"Yes. An American man took them with him at the end of the conference. I know nothing about this man, but I saw him leave for the airfield with a briefcase cuffed to his wrist."

Dudley said, "Please describe the man."

Lazaro-Schmidt said, "He was tall, and he had a southern accent."

Constanza booked a suite at the del Norte. It was insolently close to his suite and Claire. They walked through the lobby, entwined. Beth and Young Joan sat in lounge chairs and saw them. Beth scowled. Young Joan scrutinized.

His body revved, his mind raced. They'd sniffed cocaine in the cab. The seditious siblings, the gold, some elliptical gap. They hadn't discussed the heist/the fire/the gold's full origins. They assumed each other's lust for possession and possessive intent. The sibs went back with Kyoho Hanamaka. Governor Juan attended the confab and knew Meyer Gelb. His body revved, his mind raced. Tell me everything. He almost shrieked it.

They elevatored up to the suite. Constanza pushed him into the back wall and held him there with her mouth. She kissed his eyes and his neck. The doors slid open. She grabbed his waistband and pulled him down the hall. He fumbled the key out of her clutch and unlocked the suite.

The front room was all dark shapes and shadows. He kicked the door shut and pushed Constanza into a chair. He dropped to his knees and held her there with his mouth.

He threw her dress up and pulled down her stockings and underwear. Constanza drew back and hooked her legs over the width of the chair. He caught her scent. She grabbed his hair and pulled him into it.

He wanted that. He knew she knew it. He stretched her legs. He found the wet and the fit and the place. Constanza fell into Spanish. She went Sí, sí, sí, sí, sí.

She made different sounds. He learned her tones and her tastes all together. Her breath raced. She pushed up. She pitched and buckled off one drawn-out Sí. She held him there with her legs then. He'd hoped that she would.

It rained all night. They made love all night. They talked in between. It reprised his first night with Joan.

Pious you. You kill people and sense God as an innocent. You see the abrogation of all moral law in my relationship with my brother.

Yes. I disapprove and am concurrently titillated.

I disapprove of La Comunista. She is strident and indecorous. You must confirm or refute that you killed her Red lover. My brother believes that you did. He believes that my occasional lover Salvy may have assisted you.

I'll confirm or refute when I know you better. Forgive my circumspection until then.

I have never been circumspect. I despise your Red whore. She is La Comunista Estúpida. I find your young charges compelling, however. They are both of you, regardless of their blood. Young Joan possesses your ferocity, and young Beth possesses your hunger.

Your perceptions honor me, darling.

You are tall and urbane. One rarely sees that in Mexican men. My brother is urbane, but he is a shrimp.

Your brother is urbane, but not quite as perceptive as you. I rather enjoyed his perceptions of Meyer Gelb, though.

Meyer Gelb is a puto, a parasite, and an extortionist. He is an evil Stalinist, and he hates Trotskyites more than he hates fascists such as you and me. He will extort the very life's blood from our Jewish exile friends.

Betray me not, mi corazon. It would surely devastate me.

Do not tell me that. It will assure my betrayal.

Caustic you. So determined to take my measure in the course of a first-night's encounter.

One takes a lover's measure immediately or not at all. You need women to record your triumphs. You need to capitulate to women in a manner that many would find unseemly.

I commune with a wolf I met on the British moors, in 1921. He will sleep with us tonight, and he is very astute about women. He has told me that your designs are entirely felicitous, and has recently informed me that I underestimate a reckless young woman in Los Angeles. He's close to convincing me that the silly girl intends me great harm.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 7:00 A.M., 3/7/42)

I was still woozy from Otto's party, three nights ago. It wasn't a liquor hangover or a case of party-behavior regret. I barely touched booze; I abstained from flirtatiousness and cutup antics. I felt the undertow of Otto's provocative guest list. It was a nexus of criminal-case suspects, present and past.

Meyer Gelb. Jean Staley and her postcard ruse, geared to deceive my pal Elmer. Gelb's tenuous connection to the four exiled musicians. Gelb, Staley, the Lesnicks. Communist comrades in '33; party guests nine years on. Jorge Villareal-Caiz did not attend the party. Dudley Smith allegedly killed him. Claire De Haven told me that. She told me that with my hand on her breast.

I'm seated at a folding table in my backyard now; I'm ten feet from the incinerator that I use to burn rubbish. I put the incinerator to hasty use late last December; I burned the clothes I wore during my impetuous attempt to take Dudley Smith's life. Canny Claire made me for this crime. Elmer picked that nugget up during a hot-sheet surveillance. A call girl named Annie Staples was servicing Saul Lesnick.

The Claire-Dudley liaison is imploding. Claire went to Mexico with a murderous madman and now pays the price. Claire told me this herself. She told me with my hand on her breast.

Bill called me an hour ago; he bluntly stated that he and Thad Brown are now colluding. They are pushing Mike Breuning and Dick Carlisle off the klub*haus* case, while they retain my Lee Blanchard, partnered up with Hideo Ashida. Bill has characterized Hideo as a young man who perpetually "falls from shit to clover." Hideo is surely the luckiest Japanese in these parts. He has whizzed through the internment push and has secured a U.S. Army commission. Bill told me that he will soon be doubly credentialed. Double-Trouble Hideo will also serve as a war-hire policeman. He is down in Baja now, but will soon be returning. He will cut his teeth in an upcoming "pachuco sweep."

Bill Parker, fired with holy purpose and fixed upon task. Joan Conville's diary chastened and dismayed him. I'm glad I hit him in the mouth. It served to wake him up.

Bill told me that he will abet my pledge to expose false solutions to the klub*haus* case and will publicly excoriate the slaying of any and all bogus suspects. This is a direct contravention of his pledges to Dudley Smith. I have concluded that Hideo has not revealed the existence of Joan's diary or the fact that I hold possession. Hideo pines for a clean klub*haus* solve. He was robbed of a clean solve on the Watanabe case and harbors guilt for his part in the frame-up of Werewolf Shudo. I know this. Hideo's desire for a clean solve supersedes his lust for the gold and his kid crush on Dudley Smith. I know this. Hideo's desire for a clean solve transcends his bond with Dudley and Joan Conville, and cuts through all their criminal and romantic circumlocutions. I know this.

I pondered romantic triangles within a triangulated case structure. I pondered triangles in general. I thought of Brenda Allen, Elmer Jackson, and Annie Staples. A brainstorm hit. I ran inside to the phone.

Brenda's preferred meeting spot was Dave's Blue Room. She and Elmer owned a sizable percentage. Brenda's preferred pose was midmorning gin fizzes; her preferred conversational style was the full-speed monologue. One buckled in for these.

Our back booth assured privacy. The waiter brought a full pitcher of fizzes and left us alone. Brenda revved up on the war, FDR's tax bill, and her monthly bribe cut to Sheriff's Vice. She laid on the prelude and arrived at her preferred topic: her call-biz partner and part-time lover, Sergeant E. V. Jackson.

"…and I'm thinking of calling the Missing Persons Squad about this boy, Citizen. I don't care that he's got Ellen Drew on the side, or whatever else he's got going—but we're running thirty-four girls, and it's an around-the-clock enterprise that he's been neglecting while he's been working that klub*haus* job down in darktown, him all partnered up with Buzz Meeks, who I know for a fact has gunned down numerous colored and Mexican gents under dubious circumstances."

So far, so good. I arranged the klatch to get a bead on Elmer's recent actions. I sipped midmorning gin and egg whites and formulated a question. Brenda relaunched her monologue and cut straight to Jack Horrall.

"As you well know, I've got my weekly date with Call-Me-Jack, which involves perfunctory woof-woof in the missionary manner, and always on the floor, and I've got the long-standing rug burns to attest to this long-standing arrangement. Well, Jack don't take very long, and he always segues to his long-standing spiel about the woes of the big-city police chief, and this morning it's all about how your chum Whiskey Bill Parker showed up at his office last night and summarily announced that he would oppose and expose any bogus solving of the klub*haus* job, despite Jack and the Dudster's wishes, and it left Jack in a veritable tizzy, because Citizen Jack is now under Federal indictment, and vulnerable in about six trillion ways."

Bill fulfilled his pledge to me. My heart swelled. My well-aimed smack in the mouth surely did it. Brenda drained her third gin fizz and lit a cigarette; I jumped at my chance to ask a question.

"Brenda, what's going on with Elmer and Annie Staples?"

Brenda tittered and formed a circle with her left forefinger and thumb. She poked her right forefinger through the middle of the circle. It was international sign language for fuckee-fuckee.

"Well, Citizen, to begin with, Annie likes it more than she should, given that she repeatedly does it for money. Second, I told Ed Satterlee that he could use my Miracle Mile wall peek to get some footage on Annie in the kip with some Commie psychiatrist, and I heard a rumor that Elmer got embroiled in that play. I confronted him, but he refused to blab. Annie's always been too smart for her own good, which don't sit right for a line girl. To top it off, I saw Annie in Hollywood last week. She was hobknobbing with Sid Hudgens at Breneman's Ham 'n' Eggs, all huddled up thick as thieves."

(ENSENADA, 10:00 P.M., 3/7/42)

The walls were thin. His suite adjoined theirs. The walls were sound sieves. He sat at his desk and worked through the tiff.

Ashida read photostats. He'd submitted stat requests and gotten fast replies. Treasury and Alameda PD kicked loose. LAFD Arson stats had been pledged.

He read. He took notes. He sat up against a sieve wall. The two suites ran contiguous. He worked and eavesdropped.

1927. Fritz Eckelkamp's heist spree. Liquor-store jobs. Cash on hand, always. The quick in-and-out. Alameda PD snags Fritz. He falls behind multiple counts.

Claire shrieked. She defamed the Redheaded Succubus and the Nazi Half-Breed Whore. Dudley shrieked. She was the whore. She was a Dope-Addict Shrew and a Mex- and Nigger-Fucker. She fucked that Putrid Puto Jorge and that Nigger Welterweight in L.A.

Ashida read stat pages. Alameda PD supplied a background sheet. He traveled back to Weimar Berlin. Willkommen, Herr Jap.

Claire shrieked. Dudley shrieked. They traded You're the Dope Fiend barbs. Claire defamed Ace Kwan. Dudley demeaned the Jew Maestro. Claire went singsong. Somebody-stabbed-you/somebody-stabbed you/I-think-it-was-a-girl.

Fritz was a Sparticist. He fought Brownshirt thugs and swung a nail-studded plank. He robbed diamond merchants at gunpoint. He firebombed a bierhaus and fried two Brownshirts to a crisp.

Ashida wrote, "FE precedes all criminal cases and all intrigues. FE as precipitating agent? FE escapes from gold train, 5/18/31. Catalytic moment of all cases combined?"

Claire called Dudley Pussy-Whipped and Shanty Irish Scum. Dudley called Claire a Round-Heeled Poseur. A silent gap stretched. Then they laughed, then they moaned, then bedsprings creaked.

Ashida ran from it. He sat in the lobby bar and nursed a dry sherry. It was late. The lights were dim. He was the sole patron. Joan Klein messed around at the piano.

She possessed some skill. Her forte was hybrid improvisation. She melded Chopin and Gershwin tonight. Ashida caught strains of a jumpy mazurka and Concerto in F.

Young Joan. She's Dudley's and Claire's odd creature. The hotel management indulges her. She's become Spanish-fluent in record time. The head barkeep pays her a pittance to play show tunes. She wows patrons with her oddball transcriptions.

She wrapped up Chopin Meets Gershwin. She hit two sour notes and went out with a bang. Ashida applauded. Young Joan walked over and sat down with him.

She sipped his sherry, uninvited. She cleaned her glasses with his napkin. People recognized it. She had Dudley Smith's eyes.

"Comrade Chopin drank patent compounds and went insane. Comrade Gershwin died from a brain tumor. The fascist patriarchy stifles the creative class and drives them nuts."

Ashida smiled. "Comrade Stalin's agrarian purges have left four million dead. Consider that the next time you start fomenting."

Young Joan waved faux wolfsbane. "Uncle Hideo's a square, but he's not a fascist, like a certain party I could name. The jury's out on Uncle Hideo, in more ways than one."

Ashida waved faux wolfsbane. "Stop being cryptic and uncanny. Stop making with the non sequiturs and comrade talk. Nobody knows what you're talking about half the time."

Young Joan replaced her glasses. Her small eyes magnified.

"Aunt Claire took Cousin Beth and me to this swift party. Everybody talked in non sequiturs. I met Bertolt Brecht and Orson Welles. Comrade Welles squeezed my knee and called me 'cutie.' I met some swell string players from the Dresden Staatskapelle, and I drank absinthe and had visions."

Ashida grinned. He indulged the girl more than he should.

"What did you see, specifically?"

"I saw this violinist named Ruth Szigeti making the beast with two backs with Robert Taylor, while Miss Barbara Stanwyck herself watched. Then I saw this man named Comrade Meyer Gelb hit Comrade Ruth up for a blow job, and try to get her to snitch out Trotskyites in this studio orchestra."

Meyer Gelb. From the mouths of babes. This loopy child source.

"What else did you see?"

"Nothing. Visions are visions, and I'm not going to tell you I saw something

I didn't. I'm not going to lie just to entertain you, when you think I'm just a silly girl playing Mata Hari."

Ashida went Stop it. "Don't misunderstand me. I don't think that at all."

"Don't underestimate me, Uncle. If I'm just this silly girl, then why does Juan Pimentel pay me to get next to you and pump you for information?"

Pimentel was an invert. Maricón en español. Pimentel possessed sonar and radar. Pimentel sensed inversion in him.

RHIP. Ashida had master keys. They unlocked the SIS squadroom and all the file banks. He was Dudley's exec now. It covered him. Boss, I was just working late.

Pimentel perved on him. Pimentel had no shame. Pimentel corrupted a mere child and sicced her his way.

Ashida unlocked the squadroom door and hit the fluorescents. Bright tube light bore down. SIS kept intel files on all the Baja Staties. They were deemed corruption-prone.

Statie folders filled up two file banks. N to Q filled a full drawer. Green sheets detailed suspect history. Addendums listed "Possibly Related Intel."

Ashida unlocked the drawer. The Pimentel file was stuffed between Pecheco and Pizzaro. One green sheet poked out the top. Ashida plucked it and skimmed it. The sheet revealed this:

Pimentel, Juan Ramon. DOB 5/26/11. Suspect Personal History. One derogatory report.

"Arrested in raid on homosexual nightclub. 2/19/37. San Diego PD."

Ashida flipped the green sheet. Three intel notes were typed on the back.

"Subject Pimentel alleged to be highly skilled in area of telephone (payphone) technology."

"Subject Pimentel holds graduate degrees from Mexican Polytechnical Institute, Guadalajara. Purportedly attended technical institute in Germany. Purportedly knowledgeable in microdot technology."

"Subject Pimentel purportedly attended assumed subversive conference/ Ensenada, mid-11/40. Conference purportedly brought together high-ranking Soviet and Nazi intelligence officers. Subject Pimentel purportedly assigned chauffeur duties & was spotted with Abwehr Commandant Wilhelm Canaris & Gestapo chieftain Ernst Kaltenbrunner."

(SAN DIEGO, 11:00 A.M., 3/8/42)

The boys are back in town.

At this lice-lair motel. On the PD's dime. Staking Tommy G.'s PO box. To no fucking good avail.

The Seaglade Motel. Off the main drag in Dago. A hot-sheet hut for sailors and jarheads. All-nite whore traffic. One big VD stain.

Buzz read a Donald Duck comic book. He gassed on Donald's rage and perved on Daisy Duck. Elmer gabbed with Thad Brown, long-distance.

He spilled his break-in at Bev's Switchboard. Thad went Yikes. Elmer steamrolled the reaction and ran down the mail-forward scam. Link Rockwell held a box at Bev's and sent smut pix to Tommy's box in La Jolla. The pix featured klub*haus* backdrops. A white girl and Mex girl frolicked with masked men. The girls fit Ashida's snatch-hair prognostications.

Thad went Yikes. Elmer relaunched his spiel.

The post office stakeout bore no ripe fruit. Fruitcake Tommy hasn't showed. Elmer ran down the envelope in Meyer Gelb's box. It featured a La Paz PO box return address and no return name. The envelope contained blotter paper and maybe microdots.

Thad went Yikes. He told Elmer to ring Ashida—chop, chop. Tell him to check the La Paz box and apply his brain to microdots. Beyond that—chop, chop. You and Meeks go find that Tommy fuck.

Elmer went Yeah, boss. Buzz read his comic book. Thad laid out some hot PD dish.

Whiskey Bill keestered Jack Horrall. Ouch!—straight up the shit chute. Bill pulled Breuning and Carlisle off of the klub*haus* job. Bill told Jack he'd quash a bogus-suspect solve. Ouch!—Bill keestered Dudley Smith.

Elmer went Yikes. Buzz tapped his wristwatch—wrap this shit up. Thad motor-mouthed. He said Parker's wrangling a material-witness writ. Link Rockwell's at some Navy flight school in Florida. Parker wants to extradite him. Jack Horrall's dragging his heels.

Elmer went Yikes. Thad went Chop, chop, you dumb hayseeds. Thad went Quit jerking off and go to work.

They restaked the post office. The posh hamlet cocooned them. La Jolla was swanksville. Cypress trees and golf courses. Nice stores with candy-cane awnings. A nifty beach close by.

The stakeout was yawnsville. They pondered a more direct approach. Brace the Postal Inspection Service. Have the postal cops dump Tommy's PO box.

They discussed it. They nixed it. This was a strongarm job. The postal cops would demur. They had to snatch Tommy. They had to hurl some hurt on him before they dumped him on Thad.

Swanksville. Yawnsville. They sat in Elmer's civilian sled and evinced ennui.

Buzz said, "Maybe Tommy ducked down to T.J. He's bored, so he's thinking he'll go catch the donkey show and see his pal Huey. I say we go down there and stir up some shit."

Elmer said, "We overstirred the shit the last time we went down there. I say we check with SDPD Burglary. We're brother officers looking for a hot-prowl man. They might have some fresh cases and some leads they could share."

SDPD was close by the Seaglade. That greased the skids. They drove over and parked in a visitor's slot. The building was whitewashed adobe and two stories high. They walked up to the DB. Dago was a turkey town. Burglary Division was one fat-slob cop.

The dink sat in a gnat-sized office. His desk plate read SGT. LEW SARNI. They walked in, deliberate. The dink shook himself awake.

"L.A., right? You've got that look. You're down here on a job, and you need a hand."

The dink dwarfed his dink-sized desk. Elmer and Buzz straddled chairs and faced him. They lit up cigars. Elmer tossed the dink a one-dollar Cuban. It bounced on his desk.

"We're looking for a hot-prowl geek named Tommy Glennon. He's a homo, but he rapes women. He's got a postal box in La Jolla, and we thought you might have made him for some incidents down here."

Buzz slid the dink a mug-shot strip. The dink lit the cigar and studied the fotos.

"We've got a series of 459/rapes, and your guy matches the suspect's description. The victims are all Navy women, working out of Point Loma. Navy CID's handling it, because they make the rape-o for a sailor. The guy's vicious, and he's pulled six jobs so far, but the whole thing's going nowhere."

Elmer said, “That’s it?”

The dink savored his cigar. He flicked ash and went Yum-yum.

“No, that isn’t it. A Wave officer called us and reported a man following her and skulking around her apartment house. He matches your guy’s and our suspect’s description, but CID and the DB here can’t spare a stakeout team or a woman cop to play decoy.”

Buzz whipped out his flash roll. He peeled off two yards and dropped them on the desk.

“Let us handle it. What CID don’t know won’t hurt them.”

The dink coughed cigar smoke. “Well…uh…I like to accommodate the L.A. boys whenever I can.”

Elmer said, “Give us the Wave’s statistics. We’ll take it from there.”

Ensign Margaret May Mewshaw. An Omaha transplant. Ensign Meg lived in Pacific Beach. She lived alone and had no boyfriend. She lived in a second-floor/street-facing crib. It was a two-crib stucco building. Outside stairs led up to her door.

They waited for dusk. They hunkered in and car-sat across the street. Ensign Meg was home alone. They brought a short dog of 151 rum. It got them lubricated and motivized.

It was late-winter warm. Ensign Meg kept her front window cracked and the shades up. She played the radio. Bucky Beaver shilled Ipana toothpaste. Charlie Barnet played “Cherokee.”

Ensign Meg schlepped around in her slip. She was a big blonde. She had that Annie Staples scope and je ne sais quoi. Elmer got erotified. Tommy G. was a leg man. Ensign Meg had legs from Dago to Detroit.

Elmer said, “I don’t get it. Tommy’s a fruit, but he rapes women.”

Buzz said, “Sex is powerful juju.”

“Moonlight Serenade” drifted over. Elmer yawned. That tune and 151 put him dozy. He wisped off somewhere. He saw Wayne Frank in a limousine packed with gold bars. He saw Dudley in the green room at San Quentin. Buzz went Ssshhh and elbowed him awake.

“Hush now. We got a prowler.”

Elmer rubbed his eyes and looked out his window. This jamoke stood by the stairs. He’s wearing gloves. He’s holding a tool pouch. He’s pivoting to creep upward. Hold the phone, mama. It’s Tommy Glennon.

They bolted the sled and ran over. They crouched low at the foot of the stairs. Tommy stood outside Ensign Meg’s door. He brandished a lock pick and blew on it for luck. Buzz kicked a tin can, accidental. Tommy heard it and glanced down the stairs.

He saw the boys. He was trapped-rat confined. He dropped the pick and pulled a shiv and charged down the stairs.

Elmer charged up. He pulled his belt sap and crashed Tommy low. Tommy stabbed down and snagged his sport coat. Elmer sap-slammed a nut shot and cartwheeled him. Tommy screeched and tumbled ass over elbows.

He hit the ground, all bruised and splayed. Buzz rabbit-punched him and bashed his head on a stair ledge. Elmer tripped down the stairs and cuffed his hands behind his back.

They cuff-dragged him across the street. They made the sled in one split second. Elmer unlocked the trunk. They dumped Tommy in and slammed the trunk shut. Ensign Meg looked out her window. What's all this ruckus? Elmer blew her a kiss.

Tommy thunked around in the trunk. Buzz jumped in the car. Elmer got behind the wheel and burned tread. They had a spot all picked out. The caustic-sewage dump behind the Point Loma base.

Elmer wheeled them there, rapid. The spot adjoined an air-artillery range. The dump was barb-wired up. Caustic gack bubbled and gurgled. Evil swamp creatures gamboled within.

Elmer brodied up to the fence. He got out and unlocked the trunk. Buzz got out and jerked Tommy up on his feet. Tommy was beat-on and green at the gills. Buzz tossed him in the backseat and scooched him toward the middle. Elmer got in and sandwich-jobbed him on the other side.

Tommy huffed and squirmed. Elmer tapped the roof light and halo-lit him. Buzz pulled his throwdown piece. He popped the cylinder and flashed the six-bullet load.

Elmer said, "We got some questions."

Tommy quiver-quaked. Buzz dumped five bullets and spun the cylinder. He snapped it shut and winked at Tommy. He put the muzzle to his head and pulled the trigger twice.

The hammer hit empty chambers. Tommy wriggled and squealed. Elmer said, "We got some questions."

Buzz held up his piece. He spun the cylinder and snapped it shut. He winked at Tommy.

Tommy said, "Fuck your mother."

Buzz put the muzzle to his head and pulled the trigger. The hammer hit an empty chamber. Tommy wriggled and squealed. Elmer said, "We got some questions."

Tommy wriggled and squealed. Tommy bleated and squealed. Tommy said, "Okay, okay, okay."

Elmer said, "You dropped your address book New Year's Eve. I guess you figured that out."

Buzz said, "There's some names we were curious about."

Elmer relit a cigar. "Let's start with Eddie Leng. The number to his slop chute was right there in your book."

Tommy coughed. He was bruised and contused. He talked, squeaky-frail.

"Eddie was an old pal of mine. He was a terp man. He was all tonged up, and he got snuffed in C-town on New Year's Eve. You're climbing the wrong tree if you think I did it. It was this Jap, Don Matsura. He had a terp still at his place in J-town, and he peddled terp to the Japs and the Chinks. He hung himself in the Lincoln Heights Jail, but Ace Kwan might have helped him."

Buzz said, "You're in the know, son."

Elmer fed Tommy a jolt of 151. Tommy gulped and coughed out residue. Elmer caught a residual spritz.

"What else you got on Eddie and Don Matsura? You got any KAs for them?"

Tommy coughed. "How's Cal Lunceford sound? He was this shitheel cop on the Alien Squad, but he's dead now. It was in the papers. Some ex-caped Jap shot him. Cal was Fifth Column, and he was in with Eddie and Don Matsura, plus a whole lot of other shitheels. Before you ask, I ain't got no proper names."

Elmer fed Tommy a jolt of 151. Tommy sucked it in and kept it down.

Buzz said, "St. Vibiana's. What's going on there? What's with you and Monsignor Joe Hayes?"

Tommy said, "Come on, don't make me say it."

Buzz said, "I'll say it for you. You and the monsignor travel the dirt road together. You're both Coughlinites and Jew-haters. Let me hazard a guess here. Being tight with priests got you juice with Dudley Smith."

The roof light haloed Tommy. He got this caged-mick look.

"I snitched for Dud. I'm pals with Dud's boy Huey Cressmeyer. I ran wets for Carlos Madrano, so you could say I been around and know some people you might be interested in. Dud visited me in Quentin, last November. I put the squeeze on him, which I shouldn't have done. Dud put your cracker pal, Mike the B., and Dick the C. on me, but I got away, because your cracker pal here didn't have the stones to shoot me."

Elmer brain-strained it. Tommy extorts Dudley. Let's call his shakedown wedge this:

Winter '39. That Nazi costume bash. Tommy gets a biiiiiiiiiig eyeful. Dud slays that he-she bitch.

Buzz pat-patted Tommy. Good snitch dog. Let's give him a treat.

He snatched the 151 and fed him two jolts. Tommy coughed and joy-kicked the front seat.

Buzz said, "Let's get back to the address book. What's with that hot-box phone, by the Herald."

Tommy said, "I was relaying gibberish calls. It was all dot-dash-dot, dog-cat-pig, code shit that means something if you know how to decode it. My call scripts got patched through to a bookie drop in Ensenada, and I got the scripts at my mail drop in L.A. It was all through what you call cutouts, so I never knew who was writing the scripts or giving the orders. I got this sort-of tip from a Mex bookie who was forwarding the messages. He told me they were going to this political guy and his sister in La Paz, but then he clammed up."

Elmer said, "Come on, there's got to be more there."

Tommy coughed. "Okay, okay, okay. The bookie guy zipped it, but I extrapolated some shit, because Fifth Column's Fifth Column, and it's all one big sort-of-happy family, which sure loves to talk. I know Deutsches Haus guys, guys with the Mex Staties, and guys from that nutso 46th Street place. I know things just as good as I know all these guys. I know Dud killed Carlos Madrano, I know there were some sub-berth killings in Baja, and it was all part of a play to pass Japs off as Chinks, and—"

Elmer cut in. "Eddie Leng was tight with a Chinatown doctor named Lin Chung. You're a guy who knows guys, so I'm wondering if you know him."

Tommy smirked. "I know Lin. Everybody knows Lin, including a notable dead guy named Eddie Leng, who don't know him no more."

Buzz poked him. "Don't string this out. Finish whatever it is that you got to say."

Tommy resmirked. "Okay, okay, okay. Eddie was tight with Lin, and Lin was tight with these rich white guys who were behind that first sub landing. Eddie introduced me to Lin, and Lin said the second landing was the work of a left-wing/right-wing alliance, and they were setting up some kind of postwar reconciliation deal. They're pulling all sorts of evil shit in the here and now, but they intend to make themselves look good by exposing it after this war is over."

Elmer brain-braced it. "Was Dud embroiled in any of this?"

Tommy laughed. "Nein to that. Dud leans Fifth Column, but it's just a cocktease. He loves Nazi threads and regalia, but he ain't no saboteur. He's just some kind of fetishist."

Buzz said, "Let's revisit the klub*haus.*"

Tommy said, "Goody. That sounds like kicks."

Elmer said, "Link Rockwell. Them smut pix he planned to send from his mail drop to yours."

Buzz flashed the key pix. Elmer shot good camera dupes. You've got two women. One's white, one's Mex. There's that klub*haus* backdrop.

Tommy shrugged. "If you're asking me who the two janes are, I don't know. They're just jazz-club chippies out for distraction."

Elmer said, “We’re here, and we’re all ears. Give us some more on the klub*haus.”*

Tommy said, “I’m parched. Give me another nip first.”

Buzz grabbed his hair and pulled his head back. It stretched his mouth wide. Buzz juked in the juice.

Tommy gargled it and kept it down. Buzz wiped his hand pomade-free. Tommy’s mouth snapped shut. He went electrizized. He looked sloshed, slammed, and slathered to shit.

“I like this stuff you’re slipping me. It makes me want to hot-prowl and commit some swell misdeeds.”

Elmer said, “The klub*haus.* Let’s get back to that.”

Tommy squirmed. He was cuffed tight. Steel ratchets gouged his wrists. The evil punk bloodied up the backseat.

“The smut pix were just some Link Rockwell deal. Beyond that, the klub*haus* was just this place where anything goes.”

Elmer gnawed his cigar. “Our lab guy found jizz stains and fecal matter on an upstairs bed. That reads ‘queer shit’ to me.”

Tommy went C’est la vie. “I hid out at the klub*haus* for a week, after you blew that stakeout on me. Okay, I knew Wendell Rice and Georgie Kapek, but just to say hi to. I knew they were cops, and I knew they were Fifth Column, but then so’s everybody else in the exalted Thomas Malcolm Glennon’s world.”

Buzz sighed. “The ‘queer shit,’ Tommy.”

Elmer sighed. “Chop, chop, you pervert. It’d delight me to put some hurt on you.”

Tommy yawned. It was I’m-so-bored stagy. Elmer bitch-slapped him. Tommy licked blood off his lips and rebounded quick.

“Okay, ‘queer shit,’ a topic dear to my heart. I didn’t really know Rice and Kapek, but I knew they were afraid of this queer kid who hung out on the jazz strip and brought boys to the klub*haus* for some pokey-pokey. He was a blondie kid, sort of tall, maybe some kind of musician, and he was pals with a crazy Jap that Rice and Kapek busted, but the Jap made habeas and got himself sprung. Now, Mr. Jap was a sword man. Rice and Kapek popped him with this big blood-caked sword, and after he waltzed, he became a sure-as-shit klub*haus* regular. He used to kill chickens for all these slop chutes in J-town, and he licked the blood off the swords that he used.”

Elmer brained-snagged it. He witnessed that log-in. Rice and Kapek/the blood-flecked sword. This could be good. Paperwork might still exist.

Buzz said, “The haus, Tommy. Keep going there.”

“What’s to tell? It was too crazy for me, so I vamoosed.”

Elmer said, “What did you squeeze Dudley with?”

Tommy said, "Brace yourself, daddy. Dud snuffed a drag boy at a party. Huey C. and I witnessed the whole thing. I'll give you my long-held opinion on that, for what it's worth. Dud knew that she was really a he, and he was loooving the encounter until something flipped his switch."

Elmer looked at Buzz. Buzz looked at Elmer. They both orbed Tommy G.

Buzz said, "Kyoho Hanamaka? Ring a bell?"

Tommy said, "Nix."

Elmer said, "José Vasquez-Cruz. His aka's Jorge Villareal-Caiz."

Tommy said, "Ixnay."

Buzz said, "Archie Archuleta?"

Tommy said, "I knew that pendejo. I used to see him at the klub*haus,* and from what I heard, he was a notable J-town and C-town crawler. He was cinched up with more strange-o's than you can count, and he veered Fifth Column right. He knew Mex girls who'd pose for smut pictures, and he knew Sinarquista heist guys and set them up with Rice and Kapek, to buy these guns they'd confiscated from these Japs they'd tossed in the clink. RIP, Archie. He was a white man, as much as any Mex can be."

Elmer soft-lobbed it. "This Commie girl, Jean Staley. How come she's in your book?"

Tommy drop-jawed that one. He's gone on 151. He's all stage ham now.

"Jean's been known to play Red, but she's been a Federal snitch since the ice age. She was in a CP cell back in the '30s, while she was meanwhile tattling to her handler and running shakedowns on movie people and her fellow Reds with this yid, Meyer Gelb. Meyer's a ganef and a penguin-fucker from way back. There's nothing he ain't done or considered doing. He got Jean shaking down these Trotskyites he hates, because he's a Stalinist, and these Red-faction humps hate other Red-faction humps more than they hate confirmed fascistos like yours truly."

Elmer digested it. Tommy credentialed it. Jean, baby—say it ain't so.

Buzz wiggled the 151. "Bottoms up, Tommy."

Stage Ham Tommy. He goes all rubber-faced.

"I've heard that one before, but I have to add that I'm the brunser, more than the punk."

Elmer cringed. Buzz bottle-fed Tommy. The stage ham smacked his lips. The backseat socked in heat. Elmer rolled down his window and breathed deep.

"What's Meyer got Jean doing now? There's a picture of you three at the Club Alabam, just last week."

"Souvenir pictures are the blahs, hoss. They send girl photographers around, and Meyer always succumbs."

"I asked you a question, fucker."

"Okay, okay, okay. The answer is shakedowns. That's the Jean and Meyer bailiwick. This time, they're putting it to these left-wing musicians that got so-called rescued from der Führer's clutches, to make the so-called rescuers look good when Uncle Sambo wins the war. You sound me, muchacho? Meyer's setting Jean up to extort them and recruit them as informants."

One more time. Jean, darling—say it ain't so.

"How dirty is she?"

"She's a mud hen from way back, hoss. She goes back to that Kraut hump, Fritz Eckelkamp. Does that name ring a bell? He ex-caped from that gold train that got robbed back when I was still in pigtails. Jean got around and gets around, and she sure plays Jezebel in the process. She was married to a pathetic geek named Ralph D. Barr. Ralphie set fires and yanked his crank when the fire engines showed up. He was a suspect for that big Griffith Park fire, but he was a small-blaze specialist and got absolved. Jean told me he was hung microscopic."

Elmer looked at Buzz. Buzz looked at Elmer. They both orbed Tommy G.

Buzz said, "'Fifth Column's Fifth Column.' We get that. Past that, have you got a specific source for what you been feeding us?"

Tommy made horn-call sounds. Tommy blew a loooooong fanfare.

"Hold your hats, race fans. We're at Del Mar, and my #1 nag is at the gate. He's my #1 source for Fifth Column scuttlebutt, and he's none other than your ex-chief, James Edgar Davis."

Buzz looked at Elmer. Elmer looked at Buzz. They both orbed Tommy G.

Buzz sighed. "It's getting late. Tell us something we don't know."

Tommy blew a long fanfare. He wet his pants for such shtick.

"All in all, I've raped twenty-three women. I killed two bags in Frisco and a thin cooze at a truck stop in Visalia. I killed an old Jew lady in South Beach and did a necrophile job on her. I made like Dracula and drank her blood, and I yanked out all her gold teeth."

Buzz grabbed a loose seat cushion. He clamped it over Tommy's head and pulled his belt piece. He pumped a full clip into Tommy's face. Blood and cushion stuffing exploded. Shots tore out the trunk ledge and ricocheted. A skull chunk hit Elmer's cheek.

Buzz said, "I got me an old granny who's one-sixty-fourth Jewish. I don't condone that sort of grief."

(SANTO TOMAS, 12:00 P.M., 3/9/42)

The Wolf growled and paced. This bluffside spot vexed him. Swooping gulls and salt spray. A dirt parking lot. Tables perched close to a cliff.

Dudley sat outside. The spot induced vertigo. He'd called the meet. Salvy suggested this cantina. They served Baja's best mariscos.

Mucho carros jammed up the lot. The Mex Army favored El Dumpo. It was their place. They ignored the rats clustered by the kitchen. The cantina was subramshackle. Army staff cars brodied on loose dirt. Dudley ate exhaust fumes.

He sipped lukewarm beer. His table overlooked the lot and a hundred-foot drop. Mex soldiers chortled all around him.

He was furious. He conceded Fear. Bill Parker enlisted Thad Brown and applied a vise squeeze. Parker levied his no-false-solution decree and sandbagged Jack Horrall. He violated the Smith-Parker truce. He slammed Jack H. and offered up an irresistible concession. Parker said he'd erase every bug and tap recording now in Fed custody. This action would spark courtroom acquittals for Jack and his gang. Fletch Bowron, Ray Pinker, the Jamie kid. All the lesser defendants. Poof!—all would go free.

Parker pulled Mike and Dick off the klub*haus* job. Pinker stymied Jack H. there. Elmer Jackson put Mike in Queen of Angels. Call-Me-Jack nixed reprisals. Parker has adroitly nullified one Dudley Liam Smith.

Salvy was late. Dudley chain-smoked. He conceded Fear. Parker's machinations depleted his ranks. They left him with Hideo Ashida, todos.

Hideo was newly war-hired. He was partnered up with lackluster Lee Blanchard. Jackson and Meeks were off to hell and gone. Their partnership spelled chaos. Hideo came through and supplied hope.

Brilliant lad. He turned up an old Arson Squad accelerant swatch. It derived from the Griffith Park fire. He compared it to a klub*haus*-blaze swatch and got a match. The match linked two crimes spaced nearly nine years apart.

Dudley chain-smoked. He conceded Fear. The Wolf bodyguarded him. Constanza returned to La Paz. He missed her. His union with Claire had imploded. Beth was poised in retreat. The promotion-party incident unhinged her. Claire was up in L.A. She was prowling for new lovers there. He knew that.

Salvy was late. More Mex soldaten arrived. They drove custom-fitted U.S. confiscations. Special tailpipes. Hood-mounted BARs. Bleeding-saint and snarling-panther paint jobs.

They stomped three abreast. They entered the cantina and commandeered outside tables. They pinched waitresses and demanded fast service. "Neutral" Mexico. Soon to be Allied-allied. Axis in temperament and aesthetic.

Salvy showed. A car appeared, he appeared, el carro peeled off. Salvy employed Greenshirt flunkies. They chauffeured him and groomed him. He appeared more than arrived.

Dudley stood up. They exchanged abrazos. Hail-fellows-well-met. Men's men, por vida. Two damn good backslappers.

"My dear comrade."

"Mi mayor. Will you be content to stop there, or do you wish to rise to four-star general?"

Dudley laughed. "I'm a police sergeant in my heart and soul, lad. I was one when this war started, and I'll be one when this war ends."

Salvy laughed. "You are an entrepreneur, a strategist, and a treasure seeker. I am humbled and gratified by your generous pledge to our shared cause."

Dudley poured two beers. They clicked tankards and sat down at the table. The Wolf trembled. That cliffside drop loomed.

Dudley lit a cigarette. "I bear discomfiting news from Los Angeles. My errant police colleagues are determined to round up a large number of young Mexican men, who they believe may have frequented that damnable klub*haus.* I'm afraid that quite a few stout Sinarquista lads may fall into this melee. My colleagues are looking for guns, sold out of the klub*haus.* You had assured me our East L.A. lads were not klub*haus* affiliates, but I need you to convincingly reassure me now."

Salvy lit a cigarette. "Yes, of course. I am grateful to have been informed of this, and you have my most sincere reassurance."

Dudley sipped beer. It was warm. The Wolf prowled adjacent tables. He sniffed raucous Mex soldiers and growled.

"I require another assurance, as well. I proffer this request couched in my utmost respect for you as a comrade and a man. I have become involved with Constanza Lazaro-Schmidt, and I have been informed that you are her occasional lover. I request that you terminate this relationship, and that you sever all contact with Constanza immediately."

Salvy blinked once. Dudley blinked once. Salvy stubbed out his cigarette.

His veins pulsed.

"You have my assurance, but I will issue a warning along with it. Constanza and her brother are shamefully as one, and they are more utilitarian than ideologically fascist. I have given you my pledge and additional caveat, and we need not mention this matter again. I commend you for not threatening me and blowing this trivial request out of proportion."

The Wolf growled. He smelled Salvy's rage. He saw his pulsing veins and incipient tremors. Salvy checked his wristwatch. He went uno, dos, tres—and winked.

The cantina exploded. It went up, just like that. It's a fireball. There's blasted-out glass and wood shrapnel. There's smoke, flames, and palm trees ignited. Detonation equals earthquake.

The outside soldaten ran for their cars. They trampled civilians and kicked over tables and chairs. They tumbled into their taco wagons and slammed bumpers, en masse. It was straight from the Keystone Kops.

The inside soldaten ran outside. They stumbled over scorched timber and screamed. Twelve men, todos. They pitched crazy-spastic, in flames.

Salvy said, "Priest-killers and nun-rapers. Redshirts of the Calles regime."

A car pulled off the coast road and skidded into the lot. Four Greenshirts piled out. They held sawed-off shotguns. They dodged flying debris and ran up to the burning men.

They pumped buckshot into them. They severed limbs on fire. A burning man staggered and knocked over tables. Dudley pulled his piece and fumbled it. The burning man got close. Salvy pulled his piece and shot him dead.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 2:00 P.M., 3/9/42)

Annie Staples arrived in her work clothes. That meant tartan skirt, crewneck sweater, and saddle shoes. She was Elmer and Brenda's college girl, and pitched her charms to men thrice her age. Brenda set up the lunch and urged Annie to be forthcoming. We met at Jack's Drive-in on the Strip.

Annie was blond. She was tall, leggy, and busty, and hailed from Coeur d'Alene, Idaho. We dined in my car. Monarch burgers and pineapple malts. I understood Annie's allure. She was all college girl. Bill Parker would flip for her.

We made small talk during our lunch; Annie guilelessly dished on her tricks and told me she once spent a cozy weekend with the allegedly straitlaced Thad Brown. She tricked with Wendell Willkie during the '40 campaign, and said he was a sweetheart. Our carhop skated by and removed our trays; we lit cigarettes and settled down to business.

I said, "Brenda saw you with Sid Hudgens at Tom Breneman's. I sense a story there."

Annie blew smoke rings. "Well, I'd call it a complicated story."

"Those are my favorite kind."

"Brenda told me you know some of it already, because you know about her trick spots, and you're such good friends with Elmer Jackson. She said you know Sid, and you've met Ed Satterlee, and they're part of the story, too."

I said, "L.A.'s a small town for a big town, and I've been ensnared with the PD for a good three years. You tend to run into men like that, in the course of things."

Annie thought that was a hoot. She doused her cigarette in her coffee cup and chuckled a bit. She had changeling's eyes. One veered blue, one veered green.

"You tend to run into men like that, and I tend to sleep with them. You could say I ran a parlay with Elmer, Sid, and Ed, and Ed was the one who put me to good use, beyond the old you know what."

Elmer and I gabbed at Hideo Ashida's swearing-in party. He spilled the beans. I told Annie that I was up to speed on her shakedown gig with Ed the Fed. The mark was Dr. Saul Lesnick. Elmer filled in for Ed behind the camera one night. He caught wind of Annie pumping Dr. Saul. It got him thinking—and Elmer thinks impulsively, at best.

Annie said, "Well, sister, you've got most of it."

"Ed was interested in sexual and political dirt, wasn't he? Mr. Hoover gets his jollies that way, and you never know when dirt like that can be useful."

"Yep. That's the gist of it."

"Confirm this, will you? That first night Elmer ran the camera. Dr. Saul was discussing his patient Claire De Haven."

"That's right. Claire, the rich-girl Communist. Her and her cop lover, down in Mexico. Claire said you tried to kill the lover, but old Saul didn't believe it. The upshot is that Elmer heard all this, and he offered me money to wear a microphone and go to Otto Klemperer's parties, and ratchet up my pump job on old Saul."

I said, "Because Elmer wanted to keep tabs on Dr. Saul, and Claire always attended those parties, and Elmer was curious about what she might say regarding Dudley Smith."

Annie smiled. She was truly big-girl lovely. Call her Ingrid Bergman, with ten thousand chromosomes askew.

"Elmer was very curious about Mr. Smith, and I think he's got some kind of vendetta going against him. I told Elmer a little tale that old Saul told me, where Mr. Smith beat up Orson Welles, because he had a sort-of deal going with Claire. Elmer said he'd like to wire me up to pump Mr. Welles, which I'd do for free, if Mr. Welles lost some weight."

Brenda called Elmer "shakedown happy." This jibed with something I knew about him. He was a canny judge of character and voyeuristically inclined.

Annie ordered a second malt. Brenda thought she looked best on the sturdy-milkmaid side. I asked her how Sid Hudgens played into all this. She told me Sid was shakedown happy, all on his own, apart from Elmer and Ed. Join the crowd, Sid. Annie Staples knows from shakedowns.

Sid wanted dirt on film folk and politicians. He was putting out a sub-rosa scandal sheet and wanted dirt too hot for the Herald. He tried to recruit Annie as his very own Venus flytrap. She was still considering his pitch.

Annie's second malt arrived; she dunked her straw and siphoned the goo in a wink. Annie played a cameo role in Joan Conville's diary. Joan observed her futzing with her microphone outside Otto Klemperer's guesthouse. I teethed on the nexus of the whole three-case megillah. It was Meyer Gelb's cell and how the four surviving members still hovered in plain sight. The Cell. What old Saul might know and might have written down.

And Annie Staples was sitting right beside me. She's a one-woman nexus. In the market for a shakedown shill? Annie's the tops.

She had malted-milk residue on her upper lip. She's about five-foot-ten and built like a discus queen. I grabbed my napkin and daubed the goo off her lip. Annie likes people to touch her.

"I know that old Saul is a Federal informant, and that he reports to Ed Satterlee. Do you know if his informant duty went back to the early '30s, when he was in a Communist cell?"

"No, I don't think so. I think he signed on with Ed more recently than that, because his daughter was in prison for vehicular manslaughter, and Ed used that as a wedge to turn Saul out as his fink."

I lit a cigarette and thought about Elmer. He'd gone AWOL from Crash Squad briefings; Lee told me this.

Annie said, "Penny for your thoughts."

I said, "I was thinking about Elmer."

"What's there to think about? I'm in love with him, and he's in love with you."

I laughed. Elmer and his dead brother, Elmer and his shakedown girl. Early wartime L.A. The pursuit of the big main chance.

Annie jiggled the charms on her charm bracelet. Little dogs, doghouses, arrows piercing hearts.

"But Ed did have a snitch in Saul's cell back then, and Saul and Andrea didn't know it. It was this woman named Jean, and she was no kind of Red. Ed dished her to me. He said she's still in cahoots with this Meyer guy who ran the cell, even though the cell's dissolved. Jean used to be married to some crazy firebug. This Meyer guy's going to get her to shake down these exile musicians."

I said, "I'll pay you a thousand dollars to make wax impressions of all the keys that Dr. Saul carries."

Annie detached a little dog charm. She placed it in my hand and gave me a squeeze. She said, "For luck, sweetie. Because where you're going with all this, you're sure going to need it."

"Annie, will you—"

"Sure, sweetie. It's not like I've never caught him with his trousers off."

93

(LOS ANGELES, 3:00 P.M., 3/10/42)

Army brass. War-hire cop now. His luck holds. He's serendipitous and fuckstruck.

The Hollenbeck muster room was cluttered and cramped. The reduced Crash Squad was all ears.

The boys straddled chairs and faced Thad Brown. Ashida, Elmer Jackson, Buzz Meeks. Lee Blanchard and Bill Parker. Cigarette and cigar smoke/one big iron lung.

Ashida side-eyed Elmer J. Elmer's outburst still rankled. Jap, Jap, Jap. Elmer stooped to that.

Thad said, "We've got nine male Mexicans on our roust list. We need to determine whether or not Rice and Kapek sold them Japanese-confiscated guns. They filed no gun-confiscation paperwork, so we've got no comparison sheets to check against any guns we bag tonight. What we do have is the threat of illegal possession of firearms and possibly related armed robberies, to use as a wedge to extract information on our homicides."

Blanchard said, "Say it, boss. 211 pops will make us look good, if this whole job dips south."

Elmer said, "Blanchard's a pessimist."

Buzz said, "Blanchard's a Bolshevik."

Thad rolled his eyes. "We've got three squads tonight. There's Captain Parker and me, Jackson and Meeks, Blanchard and Ashida. On a related topic, that Navy chump Link Rockwell's in custody down in Florida. A naval district judge should be issuing an extradition ruling soon."

Elmer said, "Anchors away, whipdick."

Buzz said, "Link's tight as ticks with the Reverend Mimms. They're the world's foremost salt-and-pepper act."

Parker said, "We're going out tonight, and we muster here at 1930 hours. Shotguns, riot gear, and one paddy wagon per squad. Go home and sack out.

We'll be stretching these humps all night."

Buzz whistled. Blanchard whooped. They dogged Parker and Brown out to the hallway. Elmer kicked the door shut. Ashida gulped. Elmer pulled his chair up close.

"I'm sorry, Hideo. I shouldn't have said what I said. It was plain wrong of me, and I apologize."

Ashida stuck his hand out. Elmer bone-crushed it. Ashida mock-winced.

"I understand. You've been seething since you met with Kay, and I more than warranted your outburst."

Elmer displayed an envelope. He waved it and pulled out a sheet of soft-bond paper. Ashida saw faint spots. They resembled pinpricks dipped in soluble oil.

"Where did you get this?"

"At Bev's Switchboard. You know, that loopy mail drop in West Hollywood. It was in Meyer Gelb's mail-holding file, and it was addressed to a PO box in La Paz, down in Baja."

Ashida touched the sheet. It was high-rag content and top-grade absorbent.

"It's microdots. We'll need a microdot camera to bring up the text."

Elmer whooped. "I knew that was it. I saw a piece about that shit in Reader's Digest."

Mail drops. Meyer Gelb. The dicey Lazaro-Schmidts hailed from La Paz.

"Hideo's in a trance. He's hanging out the 'Genius at Work' sign."

Ashida laughed. "We can't bring up the text without that camera."

"What about a plain old microscope? Could that get us in close?"

Ashida said, "Meet me at the lab. I'll see what I can do."

They two-carred over and hooked up at six. The day-shift chemists had clocked out. Ashida locked them in. Elmer jammed a chair under the doorknob.

Ashida scissor-cut the paper and shaped three equal strips. Elmer watchdogged the process. Ashida rigged a microscope and slide-clamped swatch #1. He dialed down to maximum range. Faint ink blurs appeared.

He ran swatch #2 and swatch #3. He got eight more ink blurs.

Ashida shook his head. Elmer went Shit. Ashida placed the strips back in the envelope and resealed it.

"There's something you should know, Elmer."

"Let me guess. You can't withhold this here lead from Dudley, like you withheld Kay's spiel on Joan Conville's diary."

Ashida balled his fists and fumed. He despised that mannerism. It made him look eff—

Elmer woofed him. "You're on the fence about Dud now, aren't you? I'm not all that surprised. Kay wouldn't have clued you in if she thought you'd tattle to him. And here's something you might want to consider. Maybe Kay's smarter than you are, and maybe she's cooking up something good."

Ashida stomped one foot. Elmer haw-hawed. Ashida walked to the mail slot and dropped the envelope in.

"It's out of our hands now. I might be on the fence, and I might not be. You've got the box number in La Paz as a lead, and that's it."

Elmer stomped one foot. He did good impersonations. He mimed effete rage, c'est bon.

"You're trumping me, Hideo. I'm coming out second-best here."

Ashida walked to his locker. He turned away from Elmer and unlocked it. He grabbed the gold bar off the top shelf.

Robbery swag. Thirty-three pounds plus. Worth twenty grand, U.S.

He turned and faced Elmer. Come, let us adore it. He held it out, worship me–style.

Elmer trembled and dropped his cigar. He lurched and bumped a glassware shelf. A glass beaker toppled and shattered on the floor.

Ashida said, "Take it. Your brother died for this, and I don't want it anymore."

Elmer picked up his cigar. He looked electrified. He dredged half a voice.

"What do you want?"

"A clean solve on the klub*haus* job."

Elmer kicked glass under a work desk. He brushed ash off his suit coat and went Nyet. Ashida placed the bar back in his locker. He tossed a lab rag over it. Gold as holy sacrament. Men died for this.

"Tell me how you turned the lead on Bev's Switchboard."

Elmer said, "It commenced with Jean Staley. I braced her, and she jobbed me out of my socks. We had a nifty first date, and then she plain vanished. I started getting postcards from U.S. 66, but Jean was really here in L.A. Bev's Switchboard was stiffing the cards and jobbing up the postal cancellations."

D. L. Smith on E. V. Jackson. He's half smart here and there. He trips on his dick otherwise.

"I need those cards. They may contain microdots, inserted between the inside and outside pieces of cardboard. I'll take them back to Ensenada with me. I might be able to locate a microdot camera there."

Elmer said, "Okay, boss."

Ashida said, "I'll try to work out a truce for you and Buzz. Keep the bar. I'm sure Dudley will accept that concession."

"All I want is a fair shot at whoever killed my brother. It has to be a plain murder. The gold's just a way in to figure all that out."

Ashida bowed. "I lost my taste for the gold when Joan died. All I want is a shot at a solve."

Elmer relit his cigar. Lab fumes and hot ash. Ignition, combustion, explos—

"I got no beef with that. You're Dud's boy, so you handle everything pertaining to that fucker."

"That's fine, but he'll want to know how you know whatever you know, and we have to keep Kay and Joan's diary out of it."

Elmer said, "You're right, boss."

Ashida said, "You should know something. You should know that I'll reveal whatever I learn at the sweep tonight to Dudley."

Elmer said, "You should know that fence-sitters tend to teeter and fall. You should also know that Buzz and me did Dud quite the solid. You know our missing chum, Tommy Glennon? Buzz and me braced him and killed him."

Ashida teetered. The fence wobbled. The floor dipped.

"What did he tell you?"

"My lips are sealed, boss."

94

(LOS ANGELES, 8:30 P.M., 3/10/42)

The boys are back in town.

El Towno said it best. Boyle Heights was T.J. North. It was tacofied territory. It was one big beaner bin.

Hola, fuckers. Here comes trouble. All you wicked Juans and dirty Diegos gonna get shit-kicked tonight.

Elmer and Buzz comprised Two Squad. They wore tin hats and lugged cut-down shotguns. They packed grand-jury subpoenas. Said paperwork was stamped “Alien Sedition Act.”

A paddy wagon trailed them. Two Squad worked the flats upside Lincoln Heights. One Squad and Three Squad were off elsewhere. Three squads, three turf quadrants, three righteous roust lists.

Three three-man rousts. That standardized the sweep. Elmer and Buzz caught three doozies. Chuy “El Perro” Mendez. Frankie “El Cabrón” Carbajal. Carlos “El Cucaracha” Calderon. The Dog, the Fucker, the Cockroach. Suspected 211 men and right-wing nuts. The flats gots to swing tonight.

Two Squad worked north-northeast. Los cholos lived in a tight radius. Elmer and Buzz walked. The paddy wagon chugged in low gear. Elmer was fitfully fucked-up and dizzy distracted.

It was Ashida. It was Ashida’s microdot play. It was Ashida’s gold bar. It was Ashida’s implied double-cross of one Dudley Smith. It was Tommy Glennon, to boot.

Buzz snuffed Tommy, impromptu. That didn’t faze him. They dumped Tommy in the waste dump and let the swamp beasts eat him up. That was likewise okay. But Tommy bleated a klub*haus* lead in his pickled prelude to death.

This Jap. Rice and Kapek popped him. He was a “sword man.” He had this queer white-boy pal. The white boy might be a musician. The white boy frequented the jazz strip and poked boys at the haus. The Jap sword-sliced chickens at J-town slop chutes. The Jap licked blood off the swords that he used.

The Jap made habeas and was on the loose somewhere.

Elmer teethed the lead. He was fungooed and fucked-up. He was ditzy and diverted. The shotgun weighed ten tons. The tin hat banged his head. He walked the flats, distracted.

He'd witnessed a property log-in. It was late January. Kapek and Rice talked up a sword man. The sword man licked blood off his swords. It disgusted Kapek and Rice.

He checked Alien Squad roust sheets last night. Guess what? No fucking sword man was listed. Guess what? No Jap swords were property-logged during that time span. Guess what? No chicken-killing sword lickers were tagged in the MO file.

He'd read the initial log-in report. He recalled that much. He had the sword man's name tucked someplace unconscious. Rice and Kapek pulled his paperwork. That had to be it.

The sword man. Hideo Ashida. Cause for ditzy distraction.

He got Jean Staley's postcards to Ashida. Army SIS just might possess a microdot camera. Him and Ashida worked out a cover story. It explained how he knew all this three-case hullabaloo. It served to cloak his ass with Dudley Smith.

Dig this:

He was at Joan Conville's place. He was hot to pour Big Joan the pork. Joan was terped up. She was burbling, out of her gourd. She kept mumbling shit about the gold and her diary. He found the diary and read it. He learned everything. He put the diary back where he found it. He bid Joan adieu and waltzed off, unlaid.

The story played goooooood. It jibed with Ashida's lie to Dudley. Joan burned the diary. She was suicide-fevered. Ashida found that burned-page mess.

The rousts proceeded. The Cockroach went easy. Papa Roach fumed. Mama Roach wrung rosary beads and went Aaay, caramba. The Cockroach submitted to cuffing and shackling. Elmer gave him a cigar. They hoisted him into the paddy wagon and split for El Casa de Perro.

The Dog went easy. Mama and Papa Dog whimpered and retreated. El Perro wore a Sir Guy shirt and slit-bottom khakis. He submitted to cuffing and shackling. Buzz gave him a cigar. They hoisted him into the paddy wagon and hit El Casa de Cabrón.

The Fucker went rough. He tried to run and tripped over a lamp stand. Buzz grabbed his hair and smashed his face on the floor. Elmer cuffed him. Buzz shackled him. Mama and Papa Fucker evinced boredom. They were blitzed on white port and lemon juice.

The extraction went rough. The Fucker flailed and kicked. They tossed him in the paddy wagon. Elmer sat on his legs. Buzz sat on his head. The Dog and Cockroach haw-hawed. The driver cop hauled for Hollenbeck Station.

Four bluesuits met them. They grappled the punks through the jail door and got them ensconced. The Dog and the Cockroach went in the drunk tank. One Squad's and Three Squad's geeks were already there. That made eight geeks, all in all. They whooped and demanded their rights. A colored trusty slapped them around.

The blues dumped the Fucker in sweatbox #2. Buzz recuffed him to a chair. Oooh—what's that on his right hand?

It's a coiled-snake tattoo. It's El Symbol of Sinarquismo. This mandates some thought.

Elmer ducked down to the file room. He tapped the C cabinet and pulled Frankie Carbajal's sheet. Aaay, caramba. Frankie peddled maryjane, Frankie 211'd bodegas, Frankie whipped his chorizo out on women.

That was it. Just one file sheet. No Fed routing stamps. No subversive rebop noted. No KA list attached.

Elmer walked back to the sweatbox. Frankie was trussed to that chair. Buzz rode a matching chair and skunk-eyed him. Elmer pulled a chair close and relit a cigar.

Buzz lit a cigar. He got it going good. The sweatbox fumed up. Frankie cough-coughed.

"You guys are sadistic. I've got asthma. Those cigars aren't doing me any good."

Buzz said, "Did you catch Frankie's tattoo?"

Elmer nodded. "We got that to consider, along with the fact that Frankie's a whipout man."

Buzz said, "I'll bet he habituates schoolyards and whips it out on little kids."

Frankie said, "I whipped it out on Eleanor Roosevelt. She was serving cookies and punch at some crippled kid's gig in the Heights."

Elmer said, "A whipout man's a whipout man. I don't see no distinction between kids and our swell First Lady."

Frankie squirmed in his chair. He looked consumptive. He sported a hairnet conk. His zoot pants rode up to his sternum.

"I whipped it out on Ann Sheridan and the Liltin' Martha Tilton. They were at this war-bond drive on Hollywood Boulevard. I escaped into the crowd and whipped it out on a B-girl at the Firefly Lounge."

Elmer sighed. Buzz sighed. Elmer uncuffed and unshackled Frankie. Buzz slipped on sap gloves.

"Your whipout escapades don't interest us. Your tattoo interests us. There's some names we'd like to run by you. There's a certain spot on East 46th Street that we’d sure like to discuss. Fifth Column shit’s a hot topic these days, and we’d sure like to hear your thoughts about that.”

Frankie rubbed his wrists and ankles. Frankie said, “Viva Sinarquismo. Chinga tu madre.”

Buzz roundhoused him. One slap/ten-ounce palm weights/see Frankie fly. El Whipout Man whipped off the chair and hit the floor flat on his back. Buzz stepped on his neck and pinned him supine. Elmer read him the riot act.

“Here’s where you determine your fate, son. Prompt answers get you a cozy cell and a shot at a kick-out. Horseshit and jive gets you a bunk in the fruit tank at Lincoln Heights. Gene ‘the Mean Queen’ Kefalvian’s in custody there. He goes for Mexican shrimps like you.”

Buzz released his foot. Frankie coughed and rubbed his neck. Elmer helped him up and sat him back in his chair. Buzz slipped off his sap gloves and pat-patted him on the head.

“I’ll take the cozy cell and the shot at a kick-out. I saw Gene the Queen fight Chuco Ortiz at the Olympic. He put a drubbing on him.”

Buzz said, “Señor Carbajal’s no dummy.”

Elmer said, “Señor Carbajal’s on the Fed’s subversive list, or he wouldn’t have been on our roust list. He’s got no routing tags on his green sheet here, so I’m guessing that all the Feds have got on him is his membership in them goofy Sinarquistas.”

Buzz cracked his knuckles. “Let’s see what Señor Carbajal has to say about that.”

Frankie flashed three fingers downward. It was Klan kode. It meant KKK. This beat-on beaner aped redneck rubes.

“I say ‘¡Viva Sinarquismo!’ I say, ‘¡Sinarquismo por vida!’”

Buzz relit his cigar. “Let’s note Frankie’s point, and get to them names.”

Elmer said, “Let’s start with Archie Archuleta. He’s Mex, and he hails from Frankie’s neck of the woods.”

Frankie snapped his suspenders. “I knew Archie. He’s dead now, and he got snuffed along with two cops—which is sure as shit what all this is about.”

Buzz said, “Frankie’s quick on the uptake.”

Elmer said, “Don’t stop there, Frankie.”

Frankie fluffed out his conk. It glistened with Lucky Tiger pomade.

“Archie recruited Mexican boys for La Causa. He pulled them out of the CYO at St. Vibiana’s. This priest named Joe Hayes ran the St. Vib’s chapter. He was a Coughlinite and a big Sinarquista contributor, not to mention a big sissy. He was poking this crazy Tommy Glennon guy up the culo. I didn’t know Tommy too good. He was just a face in the right-flank crowd.”

Elmer said, “The klub*haus.* 46th, just east of Central. Wendell Rice, George Kapek, and a cop named Cal Lunceford."

Frankie shrugged. "I dropped in for visits. A bunch of my fellow Greenshirts did, and so what? I won't give up no active shirts, but I'll tell you I hardly knew Rice and Kapek, and Lunceford didn't show up there all that much. He was a keep-to-himself sort of guy. They all took the blood oath and joined La Causa, but they're dead now, so who cares?"

Elmer said, "Let's get this out of the way. We all know a Jap spy killed Lunceford, and you've got no goddamn idea who killed Rice, Kapek, and Archuleta."

Frankie said, "Sí. Es la verdad, muchacho."

Buzz slipped on his sap gloves. "Son, I don't like you telling us who or what you won't give up, and you trying to set the terms of this here interrogation."

Frankie flashed the Klan sign. Frankie flexed his coiled-snake tattoo.

"I curse your syphilitic mama, Tex. I curse your white Protestant-oppressor ancestors going back six generations, and—"

Buzz roundhoused him. Teeth and gold bridgework flew. Ditto blood. Ditto gum flaps. Ditto a slice of his tongue.

Frankie pitched backward. The chair jerked loose of its struts. Frankie crashed into the wall. The chair toppled. Buzz balled his fists and cocked big left-rights.

Elmer jumped up and held him back. Elmer bear-hugged him and ran Whoa now's. Buzz went limp and dropped his hands. Elmer hug-walked him out of the sweatbox and dumped him in the hall.

He slammed the door and threw the lock. Frankie gurgled blood and quaked abject. Elmer pulled off his suit coat and squatted beside him. He wadded the coat and passed it to Frankie. The little hump blotted his face.

Elmer hit the wall switch. The sweatbox went all dark. He got up close to Frankie. He touched him soft and whispered this:

You've got to talk/you've got to talk/you've got to talk. I won't let that Okie hurt you, if you talk to me.

Frankie gurgled and spit blood. His breath went asthmatic. Elmer baby-talked him. The sweatbox went eerie dark. Frankie caught some asthma breath and snitched this:

The Greenshirts fingered a sub attack. It was last month. The Japs lobbed the Ellsworth Oil Refinery. The shells went adios and pfft. Rice and Kapek were muy Fifth Column. Catbox Cal, just as much. They sold Jap guns to the Greenshirts. The shirts got plans to commit 211s. La Causa needs the gelt. Catholic dinero fuels los Sinarquistas. They've got this initiation rite. You got to kill three priest-killers.

Salvy Abascal's El Führer. He's got kill lists of priest-killers and Reds. El Führer's got this Irish fool eating out of his hand. The fool's an Army major and an L.A. cop. They're smuggling "H" and wets. They're selling Baja Japs as slaves. The Irish guy's got his head up his ass. He don't know shit from shinola. Salvy's put Greenshirt plants in with the wets. Them fake wets are set to escape and pull sabotage.

It came out in stutters and gasps. The sweatbox was blackout dark and reeked of slobber and blood. Elmer cleaved close to Frankie. The little hump bled on him. The little hump gasped for breath and gasped this:

Archie the A. Call him "El Pimpo." He brought girls to the haus. There was this queer boy. He went to all the jazz clubs. He orchestrated the pervo shit at the haus. He had this Jap friend. The Perv of All Pervs. He sold curios. He ate raw chicken flesh. He sucked blood off samurai swords.

(LOS ANGELES, 11:00 P.M., 3/10/42)

Salvy said, “You seem fretful, Comrade.”

Dudley lit a cigarette. He’d chained the whole pack in nothing flat.

“I could say the same about you, lad.”

“Yes, but I am more high-strung to begin with. I have never possessed your most serene composure.”

They slouched in Dudley’s prowl sled. They’d parked up from Hollenbeck Station. They had a clear front-door view.

The sweep stood complete. They’d observed the haul-ins. Nine fish were now jailed. Salvy tagged three Sinarquistas. Miguel Santarolo, Frankie Carbajal, Mondo Díaz. Hard boys all. Salvy said they’d never roll and bleat.

Dudley chain-smoked. His throat felt raw. His nerves ran raw, besides. Hideo called him, pre-sweep. Hideo tattled an odd chat with Elmer Jackson.

Elmer tumbled to the three-case convergence. He wouldn’t say how. He knew about the gold and fixated on the fire. A three-case principal must have killed his brother. Elmer believed it. Elmer vowed revenge.

It was unsettling. Hideo’s punch line troubled him.

Elmer and Buzz Meeks killed Tommy Glennon. The act redeemed Elmer’s New Year’s Eve fuckup. The act proclaimed a vow of fealty to one D. L. Smith. Hideo foisted his gold bar on Elmer. Hideo urged him to confess to Father D. L. Smith. The gold gift seems justified. How Elmer tumbled remains perplexing.

Salvy lit a cigarette. “You needn’t concern yourself as to what my boys might reveal about our plans. They know very little, and I’ll secure them a lawyer and post bail in the morning. This klub*haus* mess will subside and resolve at some point, and I’ll keep my boys sequestered until then.”

Elmer Jackson showed. He walked out of the station. He lit a cigar and stretched loose some kinks. He looked disheveled. He was coatless and sported a badly stained white shirt.

Dudley beeped the horn and flashed his high beams. Elmer looked over. Dudley got out and stood on the sidewalk. Elmer ambled on up.

He leaned against a streetlamp. It backlit him nicely. The stains were wet blood.

Elmer said, "Forgive my appearance, Dud. A suspect got between me and Buzz."

"Turner Meeks is a vivid interlocutor. He's been known to lose patience with rowdy Mexicans. Might you tell me the suspect's name?"

"Frankie Carbajal."

"I'm assuming that he rolled in the end."

"Such as it was, boss. He said the Sinarquistas are planning some 211s, and they plan to use some guns that Rice and Kapek sold them. Archie Archuleta brought girls to the haus, which don't surprise me at all. Frankie was hipped on some queer jazz-club geek and some Jap with a sword fetish."

Bland revelations. Ho-hum. Nothing catastrophic there.

Elmer pointed to the car. "Who's the cholo?"

Dudley smiled. "He hardly concerns you."

Elmer smiled. "Tommy Glennon concerns both of us. Buzz and me clipped him, in case you didn't get that from Hideo already. I don't expect an attaboy on it, but I'd sure like you to acknowledge the favor we did."

Dudley said, "Muted bravos, Elmer."

"Don't you want to know what he spilled?"

"I was getting to that, yes."

Elmer blew smoke rings. "He laid out some old news. You and Carlos Madrano ran wets, and Joe Hayes was his bun boy. He tried to squeeze you when you saw him up at Quentin last year, but he didn't say what with."

Dudley lit a cigarette. It was a gaffe. His hand trembled. Elmer caught it.

"I had quite the chat with Hideo. He told me that you've put some things together since the last time we spoke. I'm wondering how you came upon what you learned."

Elmer stretched and rubbed his back against the streetlamp. He was milking this. You overreaching bumpkin, I will kill—

"I was over at Joan Conville's place about a week before she died. I was putting some moves on her, but it wasn't going my way. Joanie was terped, and she was mumbling about the gold heist and the fire. She kept fading in and out, and she talked up a diary before she passed out for real. I tossed the place, found it, and read it. It was mostly woo-woo about you and Bill Parker, but she wrote up her forensic shit with Hideo pretty good. I put some threads together, and figured the three of you were out for the gold. I put the diary back where I found it, kissed Joanie good night, and scrammed."

Vivid verismo. Elmer Jackson in quintessence. Woman-crazed and self-seeking. Less than half smart.

“Sally forth, lad. Keep the gold bar. Kill your brother’s killer with my most fond regards.”

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 11:30 P.M., 3/10/42)

I watched the Maestro compose. We sat at his piano; Otto picked out low-register chords and jotted notes on a scratch pad. He was working on the nightmare tone poem we had discussed several times. Otto encouraged me to improvise at the moments his imagination faltered. I filled in with passages from the three Bartók concerti; I was undermining Otto's more foreboding motifs. My mission was therapeutic more than anything else. I was seeking to derail the Maestro's darkly foreboding moods and loosen the hold of his formal therapist: the darkly corrupt Saul Lesnick.

Otto hit chords as I smoked and sipped brandy. Once again, I studied the piece of paper secured by the sheet-music stand. Words by Meyer Gelb and W. H. Auden. Once again, I came up against Comrade Gelb's old Communist cell.

This storm, this savaging disaster.

Otto tapped the music stand and smiled at me. He said, "When I compose, I must always immerse myself in the mood the music attempts to express. Here, we have the chaos of my brain tumor and the muted light of my recovery, with recapitulative passages depicting the ongoing slog of the war."

I hit a series of random chords, up and down the keyboard. They were meant to represent the overlapping jabber of the too-rude and too-voluble guests at Otto's all-too-frequent parties. The chords covertly announced my intention to pump the Maestro for information on Jean Staley.

Otto said, "Tell me what that earsplitting passage represents, and perhaps I shall tell you a compatible tale."

"Your parties," I said. "Nesting grounds for parasites, all given to one doctrinaire view. All belligerent and convinced of their own uniqueness."

Otto laughed and clasped my left hand; he poised it over the keyboard and banged a run of similarly unpleasant chords. I pulled my hand free and laughed with him.

Otto said, “Call it a crude parody of the German tanks approaching Leningrad in Comrade Dimitri’s new symphony, and anoint it the expression of my own loneliness and need to smother it with the company of idiots.”

I laughed and got to the point. “Jean Staley comes to mind there. She seems to have colonized your guesthouse permanently. One might call her ‘the woman who came to dinner.’ ”

Otto found this uproarious. I failed to add “while she’s been dodging a major police inquiry and perpetrating a bewildering mail ruse.”

“Jean has colonized my guesthouse before, and will colonize it again. She is a Communist, you see. She purports to despise private property, even as she appropriates it. She sublets the homes of the rich to suit the whims of the decadent Right, which I find delightfully hilarious.”

I banged right-hand chords up and down the keyboard. “I sense a provocative story, Liebchen.”

“Aaah, Katherine Ann Lake in her vamp mode, and ever the rival of other provocative women.”

“I’m hardly Mata Hari, Liebchen.”

“No, but you are the consort of inquisitive policemen, and I know when I’m being pumped.”

I laughed and covered my mouth. I was once again a conniving schoolgirl in Sioux Falls, South Dakota.

Otto sipped brandy and lit a cigarette. “I wasn’t there for the party that Jean midwifed, but I had given her my consent to sublet the house, and to do with it as she saw fit. Saul Lesnick had diagnosed my tumor, and I was taking a rest cure prior to my operation. So, I’m afraid my story lacks the level of detail that might give it a corresponding punch.”

Once again, Saul Lesnick. Once again, Meyer Gelb’s cell. Annie Staples called me early this evening; she told me that she had secured wax impressions of Dr. Saul’s office keys.

“I’ve never minded incomplete stories.”

“I know that about you, dear. You’re quite capable of ascribing your own endings.”

“Otto, you’re taunting me—”

“It was early in ’39. Jean sublet my home for a party she described as having a ‘pro-fascist theme.’ I left the sanitarium and returned here. I immediately felt that something evil had happened in my absence, but I was debilitated, and disinclined to confront Jean as to what might have occurred. I was stuporous from headaches and the medicine that was prescribed to alleviate the pain, so I don’t know where I was or who the other person was when the following occurred.”

The Maestro taunted and teased me. I almost blurted "Don't string this out."

Otto hit the tanks-approaching chords from the Leningrad Symphony. They were ever dark and foreboding. The Maestro knew how to build suspense.

"The conclusion, dear Katherine. A man approached me and berated me for living in a haunted house. I beat that man to death."

I shut my eyes. Otto hit the ominous chords again. I barely heard my own voice.

"And then?"

"And then, I told Dr. Lesnick. And Saul told me he knew an FBI man who could make it all go away, for a goodly amount of money."

"Was the FBI man Ed Satterlee?"

"Yes."

"Was Jean Staley the conduit for the financial transaction?"

The Maestro said, "Yes, she was."

This/storm/this/savaging/disaster/the rain/the gold/the fire/it's all/one story/you see.

I drove home and sat down at my own piano; I picked out those notes and tried to will a single three-case solution. The gold robbery as genesis; the fire as corresponding catastrophe; the Communist cell as point of constellation. Meyer Gelb, Jean Staley, Saul Lesnick. Ed Satterlee as snitch-recruiter. Otto Klemperer kills a man; Lesnick and Satterlee quash public exposure. The Maestro Manse as a current constellation point. Gelb's current plan to recruit four exiled musicians and turn them as informants.

Lee was off at Hollenbeck Station; he'd told me the East L.A. sweep should run through the night. The house echoed those twenty-odd notes. My thoughts went nowhere constructive. I thought of Joan through it all.

The doorbell rang; I knew who it was; who else perched and pounced this late?

I got up and opened the door. Bill walked straight past me and beelined to the liquor shelf. I allotted him time to guzzle a tumbler of scotch. I knew all his brusque movements and modes of peremptory address.

He'll turn to face me. He'll reveal unsettling moments from the East L.A. sweep. He'll take me in because I'm the woman he loves, and I hit him in the face ten days ago. I'll notice the coffee stain on his wilted white shirt.

Bill did just that; the stain was off to the side of his necktie. He stood ten feet away from me and made no move to close the gap. He said, "Thad and I braced a dink named Miguel Santarolo. He said Rice and Kapek sold the Greenshirts a large quantity of Jap guns. He laid out some planned 211s and snitched off Salvy Abascal's Irish-cop hermano. I'm sure you won't be surprised to learn that Dudley has been murdering priest-killers down in Baja, or that he's now a slavering fascist convert."

I sat down on the couch; Bill sat down beside me. I took off his hat and sailed it across the room. It hit the piano and landed on the adjoining carpet. Bill shut his eyes. I put my hand on his chest and felt his heart race.

"Annie made those wax impressions. We've got access to Lesnick's office now."

"Have Ashida toss it. He's primed to betray Dudley. There's a glimmer of decency in him that we can exploit."

I unbuttoned his shirt and ran my hand over his chest. Bill said, "Oh Jesus, Kay." He fumbled at my legs and snapped one garter strap. I went dizzy. He kept his hand there and kept his eyes shut.

It was who kisses who now. I pulled off Bill's shoes and unclipped his holster. He clamped his hand on my hand and held it to his heart. I threw my free hand back and hit the light switch by the couch. It was who kisses who in the dark now.

Bill surprised me there. He pulled me close and touched me under my sweater. We bumped noses and scraped teeth as we kissed in the dark.

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 A.M., 3/11/42)

Mondo "El Tigre" Díaz. He defines intractable. Sweatbox #4's his new habitat. Ashida played good guy. Blanchard played bad guy. They were ten hours in. They eschewed rough stuff. They fed El Tigre doughnuts and coffee. They plied him with booze and contraband weed.

El Tigre revealed zero. They stressed the Sinarquistas and his Peeping Tom busts. El Tigre came off bemused. He wore a sharkskin zoot suit and a coiled-snake pendant. He sported snarling-tiger tattoos.

Blanchard yawned. Ashida yawned. El Tigre told stale jokes. A lion is fucking a zebra. If a nigger and a Mexican jump off the Taft Building, who hits the ground first? Come-San-Chin, the Chinese cocksucker. That old chestnut.

El Tigre was twenty-nine. He graduated Lincoln High and LAJC. That was enticing. Ashida dispatched the Hollenbeck watch boss. El Tigre came off educated. See what you can find out.

Díaz lit a cigarette. He'd smoked all of his and half of Blanchard's. He was bright-eyed and bushy-tailed.

"You guys have been good to me. I'll concede that. You've read me pretty well, too. You know a tough nut to crack when you see one. I got popped for 459, back in '38. It was a humbug roust. Two jamokes named Dougie Waldner and Fritzie Vogel leaned on me. They were rough boys. I withstood their grief, so you can bet your bottom dollar I'll withstand yours."

Blanchard yawned. "That Fritzie's a mean one. He's never learned the art of waiting your suspect out."

Díaz said, "I'm the intransigent type. The day you wait me out will be the twelfth of never."

Blanchard rolled his eyes. He ruffled the phone book on the table. The '41 White Pages. Heavy and fat. The classic tell-me-now tool.

Ashida said, "You're well-spoken, Mondo."

"For a beaner. That's what you're saying."

“No, I’m saying you’re well-spoken, by any and all standards.”

“Don’t butter me up, Charlie Chan. I’ve been buttered up by experts.”

Blanchard yawned. “Charlie Chan’s a Chink. You’re confusing him with Mr. Moto. Peter Lorre plays him in the movies. I popped that little twerp for possession of morphine. Some studio bulls put the skids to it.”

Ashida yawned. Díaz mock-yawned. Peter Lorre—snoresville. The room buzzer buzzed. Ashida got up and cracked the door.

A bluesuit passed him a folder. “That educational stuff you asked for. LAJC requisitioned it from the U.S. Passport Office. Your pal here did some traveling and raised some eyebrows.”

Ashida nodded. The bluesuit took off. Ashida shut the door and skimmed file pages.

Díaz had a Passport Office green sheet. He’d matriculated in Germany, circa ’35. He attended Dresden Polytechnic. He had a graduate chem degree. He’d joined the Nazi and left-wing Sparticist parties. He built bombs for Franco’s Falange and blew up Loyalists in the Spanish Civil War.

Díaz said, “Mr. Moto’s in a trance. He’s conniving something. He’s the inscrutable yellow man of the East.”

Blanchard said, “What gives?”

Ashida dropped the file and grabbed the phone book. He applied a two-hand grip and a baseball swing and smashed Díaz in the head. He heard his nose snap and watched blood burst. He reversed himself and slammed downward. Díaz whiplashed and jackknifed and bounced off the chair.

Blanchard jumped up and stood back. Díaz burrowed into the chair legs and covered his head. Ashida pounded his back. He made like Mr. Moto. He talked pidgin singsong.

“Dresden Polytechnic.”

“Your chem degree.”

“Your conflicting memberships.”

“Fascist or Communist. I’ll hit you until you roll.”

Díaz scrunched down and covered up. Ashida phone-booked him. He hit Díaz in the back, Díaz in the legs, Díaz in the head. He caught side shots of drop-jawed Lee Blanchard. He heard Díaz singsong-yell:

“Fuck Salvy.”

“I’m playing the left-right field.”

“I’m in with the real Kameraden.”

“We’ve got cutouts and mail drops and microdots.”

“We’ve got rebop straight from Buck Rogers.”

“We’re running shakedowns and we’ll have spaceships before this war is through.”

“We’re invisible.”

“We’re everywhere.”

“We’ll rule the postwar world.”

“Ask my cutout, Two-Gun Davis. Ask sub-Führer Meyer Gelb. We’re invisible and we’re everywhere.”

98

(LOS ANGELES, 11:00 A.M., 3/11/42)

Crash Squad confab. The big postmortem. Let's kick loose leads to death.

The squad ran underweight now. Ashida split for Baja and pressing Army shit. The roster ran Elmer, Buzz, and Lee Blanchard. Plus Bill Parker and Thad Brown.

They hogged the Hollenbeck muster room. Thad brought a jug. They yawned and stretched and crapped out at one long table.

Elmer was bennie-bopped. Ashida's absence jazzed him and gored him. Ashida grabbed Jean Staley's postcards. They might contain microdots. That was all good. Ashida foxed him otherwise. He dumped that microdot letter in the mail slot. It would shoot to La Paz. He'd probably snitch the PO box number to Dudley. Ashida was playing Dud ad hoc. Betray him/rat to him/betray him. Ashida ran this treadmill to The Big Where?

The Big Where? was everywhere. Him and Buzz were half-ass estranged now. Buzz overthumped Frankie Carbajal. They half-ass made up, in the wake. They agreed to withhold certain shit that Frankie revealed.

Like Frankie's sabotage rat-out. Like Abascal's double-cross on Dud. Like Abascal's plan to work wetback saboteurs and plant bombs on U.S. soil. The withhold felt dicey and clammy. The withhold felt good. Him and Buzz were running pure rogue now.

Dud vetted the Tommy Glennon snuff and told him to keep the gold bar. Dud vetted his shot at Wayne Frank's killer. It all felt dicey-clammy and good. This new Crash Squad had formed. It was him, Kay, Thad, and Bill Parker. Ashida half-ass cosigned their main gig.

Cornhole Dudley Smith. Nullify his evil shit. Notch a clean klub*haus* solve. Ashida was a wild card. Buzz was wild card #2. Buzz was running hurt-crazed and kill-crazed. He laid Joan's diary scoop on him. The scoop gave Buzz this big hotfoot. Yeah—but toward what goddamn end?

Everybody yawned. Everybody stretched. Crash Squad vexation meets Crash

Squad exhaustion. The jug went around. Elmer abstained. Booze defused his bennie drift. Thad B. intoned some bad news.

"This Greenshirt fuck Abascal fucked us. He got a lawyer to get Díaz, Santarolo, and Carbajal moved into Federal custody. Hollenbeck Patrol raided their domiciles and turned sixteen revolvers and automatics that Rice and Kapek sold them. The Feds are holding those little Nazi shits under Alien-Sedition Act provisions. My guess is they'll be in stir awhile, and then get deported to Mexico."

The room rippled. Abascal be wicked whammy. Elmer caught a whiff of Ed the Fed Satterlee here.

Buzz yawned. "This priest Joe Hayes is Tommy Glennon's bun boy."

Parker said, "Ouch—he's my confessor."

That roused some yuks. The jug went around. Elmer abstained. Buzz lit a big cigar.

"Archie Archuleta recruited out of the CYO at St. Vibiana's. You got lots of rich-ass Catholic laymen contributing to the cause. Who knows how many 211s those dinks have pulled so far."

The room rerippled. Buzz stifled a big yawn.

"Here's something that may shock the more naïve among you. The Dudster's hatching racket schemes down in Baja. I don't see no dropped jaws on that one, so I'll add that he's partnered up with Salvy Abascal on that front, which makes him a second- or thirdhand accomplice to all of Salvy's seditious shit."

The room triple-rippled. Elmer slapped the table and focused eyes his way.

"Look, Dud's covered as long as Jack Horrall serves as Chief. We've got our next chief right here in this room, and it's either Brother Bill or Brother Thad. We all know how bent the Dudster is, but we've got ourselves a homicide job right now. The next chief can put the hurt to Dud—but we should only talk up real case leads."

Thad said, "Hear, hear."

Parker said, "Elmer's right. And all our Dudley Smith accusations are second- and thirdhand supposition."

Buzz said, "I hate that mick cocksucker."

Blanchard said, "That's hot off the ticker tape. Roll the presses on that one."

More yuks ensued. Elmer slapped the table. He was bennified out to the planet Pluto.

"I got a lead, but I can't reveal my source on the first part of it. It's a no-shit, somebody-killed-those-guys-at-the-klub*haus* lead."

Thad said, "We're listening."

Blanchard said, "Elmer tends to draw things out."

Elmer laughed. "My source told me a crazy Jap and a queer white kid frequented the klub*haus.* The Jap was a nutty sword man who killed chickens and licked blood off the swords he used, and the fruit kid was a jazz-club habitué. Rice and Kapek popped a Jap like that in January, and I witnessed the property log-in, but all the paperwork and property has gone missing, and I can't remember this Jap's name."

Thad said, "Okay, that's the first part, and you've still got our attention."

Elmer said, "You've got the gist right there, which Frankie Carbajal confirmed last night. But he added that the Jap sold curios for a living, which narrows down a possible make on him. There was queer action going on in the upstairs bedroom, and any Jap sucking blood off samurai swords looks like a real lead to me."

Buzz grabbed his crotch. "I got your real lead, throbbing twelve inches."

That roused yuks and yawns. Blanchard nipped on the jug and stubbed out his cigarette.

"Here's your real lead, but I'm not sure how it pertains to the klub*haus* job. First, there's this. Ashida broke Mondo Díaz, but he took off and split back to Baja—which I don't like, given what he is to Dudley. It turns out that Díaz is a chemistry whiz, and he went to college in Germany, and he knows something called 'microdot technology,' and he betrayed Salvy what's-his-name and threw in with some left- and right-wing guys he calls the 'Kameraden.' They're out to profit off the war, they're running a shakedown racket, they've got mail drops and intermediaries, so nobody knows nothing they're not supposed to. It's all one big fucked-up megillah, and Mondo's personal high-up was a certain ex-chief of ours named James Edgar Davis."

Oooga-booga. Nobody's yawning now. Elmer recalled Joan's diary. Joan laid out good Davis dish.

Thad slapped the table. The room simmered down quick.

"We've got to act on this. For the PD's sake, if nothing else."

Parker said, "I happen to know that Dudley has plans to pentothal Davis. We need to get to him first."

Sweep fever resumed. They went Mex sweep to Chink sweep in a hot tick. Two squads formed. One Squad: L. Blanchard, T. Brown. Two Squad: B. Parker, E. Jackson, B. Meeks.

We rendezvous at Kwan's, 1300. Chink-o-phile Davis haunts C-town nonstop. He's Chink-fluent and Chink-defined. He's got a rumored C-town pied-à-terre.

The sweep could wait. Elmer detoured first. He racked his brain and snagged that log-in Jap's name. There it is. It's Robert "Banzai Bob" Yoshida.

He dipped by Central Station and combed the Alien Squad files. He found what he missed the first time.

Banzai Bob's log-in sheet. 1/24/42. No habeas tab. The klub*haus* job occurred 1/29. Banzai Bob was a railroad clerk. Banzai Bob was not a curio dealer.

Elmer called the Lincoln Heights Jail and talked to the watch boss. The boss checked detention records and came back on the line. He said Banzai Bob had been in stir, 1/24 to now. That nixed him as a klub*haus*-job suspect. Elmer told the boss to plant Bob in a sweatbox. He'd be right there.

He bopped to Lincoln Heights. Banzai Bob spoke good English. Bob was native-born. He voted for FDR three times. This internment drive's the shits. He'll be on the bus for Manzanar, 3/25. It's like Pharaoh and the Jews. Let my people go!!!

Elmer commiserated. Elmer slipped Bob a ten-spot and a stack of girlie mags. Bob was delighted. Bob revealed this:

He didn't know no queer white boy. He didn't know no klub*haus* or jazz-club crawlers. He didn't know no curio men. His daddy bequeathed him his samurai swords and nail-studded dick sheaths. Who knows where Daddy got them. Daddy was bughouse crazy. Daddy committed seppuku on 10/8/39. Sayonara, Daddy.

Banzai Bob conceded this:

Yeah, he sword-slaughtered chickens. So what? He was a part-time Buddhist priest. It was like them Jew rabbis. They kosherized food. He decapitated it.

Sayonara, Bob. You've been exonerated. Elmer laid tracks for Kwan's.

Two Squad was set to go. Buzz supplied beavertail saps. Bill Parker supplied rock salt–packed shotguns. He cautioned Elmer and Buzz. The PD was Hop Sing–allied. Ace Kwan was Jack Horrall's lapdog. Go easy on Hop Sing storefronts.

They fortified on mai tais and pork fried rice. Ace Kwan served them. Ace professed ignorance. Don't know Jim Davis' hideaway!!! Ace lied like a rug.

They lit out on North Broadway. It brought back New Year's Eve and french-fried Eddie Leng and the start of all this multitudinous shit. They lit out three abreast. Elmer gassed on their mission. Oooga-booga. They packed pump guns and walked tall.

They bypassed Hop Sing fronts. They leveled rival tong fronts. They blew out plate-glass windows. They raided chop suey pits and bookie joints. They dumped the fly-specked produce in open-air stalls. They prowled Chink-smut theaters on East College Street. They saw surreptitious Chinamen slam their underhung ham.

They ran field interviews. They got Don't know where Chief Davis live!!! ten million times. They tore through "O" dens. They dumped hopheads off dope pallets and got ditto. They knocked over the late Eddie Leng's Kowloon. Elmer spotted a Four Families warlord. Buzz dunked his face in a bowl of wor-wonton soup. The warlord revealed this:

I see Dudley Smith and Lin Chung!!! They wrestle Davis into car!!! Don't hurt me, don't hurt me!!! Parking lot on North Hill!!! Broad-daylight abduction!!!

That was lead #1. A B-girl at Moo-Shoo's Mandarin disgorged lead #2.

Jim Davis live above garage off Alameda and Ord. He fly Hop Sing and Don't Tread on Me door flags. He keep sewer rats as pets.

Two Squad hotfooted on over. They kicked down said door. Jim Davis was gone. The ex-chief lived in a rodent resort. Note the swastika wall flags. Note the beaver pix taped beside them. Sewer rats ate out of dog dishes. A box of hand grenades sat by the bed.

They tossed the place. Buzz snatched the beaver pix. No further leads surfaced. Bill Parker decreed a breather. They schlepped back to Kwan's and revitalizized.

Uncle Ace served lunch-crowd leftovers and Singapore Slings. He told Elmer Miss Lake called and said to call her back. Elmer ducked over to the pay phone and slug-dialed Kay's number. He got two rings. Kay came on the line. She said, "Elmer, is that you?"

"It's me, for sure. I'm at Kwan's, and Ace told me you wanted to gab."

Kay said, "Lee called me from Chinatown. He told me about Mondo Díaz and what he said about Jim Davis and the 'Kameraden.' Díaz said they were running shakedowns, and Annie Staples told me some things that got me thinking."

Elmer yukked. "Well, shit, then. When you think, I listen."

"All right. Annie told me that Jean Staley wasn't really a Red, and that she and Meyer Gelb planned to extort a group of Jewish refugees that Otto Klemperer has befriended. Otto shares a minor history with your friend Jean, and she's been staying in his guesthouse while she's been sending you postcards from her automobile trip."

Elmer went woooo. "I can tell you found out some things that I didn't tell you."

Kay said, "I've got that knack—which is why you love me so much."

Elmer said, "Hold that thought. A notion just smacked me, and I'll let you know if it pans out."

Brentwood was swank. Lots of leafy streets and big Spanish houses. Brentwood north of Sunset was woodsy swank. You had deep-set yards and cribs more like estates.

Elmer surveilled the Maestro Manse. He hunkered low in his sled. Dusk came and went. He settled in for a loooooong eyeball stint.

He parked behind Jean Staley's '35 Ford. He got her DMV stats and ID'd her car. He went by Central Station, en route to here. He burgled Hideo Ashida's locker and stole a priceless something. He laid said something on the front seat of Jolting Jean's car.

The Maestro Manse was done up modernistic. Elmer perched across the street and got the looooooong eyeball view. He pissed in a cardboard coffee cup and smoked cigars. He scratched his balls and brain-strained Jean Clarice Staley.

Jean, the carhop. Jean, the ex-starlet. Jean, the faux Red and Fed fink. Jean, the ritzy-house subletter. Jean's jungled up with Meyer Gelb. Red Meyer extorted movie stars and Commos. That was back in the '30s. Meyer and Jean got current blackmail plans. There's these hebe exiles swapped out of Krautland. Meyer's got designs on them.

Jean, baby—say it ain't so.

Tommy G. tattled her good. Jean went back with Fritz Eckelkamp. That cinched her to the gold heist. Jean was hitched to an arson dog named Ralph D. Barr. That cinched her to the fire. Tommy G. revealed all this. Tommy G. dubbed Jim Davis his spy conduit. Mondo Díaz tapped Chief Jim, likewise.

Elmer lit a fresh cigar. Elmer pissed in his piss cup and tossed the piss out the window. Elmer scoped the Maestro Manse and heard a door slam.

Then a cough. Then high-heel taps. Then Jean herself. She made for her car. Moonglow lit her up. She wore a tight skirt and a camel-hair coat. She wore nifty tortoiseshell glasses.

Elmer hunkered extra low. Jean crossed the street and went for her sled. She opened the driver's door. The roof light flashed. She saw you know what and fucking SHRIEKED.

Elmer jumped out and swooped down on her. Jean dumbstruck'd the gold. She was bug-eyed and all trancelike. She sensed nothing else on planet Earth.

She touched the bar. She traced the mint marks. She caressed the bar and all but drooled. She fondled the contours. It's the Fatted Calf. Come, let us adore —

Elmer swooped and clamped her mouth shut. Elmer said, "You can keep it, if you tell me some things."

Santa Monica was close. They car-o-vanned to the Goody Goody Drive-in. They sat in Elmer's car. Elmer ordered coffee and spiked it with 151.

It was cold and clear. The beach was close. Cars whirred by on Wilshire. Jean snuggled close to him.

Elmer nudged her back. Ixnay, sister. Don't you vamp me tonight.

"Tommy Glennon's my source on most of this. Some police-file dirt fills out the rest."

Jean said, "How is Tommy? I haven't seen him in a coon's age."

"Tommy's off for parts unknown. Sort of like you, with that fake-postcard shuck you were running on me."

The gold bar sat on the floorboard. Jean kicked off her shoes and foot-fondled it. Her nylon stockings went screee.

"You're telling me you sussed out the drop at Bev's Switchboard, and you know what's going on there."

Elmer sipped spiked coffee. "Let's start with Tommy. He was making what he called 'gibberish calls' to some sort of relay phone down in Baja. He got his so-called scripts for the calls at Bev's. All of this here shit is specifically spy shit, and you've got to have some sort of knowledge of it, because everybody knows everybody in this tight little world of yours, and all this shit is rolled up in a tight little ball."

Jean lit a cigarette. "You've got to be more specific than that. I don't know anything about Tommy making 'gibberish calls,' and I don't know anything about spies in Baja or elsewhere. I was in the CP back in the '30s, back when it was the thing to do. I met some questionable folks, but I'm not part of any spy ring run by the Comintern or the domestic CP, or anybody else. Get it? I renounced Communism, and you know what I am in my heart?"

Elmer smiled. "You're a shakedown girl."

Jean smiled. "Give Sergeant E. V. Jackson a gold star, because he hit it right on the head."

Elmer respiked their coffee. "Let's get back to Tommy for a second. All that code-call stuff got decoded and sent to a brother and sister in La Paz, way south in Baja. There's some hotshot left-wing/right-wing cabal looking to make hay with whoever wins this here war. Does any of this make sense to you?"

Jean said, "No. But I've been around CP guys and their pals for a long time, so I can tell you that the far Left and the far Right share a lot of spit, because what they really hate is the square white man's U.S."

Elmer sipped coffee. The 151 subverted the bennies and had him seeing wisps.

"There's a klub*haus* off of 46th and Central. Two cops named Wendell Rice and George Kapek got snuffed there. They had a Mex pal named Archie Archuleta. He got snuffed, too."

Jean shrugged. "If you're asking me if I know anything about all this, the answer is no."

"Frankie Carbajal, Miguel Santarolo, Mondo Díaz, and Salvador Abascal."

"No. It sounds like a cavalcade of cholos to me, and I don't play the Latin-lover field."

Elmer smirked. "What about Two-Gun Davis? He's the ex–L.A. police chief."

Jean tossed her cigarette. "Strictly from hunger. He's a fellow traveler all over the spectrum, but he sways distinctly right. We talked about Meyer Gelb that first time we met, and Meyer and Jim Davis go back a ways. Jim's also tight with Saul Lesnick, for what that's worth."

Elmer teethed on it. Elmer flashed the klub*haus* smut pix. Jean squinted at them and went nein.

"If you're asking me who the two skirts are, I've got no idea."

"Sex shows at the klub*haus*? Queer stuff at the klub*haus*? A nutty Jap who licks blood off swords, and his homo companion?"

"Elmer, I know nothing about that clubhouse, so why would I know something about the strange-o types who congregate there?"

Elmer teethed Jean overall. "Tommy said you knew Fritz Eckelkamp. That takes you back to '31, Eckelkamp's escape, and the gold robbery later that same day. You're tight with Meyer Gelb, so that takes you back to '33 and the fire that killed my brother. Them first two events are all hooked together, and don't tell me they're not. They're both a ways back, and now we got the klub*haus* job tethered in, and the same names keep popping up. There's some kind of story here, and you're the only one I got to tell it to me."

Jean sipped spiked coffee. She took little sips. 151 was hoodoo hooch.

"I'll tell you what I know. I'll start at the start, and you can fill in whatever blanks you can."

"That's what I need to hear."

"You haven't issued any kind of threats yet. I haven't heard you say 'Give me this' and 'Roll over on this guy, or I'll run you in.' "

Elmer shook his head. "I don't know where I can go with any of this, without it causing a big upscut and getting shot down, because it's all too damn embarrassing for everybody concerned, and the smart thing to do is make it all vanish. I'd like to find out the whole story on my brother and get a clean klub*haus* solve, and running you in wouldn't help me any there."

Jean said, "Okay, then. I'm fifteen years old and crapping out in a Jesuit college dorm in San Francisco. I meet Fritzie Eckelkamp, who likes his stuff underage, and one thing leads to another. It's '27 now, and Fritzie goes down behind his robbery string in Alameda. He's up in Quentin now, and we correspond and keep in touch. Fritzie wangles a retrial in L.A. and gets on that train that's all loaded up with gold. Before you ask, I don't know if Fritzie got hipped on the gold before or after he escaped from the train, or if he had anything to do with the heist. All I know is that he sure got hipped on it in good time, and this gold bar you promised me didn't come from nowhere."

Elmer sipped spiked coffee. Jean sipped spiked coffee. She scooched her legs and surefire vamped him.

"Don't stop there, now."

Jean caught some breath. "Fritzie told me there might be a crash-out, and he said to wait by the phone. I did, and I sure as hell got the call. I was twenty-two then, and I dressed all high school girl. I stole a car in Sacramento and picked Fritzie up in San Luis Obispo. There were roadblocks all the way southbound on the 101, but the cops bought my schoolgirl act and neglected to check the trunk. The roadblocks were lifted, north of Malibu and this swanky nuthouse. I got Fritzie into L.A. and dropped him at a fleabag hotel in Echo Park. That's when I met Meyer Gelb, and that's when Fritzie stopped being the so-called man in my life, and Meyer took over the job."

She'd played kosher so far. The last part felt rehearsed. Her Fritzie-Meyer spiel played too pat.

"Keep going. You're doing good in my book."

Jean said, "Some time passed. I'd been selling maryjane in Sacramento and moving it through Tulare County, into Nevada. That made it a Federal bounce. A Fed named Edmund J. Satterlee popped me, and I gave up Meyer as a Commo to buy my way out. Ed fed me a diet of Communist tracts, and I faked a conversion and joined Meyer's CP cell in L.A. Ed got me a screen test at Paramount, because he was chums with the studio cops, and that's when I entered my silly-starlet phase. The deal was, Ed learned that Meyer recruited for the Party at Paramount, and that he ran a handbook there, and he wanted me to keep tabs on him. That's how I became a so-called movie actress."

Elmer tossed a tweaker. "What's Fritzie doing while all this is going on?"

Jean rebuffed it. "I told you. Fritzie walked out, Meyer walked in."

It still played hinky. It still played too pat.

Elmer said, "Keep going. You've got me tantalizized."

Jean removed her glasses and buffed them on her skirt. She was buck-toothed and half cross-eyed. She was still a hot dish.

"So, I met a prop man at Paramount and married him. Ralph D. Barr. I lied the first time we talked. I was afraid you'd roust me if you knew I was hitched up with this big arsonist and Griffith Park fire suspect. Of course, Meyer and Ralphie were two peas in a pod, and they both loved fires, floods, cataclysms, and storms. Ralphie was an active firebug, but Meyer was just a fire talker and a gasbag. He was preaching apocalypse before the big fire, working up the rubes at garment workers' marches and the like. Then the fire occurred, and Meyer and me and the other fools in the cell got leaned on, and it all went away until you knocked on my door."

Elmer sighed. "So that's it, then?"

Jean sighed. "That's it."

"Wayne Frank Jackson, Karl Frederick Tullock, Kyoho Hanamaka. Ring any bells for you?"

"Well, Wayne Frank's your brother, who I didn't know from Adam—and you still haven't told me why you thought he was murdered and not just burned up by accident. I don't know the second guy, and Kyoho was pals with Meyer, but I hardly knew him. Meyer said he swung right and left, and that he was some big-deal spy for the Jap Navy."

Elmer brain-drained it. "Gelb and Hanamaka have got these allegedly burn-scarred fingers. I'm wondering if they got them in the Griffith Park fire."

Jean shook her head. "Meyer was with me the day of the fire. Him and Kyoho were strange-o types of the first order, and they burned their fingers doing print-eradication dips, if you can feature that kind of action."

Elmer beagle-eyed Jean Clarice Staley. She read 96.6% kosher overall.

"Let's get back to Gelb, Tommy the G., and that spy shit we discussed."

Jean squirmed. She was hot to grab the gold and scram.

"Like I said, I'm strictly from shakedown. I pulled jobs with Tommy, mostly on political types, but I just sent incriminating photos and wire recordings through intermediaries, so I never knew who the marks were. I'm really just a courier and an informant. I finked Saul Lesnick to Ed Satterlee, years before Ed exploited his daughter's vehicular-manslaughter beef and turned Saul as his own snitch. All I've done spywise is forward mail for Meyer through Bev's Switchboard, which is the Grand Central Station of spy mail, because it's 1942, and everybody and his spotted dog is Fifth Column and thinks this new world war is the gateway to untold riches. Also, Bev's is in L.A., and L.A.'s close to Mexico. Meyer says the alleged el jefe of this alleged right-left conspiracy is a Mex, but I think it's all fantasia, because I think Mexico's a repository for all of Meyer's nutty get-rich-quick schemes and political notions. Bev's is Sheriff's-protected, and—"

Elmer cut in. "Why'd you send me them postcards? Why'd you pretend to be traveling?"

Jean turned on her baby browns. Jean laid on the oooh, baby and soft-soaped him.

"You're a cop, Elmer. I sure go for you, but that's what you are. I told Meyer you were nosing around, and he told me to scram for a while. I had a bunch of microdot postcards I was supposed to forward, so I decided to send them through you, because I knew you'd save them, and then I could retrieve them. Also, Bev Shoftel was starting to think that Sheriff Biscailuz was souring on their protection deal, so sending the cards to you seemed safer, because then I could resend them through Bev, if her biz was still protected."

Jean, baby. Say it ain't so. You exploited my redneck ass and ran me in circles.

"Ed Satterlee requested a search warrant for Bev's. How does that snatch you?"

"It doesn't snatch me at all. Ed's business is Ed's business, and thanks for the tip."

"Where's Meyer live? Nobody can pin an address on him."

"Nobody knows where Meyer lives. He's just that secretive. We communicate through Bev's."

"What's Fritzie doing now?"

"I told you. Fritzie walked out, Meyer walked in. Fritzie's out in the vapors."

"You arranged a party at Otto Klemperer's place in the winter of '39. Tell me about that."

Jean foot-stroked the gold bar. Her nylon stockings went screee.

"I know the Maestro through Meyer. He contributed to Meyer's Free Spain funds, which were all scams to begin with. The Maestro was holed up at Terry Lux's dry-out farm in Malibu, because he'd been suffering from these bad headaches. Some America First guy, a priest from a wealthy family, came to me through Tommy Glennon, who I already told you was my kid brother Robby's squeeze. The priest laid out the theme of the party. It was supposed to be all about some event in Nazi Germany four or five years before. There was supposed to be costumes and masks, and it all sounded strange-o to me. That's it. I set the party up, but I didn't attend it. I heard rumors that something went very bad—but everyone I knew who was there held their mud about what all happened."

Elmer brain-strained it. "Was the priest a man named Joe Hayes?"

"Yes."

"Do you know a man named Dudley Smith?"

"No, but I've heard of him. He's supposed to be a hatchet man for the L.A. Chief of Police. People are afraid of him."

"Klemperer and Meyer Gelb. Give me some more there."

"What's to give? Otto throws parties, and Meyer attends."

"You attend, too. Here's my guess there. You've got these music and movie hotshots passing through, and Meyer trawls for his marks."

Jean said, "Bingo."

Elmer said, "Bingo how?"

Jean said, "Meyer's always trawling for marks, and he's got no conscience in that regard."

Elmer smiled. "Rat him, then give me something I can use, in case this whipdick and I ever meet."

Jean lit a cigarette. "Otto's befriending these refugees. They're all Jewish musicians, let out of Germany. Meyer's set to run a squeeze on them. He says it's all hooked into some mysterious cabal, but I think he's just in it for the gelt."

Kay knew those folks. They were okay by her. They'd endured too much grief as it was.

Elmer said, "No soap. No shakedown, no extortion. That's straight from me. Tell Meyer I'm looking to hurt him. Tell him I'll put him in the shit if he goes ahead."

Jean said, "Okay, sweetie. I'll pass it along."

Elmer kissed his fingers and brushed back Jean's hair. La Jean swooned a bit. It felt half real/half fake.

"Take the gold and go someplace safe. This whole deal could blow up in our face."

Jean dumped the bar in her purse. She dropped a wet one on him and booked triple quick. The bar was triple fat and heavy. Her purse sagged down to her feet.

(LOS ANGELES, 1:00 A.M., 3/12/42)

The mad eugenicist. The butcher plastic surgeon and tong affiliate. Your host, Lin Chung.

Slumlord Lin. The crazy sawbones owned half of Montebello. He packed Chink refugees into gimcrack cribs and charged usurious rent. An opium den flanked his office. "O" fiends test-trialed Lin's "Youth Forever" blends. Lin and Dr. Saul Lesnick synthesized them. Let's build a hophead master race.

Lin's office was Führer bunker–sized and all knotty-pined. Physical-culture posters drooped off the walls. Norse vixens performed calisthenics. It refracted Leni Riefenstahl and Triumph of the Will.

Dudley watched Herr Doktor work. Lin jacked a spike with sodium pentothal and geezed up Jim Davis. Chief Jim was strapped to a gurney. He's a suckling pig at a luau. A sock is stuck in his mouth.

Chief Jim went loosey-goosey. He was prone to run his mouth and blab impolitic. In truth serum, veritas. Let's see what results.

Lin bowed and left the office. Chief Jim looked knocked-down euphoric. Dudley lit a cigarette and blew smoke in his face.

Hideo called him, postsweep. It spurred the abduction. Mondo Díaz snitched Davis as his spy-ring conduit. Lee Blanchard observed the snitch. Blanchard will likely resnitch it to Bill Parker. Hideo further revealed this:

Elmer Jackson showed him a microdot letter. Hideo ran first-round tests and failed to raise the text. Elmer refused to forfeit the letter. Hideo grabbed it and dropped it in the crime lab mail slot. It was addressed to a Baja PO box. La Paz/box 1823.

Elmer snagged the letter at Bev's Switchboard. Bev's stood self-indicted now. It's a seditionist mail drop. Dudley called the La Paz post office. He spoke Spanish and came off Army-SIS brusque. He picked up a ripe tidbit. Miss Constanza Lazaro-Schmidt rented box 1823.

Chief Jim looked ripe to pluck. Dudley pulled his gag. Jim coughed and gurgled euphoric. Jim looked gaga guileless and eager to please.

"I'm anxious to hear your thoughts about several events and the numerous people who may have attended them, Chief. We have a celebrated gold robbery in 1931, the celebrated Griffith Park fire of 1933, the recently celebrated klub*haus* murders, microdot communiqués, the Sinarquistas, and individuals named Tommy Glennon, Meyer Gelb, Jean Staley, Fritz Eckelkamp, Wendell Rice, George Kapek, Archie Archuleta, Karl Frederick Tullock, Martin Luther Mimms, Leander Frechette, George Lincoln Rockwell, Kyoho Hanamaka, Eddie Leng, Donald Matsura, Mondo Díaz, Miguel Santarolo, Frankie Carbajal, Juan Lazaro-Schmidt, and his sister, Constanza."

Chief Jim deadpanned the names. He said his pet rat Lucifer fucked his pet rat Brünnhilde. Dr. Saul fed them eugenics potions and imbued them with eternal youth. He planned to name their ratlings Hitler, Stalin, and Saul Junior.

Dudley said, "You're veering off a bit, Chief."

Davis said, "Lucifer raised money for some far-right boys. Meyer Gelb's a kosher cowboy. He's right-left and who knows what else. Meyer gave a speech at this Mexican confab. Vodka and schnitzel. The 'Horst-Wessel-Lied' and the 'Internationale.' Meyer's a goldbug. He wants the gold, but who doesn't? There's good colored trim at the klub*haus,* but I like fourteen-year-old white girls myself. There ought to be a law—and, frankly, there is. Preacher Mimms preaches the new gold standard. Meyer's a kosher extortionist. Kyoho refueled Jap planes at the Blue Fox on the Day of Infamy. He took Ernst Kaltenbrunner and some apparatchiks to the Fox his own self. Lucifer's a muff-diver. That's a rare trait in rats. Is this the DTs, Dud? I've had the DTs before."

The confab. Goldbugs. Blathering nuts and realpolitik. Oddball egalitarianism. Aus der Neuen Welt.

"I wonder if I might ask you a few more specific questions, Chief."

Davis said, "No. I won't let you. They're my DTs and my pretty pictures I'm seeing. I fucked Theda Bara and Vilma Bánky, and you didn't. I fucked your Irish mama. Lucifer fucked Marlene Dietrich in Dresden. There were these white boys and spic boys in this college there. Wallace Jamie, Joe Hayes. Juan Pimentel and Mondo Díaz. You want microdots and phone relays? They've got them. Jamie's America First. Father Joe blows Father Coughlin. They own a drop in West Hollywood, but Blow Job Bev's got her name on the deed. This Juan spic was there at the confab. Talk about your spy brain."

Aus der Neuen Welt. Realpolitik. Lucid instants couched in dross.

Postwar-strategy talks at a donkey club. We all want the gold. That means you. We're all goldbugs. We're all in this together. It's all one story, you see.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 2:30 A.M., 3/12/42)

My émigré friends lived in adjoining bungalows. They were night owls to begin with; they required no urging to stay up late, socialize, and make music. Elmer called me at home an hour ago and told me that he had braced Jean Staley. He said we should discuss the fruits of the interview, and told me I should pass a message to "those refugee chums of yours."

"Jean was in on some shakedown deal with Meyer Gelb," Elmer said. "And I figured out he had an eye on your chums. Tell them to breathe easy. I paid Jean off and sent her back on the lam again. She's indispensable to that shitbird Gelb, so he won't be squeezing your chums, no way at all."

I called the Koenigs and relayed the good news. Hence this impromptu celebration. My refugee chums had learned one aspect of the L.A. gestalt very quickly. When in doubt, throw a party.

Magda Koenig whipped up a pot of goulash; Ruth Szigeti journeyed out to a liquor store and stocked up on booze and mixer. I called Elmer back and told him he'd be a fool not to attend. He said, "We both know I'm a fool, but I'll be there anyway."

Bill called me a few minutes later. He relayed the latest sweep leads and closed with "For what it's worth, I love you." He hung up, just as I started to swoon.

The party was running full steam now. Ruth had invited four of her most recently acquired lovers, two of each sex. There was an usherette from the Aero Theatre and Miss Barbara Stanwyck. There was Brenda Allen's sought-after male prostitute, "Ten-Inch" Tony Mangano. There was sepia songster Billy Eckstine, hot off a record-breaking engagement at the southside Congo Club.

The goulash was spicy and tasty; Miklos Koenig made mean rye-whiskey Manhattans. Ruth shared brief bedroom intervals with Babs and Tony, and returned from them both looking pooped. The disparate batch of folks seemed to get along swell. Ruth played Paganini’s 24th violin caprice; Billy Eckstine held pace with her and warbled an a cappella “Ebb Tide.” Elmer the J. walked in the door and withstood a refugee stampede.

Miklos Koenig and Mr. Abramowitz pumped his hand and pounded his back; Magda demurely kissed both his cheeks. Elmer and Ruth shared a look that might best be described as lustful and opportunistic. Miklos force-fed Elmer a bowl of goulash; Elmer told him it was savory, but ain’t this the sort of grub the Communists eat? Babs asked him to fix a slew of her unpaid traffic tickets—which Elmer graciously agreed to do. Elmer addressed Billy Eckstine as “Sir.” He apologized for the Vice Squad raid on the Harlem Hutch in August ’38. Sir Billy impulsively embraced him.

Elmer and Ruth fell into each other’s gravitational pull. I eavesdropped on their screwball conversation. Elmer said things like “You’re Jewish, right?” and “I’ll bet Hitler’s boys were right on your tail.” Ruth asked Elmer how many Negroes he’d lynched and if his mom and dad bullwhipped their slaves. Elmer told Ruth she had green panther eyes. Ruth told Elmer he had beady eyes and said that she preferred circumcised men.

Dawn came up. I played hesitant Liszt on Miklos Koenig’s piano while Magda Koenig scrambled two dozen eggs. It was a very fine party. I looked out the front-door window and spotted a Ruth-meets-Elmer vignette. They leaned up against a wilted palm tree. I watched the not-too-dumb cracker and the Jewish refugee kiss.

(ENSENADA, 7:00 A.M., 3/12/42)

He worked all night. SIS maintained a small crime lab. Their photographic gear excelled. He examined the Jean Staley/Elmer Jackson postcards. He found microdots on two out of six.

The cards were two-ply pasteboard. He separated the pieces and got microscopically close. The dots looked like pinpricks. He dialed down and exposed them at maximum power. They remained dots. No text was revealed.

Ashida swigged coffee. He pondered ways and means and got an idea. He walked to the photo room. He pulled a Minox Riga camera and loaded it with high-resolve film. He shot twenty-four exposures. He photo-snapped the postcard pieces and developed the film.

The darkroom was well stocked. Ashida did the cut-and-dunks inside four hours. He hang-dried the prints. He got all cardboard grain. No microdots were exposed.

He found a paint atomizer. He sprayed a large piece of posterboard black. He taped the twenty-four photographs to sheer sheets of paper and placed them on an easel stand. He placed the posterboard on its own easel. Both stands were frame-only and hollow-backed.

He poked pinholes in the posterboard and placed the two stands close together. He rigged the posterboard easel in front of the photo easel. He aligned the stands just so.

He squinted through the pinholes. He saw the taped photographs just so. He dragged a forensic arc light up into position. He hit the juice and illuminated the back-easel sheets from behind.

It was very sheer paper. Ashida naked-eyed the flaws in the bond. He reloaded his camera and cut the overhead lights.

Black room, blinding arc light. He placed the camera lens up to the pinholes and snapped shots into the flare. The pinholes limited his photographic field and homed it in on the invisible dots.

He shot twenty-four exposures.

He developed the film.

Microdots appeared.

They were naked-eye visible. The text appeared as a blur.

Ashida microscoped all twenty-four prints. He dialed deep and brought up bursts of visible text. It wasn't coded. It was Spanish language. The sentences ran out of sequence. He poked his pinholes randomly and photographed the dots that way. He juggled prints and microscope slides and rigged up a first-draft sequence.

He quick-translated to English. He scanned words and cribbed up a text. Said text was all LISTS.

Of U.S. defense manufacturers.

Of pro-Communist and pro-Axis comrades/Kameraden within.

Of gold prices now.

Of gold prices predicted, up through '44.

Of sub berths on the Baja coast.

Of secret airstrips geared for takeoffs and landings. All situated north of L.A. All in the San Joaquin Valley. All near agricultural-crop properties.

This admonition. Typed in boldface:

"EYES ONLY. DO NOT REVEAL TO JLS & CLS UNDER ANY CIRCS."

JLS, CLS. Surely the Lazaro-Schmidt siblings.

Ashida jumped microscopes and rigged up fresh slides. He dialed down to maximum power. He brought up more text. It was all numbers and single letters.

The import hit him. It was Bible code. He'd learned the rudiments in grad school. Chapter and verse listings. King James page listings. Substitutions to transpositions to coherent text.

Ashida combed the lab and squadroom. He found a KJV Bible in the watch sergeant's desk. He worked with scratch pad, pen, and microscope.

He jumped Bible-to-scope. He fought eyestrain. He jumped Genesis-to-Revelation and covered all sixty-six books. Numbers-letters, numbers-letters. Chapters and verses. Sacred text to microdot text.

He worked for five hours straight. The translated text read thus:

"My trusted Comrade, or should I say Reichsführer, second only to me. We have veered left and right as this storm rages. Tovarich and Kamerad mean the same to us now. The NKVD and Gestapo are as one. 'Hail' or heil, makes no difference. I say both to you—Captain Juan Pimentel."

Ashida pulled up to chez Hanamaka. Genesis to Revelation. A recent memory perks. Cause and effect perk, in retrospect.

The bookie-drop raid. The phone-relay system identified and destroyed. Forty-odd men burned alive. Pimentel acts boldly. He incinerates evidence and kills co-conspirators. Comrade, Kamerad, tovarich. The perverse brotherhood survives.

Plus, something Dudley told him. A cove cave south of Ensenada. Pimentel acts boldly. He flamethrowers saboteurs. Comrade, Kamerad, tovarich. The perverse brotherhood survives.

Ashida parked in the carport. He'd called Pimentel and suggested a meet. Pimentel suggested this place.

Ashida arrived early. He wanted to reconnoiter. He wanted to check his photo device.

He got out and examined it. The trip wire stretched the full carport width. The photo housing was dust-streaked. It appeared operational. He pressed levers and heard car-tire thuds. The picture tube showed three rear license plates.

Two Baja diplomatic plates. One U.S./state of California plate.

Ashida memorized the numbers. He walked up to the house and unlocked the door. He had his own keys. Dudley trusted him.

The front room was breezy cool. Dudley kept the windows open. The telephone still worked. Dudley saw to that.

Pimentel was late. Ashida left the door cracked. He'd hear Kamerad #1 arrive.

Ashida dialed the Mexican Motor Vehicle Bureau. A male clerk took the call. Ashida cited his Army rank and serial number. He stiffed the plate request and stressed diplomatic.

The clerk went Un momento. Ashida eyed the door. The clerk came back on the line. He kicked loose the name and address stats.

Juan Lazaro-Schmidt. Constanza Lazaro-Schmidt. Two La Paz addresses.

Ashida hung up and dialed the Ensenada operator. He asked her for a stateside hookup. The main DMV in Los Angeles. Person-to-person. The head clerk, por favor.

The operator Sí, sí'd him. Ashida hung up and eyed the door. Pimentel was late-late now. The phone rang inside three minutes. Ashida jumped on the call.

He laid out his Army credentials. He recited the plate number. The clerk had him hold the line.

He held. He watched the door. The clerk came back on the line. She kicked loose the name and address stats.

Claire Katherine De Haven. A 1910 DOB. A Beverly Hills address.

Ashida hung up. The room warmed up. He walked to the back window and took some deep breaths.

He counted lies, omissions, distortions. What he'd told Dudley. What he hadn't told Dudley. Joan's diary. The East L.A. sweep. His end run with Elmer Jackson. His microdot findings. What he learned about Juan Piment—

"Alone at last. However you might judge me, you can't say that I haven't been patient."

Ashida wheeled. Pimentel wore Statie black. His tunic was custom-tailored. Silver daggers marked the Waffen-SS. Braided shoulder boards marked the Red Guard.

Ashida said, "Should I call you Reichsführer? I don't know the equivalent rank in the Russian Army."

Pimentel blew a kiss. "You'll call me sweetie pie in just a few minutes, once you've seen what I have to show you."

Ashida backed away. He bumped a window sash and froze. Pimentel crooked one finger and walked past him. He turned down a short hallway.

He sashayed. He rolled his hips. He did mambo steps and went Tra-la-la. Ashida followed him. The hallway dead-ended ten feet ahead. Brushed-oak panels. No doors inset. A tight cul-de-sac.

Pimentel tapped a wall plank. A panel slid back. Ashida saw pulleys and hinges. A dark space opened up.

Pimentel said, "Kyoho was quite the pack rat. Dudley never discovered this little cache."

Ashida caught up. Pimentel pulled a light cord. Presto—cul-de-sac, cubbyhole, closet.

It's six feet wide and deep. It holds period costumes. They're all nineteenth century and displayed on wall pegs. Pastel silk gowns. Cossack cavalry wear. German Navy kit. Imperial couture. The czarist era. The reign of Otto von Bismarck.

Pimentel giggled. "Does it make you feel special? There's really just a very few of us who know."

"Like the Lazaro-Schmidts? Like Claire De Haven?"

Pimentel went tsk, tsk. "The disapproving American. Ever so judgmental. He can't see through to the roots of what we have here. It's like your national treasure, the motel. Couples dress up to meet in sordid little places. We have this snazzy dressing room, and a surfeit of bedrooms upstairs."

Ashida said, "Couples?"

Pimentel touched his coat sleeve. Ashida pulled away. Pimentel went tsk, tsk.

"Well, the Lazaro-Schmidts are a couple, however much you might disapprove. And Claire met José Vasquez-Cruz here, up to the point that he was revealed to be a Communist priest-killer, and our gorgeous comrade Dudley killed him. People come here to don costumes, and who can blame them? We all want to be something more beautiful and gilded than what we really are.”

Ashida shuddered. “What costume will you wear? Are you a comrade or a Reichsführer at this moment?”

“That’s hardly the question. The question is what you’ll wear.”

Ashida froze. Pimentel leaned close and kissed him. Ashida grasped his arms and opened his mouth. He felt Pimentel’s tongue. He felt Pimentel’s hand between his legs.

He kissed back. He smelled mothballs and old wool. He shut his eyes and saw Bucky and Dudley. He opened his eyes and saw the moles on Pimentel’s eyelids. He smelled talc and cheap aftershave.

He stifled a screech. He shut his eyes. He clamped down and bit Pimentel’s tongue off. Blood burst into his mouth. Pimentel screeched. Ashida pulled his piece and emptied the clip.

Pimentel pitched and flailed. He took down a row of hatboxes. He smashed into mothball sachets and gold brocade gowns.

(LOS ANGELES, 3/12–3/25/42)

This kiss.

His first kiss with Ruth. It started something. Kay told him she peeped the event and saw worlds implode. He hasn't forsaken Brenda, Ellen, or hot-damn Annie Staples. Ruth hasn't forsaken her hot-damn yen for both girls and boys. Kay told him about this other kiss. That kiss got him all brain-broiled.

Kay visited Hideo Ashida. He was plunked in the Army stockade outside T.J. Dudley extracted him from the Statie jail. The beaner cops popped him and held him there. He snuffed that Juan Pimentel cat. Hideo Ashida, tagged for Murder One.

The Mex cops tortured Hideo. They beat him and attached electrodes to his balls. They installed hungry rats in his cell. The Dudster wangled a writ and secured him a stockade berth. Kay saw him there. Hideo was woozed up on morphine. The Army docs prescribed it for his thumped-upon head. Kay asked him why he juked Pimentel. Hideo babbled, "This kiss."

"This Kiss" tweaked him. It cinched him up to "This Case" and all the attendant queer shit. Queer Tommy Glennon. Queer Joe Hayes. Queer Huey Cressmeyer and queer klub*haus* traffic. Pimentel got snared in a queer-bar raid. San Diego, '37. That cinch-up cinched numerous threads.

He goosed Thad Brown. Thad record-checked Captain Juan, back to his bassinette. He glommed El Juan's Statie file and some adjunct paperwork. Pithy dish was revealed.

Pimentel studied in Krautland. He attended Dresden Polytechnic, circa '35. Class lists came with the paperwork. Wallace Jamie, Mondo Díaz, and Padre Joe Hayes were Dresden alums. Pimentel studied relay-telephone techniques. That cinched him up to a slew of pay-phone snafus. Pimentel studied microdot technology. Pimentel hobknobbed with Nazis and Reds at that Baja shindig. That cinched him to this whole shit-shrouded conspiracy.

Hideo killed him at Kyoho Hanamaka's place. He called the Staties and surrendered right there. Pimentel—microdot whiz. Hideo—forensic whiz. Microdot postcards. The Staley-Jackson snafu. Hideo's pledge to decode them postcards.

The overall dish strained his brain waves. He dished it straight back to Kay. She dished Bill Parker. Whiskey Bill dished Thad Brown. They held an All-Dish Summit at Lyman's. Buzz Meeks joined them. They made no progress toward a three-case solve.

Ace Kwan dished some dish. Ace said Dudley pentothaled Jim Davis. Chief Jim revealed gibberish. Dud ensconced him at the Terry Lux nut farm. Jim's got congestive heart disease. Jim's going through the DTs. Jim's tick-tight with Mondo Díaz. Jim's cinched to the left-right combine. Sieg Heil, you fat sack of shit.

Jim's stuck in stir. That's one witness down. Link Rockwell's witness #2. He's in the Navy brig in Sarasota, Florida. The Navy won't permit extradition. Whiskey Bill's preparing a hot question list. A Navy lawyer pledged cooperation. He said they'd film the interview and send it along. Witness #2's scratched for now.

Witness #3 crapped out. Adios, Ralph D. Barr. He was Jean Staley's ex-hubby and a Meyer Gelb KA. Ralphie: Paramount stagehand/firebug/noted whipout man.

He got popped in Detroit. The Motor City bulls nailed him for Red agitation. It was summer, 1940. He firebombed the love shack of a high-up Ford man. The cops hard-nosed him. He snitched Gelb and ex-frau Jean. He said they recruited him for the CP. Ralphie torched his cell in the Detroit City Jail. Ralphie self-fried in true firebug fashion. Scratch witness #3.

Scratch three more witnesses. Díaz, Carbajal, Santarolo. Salvy Abascal interceded on their behalf. He called in Catholic fat-cat favors. Papist lawyers sprung the trio from PD custody. They're now in Fed custody.

Bill Parker requested further interviews. The U.S. attorney rebuffed him. Parker was a Federal bar–licensed lawyer. He called Fey Edgar Hoover personally. Fey Edgar rebuffed him. Parker requested a sitdown with Ed Satterlee. Fey Edgar rebuffed that request. Ed the Fed had been placed under house arrest.

Scratch seven witnesses. Scratch the Parker-Jackson shot to erase the Fed-probe recordings. Scratch that avenue to secure acquittals for Jack H. and Fletch Bowron. Ed the Fed was their conduit. Ed the Fed was set to unlock the evidence vault.

Lawyers will fuck you when no one else will. Salvy Abascal is a lawyer. He's an overall shitheel to rival Dudley Smith. Yeah—and him and Buzz have got a hole card to lay Salvy's ass low.

Frankie Carbajal's key revelation. This delirious dish:

Abascal is jobbing his Irish Kamerad. Abascal is planning sabotage behind El Dudster's back. Abascal has piggybacked Dud's run-wetbacks racket and has infiltrated saboteurs in with the wets. The saboteurs are set to bolt their San Joaquin Valley huts. They're fruit-pickers and bomb-tossers. That's a hot new one.

Him and Buzz got advance warning. They've withheld the word. It bought time. He bought them time with Dudley. He told him they slayed Tommy Glennon. He got the green light to slay Wayne Frank's slayer in return. Dud cares naught for the klub*haus* job. All Dud wants is the gold. Yeah—but it's all a lot bigger than that.

Strategies. Plays, plots, ploys, plans. His overworked brain's overheated and pitched to a boil.

He's prowled the jazz-club strip. He's trawled for the Jap sword man and his queer white companion. He's notched no solid leads. He's likewise trawled for the two skirts in the klub*haus* smut pix. You get lucky sometimes. He spotted them at the Congo Club. They were full-fucked forthcoming.

We've been to the klubhaus. Link Rockwell and Archie Archuleta drew us in. We posed for the pix. Our male costars wore masks. Link worked the camera. We never met Wendell Rice and George Kapek. We don't know who snuffed them. We don't know no Jap sword man and no queer white boy. You sound us, Daddy-O?

Sí, yo comprendo. Vaya con Dios, you slovenly sluts.

He jumped locales then. He jumped darktown-to-J-town and trawled for the sword man. He'd eliminated Banzai Bob Yoshida. Sword man was allegedly a curio dealer. He pounded J-town under shit conditions. The bulk of the Jap populace was now stuck in stir. The remaining Japs fish-eyed him and played it sullen. Sword man? Queer friend? Eat shit and die, White Oppressor!!!

The klub*haus* job was thus dead-stalled. He worked around it. He finally finagled an Annie Staples–Orson Welles tryst. Brenda put it together. Welles tricked out of the service and gassed on big blondes. The fuckfest transpired at the Miracle Mile love nest. Sergeant E. V. Jackson voyeurizized.

Annie seemed to enjoy it. Der Wunderkind surely did. Annie steered Fats to some pillow talk per Major Dudley Smith. Welles described the savage beating Dud put on him. Welles described Terry Lux's plastic job and his snitch recruitment. Welles went on a goodwill tour conceived by FDR. Dud wanted rat-outs on Commies and other such scum. Welles was Claire De Haven's part-time lover. Dud was jealousy-jammed. Welles considered the Dudster insane. I'll tell you this, Annie. He's dropping into some hellish abyss.

Annie excelled at the Welles tryst. Kay paid her to make wax impressions of Saul Lesnick's keys. Annie delivered there, ditto. Who's set to raid his office? Him and Buzz are good bets.

Yeah—but all bets are off on the gold now. Joan's dead. Hideo Ashida's imprisoned. Dud's the sole gold quester still extant. The gold to the fire. That's your ’31 to ’33 parlay. Jean Staley dished there. It felt incomplete. What if nobody killed Wayne Frank? What if he fried of his own dumb volition? What if kid brother Elmer’s got nobody to clip for revenge?

His brain’s overheated. He’s overworked. He’s running bag for Jack Horrall and Fletch Bowron. Gold-star contributors are dumping gelt on their defense fund. They fear Fed-probe convictions and expulsion from office. He’s siphoning cold cash to their lawyers. Bagman Elmer rides again.

He’s overworked. His brain’s overheated. His body and soul’s overtaxed. Temptress—thy name art Ruth Klarfeld Szigeti.

She’s from Budapest. He’s from Wisharts, North Carolina. She’s forty-three. He’s twenty-nine. She’s Jewish. He’s a Scottish preacher’s kid out of some unholy bog. Her dad conducted the Hungarian National Opera. His dad peddled Klan kode books. He’s seen some whopping bad grief in his day. She’s seen the Nazis machine-gun three hundred Jews and dump them in a ditch.

The Nazis made her watch. The Koenigs and Sandor Abromowitz stood beside her. They didn’t get blasted themselves. Here’s the big why of that.

The Jews were Commies and big anti-Nazis. Ruth and friends snitched them out for asylum. Their life savings bought them tickets to Mexico and the U.S. The dead three hundred were musicians and college profs. The death-squad Nazis were distantly allied with Meyer Gelb. The slaughter warned Comrade Gelb. His postwar scheme was a distant jerk-off dream at this moment. It could go blooey at any point.

Ruth was braced in advance of the slaughter. You will survive. You will emigrate and inform. You will facilitate extortion. You will fink at Comrade Gelb’s behest.

Comrade Gelb. Comrade Jean Staley’s shakedown boss. Comrade Elmer bought Comrade Jean off and scared her out of L.A. Comrade Elmer derailed Comrade Gelb’s current shakedown play. Comrade Elmer’s a big hero to Ruth Szigeti and friends.

The Koenigs and old man Abromowitz have crowned him their king. Ruth throws herself at him in bed. Ruth’s omnivorous. She throws herself at cocktail waitresses and pizza-delivery boys. It doesn’t faze him. Her big hurt fazes him. He plays the fool to quash the hurt and make her laugh.

Ruth runs abrupt. She whips him the woof-woof and hops out of bed to practice her violin. He lives to jolly her and eradicate her grief for a while. She flaunts her death-camp tattoo. He tickles it and makes her howl. He tells her Marine Corps and cop stories and lays on the laffs.

They’re both treading quicksand. He’ll escape his patch or he won’t. She’s got it worse than him. Her quicksand is all in her memory—and it sure as shit won’t go away.

Claire left him. Young Joan left him. Beth left him. His Mexican family has cut him adrift. Juan Pimentel is dead. Hideo Ashida has been imprisoned. Salvy Abascal is off, preoccupied. He's running their biz ventures sans Salvy's aid and Greenshirt collaboration. He's neglecting his Army duties and his triple-murder case. The gold quest lies dormant. Army doctors have diagnosed Hideo's "advanced fugue state."

Hideo masterminded the gold quest and their three-case inquiries. Mike Breuning and Dick Carlisle have been removed from the klub*haus* job. A hostile faction runs that investigation now. Elmer Jackson and Buzz Meeks are running rogue. Elmer read Joan's diary. The rogue redneck knows the gold heist and fire jobs intimately.

He misses Claire. He misses Young Joan. He misses Beth. His wife and daughters have booked passage to Ireland. He misses Hideo most poignantly.

Hideo killed Juan Pimentel. A lust motive glimmers there. A hidden closet was revealed at chez Hanamaka. It was packed with garish costumes. Captain Juan's severed tongue was found on the floor. Responding Staties noted Hideo's blood-smeared lips.

Hideo has withheld from him. He senses that. His hideous omissions feel paradoxically defined. Juan Pimentel's death plays non sequitur. He interfered in some vexatious manner and caused Hideo to react. Hideo was doing microdot work at the SIS lab. Singed cardboard and misplaced equipment suggest it. The microdot work revealed something. Hideo is near catatonic and in no shape to tell him what.

He had requisitioned a full range of three-case paperwork. A range of newly discovered files was cached within it. He gave the paperwork to Hideo to study and analyze. He searched Hideo's quarters in Ensenada and L.A. The paperwork has gone missing. Hideo remains his sole hope for a three-case solution and shot at the gold.

Missing paperwork. Three-case principals, missing in action.

Link Rockwell—in Navy custody. Díaz, Carbajal, Santarolo—in Fed custody. James Edgar Davis—exiled to Terry Lux's retreat.

Count Joe Hayes missing. He called the Archbishop and requested a formal chat with Monsignor Joe. His Eminence brusquely refused. Count Orson Welles missing. He's off carousing and moviemaking. He's an unproven snitch, so far.

Impasses.

Stalemates.

Checkmates.

Credit Bill Parker's strategic aplomb.

Jack Horrall has not returned his phone calls. Parker's Fed maneuvers have put Jack squarely in his debt. Thad Brown has fallen under Parker's pious spell. The two great rivals for postwar Chief of Police. Now allied against Dudley L. Smith.

He's made moves to restore a counterbalance. He's requisitioned a second set of three-case paperwork. He's saving it for Hideo's hopeful return to health.

Hideo haunts him. He pulled strings with U.S. Army courts and secured binding writs. Hideo will not stand trial for the murder of Juan Pimentel. He will not rot in Leavenworth or a Mexican prison. Hideo will be interned at a U.S. relocation center later this month.

Three-case paperwork will await him. The U.S. Army is building him his own crime lab. Hideo will waltz the day that fascist Japan surrenders.

Countermeasures.

Logical applications.

Counterbalancing tasks.

Kyoho Hanamaka haunts him. He's the crux of all explication. He's the secret sharer. The gold heist and fire precede his tour of fascist-Communist hot spots. His friendship with Meyer Gelb precedes. His German-Russian schooling sets the course of hellish events to come. The gold is hoarded and left to snowball in value. World war looms as inevitable. Hanamaka envisions a postwar brotherhood. The gold will finance the survival of totalitarian rogues in extremis. A conspiracy is born. Murderous pratfalls occur. Personal agendas surface. 1942 marks a chaotic nexus. He must exploit it.

Countermeasures.

He's issued a second APB on Kyoho Hanamaka. He's tapped police agencies, jails, hospitals. Plus relocation centers and travel hubs. He's blanketed Mexico and the U.S. Kyoho Hanamaka—arrest and detain.

Countermeasures.

Makework.

Tasks to tether him.

He's adrift. He's not demoralized. Constanza tethers him. They thrive as one imagination. Constanza loves the Wolf and trusts in his powers. They envision the gold and lust for it as one shared dream. Brother Juan lusts for the gold—but lacks their imagination. Brother Juan attended the '40 conference. He knows things he might not have revealed. Constanza was Herr Hanamaka's lover. She rutted with the one man who knows the whole story. Her body consecrates their dream quest.

Constanza withholds from him. He's yet to brace her. He needs to know the mail-drop secrets of box 1823. He falters with women, on occasion. It's his Achilles' heel.

Constanza's passion exceeds Claire's. Terry Lux told him that Claire is kicking morphine at his retreat. Kay Lake urged the treatment and visits Claire daily. The Wolf views Kay Lake suspiciously and considers her a deadly proposition. His own opinion vacillates and finally rests at disbelief. The Lake girl is grandiose and heedless to her core. Claire has always overestimated her and vilified her to a fault. Kay Lake and Claire De Haven now live in rapprochement. They are casualties of early-wartime L.A. Only the war could have spawned such a fatuous misalliance.

He found Claire's morphine stash in their hotel suite. He injects the drug periodically. He drifts off on a cloud where no woman ever beats or betrays him.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES AND BAJA, 3/12–3/25/42)

We were fated, Bill and I. He knocked on my door last December 6; he'd concocted an injudicious plan to entrap Communists and recruited me on the day before Pearl Harbor. He instilled my bitter loathing of Dudley Smith and introduced me to Claire De Haven. I was sucker bait for the heady series of events that have followed. I was at loose ends, in the Joan Conville manner. Bill hopped from crush to crush and ensnared us both. He pointed Joan on her way to self-immolation and allowed me to glimpse a blithe evil that I cannot turn my back on. The late diarist has provided the current diarist with the means to rectify her botched knife assault. I shouldn't have done it; I could not have taken a human life and lived with the consequences. And why kill when one can facilitate a self-immolation of the sort that consumed my dear friend?

Joan's words indicted Dudley. I will draft a freshly revised indictment. It will take various epistolary forms. I will create scripts for the Catholic Bill and Claire to perform for their confessor, Joe Hayes. The scripts will contain innuendo and misinformation calculated to push Dudley to blunder. Dudley is blunder-prone now. Elmer told me that Salvy Abascal has monumentally betrayed him, and has hinted at possible deadly ramifications. Dudley collects protégés. Witness Mike Breuning, Dick Carlisle, and—most auspiciously—Hideo Ashida. I encountered Breuning at Lyman's a week back. He was in his cups and mourning the loss of some essential Dudley Smith. He told me that Dudley's women are leaving him, one by one. Dudley's corps of able and compliant men must be made to follow. This is the basic design of my malicious levy of words.

Hideo's current gambit is no words. I have visited him at the Army stockade and am convinced that he is feigning a catatonic state. He is doing this in order to circumvent confrontation and capitulation in all matters pertaining to Dudley Smith. Dudley Smith and Hideo Ashida love each other deeply. Dudley's love is fraternal. It's the love of a brutalized Irish boy who saw British soldiers murder his brother, leaving him alone to suffer the whims of a sodden and vicious mother. Dudley holds Hideo Ashida to be James Conroy Smith, reborn. Dudley worships brilliance and mastery and possesses the generous gift of acknowledging it in all manner of people. He sees Hideo as his fascist-utilitarian kin. Hideo's love for Dudley is wholly lustful and at odds with his fulsome knowledge of Dudley's evil.

Hideo has omitted and withheld from Dudley. Dudley will not crack unless Hideo cracks first. Dudley sees the Smith-Ashida alliance as a perfect wartime union. Hideo sees it as a vouchsafe of his wartime survival and fugitive sexual urge.

I will rob Hideo of his early-wartime love. I will covertly engage and collaborate with early-wartime fury and racial animus. I will rip Hideo free of Dudley Smith—so help me God.

I am possessed of a ghastly agency here. The war facilitates me; I consider the war to be a dear friend. I worship catastrophe in the manner of the nineteenth-century romantics. Chaos vitalizes me and assigns me tasks. I accede to the fact that this is my personal madness.

The war gave me the great Otto Klemperer and his nightmare story of beating a man to death. The war gave me a small part in the American passage of Shostakovich's new symphony. The war gave me a brief colloquy with an imbecilic monster.

I've been visiting Claire during her dope cure at Terry Lux's clinic. Jim Davis is now enrolled there. Two male nurses were walking him back from the infirmary. He recognized me from various PD functions and said hi.

I asked him how it felt to betray your country and side with fascist and Communist killers. I asked him why he molested underaged girls. I asked him how it felt to disembowel four human beings and let an innocent man take the rap.

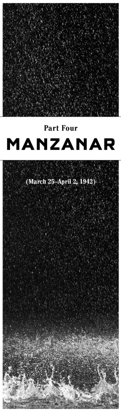
Davis didn't seem to understand me. Terry most likely had him doped up.

Claire and Chief Jim head the sick list; numerous three-case witnesses top the custody list. Hideo Ashida remains in stir. The internment push has leveled Japanese communities throughout Los Angeles County. City jails, work farms, and barracks shantytowns overflow with imprisoned Japanese. They'll soon be scoured Jap-free. The exodus to permanent relocation centers will kick into high gear. Hideo Ashida will head northeast to the Owens Valley. Dudley Smith will surely enhance his accommodations. I might run into the Dudster some fine visitors' day.

Part Four

MANZANAR

(March 25–April 2, 1942)



105

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 A.M., 3/25/42)

Exodus, 7:14. “And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh’s heart is hardened; he refuses to let the people go.”

He watched. He pointed his binoculars east and tracked the migration. He’d spent his last free night at the Biltmore Hotel. A high terrace supplied the view.

Whole families trudged. They pulled handcarts piled with luggage and folded overcoats. Prowl cars trailed them. FBI men walked alongside. The pickup spot was north-northeast. Army buses revved their engines there.

Ashida watched. He stood by himself. His mother and brother had already been interned. They were sequestered at Heart Mountain. He was Manzanar-bound. The Owens Valley. Up in the Sierras. A two-temperature zone. Broiling heat, freezing cold.

He got off lucky. There would be no Mexican jail or U.S. prison. He sidestepped death by torture and brutal mistreatment. All praise to Dudley Smith.

Manzanar would suit him. Preferential treatment had been arranged. Dudley assured him of that. He canned his I’m catatonic act. They had a nice chat.

He detailed the text of the microdot postcards. He laid out Juan Pimentel’s spy-ring complicity. He did not snitch off the two Lazaro-Schmidts.

Dudley was Constanza’s lover. She was spy-ring complicit. Dudley would or would not determine this for himself.

He played God with Dudley. It was a jilted-lover move. He employed need-to-know tactics with Dudleyesque aplomb. He apologized for killing Pimentel. It left Dudley’s “business fronts” understaffed.

Dudley took it all in. There were no accusations. There were no probes or digs per the murder and no displays of pique.

They embraced. They vowed to retain close contact. Ashida pledged his loyalty.

I'll remain assiduous. I'll study any and all files you provide. I'll press for a three-case solution and shot at the gold.

Dudley said, "Chin up, lad. We'll both survive and prevail." Dudley evinced psychopathic good cheer.

That was last night. He trained up from Baja then. He packed one suitcase and ordered a last room-service meal. He slept on the living room couch. Early sunlight roused him.

Ashida walked out. He affixed his blinders and took the back service stairs down. He cut through the lobby and walked north on Olive. The migration was due east. He looped in west of the swarm.

He cut east on 1st Street and passed Central Station. He took a last look up at the crime lab. The pickup spot was dead ahead.

He dawdled over. Two hundred Japanese huddled at 1st and Los Angeles. They pushed off the sidewalk and covered the street. Four buses were double-parked.

Army noncoms cinched luggage to above-the-bus racks. They unloaded handcarts and checked names off clipboard lists. Men, women, children. Knots of four, five, and six. Name tags pinned to overcoats. Families in tight little cliques.

Ashida scanned faces. The Japanese suck it up. The kids stuck close to mom and dad. He saw flat eyes and no spilled tears.

He jostled into the throng. He removed his blinders and donned his Man Camera. He picked out details. People recognized him.

Little girls clutching dolls. Who's that man there? Little boys clutching toy trucks. It's Running Dog Ashida.

Name tags pinned to coat lapels. More eyes pinned his way. Old men with canes. Running Dog Traitor. Luggage lashed to bus racks, piled skyscraper high.

He dialed his Man Camera close. He saw men hiss. He saw women dodge his lens. A fat man mimed spitting. A high school boy mimed FUCK YOU.

The boarding commenced. The noncoms herded people onto buses. Ashida stood his ground. Men elbowed and jostled him on purpose. Spit globs hit his coat. He heard Shudo/Werewolf/Watanabe. The crowd thinned a bit. He Man Camera'd the sidewalk and saw them.

Bill Parker. Elmer Jackson. Kay Lake.

They smiled at him. They waved at him. They made no moves to screw it up with words. His eyes clouded over. Tears doused his camera lens.

Two noncoms approached him. They called him Dr. Ashida. They said something about Major Smith and sitting up front.

Ashida waved to his friends. Elmer Jackson bayed like a hound dog. Kay Lake blew him a kiss.

The driver and gun guard gabbed. It was all baseball and promiscuous Wacs. They'd rigged up a jump seat. Ashida sat between them. Wire mesh closed off the hoi polloi Japs.

They looked forlorn and apprehensive. They played it stoic. They saw Ashida up front with the round eyes. Ashida supplied thought balloons. Race traitor/white man's tool/running dog.

The bus rolled through L.A. and San Berdoo counties. Ashida's bus took the pole spot. Three buses trailed it. The gun guard yakked Ashida up.

Manzanar ain't too bad. The weather bites Chihuahua dicks. Families get housed all together. The mess halls are done up homey. You can plant your own garden. There's Christian and Shinto chapels. There's work assignments. Kids go to school.

That Major Smith's a sketch. That's some brogue he's got. He's got swell quarters set up for you.

The journey slogged. The driver and gun guard shot the shit and yakked over engine throb. The buses refueled at a filling station outside Visalia. The guards passed out sandwiches and declared a piss stop. The Sierras loomed off to the east.

The stop consumed an hour. The captive Japs hogged both rest rooms and pissed the local yokels off. Hooligans went Banzai and made like the Zeros at Pearl. The gun guards pulled their billy clubs and moved them along.

The slog resumed. The temperature dropped. The caravan chugged through steep mountains. Ashida shivered. The gun guard passed him a blanket.

They hit the Owens Valley. It was wide, flat, and bleak. Tall mountains bordered it. The air was dry and cold. Snow covered the peaks and iced up the ground.

There it is. Manzanar War Relocation Center. It's all the way off by itself.

There's all these claptrap buildings and all this barbed wire. The family huts extend a mile out. It's perfectly symmetrical. It's all jerry-rigged.

There's all these wide streets. They're unpaved and squared off. The crisscross goes on forever. It's cold today. There's nobody out and about.

Fifty-odd buses were parked by the guard gate. MP's in hooded greatcoats smoked and chewed the fat. A first lieutenant stood off by himself. Ashida recognized him.

Al Wilhite. Ex-Burglary hardnose. Known Dudley Smith toady and apologist.

The new buses pulled up to the bus line. Wilhite approached the lead-bus door. The gun guard kicked it open. Ashida walked out first.

Wilhite saluted him. “Welcome to Manzanar, sir. Major Smith has requested that I show you to your quarters.”

They were jailhouse de-luxe. Dudley Smith vouched good hotels. The Biltmore in L.A. The del Norte in Baja. This three-room Manzanar suite.

A bedroom. A well-equipped lab. A workroom with built-in shelves and a large desk. A fresh set of three-case paperwork, all neatly stacked.

Plus a kitchenette. Plus an Army scrambler phone. He could make and receive his own calls.

His suite was detached. He had stormproof windows and a Mount Whitney view. Central ducts supplied heat. He had privacy. The shack rows stood a full hundred yards off.

Al Wilhite pointed to the paperwork. “That’s your job, for as long as it takes you. And, there’s a man at the Lone Pine Hospital. Major Smith would like you to interview him. He’s being treated for severe burns there.”

Dusk settled in. A mountain gale stirred loose snow. It swirled high and obscured rooflines. Manzanar went arctic cold. Steam heat warmed the suite.

Ashida dozed. Al Wilhite brought him his dinner. The MP’s mess hall employed local cooks. Those guys knew their stuff. The jailbirds rated Army cooks. They got substandard fare.

The meal was good. It included French champagne. Relentless Dudley. Ever the Dudleyesque touch.

Ashida heard voices outside. He checked his front-room window. Three young men stood by the steps. They wore Belmont High letter jackets and held whomping sticks. Go, Mighty Sentinels. Green-and-black, 4-ever.

He walked outside.

He said, “As you wish.”

He motioned them forward to beat him.

They came at him low and knocked him flat on a snowdrift. They arced their sticks and brought them down hard. They thumped his arms and legs. Swirling snow covered their faces.

(LOS ANGELES, 9:30 P.M., 3/25/42)

Ruth kicked him out. Lazy love gave her the frets. She cited her violin and an audition. You have other women, Liebchen. Go, pester them for a while.

Elmer hoofed it. Ruth dispensed good advice. Make the rounds. Visit the girls. Ask those questions you should have asked before this.

He hopped east. He split Santa Monica and cut back to L.A. proper. The SaMo PD ran shoreline blackouts. That meant doused traffic lights and house lights. He drove out of it and lit a cigar.

He passed the SaMo-city border. He went from no lights to muted lights and cellophane-dim stoplights. Folks drove faster. Wilshire opened up.

A light rain kicked in. He cut north to Laurel Canyon. He caught Brenda in her robe and up for a chat. She drew the line there. No transitory woof-woof tonight.

They sipped Cointreau and noshed salted peanuts. They discussed their hot-sheet biz. Elmer snagged his chance and steered the talk.

"Bev's Switchboard keeps popping up in the klub*haus* job. I was wondering if you knew who actually owns the place."

Brenda blew smoke rings. "This priest Joe Hayes has a small percentage, but the Ness family's got more of a percentage on the books. You know—that racket buster Eliot Ness, and his nephew, Wallace Jamie. That twerp who's in the shit on the phone-tap probe."

That hitches up. Jamie and Hayes. It bespeaks Fifth Column calumny. Thad Brown turned bonus paper on Mondo Díaz. The INS compiled it. Dig: Hayes and Jamie attended Dresden Polytechnic. Likewise, Mondo Díaz and Juan Pimentel. Sieg Heil—it's Deutschland '35.

"Bev's is Sheriff's-protected, right? Gene Biscailuz is taking a few points there."

Brenda said, "Eight points, Citizen. One more than we're paying Jack Horrall. That doesn't mean that Gene don't have misgivings. The rumor is that he's been rethinking the protection, because Bev's is so damn flat-out crooked."

Elmer sipped Cointreau. "That's some tasty dish. It's funny how these things drop on you out of the blue."

Brenda laughed. "You came here to pump me, Citizen. And I'm not talking about in the sack."

Ellen kept late hours. The baby bawled nonstop and shitcanned her sleep. She was shooting some back-lot oater. Her hubby was off with the Air Corps. He might catch her bored and eager to yak.

Elmer cut to Hollyweird. He parked outside the Green Gables and elevatored up. He peeped the fire-escape window. The lights were on. Ellen wore a shorty nightgown. Ellen paced and smoked.

He climbed back inside and door-knocked her. Ellen opened up and went Ssshhh. He knew the drill. The baby's sleeping, you dipshit.

They sat around and tipped Lucky Lager. Ellen cited a migraine. It quashed a stint in the kip.

They kept their voices low. The baby had keen ears and lived to disrupt. Elmer steered talk to Jean Staley.

This job I'm on. It's strictly routine. Her name popped up. You two were fellow starlets, huh? Right here on the Paramount lot.

Ellen inveighed. Insomniacs ran talkative. Ellen lived to dissect and rehash.

"Jean was a strange-o. She fell into her actress gig, but I always made her for a grifter at heart. She had a strange-o kid brother. His name was Robby, and he wanted to be an actor, but he couldn't get his foot in the door. He was a swish, and I think he was in with some swish boys who rolled pathetic old queens for kicks."

Elmer cinched it. Robby was Tommy Glennon's ex-squeeze. Jean told him that. He lashed up loose strands. The queer white boy, the Jap sword man's pal.

"Was Robby tall? I'm working off witness descriptions of some fruit kid I've never seen."

Ellen lit a cigarette. "Robby was short. He was a shrimp in the mode of Alan Ladd, but without the charm and good looks."

Elmer said, "Jean and men. There's got to be a story there."

Ellen said, "Sure, if you don't mind Communist no-goodniks and firebugs."

"Shit, don't stop now."

"Who's stopping?"

"Ellen, come on. Don't—"

"Jean had this strange-o lover named Meyer Gelb. He recruited for the CP at Paramount, and he was hawking a pro-Red script titled 'This Storm,' which Jean told me was strictly from hunger. Meyer exerted a sick-o power over Jean. He made her marry a sick-o grip named Ralph D. Barr, who set fires and whipped his pecker out on the girls at Le Conte Junior High. Ralphie used to rig explosives and set contained fires for the cheap-o westerns the studio used to shoot out in the Valley. This was strange—because Meyer had these burn scars on his hands, and the rumor was that Terry Lux and some Chink plastic surgeon did skin grafts on him."

Ellen dished good dish. It confirmed prior dish. It cinched up Staley/Gelb/Barr/Lux/Chink-o Chung et al.

"Sergeant Elmer's in a trance. Don't tell me this is 'strictly routine.' You've got your jaws locked on something."

Elmer yukked. "All right. We've got all these strange-o types. What about other friends and known associates?"

Ellen crushed her cigarette. "There was this tall southern guy. He impressed me as a grifter, and he had a drawl sort of like yours."

Cinch knots unraveled. Elmer pulled out his wallet and fanned the photo sleeves. He flashed his Wayne Frank picture. Ellen orbed in on it.

"Yeah, that's the guy. And I hate to say it, but that Klan sheet looks pretty good on him."

Surprise didn't cut it. Shock missed the point. Spiritus Mundi said it best.

Kay's shtick. We share one soul and one fate. Our shit's all interlocked. We're as one and fucked-up by life's follies. We swirl as our foolish fate plays itself out.

Annie was bright-eyed and bushy-tailed. She looked 1:00 a.m. in-her-robe goooood. She scoped his dizzy demeanor and fixed him a quadruple scotch. He guzzled it.

The couch dipped. He saw the six-eyed beasts in the Book of Revelation. Wayne Frank grew six eyes and burned a Klan cross. Tommy Glennon levitated. Gold dust rained down on L.A. Joan Conville resurrected. Revelations ripped his way.

Mondo Díaz. Frankie Carbajal. The Dresden boys. Joan said it's all one story. Kay said she'd marry him if he sussed it all out.

Annie said, "Penny for your thoughts."

Elmer opened his eyes. The couch resettled. The Revelation gang waved good-bye.

"Ed Satterlee. You've spent time in the sack with him. Tell me something I don't know."

Annie furrowed up. “I think he’s a secret Red, but nobody knows it. He’s always saying we’ll win the war with Germany but lose the war with Russia, which wouldn’t be such a bad thing. He says we should be prepared for that, because the Reds are the wave of the future.”

Ruth said, “Have you ever killed anyone, Elmer? You have heard my own horrible story, and I must insist that you respond in kind and answer me candidly.”

The bed sagged. They’d sweated up the sheets. The bedroom was cold. A sea breeze ruffled the curtains and induced goose bumps.

“I clipped a political fanatic in Nicaragua. He was trying to kill the police chief we had here in L.A. then. Jim Davis was grateful, and that’s how I got on the PD.”

Ruth finger-walked up his rib cage. She did deliberate things like that. Her panther eyes gleamed.

“You are a bloodthirsty type. I would have thought you would have more scalps on your belt.”

Book of Revelation. Six-eyed beasts. Tommy Glennon and Catbox Cal Lunceford. Additional scalps on his belt.

“That’s as far as it goes. I’ve never had the misfortune of passing through Nazi Germany, and I’ve never come up against the likes of Meyer Gelb.”

“You say Comrade Gelb’s name casually, as if you know this man in a personal way.”

“I’m working an investigation. His name keeps coming up.”

Ruth shrugged. “There is not much one can say about Comrade Gelb. He is a Communist, so he is both enlightened and deluded. He is also an extortionist, which has earned him my enmity. I owe my American passage to Herr Comrade, but many good people died as a result. My friends and I will not be impressed into informant duty, and we ardently applaud your coercive efforts with Miss Staley. Maestro Otto has passed along rumors as to Comrade Gelb and his left-right bund, but they impress me as nebulous poppycock.”

Elmer shrugged. “That’s all you’ve got on Meyer the G., huh?”

Ruth grabbed his hair and pulled their heads close. She did abrupt things like that.

“I formally met Gelb only once. It was in Munich, in ’36 or ’37. We met at a reception for Wilhelm Furtwängler. We were two Jews, and we briefly discussed our prospects for leaving Germany alive. Gelb bore an odd resemblance to a Sparticist hoodlum I knew in Berlin in the ’20s. His name was Fritz Eckelkamp, and he was quite the mad boy. I mentioned this to Herr Gelb, and noted that my rather bland comment disturbed him."

Revelation. Spiritus Mundi. Six-eyed somethings. Ellen Drew's dish. Jean Staley's drift.

Ellen's dish enticed. Terry Lux and a Chink plastic man grafted up Gelb's hands. Jean's drift gored and perplexed.

The train escape and gold heist. Jean finagles Fritz Eckelkamp through southbound roadblocks. The roadblocks stop north of Malibu. "Near this ritzy nuthouse." It's the Terry Lux clinic, for sure.

"Elmer, where are you? You are certainly not listening to me."

Elmer fought off chills. His goose bumps grew goose bumps.

"I'm sorry. What were you saying?"

"I was commenting on Comrade Gelb, and I was saying that when the four of us were flown to La Paz, the airplane stopped in Juarez to refuel. An FBI man boarded the plane and queried us on Comrade Gelb. He wanted to know about Herr Gelb's plans to relocate refugees, but it occurred to me that he already knew the answers, and that perhaps he and Herr Gelb were in league. He added that we should mind our p's and q's, or risk expulsion from America."

Elmer tingled. "Was the FBI man's name Ed Satterlee?"

Ruth said, "Yes, it was."

107

(TIJUANA, 9:00 A.M., 3/26/42)

The T.J. Express. Two trucks and two buses. Perched at the border. Japs and wets set to roll.

To internment camps. To PD road gangs. To San Joaquin Valley farms. Arriba, Japos y braceros. You're plain old slaves now.

Salvy was late. Dudley briefed the Statie drivers and gun guards. They resented him. Juan Pimentel was their immediate boss and sub-Führer. El Dudley mollycoddled his killer. El Puto Ashida got a soft stateside berth. It pissed the slave crew off.

Salvy was late. It pissed him off. Salvy was set to ride north with the slaves. He was charged to glad-hand farm and road-gang jefes and dispense bonus cash. Salvy excelled at such tasks. Salvy possessed the gift of gab and the PR-man touch.

Salvy was late. Dudley was double-pissed. Al Wilhite called him last night. He reported Hideo Ashida's first day in camp.

Hideo praised his accommodations. Youthful thugs beat him up. That was most regrettable. Hideo had pressing tasks. He had file work to assess and a french-fried Jap to debrief.

Kazio Hiroki. Note the suspect initials. Wilhite snagged him off the Hanamaka APB. Hiroki is bilingual. Hideo will brace him in English and Japanese.

Salvy was late. Dudley fumed and performed roll-out tasks. He head-counted slaves. He stashed heroin in engine compartments. He teethed on Constanza, nonstop.

He saw her naked. He saw her clothed. He dressed her in fascist garb. She wore brown jackboots and carried a riding crop. She surveyed Waffen-SS troops and found them unkempt. She lashed them and drew blood.

Salvy was late. Dudley teethed on Constanza. He loved her. He did not fully trust her. He'd run intermittent stakeouts on the La Paz post office. Hideo snatched and mailed Elmer J.'s microdot letter. Constanza must have received it.

His stakeouts continue. He wants to nail her at the location. Tell me why I should trust you. Declare your loyalty and lead me to the gold.

Salvy was late. Dudley teethed on Constanza. He saw her in white gowns. Her shoulder straps kept slipping. He saw her in Brownshirt riot gear. She raised her riding crop and whipped Marxist thugs.

"Mi hermano, I apologize for my tardiness. Greenshirt business has kept me occupied."

There he was. Salvy snuck up on you. He was Latin decorous and ever deferential. Dudley raised a hand to slap him. Dudley hugged him instead.

"Your tardiness is confounding, but I trust and revere you, regardless."

Salvy laid on back slaps. He had that Latin love-tap touch. Salvy beamed. Latins lived to ingratiate.

Dudley pointed to the lead bus. The driver goosed the gas. The engine purred. The gun guard jacked shells in his piece. The shackled slaves pitched boo-hoo.

"Bon voyage, lad. Call me from Fresno or Bakersfield. I'll be staying with Constanza in La Paz."

Salvy shook his head. "I cannot accompany the convoy, Dudley. La Causa needs me here. I have urgent duties in Ensenada, and at the encampment. There will be many other convoys, but I cannot go with this one."

Dudley saw red. He flushed and felt his veins swell. Salvy love-tapped him. Poquito cuffs.

"Do not be angry, brother. I see that you are disappointed, and your anger hurts me. The Staties will perform my duties, and I will accompany the very next convoy. I promise you that."

Dudley flushed, warm to hot. He stepped close and almost threw elbows. Salvy love-tapped him. Dudley almost screamed.

The box rows flanked a service counter. The boxes were pullout, shelf-parcel size. They were numbered off-kilter. 1823 adjoined 901.

Dudley stood by the stamp machines. The PO resembled a pint-sized Alamo. He'd caught an Army flight down. He wore civvies and a belt piece.

Constanza called him in Ensenada. She suggested a tryst and come-hithered him. He said, "Sí, mi corazon." She said, "My place at six."

It was 3:20 now. Constanza said she had afternoon errands. She mentioned the grocery store and the post office. She decreed this surveillance herself.

It was stand-around/blend-in surveillance. That's the most boring type.

Dudley read postal circulars and wanted bulletins. The bulletins tagged U.S. fugitives and deserters. Dudley yawned and stayed awake.

3:40, 4:00, 4:20. Dudley got impatient. His thoughts boomeranged.

Salvy had mollified him. He should have hit him and cowed him right back. Constanza had a darkroom. She developed her wildlife photos there. She might possess her own microdot camera.

The Wolf appeared. He enjoyed La Paz. He hunted wharf rats and peeped Mexican women. Constanza loved the Wolf. He slept between them most nights.

4:40, 5:00, 5:10. Constanza walked in and strolled to box 1823.

Dudley peeped her. She unlocked the box and pulled out four envelopes. She sifted through them. The last one tweaked her. She evinced surprise.

She slit the envelope. Dudley stepped close. She examined the contents. Dudley got muy close. He saw a soft-blotter page.

Constanza looked up and saw him. She smiled, Latin stylish.

She said, “My alert darling.”

He said, “I’ll need to read it, of course.”

The process consumed her. He watched her work. The darkroom cast pulsing red light.

She placed the page flat on a workbench. It was magnification glass–topped. A small arc lamp beamed light from below it. The light was bright-bright.

She sprayed saline water on the page surface. It brought up collodion and aniline dye. The page glowed purple now.

She unloaded the film and cut it into ninety-six strips. She placed them in a developing pan. She sprayed on emulsifier. It brought up ninety-six small prints.

Spanish words appeared. Constanza kept her goggles on and skimmed the out-of-order texts. She took a white grease pencil and numbered the prints from 1 to 96. She clipped them to three clotheslines.

The prints dried in an hour. Dudley donned the goggles. Constanza turned on a fluorescent arc light. She positioned Dudley beside print #1 and had him read left to right.

Message #1 was a variant. Hideo described the postcard texts. This was more of that.

Lists:

U.S. defense installations. Leftist and rightist plants there employed. Established gold prices now. Gold prices predicted, up to ’44. Jap sub berths upside Baja. Secret airfields. All upside San Joaquin Valley farms.

Message #1 dittoed postcard information. Message #2 was all new. It revealed this:

A list labeled “Defense Contacts.” Lists labeled “Farmers,” “Ordnance Makers,” “Airfield Supervisors.” San Joaquin Valley locations, listed below.

One ellipsis loomed large. There was no closing salute. Plus, no admiring nod to Juan Pimentel. Plus, no admonition: “Do not reveal to JLS & CLS.”

Dudley tracked the logic. The postcards were sent to Pimentel himself. Elmer Jackson intercepted them and shot them to Hideo Ashida. The postcard dots expressed exclusion. They nixed the two Lazaro-Schmidts. Said dots nailed them as submembers of a factionalized cabal. The postcard sender distrusted the two Lazaro-Schmidts. This dot sender trusted them fine.

One cabal. Stratified and well buffered. Factions within factions. The intelligent, the resourceful, the superbly self-protective. To wit: Pimentel and the Lazaro-Schmidts. To wit: Meyer Gelb and Kyoho Hanamaka. Allied with the reckless and near insane. To wit: Jim Davis, Saul Lesnick, Lin Chung. To wit: Tommy Glennon and Catbox Cal Lunceford. To wit: dead cops Wendell Rice and George Kapek.

Dudley removed the goggles. Constanza ran her hands through his hair.

“You see how many layers there are, and how little most of us in the middle range know.”

“I knew you and your brother were part of it. You all but told me some weeks ago. You wouldn’t have known what you know about the gold if you were fully on the outside.”

They stepped out of the darkroom. The normal light burned Dudley’s eyes. Constanza placed her hands over them.

“I have not betrayed you. I simply omitted what you had already surmised. I assumed that you already suspected Juan Pimentel.”

Dudley nuzzled her hands. “You forward dot mail sent to you. The various forwarding levels are buffered past comprehension. Pimentel was one step up from you and your brother. Beyond that, you have no idea who’s who.”

Constanza stroked his cheek. “I have never doubted your ability to assess and extrapolate.”

Dudley said, “I have a certain matter to discuss with your brother.”

Governor Juan’s office. It was a big-cheese refuge and spot to receive and anoint. Note the pedestal desk and throne chair. Short beaners sit tall here.

Dudley walked in. Constanza followed him. She shut the door and bolted it. Governor Juan looked up.

His chair sat on risers. His desk sat waist-high. Goldbug Juan. All these gold figures on shelves.

His perfect suit. Gray wool with flecked gold highlights. His gold collar pin and burnt-gold necktie.

Dudley walked up to him. Constanza sat beside the desk. She lit a cigarette. Juan's desk lighter flamed.

Juan sensed intent. He slid his chair back. It bumped a window ledge. Dudley picked him up and threw him. He crashed into a bookshelf and fell to the floor. Gold-etched volumes fell on his head.

Dudley kicked him. The books scattered. Dudley kicked his face and split his nose. Dudley sliced a new harelip. Juan bit his coat sleeve and muzzled shrieks.

"I read a dot letter that Constanza received. It convinced me that I should issue a stern warning. There will be no sabotage on U.S. soil. Your cabal or clique or junta may not kill Americans."

Juan whimpered. Dudley kicked his balls and kicked his legs. He pulled his Arkansas toad-stabber. It brought back '28. He shot a 459 man and took a souvenir.

Juan whimpered. Dudley leaned over him. He grabbed his hair and carved a Jew star on his forehead.

Juan screamed. Constanza crossed her legs and blew smoke rings.

The Wolf watched them sniff cocaine and make love. They steamed up Constanza's bedroom. Dudley held a hand out. The Wolf licked white powder off his fingertips.

They lay three abed. The Wolf purred and dozed. Constanza stroked him.

"The scar will never heal. You've marked him for life. He'll look in the mirror and know that I've told you everything. He'll recall that he raped me on my tenth birthday, and he'll never touch me or tell me who to sleep with again."

Dudley burrowed into her. He felt schizy. His heart raced. He fought chills. He saw three of everything. Constanza, the Wolf, the bed.

Constanza stroked the Wolf. Constanza stroked him. His pulse ratcheted down some. She gave him her breasts.

"We can use him, my darling. We can use him as he has used me. We can find the gold by ourselves, and keep all of it. These rumored comrades would not dare to trifle with a fearsome man such as you."

The Wolf warmed him. Constanza warmed him. She threw a leg over them both.

“You must know something, my love. I consider it definitive. I will never be able to fully give myself to a man as long as my brother draws breath.”

He caught a midnight flight back. He still felt schizy. His pulse still raced. He ran too hot or too cold.

He smelled Constanza all over him. He held his hands out and shared her scent with the Wolf. He cabbed home to the del Norte. He unlocked the door and turned on the lights.

The Wolf hopped on his favorite chair and dozed off. Dudley smelled something familiar. Perfumed stationery. The envelope on the floor. He knew that—

The L.A. postmark, her handwriting, her now-banal scent.

He opened the letter. It ran six full pages. Claire cut loose on him.

His Irish pomp and bonhomie. People laugh behind his back. Her dope cure and how it purges his fowl touch and stink. His infantile brag. His groveling need for women. His puerile rule over weak men. His shanty mick cultivation of all things high-class. His jejune grandiosity. His vile regard for God’s law. The precise moments that Beth Short and Joan Klein saw through him. His rage cloaked in pitiful terror. His shallowness. His abject neediness. His idiot criminal schemes that all run aground. His sheer fraudulence. His effete eye for callow young men. His remorseless cruelty. His repugnant selfishness. His trifling life passed unmourned and casually unremembered.

He dropped the letter and weaved into the bedroom. His heart raced. He saw three of everything. He saw three nightstands on Claire’s side of the bed. He pulled open the top drawer. He saw three syringes and dope spikes and vials of morphine sulfate.

He grew three arms. He ripped off his coat and fashioned a sleeve tourniquet. His three hands shook. He saw three syringes, three spikes, three vials. He rigged the kit and punctured the stopper. It took three tries. His third try hit the vein. He went slack and fell back on the bed.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 P.M., 3/27/42)

The PD kept a suite at the Ambassador Hotel. It was used to stash important witnesses and entertain politicos that Jack Horrall sought to impress. The Cocoanut Grove was three floors below; the Tommy Dorsey Orchestra was headlining tonight. "Song of India" drifted upstairs. It made me want to jump out of bed, grab Bill, and dance.

But we were naked, Bill wasn't the dancing type, and he was occupied with my typed draft of Claire's handwritten letter to Dudley. We were both anxious and apprehensive. Dudley should have received the letter by now.

Bill said, "You're presuming a small kernel of self-knowledge in the man. One that he won't be able to shake."

"Yes, but not conscience," I said. "I expressed Claire's sentiments in my own words, and inferred that a great number of people see through him. He's immune to remorse, and he has no germ of probity to appeal to. He has to be made to question his hold over those he commands and seeks to intimidate."

Bill smiled and cleaned his glasses on a pillowcase. We sat with our backs on the headboard and sipped room-service bourbon. We were lovers and hotel cohabiters now; Bill's marriage cohabited his conscience more than mine. Lee Blanchard didn't care what I did with men. We were cohabiters in name only. Bill understood the arrangement more than I first thought he would.

He said, "I've got your script memorized, and I'll be seeing Monsignor Hayes soon. I'll lay out your version of Dudley and the klub*haus* job, and make the monsignor fear for his own safety."

"Claire's recuperating. She'll go to confession a few days after you. She'll spear Dudley from oblique angles."

Bill kissed me and pulled the sheet below my breasts. Seeing me nude always underlined exactly what this was and that I wasn't his wife. I knew he'd say something dispiriting next.

“We cannot maneuver Dudley into criminal indictment without bringing down the PD. We cannot strategically circumvent him to any sure advantage. He’s simply too well situated, and too many powerful men owe him and need him.”

“He’s inviolate as long as he’s perceived as sane,” I said. “And the best way to unnerve him is through his women.”

Bill said, “He has to lose his shot at the gold. A three-case solve has to explode in his face. We have to hope that Hideo Ashida values a clean solve more than he values his loyalty to that shitheel.”

(MANZANAR, 9:00 A.M., 3/28/42)

The file stacks. Newly compiled and exhaustively comprehensive. A full three-case brief.

He'd lost his Ensenada set. Post-Pimentel chaos had engulfed him. Dudley had supplied this replacement. It contained all-new paperwork.

Newspaper clips. Custody files and visitors' logs. Bertillon charts. Detailed background briefs and summary reports.

Ashida worked at his desk. His beating-injury pain had subsided. He'd self-treated his wounds. He'd rested. He'd applied alcohol rubs and ice packs. He felt better now.

He'd scrambler-phoned Elmer and Kay this morning. He'd bug-checked the phone and tagged it pristine. Elmer and Kay updated him. They laid out the faux Claire letter. Faux daughter letters would follow. Plus, faux Claire and Bill Parker confessions to Joe Hayes. They laid out the Jamie and Ness family ownership of Bev's Switchboard. Plus, the Hayes family-money cut. Plus, the L.A. Sheriff's protection clause. Plus, Jean Staley as Ed Satterlee's snitch. Jean drives Fritz Eckelkamp southbound, post–gold heist. Wayne Frank Jackson as Meyer Gelb's KA.

Terry Lux and Lin Chung. They plastic-cut Meyer's hands. Ruth Szigeti. She knew Eckelkamp in Berlin, circa '20s. Circles constrict and overlap, circles remain in ellipses.

He updated Elmer and Kay. He laid out the microdot revelations. He pitched the left-right cabal, then to now. He stressed the Dresden Poly convergence. He told them everything Dudley had told him. Elmer and Kay stood up-to-date. They'd repitch Parker and Thad Brown. He stood up-to-date. He was set to push forward, now.

Ashida stacked the files. He worked chronologically. He jumped back to '27. He read the Eckelkamp arrest reports and background sheets.

Alameda. A small East Bay burg. It's couched between Oakland and Berkeley. Alameda's the county seat. Their rinky-dink Sheriff's force roams countywide. Fritz Eckelkamp pulls countywide 211s. County bulls pop him at his eleventh heist. He admits his prior robberies. It's tacitly confirmed. His confession was coerced.

It's old news, so far. The background brief's got more snap.

Eckelkamp riffs on Weimar Berlin. The street skirmishes. The Nazi-thug-versus-Marxist-thug riots. Nazi thugs and Marxist thugs allied in blackmail schemes. A Nazi-Sparticist kidnapping ring.

Deutschland, '26. Evidence of right-left alliance. Ensenada, '40. The formal alliance meets. It pervades three case lines: '31, '33, '42.

More background facts. Fritz Eckelkamp is born Protestant. He's orphaned early. He's raised by a Jewish family. He's Yiddish-fluent.

Ashida cut back to Alameda. Fritzie is tried, convicted, slammed for twenty-five years. He's sent to San Quentin. He studies law texts and petitions for a retrial. It's now 2/31. His application is granted. The trial is scheduled for Los Angeles District Court.

Three newspaper stories were clipped to the file. They were perfunctory. Clip #1 announced eight convict retrials. Judicial errors had been determined. The retrials would take place in L.A. They would begin in mid-May, '31. Clip #2 announced the gold-train run. It was set for May 18. There it is—San Francisco to L.A. Clip #3 announced a rail workers' strike. It would cripple but not halt operations. The San Francisco train yards have endured labor strife. The strike would hit 4/25. That meant this:

Certain train runs would be combined.

U.S. government runs. California state runs. That meant the run. Ashida surmised this:

The convict-retrial run and gold-train run were secretly combined. Fritz Eckelkamp learned this. He had leftist contacts at the Frisco train yards. He planned the mass escape. He escaped for good. The other convicts were gunned down. Fritzie worked solo. He cut his fellow convicts loose, impromptu. He planned the derailed-track snafu. The escape went down. Chaos reigned. It suited Fritzie's designs. Marxist realpolitik. Expendable convicts are killed. Only his freedom counts.

Ashida backtracked. He pulled the Alameda custody file and skimmed it. He caught a hot file note.

Fritzie met Leander Frechette in '27. They were county-jail inmates then. Frechette. He's these three things. He's Negro/mentally dim/big and inhumanely strong. He's the chief gold-heist suspect. He's the bête noire of the Santa Barbara Sheriff's and Deputy Karl Tullock. Frechette was a trainman and rail-yard worker. He'd been jailed for Assault One. He took part in a Frisco labor brawl. An obscure file note sizzled. A guard boss caught the odd friendship. Here's this Kraut armed robber and dim colored youth.

Ashida surmised:

Frechette is not dim. He feigns insolvency. It complements his labor-thug pose. He conspires with Fritz Eckelkamp. He tells Fritz that he works gold-run jobs on occasion. The heist is theoretically planned. It's a jailhouse-bullshit concoction. It's conceived in advance of Fritzie's San Quentin jolt. It's all shuck and jive at that stage.

Ashida backtracked. He pulled Fritzie's jail visitors' log and skimmed it. He caught a hot file note.

Martin Luther Mimms visited Fritzie. There's Mimms, in Alameda County. He's a corrupt preacher/slumlord/race racketeer. He owned the 46th Street klub*haus.* He's tight with ranking L.A. cops. Jump—'27 to '31. Mimms springs Leander Frechette from the Santa Barbara jail. Mimms halts the beatings of Deputy Karl Tullock.

Mimms. He's L.A.-based. He's tight with high-up L.A. cops. Who's the boss L.A. cop in 1931? It's James Edgar "Two-Gun" Davis.

Names. Dates. Guesses. Extrapolation. Surmise.

Frechette creates the initial train-track diversion. He employs his fearsome strength and bare hands. The escape occurs. The train journeys south. There's a second track snafu. It's Frechette's work, as well. Frechette off-loads the gold bars on his person. He hands them off to—

?????

Jean Staley facilitates Fritzie's escape. She's Fritzie's lover. They haul southbound. They dodge roadblocks. Jim Davis aids the escape. He clues Fritzie and Jean in to roadblock deployment. Said roadblocks are pulled on U.S. 101 south. Right before this ritzy nut farm. It's Terry Lux's nut farm. This is all informed guesswork.

Elmer Jackson chats up Ruth Szigeti. She cites Eckelkamp's resemblance to Meyer Gelb. Her statement startles Elmer. He almost blurts his big guess on the scrambler-phone call.

Ashida surmised. Let's confirm or refute. This investigation is all about that.

Meyer Gelb has burn-seared fingers. They're covered by graft marks. Meyer Gelb was hauled in and braced per the Griffith Park fire. His scarred fingers tweaked the Arson Squad cops. That has to be true. Gelb's fingerprint ID has been compromised. What's their next step? What would the Arson cops do?

They'd order up a Bertillon measurement chart. They'd establish a certified Meyer Gelb ID. That raises this question:

Was Fritz Eckelkamp Bertillon-charted? Did Alameda County or the San Quentin lab chart his measurements?

Ashida prowled file paper. He jumped '27 to '28 and Fritzie's Quentin jolt. There it is. The Quentin lab charted him, 1/12/29. That's one comparison point.

It takes two to make this work. Ashida jumped—Eckelkamp to Gelb. He jumped ’29 to ’33 and the Griffith Park fire. He thumbed Arson Squad and Red Squad reports. Comrade Gelb’s cell is hotly scrutinized. Comrade Gelb is hard-nosed. What’s with your fingers, Jewboy? Let’s Bertillon-chart this kike.

There it is. 10/18/33. The PD crime lab charts Meyer Gelb. Ray Pinker measures him.

Ashida studied the two charts. Ashida dripped sweat on the pages. He compared the height and limb-length numbers. He compared the finger spans. He compared twenty-three separate phrenological marks. Every single mark matched identically. This is no extrapolation. Fritz Eckelkamp is Meyer Gelb.

Now, we extrapolate.

Jean Staley lied to Elmer Jackson. She omitted a key fact. The roadblocks are pulled just north of Terry Lux’s clinic. Jean takes Fritzie there. Dr. Terry and Lin Chung perform plastic surgery. They make Eckelkamp Gelb. Jean Staley knows this, full well. Fresh-cut Gelb joins the CP and forms his own cell. Jean S., the Lesnicks, and Jorge Villareal-Caiz join up. Sieg Heil—they raise the Red flag.

Cut to summer ’33. It’s two months before the Griffith Park blaze. A rash of liquor store 211s plague the L.A. cops. Liquor-store jobs are Fritz Eckelkamp’s meat. Eyewits ID a man who resembles Wayne Frank Jackson. Let’s posit a two-man heist squad. Strange bedfellows. Faux Jew/face-cut Meyer Gelb and Klan klown Wayne Frank Jackson. Let’s posit that prefire Gelb/Wayne Frank bond.

Ellen Drew has already confirmed it. She has not confirmed a Gelb/Wayne Frank chronological point of convergence. Ellen Drew was a mid-’30s Paramount starlet. She met Gelb-who’s-really-Eckelkamp then. She met Wayne Frank Jackson then. Wayne Frank was alive then. She ID’d Elmer’s wallet pic. That cinched her identification.

Ergo:

Wayne Frank did not die in the Griffith Park fire. Ergo: somebody else did. Ergo: somebody snatched Wayne Frank’s dental chart from the office of his cut-rate dentist. Ergo: somebody planted the real dead man’s chart under Wayne Frank’s name. Ergo: those efforts confirmed Wayne Frank’s death. Ergo: Wayne Frank’s perceived death was deemed essential—but to who and to what criminal end?

Ashida surmised. Ashida tossed conclusions. Ashida linked three-case players, flesh-to-flesh. Eckelkamp-Gelb to Jean Staley to Leander Frechette. Leander to Martin Luther Mimms. Toss in the late Ralph D. Barr. Toss in Ed Satterlee. He suborned Jean Staley. He ordered her to fink out fresh-cut Meyer’s cell.

Saul Lesnick’s in that cell. Satterlee makes him his snitch. Kay Lake has duplicate keys to Lesnick’s office.

Ashida caressed the file stacks. He'd dripped sweat all over them.

It's all one story. I will not be denied the full truth of it.

Kazio Hiroki. The same initials. It must be him. Al Wilhite has implied it. Who else could he be?

A waiting room adjoined the burn ward. Ashida sat alone. Wilhite drove him from Manzanar to Lone Pine. The interview had been prearranged. The subject requested Dr. Ashida. Dr. Ashida was his preferred interlocutor.

Hiroki was bilingual. They could chat in English or Japanese. Wilhite issued strict orders. "You will take no notes. You will write nothing down. You will report to Major Smith, verbally."

Wilhite sat downstairs. He'd worked off Dudley's APB. Hiroki hid in plain sight. His cover was interned Jap, vouched by forged papers. He'd journeyed north-northeast. Baja to L.A. L.A. to Manzanar. He had a cot in "C" row, bachelor barracks 3.

Hiroki was clearly insane. He torched his barracks and scorched himself, severely. A doctor noted preexisting burn scars. The doctor told Hiroki that some Army cops wanted to brace him. Hiroki said, "Dr. Ashida, one hopes."

A nurse walked in. Ashida stood up. The nurse walked him to the ward proper. It was three rooms off a hallway crammed with drip gizmos. Ashida smelled medicinal salve and charred flesh.

The nurse opened the door and about-faced. The room was small. There was a crank-up bed and guest chair. Air vents diffused salve and burn stink.

Hiroki was bandage-mummified and cranked up to face guests. An intravenous bag fed him pain juice. His face was uncovered. It was him. It's all one story, you—

Ashida pulled the chair up. He said, "芦田先生."

Hanamaka said, "花丸司令官."

His voice was firm. His neck was unbandaged. His vocal chords were most surely intact.

Hanamaka shut his eyes. Ashida unscrewed the fluid bag. He pulled out an envelope and poured in three crumbled Benzedrine. Get your man perked up and loose-lipped. Dudley taught him the trick.

They traded pleasantries. Hanamaka alternated English and Japanese. So happy to meet you and あなたの最近の人生に興味を持ってきました. 渡辺事件. 警察 署の仕事. Juan Pimentel and のメールドロップニュース.

Ashida quick-translated. I've followed your recent life with interest. The Watanabe case. Your police department work. Mail-drop news from Juan Pimentel.

"I would say that I'm notorious, more than justifiably famous."

Hanamaka switched to English. "I'm sure that you and Major Smith know a great deal about my endeavors, going back some years."

Ashida sat down. "Yes, but I'm sure you can fill in a few gaps."

The stimulant took hold. Hanamaka's carotid vein pulsed. His hands twitched. He spoke more rapidly.

"I should tell you that I love fire, and that the small barracks blaze was merely an experiment. I wanted to see if I could eradicate the burn scars the Griffith Park fire inflicted, along with the print-eradication scars that Meyer Gelb and I so foolishly marked ourselves with."

Ashida said, "Meyer Gelb is really Fritz Eckelkamp. Terry Lux and Lin Chung cut him a new face shortly after his escape from the gold train."

Hanamaka smiled. "The American Jew is the German Gentile, and quite the covert anti-Semite. The leftist firebrand is really an armed robber."

"That statement tells me a great deal about this politically diffuse cabal of yours."

Hanamaka said, "I'll quote Meyer here. 'This storm, this savaging disaster.' The disaster is History, and the cabal was formed as a means to survive it."

Ashida smiled. "I'll quote the Book of Proverbs. 'Envy thou not the oppressor, and choose none of his ways.' "

Hanamaka sipped water. Benzedrine spawned dehydration. He held a small canteen. He sipped through a glass straw.

"Bible to Bible, Dr. Ashida. I read the Los Angeles papers on New Year's Day. A rainstorm of biblical proportions had unearthed a man's body in a wooden box. I knew that a reckoning of biblical proportions was about to occur."

Ashida tingled. "Yes?"

"Yes, and I had been thinking about Karl Tullock for some time already. Two months earlier, I had read a locally distributed golf magazine, published in San Diego. An article described a driving range, soon to be built on the exact spot where Tullock reposed. I'm sure you've heard the complaint 'It's hard to find good help these days.' That complaint proved itself especially true in the world of the domestic Fifth Column. I dispatched Wendell Rice and George Kapek to find the box and dispose of it before the excavation crews began work. Rice and Kapek bungled the job, because a reckoning was preordained."

Ashida coughed. The burn stink stifled him.

"Who set the Griffith Park fire?"

Hanamaka said, "Ralph Barr, on Red Meyer's orders. Meyer wanted to create an apocalypse that would take the lives of many oppressed workingmen, which would be a Marxist-fascist ruse to rival the temerity of the Reichstag fire. Meyer also knew that Karl Tullock had found a spot on the CCC crew, and was closing in on Wayne Frank Jackson as a gold-robbery suspect. Meyer wanted Tullock dead and Wayne Frank believed to be dead. When weather reports predicted one-hundred-degree heat and strong winds that day, he put Ralph to work creating a very subtle accelerant."

Ashida inched his chair back. Hanamaka oozed contagion. The Mummy escapes his crypt. His wrapping suppurates.

"Wayne Frank was suspected of a string of liquor-store heists in the summer of '33. It was shortly before the fire, and liquor-store jobs were Fritz Eckelkamp's well-established pattern. Was Eckelkamp-Gelb Wayne Frank's partner on those jobs? The gold heist occurred two years and three months previously, so I would assume that Wayne Frank met Gelb before May of '31, or am I mistaken here? Were those robberies a means of Wayne Frank's introduction to Gelb and your cabal et al.?"

Hanamaka shook his head yes. Hanamaka shook his head no. He was fully Benzedrined. His eyeballs glowed.

"You must realize that the Comintern and their kindred fascist counterparts are criminals first and foremost, over and above whatever ideologies they might express. You should not be surprised to see armed robbery as a recurring motif in this account of political misdeeds. On that note, yes. Gelb was Wayne Frank's partner in those robberies. Yes, Karl Tullock suspected Wayne Frank of complicity in the gold heist. Tullock had, in fact, been shadowing Wayne Frank—but Wayne Frank's presence on the CCC work crew was at first largely coincidental. Wayne Frank had been scouting potential targets for Meyer's 'workingman's apocalypse,' and the work crew seemed like a good candidate. But then he saw Tullock's name on a hire sheet, and told Meyer. That was when Meyer truly conceived his notion of workingmen burned alive."

Ashida coughed. "Sensei, when did Meyer Gelb and Wayne Frank Jackson meet?"

Hanamaka said, "Wayne Frank met Meyer in his Fritz Eckelkamp incarnation. They met in the Alameda County Jail in 1928, before Fritz was sent to San Quentin. Wayne Frank was serving time for plain drunk and vagrancy, and Fritz Eckelkamp was plain Fritz. That jail became a point of convergence for the gold heist—Fritz, Wayne Frank, and Leander Frechette. That was the genesis of the robbery. That was the moment that Fritz inculcated Wayne Frank with Marxist rhetoric and converted him. It was culminatingly the moment when Fritz and Wayne Frank saved Leander from a gang of race-baiting jailhouse thugs, and ensured that the robbery would actually occur."

Wayne Frank Jackson. Elmer's Klansman brother. Revealed as a Comintern dupe.

“Something troubles me, Sensei. It’s Wayne Frank’s statements pertaining to the robbery. His brother Elmer speaks of Wayne Frank as no more than a sad fantasist.”

Hanamaka smiled. “You are quick to note that, Sensei. Let me add that Wayne Frank was then a man of intemperate appetite, and is now a man of strict circumspection. He went on a bender shortly after the robbery, and awoke one morning in an opium den in San Francisco. A nosy Chinese man told him he had been mumbling about the robbery while in his opiate haze. Wayne Frank was already a seasoned treasure dreamer, albeit one who had now transcended his sad origins. That moment in the opium den shocked him. He incorporated the gold robbery into the repertoire of his once-obsessive persona. He used it as a means to publicly express ‘I could not have done this.’ ”

Explication. Revelation. Ashida had clenched himself numb.

“You torched the klub*haus,* didn’t you? You were holed up down the block. You used the same accelerant that Ralph Barr used in Griffith Park.”

Hanamaka said, “Yes, and those were taxing days for me. Some unknown person killed Rice, Kapek, and their friend Archuleta, and the puerile Cal Lunceford was chaperoning me. They were all manipulated and given tasks via mail drop, and the murders felt like yet another preordained catalyst. I felt you, Major Smith, and the other policemen converging. I took advantage of the Negro riot and burned the klub*haus.* I wanted to divert your investigation and create a new level of chaos, and the angry Negroes proved themselves to be convenient scapegoats.”

Ashida said, “Whose body stood in for Wayne Frank’s? A dental-plate substitution must have been worked.”

Hanamaka smiled. He was Sensei Death. He was Mr. Death’s-Head.

“Wayne Frank’s assignment was to kill Karl Tullock during the fire, and then disappear. We were afraid that Tullock had informed other Santa Barbara policemen of his suspicions, so Wayne Frank’s disappearance was deemed a necessity. Wayne Frank decided to kill a second man during the fire, and pass that man off as himself. Wallace Jamie was quite young then, but he was already acquainted with another comrade named Joe Hayes. Wallace and Father Joe were fellow travelers on the Right, and dabbled on the Left. They would reunite a few years later, at a German technical college. Wallace had a meddlesome younger brother named George. Wayne Frank got George a job on the CCC work crew. George ran a German-American Bund cell, and began recruiting at the work site. George was also about Wayne Frank’s size and build. Wayne Frank decided to kill him and disguise it as his own death. George only came to work occasionally, and was never carried in any sort of official CCC log.”

Gears snapped in place. Ashida heard clicks. He'd guessed abstract parts of it.

"And then?"

"Then Meyer had Terry Lux build prosthetic dental work off of Wayne Frank's actual teeth. Then the fire occurred. Then Wayne Frank beat George to death, knocked out all his teeth, and inserted the prosthesis. Meyer preinserted forged dental records for Wayne Frank at a downtown L.A. dentist. It facilitated the coroner's decree. Wayne Frank died in the fire. Then Wayne Frank deftly disappeared."

Ashida said, "Leander Frechette?"

"Last seen in San Francisco, some years ago."

"And the gold? Where is it now?"

Hanamaka went C'est la guerre. "Meyer entrusted it to a Mexican Stalinist. I think he was a money conduit for the assassination of Leon Trotsky. The gold was transported to Mexico, to be deployed for political purposes, with one bar left in a Los Angeles storage facility, to cover pertinent expenses. Meyer has hoarded the gold, and now it is pledged to the cause of postwar resettlement. Only Meyer and the Mexican Stalinist know where it is. Meyer trusts the Stalinist, because he made him endure a rigorous initiation. Meyer had him butcher forty Trotskyite priest-killers, and make it look like fascists did it. The man fawningly complied."

Ashida watched the fluid bag drain. The mixture was down to mere drips.

"Where is Meyer Gelb hiding?"

"No one knows that."

"Let's return to the gold."

Hanamaka shrugged. "It has lain fallow, and has exponentially increased in value. A good deal of time has passed. A convergence in Dresden brought about an enlargement of our original band of Kameraden. Wallace Jamie brought Joe Hayes, Mondo Díaz, and Juan Pimentel in. You killed Pimentel, and I'm sure you know of the other men."

Ashida checked the fluid bag. It had drained dry.

"Would you call Meyer Gelb the key architect of the gold robbery?"

"No. It was Wayne Frank."

"Where is he now?"

"I have no idea."

"Are the Kameraden really Communist or fascist?"

Hanamaka said, "At this point, who can tell?"

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 P.M., 3/28/42)

Oooga-booga. The DTs, dead sober. It's like this gag song. I gots jitters like Jell-O in an earthquake.

Ashida called him and Kay. He relayed his talk with Kyoho Hanamaka. Wayne Frank masterminded the gold heist. Wayne Frank was sure as shit alive.

Elmer boozed and noshed at Linny's Delicatessen. His table fluttered. The pickle jar leaped. The walls talked back to him. He is Risen, He is Alive.

Buzz was three blocks over, on Bedford. They were set to 459 Saul Lesnick's office. Buzz brought cans of paint and brushes. Buzz brought pistol silencers. The rendezvous time was 9:30.

Elmer snarfed Old Crow and pastrami. Him and Buzz had spent the day at Kay Lake's place. Kay dished Buzz her version of the whole story. It put Buzz up to speed with him, Kay, Whiskey Bill, and Thad Brown. Buzz buzzed straight to Meyer Gelb. He vowed to find that whipdick.

Whiskey Bill showed up. He brought subpoenaed phone bills for Ed Satterlee and Doc Lesnick. He wrote a quickie writ and ran it by a PD-lapdog judge. PC Bell kicked loose bills going back six months.

They divvied up the bills and worked at Kay's dining room table. The bills listed the callees' names and phone numbers. The tally job took four hours. It revealed this:

Doc Lesnick and Ed the Fed called each other boocoo times. They were snitch and snitch runner. There was no surprise there. Ed called Bev's Switchboard nineteen times. Woo-woo—it's a spy mail drop. Ed called Padre Joe Hayes fourteen times. Hot potato—El Padre went waaaaay back with the spy-ring boys and owned points in Bev's.

Here's a scorcher. Doc Saul and Ed the Fed called the Baja phone-relay number fifty-nine times, all in all. Up till Ashida and Pimentel torched the relay room. Those calls indict both callers up the ying-yang.

Satterlee called Tommy Glennon's L.A. hotel room. Satterlee called Tommy's La Jolla crib. Mark that forty-two times, total. Satterlee and Lesnick called Jean Staley's Hollywood place. Mark that twenty-three calls.

Here's an El Scorcho. Ed the Fed called Baja's governor, Juan Lazaro-Schmidt. Mark that fourteen calls. Hideo said El Juan was jungled up with El Dudster's rackets. El Dud was bonking Juan's sizzling sister. Hideo said the seditious sibs were spy-ring complicit.

Doc Saul and Ed the Fed called AX-4869. It's a darktown exchange. They called the number twenty-four times, total. Dig: it's the hideout-house number. Kyoho Hanamaka holed up there. Cal Lunceford died there. The klub*haus* was just up the street.

Ed the Fed called Martin Luther Mimms. Twice at his crib, thrice at the Congregation of the Congo. Mimms was deeply gold heist–embroiled. Ed and Doc Saul called Wallace Jamie—fourteen and nineteen times apiece. Both gents placed umpteen calls to Drs. Terry Lux and Lin Chung. Both gents called the C-town flop of James Edgar Davis.

A final head-scratcher scratched. Ed the Fed placed a recent spate of late-nite calls. He called all-nite eateries and cop spots. As in Lyman's and Kwan's. He called them interchangeable. Who you lookin' fo, Brutha Ed?

Elmer paid the bill. He schlepped over to 416 Bedford and donned his B and E wig. Buzz was parked curbside. Elmer got in and tossed him a french-dip sandwich. Buzz snarked it.

Beverly Hills. The psych-doctor district. Pitch your woes to Doc Saul. He'll fuck you up worse than you are.

416 was a mock-château job. Lobby, elevator, stairs. Offices above. Kay made keys off Annie Staples' wax mounts. It was a walk-in caper.

Buzz said, "The building's empty. Everybody up and left two hours ago."

Elmer grabbed their tool kit. It was two grocery sacks, double-wrapped. Buzz jiggled the keys. They choked back B and E giggles and charged.

They crossed the sidewalk. Elmer lugged the bags. Buzz held the keys. The lobby door opened easy. They checked the directory. Saul Lesnick, M.D.: suite 216.

They took the stairs. The second-floor hall was pitch-dark. Elmer flashed his flashlight and read door plates. There's 216.

Buzz unlocked the door. They stepped in and locked themselves in. Elmer hit the lights.

The waiting room featured agitprop art. Workers Unite!!! Beefcake boys waving scythes. Elmer made the jack-off sign. Buzz unlocked the inner-office door.

Elmer hit the lights. There's the psychee's couch. There's the psych doc's desk. There's file cabinets. There's more Commo wall art. Tanks rolled through Red Square. Butcher Stalin screamed. The Russki alphabet resembled DT hieroglyphs.

Buzz yanked at the file drawers. They were locked. Elmer dug into his bag. He pulled out the two silencers and tossed one to Buzz.

They tap-screwed their roscoes and stood back. They aimed in unison and blasted the drawers. The silencers went pfffft. Bullets pierced the file locks and ricocheted through the drawers. The office got all gunsmoked up.

They slid the file drawers open. They both went wooooooo. They thought they'd find patient folders. Nix to that. They found wire-recording spools.

Elmer grabbed all of them. He dumped them in the bags. Buzz hit Old Saul's desk. The drawers were locked. Buzz aimed tight and blasted them open. Gunsmoke smoked the whole room now.

Elmer dug through the drawers. Old Saul stashed his jerk-off books there. It was Nazi shit. Hopped-up Hildegards in black tunics whipped terrified Jews. The Hildas wore jackboots and had tits out to here. The Jews wore skullcaps with propellers on top. Full-page ads hawked dick-size enhancers and eugenics brews.

Elmer tossed all the drawers. He thought he'd find correspondence and an address book. Nix to that. He found more Nazi shit and a jack-off suction device.

Buzz flashlight-flashed the walls. He said, "Looky here." Elmer tracked the beam.

He saw wires spackled to wainscot strips. He saw wires stuck to wall junctures and tucked under rugs. He saw painted-over wires stuck to lamp stands.

"He's bugging his patients. I don't see no other explanation."

Buzz said, "Let's fuck that fucker up."

They pulled the wall wires. They unspooled the rug wires. They dumped the lamps and yanked the microphones. They got out their paint and brushes and refestooned the walls.

Buzz painted swastikas and hammer and sickles. Elmer painted X marks over them. Buzz painted "Death to Traitors!!!" Elmer painted "America Forever!!!"

(LA PAZ, 10:00 A.M., 3/29/42)

Cocaine and cigarettes. Their standard breakfast. Rut and talk. Their standard MO.

They stuck to Constanza's bedroom. Peons puttered, just outside. Constanza motormouthed. She plumbed two topics. Her brother and the gold.

Dudley played attentive lover. His thoughts ran afield. Al Wilhite found Kyoho Hanamaka. Hideo was debriefing him. Hideo had failed to report.

The bed sagged and grazed the floor. It succumbed to overuse. They banged the headboard loose last night.

Constanza said, "I was thinking of the brand you stamped upon my brother. I would imagine he'll employ Terry Lux to prettify the damage you did."

Dudley sniffed cocaine off a bread plate. He shivered. He got the chill, the numb teeth, the whoosh.

"Terry's the best at what he does. I could hardly begrudge your brother his services. I'm dining with Orson Welles in Ensenada tonight. He utilized Terry recently. Terry deftly allayed some damage I inflicted."

Constanza lit a cigarette. "Fierce you. Such utility. Such brutal agency."

Dudley kissed her breasts. Constanza and cocaine. His morning bifecta. She seized his body. His mind whooshed elsewhere.

The microdot letter. The planned sabotage. He'd warned off brother Juan. He did not report possible attacks to Fourth Interceptor. Kyoho Hanamaka. Constanza's former lover. He'd described Kyoho's self-torch job. Constanza said he saw too much in Deutschland and Russia. It was his time to die. He simply gave up.

"You haven't mentioned the gold in at least three minutes, darling. Are you relinquishing your grasp?"

Constanza primped him. She wiped his face with a bedsheet. The whoosh raised a sweat.

"Allow me to gloat over my brother. You enacted a long-overdue revenge."

Dudley lit a cigarette. "I pentothaled a rather sodden Kamerad. He described a convergence at a German technical college. The late Juan Pimentel, and young men named Díaz and Jamie. Joe Hayes, whom I've mentioned before, was a member of their bund. The mid-'30s, I think. I'm wondering if the overall cabal was formed then."

Constanza said, "No. I believe it all began to germinate before the fire. I would call the meeting of Kyoho and Meyer Gelb the point of germination. Meyer was recruiting for the Comintern at the Paramount Studio. People fell under his sway. The Kommisariat was Meyer's idea. He predicted the world conflict, as we see it today. His prophecy preceded Kyoho's sojourn in Germany and Russia."

The Wolf cocked his head. Constanza's scent aroused him. He probed Constanza's mind. She disclosed just so much. This vexed the Wolf.

Constanza said, "I have a lead on the minutes for the Baja conference. What would you pay for them?"

Welles was late. Film folk ran breezy and tardy. He knew that beast inside and out.

He'd extorted them. Harry Cohn paid him well. They misbehaved. He snapped furtive photographs. They starred in Columbia cheapies, resultant.

Johnny Weissmuller jumps jailbait. Tallulah Bankhead snarfs muff at lezbo hot spots. Duke Ellington sires Kate Hepburn's mulatto love child.

Welles was late. Like Salvy was late in T.J. Salvy refused to chaperone the Japs and the wets. The Wolf teethed on it.

Dudley ordered a private room. The del Norte staff salaamed and obliged. Welles drew flocks of autograph hounds. This room would hold them off. Orson called and requested the audience himself. It was a snitch and snitch-runner confab. It mandated privacy.

Dudley drummed the table. He felt fluttery. The flight back induced jitters. Cocaine exacted a price. He missed Constanza more than he should.

Dudley Liam Smith. Such a schoolboy crush. How unsound of you.

The door swung open. Such élan. Orson Welles entered rooms. He walked to the table. He was six-three and porcine. He exuded bonhomie and snitch fear.

Dudley stood up. They shook hands. Fat Boy's clasp was damp and weak. Dudley wiped his hand on the tablecloth. He made a blunt show of it.

They sat down. Dudley poured champagne. It was one-dollar swill. L'auteur, le gourmand. He'll gag on it.

"It's good to see you, Dudley."

“You’re looking sleek, lad. Would you consider me brusque if I asked what brings you to Ensenada?”

Welles sipped champagne. He almost but not quite pulled a face.

“It’s quite the ad-lib proposition. Howard Hughes flew us down. Dolores del Rio’s sister needed a blind date.”

Dudley went Tu salud. “Allow me to chart your train of thought, lad. You have information for me, and you thought you’d kill two birds with one stone.”

Welles guffawed. Note the coward’s cringe within.

“That’s Dudley Smith for you. He cuts to the third act, and forswears the amenities.”

“On that note, lad. You’re not here to waste my time, and who am I to deny Miss del Rio’s comely sister your presence?”

Welles coughed. “Well, I’ve been making appearances for the OIACC, as you well know. I’ve been traveling with a small jazz combo, and I’ve put together a few incidental things I thought might interest you.”

Dudley sipped rotgut champagne. He pulled a face and gagged it down.

“I’ll set the scene, lad. You’re traveling throughout Latin America. The combo plays inoffensive music during the cocktail receptions that precede your dinner talks.”

Welles said, “Right you are. And one of the musicians was a froufrou kid I first met at an admittedly bent party at Otto Klemperer’s place in ’39. Otto was holed up in a sanitarium then, and—”

Dudley clamped his champagne flute. The stem snapped. Fat Boy missed it. Dudley dropped the shards on the floor.

“—and the kid told me he was there at the party, which chagrined me quite a bit. He went on to tell me a rather outrageous story about the America Firsters he met—”

Dudley cut in. “Describe the party, lad. Set the scene for me.”

“Well, it was what you might call a masked ball, and the theme ran decidedly right of center. People wore Nazi costumes, and I screened an admittedly risqué film that I’d shot. I wore a mask, but the fruit kid recognized my voice from my radio broadcasts, although I’m reasonably sure that no one else did.”

I was there. You wore a Red Guard costume. I saw parts of your film. It repulsed me.

“Please continue, lad. You’ve piqued my interest, quite adroitly.”

Welles smiled. Mere hints of praise induced simpers.

“Well, the kid told me that he’d seen some real-life Nazis, whom he’d seen in newsreels, there at the party. They were talking out on the porte cochere, and they’d removed their masks. It was about dawn, and there had already been quite a ruckus. Some comatose woman was carried away, on the Q.T., which was—"

The She was a He. Dead is not comatose. Do you know who you're talk—

"Here's where it gets intriguing, if a bit outlandish. The kid told me the real-life Nazis were discussing the 'Führer's ultimately futile war' and some sort of 'future exoneration scheme.' One man said they should assassinate Hitler, or deliberately fail at it, but publicize the failure. Another man said their 'Red Kameraden' should do the same thing with Stalin. There was some talk of potential postwar escape routes to Latin America, specifically pro-fascist or pro-Communist countries."

Dudley said, "Please continue. It's like your War of the Worlds broadcast. You've got me on the edge of my seat."

Welles beamed. "Well, the kid sounded sincere about all this, and I'll admit to having a soft spot for good stories. This was one story I couldn't quite shake, and I tossed out hints to a few left-wing and right-wing types I met at various functions. I got a lot of murky responses, and heard rumors that this so-called plot derived from Mexico."

Dudley lit a cigarette. "I'm tipping off the edge of my seat. Please continue."

Welles laughed. "All right. Here's the conclusion, and we jump from the winter of '39 up to the present day. The kid told me a man named Wallace Jamie was at the party. He saw him unmasked, and he just recently put together who the man actually is. He recognized Jamie from newspaper photographs, a few weeks ago. That's because Jamie's in Dutch on that big Federal probe. The kid also said he recognized two other men who'd been at the party. Their pictures were in the papers, because they'd been murdered. I'm talking about Wendell Rice and George Kapek. They didn't actually attend the party. They wore chauffeur's garb and stood outside, on the porte cochere."

Autopsy pix. The dead cops. Gasping mouths. Ice-pick punctures. Single hand-span bruises.

"It's a small world, eh? Then the kid tells me that he knows another fruit kid, who's also a jazz musician, up in L.A. He didn't know the other kid's name, but he said that when those murders were all the rage in the papers, the other kid told him he'd been to jam sessions at the clubhouse where the bodies were found. He bragged that he and a so-called 'Red-fasco woman' killed Rice, Kapek, and a Mexican friend of theirs. I'm telling you all this because Claire told me you were involved in the police investigation."

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 A.M., 3/30/42)

Sheriff Eugene Biscailuz. "Clean Gene" to his supporters. "Last Seen Gene" to his detractors. Frequently glimpsed at the Saints and Sinners Drag Ball.

We met the Sheriff at Kwan's Chinese Pagoda; Uncle Ace set a table for four in the Chiang Kai-shek Conference Room. Hop Sing goons peddled trinkets out of the room, twenty-four hours daily. REMEMBER PEARL HARBOR!!! signs and I AM NOT A JAP!!! T-shirts were current hot sellers. Ace also sold Jap shrunken heads. They were purportedly harvested by Chinese death squads, in retaliation for the Rape of Nanking. Elmer gave me the true lowdown. Chinese kids at Nightingale Junior High were the culprits. They robbed recently planted graves in Japanese graveyards. Dr. Lin Chung performed the decapitations and supervised the shrinking process.

Thus, breakfast with Sheriff Gene. Bloody Marys, hangtown fry, and Emperor Tso's flapjacks. Elmer, Bill, and I sat across from the Sheriff; he was three morning cocktails in and emitted a glow. His eyes clicked: Bill to Elmer to me. He already knew Bill and knew Elmer through Brenda—but what's this young cooze doing here?

Bill kicked things off. He'd sent the note requesting the sit-down and had braced Biscailuz in advance. Brusque Bill: the meeting pertains to Bev's Switchboard.

"We know you've got points in Bev's, Sheriff. We'd be going the search-warrant route if that weren't the case."

Biscailuz said, "I can read tea leaves. You're talking about a raid."

Elmer butted in. "Nobody's judging you for those points, boss. Everybody's got operating costs. You know damn well that Brenda and me are letting Jack H. dip his beak."

Biscailuz winked at me. "Miss Lake's got judgment written all over her. I know girl Bolsheviks when I see them."

I laughed and lit a cigarette. Bill lit up out of my pack.

"There's a great deal of seditious drop mail passing through Bev's. I want to raid the premises and seize it. Wallace Jamie and the Ness family hold the deed to Bev's, and a priest named Joe Hayes has a profit percentage. We're not looking for publicity, and we're not looking to turn this into indictments. We only want to depose Wallace Jamie, in order to turn leads on the klub*haus* job and two related cases from '31 and '33."

Elmer butted in again. "I know you know Ed Satterlee, boss. A little birdie told me Ed was looking to hang a search subpoena on Bev's, but you kiboshed it. Ed's Fifth Column up the wazoo, to the extent that Mr. Hoover's got him under house arrest. That's the sort of shitheel who sends drop mail through Bev's. We figure these here traitors are beset by factionalism, and Ed was looking to gain some sort of advantage with that subpoena plan."

The Sheriff drained his third cocktail. "Let's see if I'm reading you right. This 'we' you keep mentioning is you two policemen and Miss Lake. You're not proxies for the PD, which means you're open to a little horse trading. Which means you'll throw Uncle Clean Gene a bone."

Bill fumed. I kicked his leg under the table. My message was Concede. We need him more than he needs us.

"Ed Satterlee told Elmer that he'd accord him the opportunity to erase his own name on any Fed-probe recordings currently held in custody. I've been charged to erase recordings that might implicate Chief Horrall. With Satterlee suspended from duty, a new strategy to enter the evidence vault will have to be conceived and executed. If such a plan can be implemented, I'd enter the vault myself, and erase every single wire-recorded mention of your name."

Biscailuz winked at me. The novelty of a woman in the room floored him. Brenda wasn't sure which way he bounced. He ordered girls out of the girl book. He kept a copy of the boy book handy.

"That's okay for starters, Bill. It takes care of me, but it doesn't take care of mine. For what it's worth, I like Wallace Jamie, and if he's Fifth Column, I'm a Hottentot. Moreover, his Uncle Eliot will be mayor of Cleveland soon, and I want him to owe me. So, I won't permit you to depose Wallace, but I will permit you to seize anything and everything on-site at Bev's."

Elmer butted back in. "You ain't said what you mean by 'mine.' "

" 'Mine' means 'me and all my deputies.' 'Mine' means 'erase every spool in Fed custody, to make damn sure me and mine don't get smeared.' "

Bill said, "It's a deal." Clean Gene dropped his eyeglass case and ducked below the table to retrieve it. He wanted to look up my skirt. I'd have to tell Brenda: the Sheriff veers toward girls.

Bill and I tucked in at the Ambassador. We discussed the Lesnick burglary first thing.

Doctor Saul hadn't reported it. That much was sure. Bill threw feelers out at Beverly Hills PD. Elmer and Buzz robbed his office and desecrated it. Their wall artwork defamed the Kameraden. Saul Lesnick—j'accuse. We're onto you and yours.

"We," "We're," "Us." Sheriff Gene picked up on it and parlayed it to his tactical advantage. I extended "We" to include Annie Staples, and described our phone chat early this morning. Annie called me. She said she was servicing Saul Lesnick tomorrow night; the assignation would take place at Brenda's Miracle Mile trick spot. This was to our benefit. Doctor Saul unburdened himself to Annie and would most likely whine about the burglary-desecration. And Elmer would be there to film it.

Room service delivered club sandwiches and coffee; Bill and I lunched on the bed. Assignation, rendezvous, shack job. Bill crossed himself every time I said the words.

"The phone records," he said. "What's the first thing that comes to mind? Where do they most conclusively point?"

I said, "To collusion and conspiracy. And, given what we know about the principals, a conspiracy that must be judged as politically and socially diffuse."

"And what string of calls plays most out of sync with the rest?"

"Ed Satterlee's late-night calls to Lyman's and Kwan's. Two all-night PD watering holes. The calls serve to pose the question: 'Who was Ed the Fed looking for?' "

Bill snagged his trousers off the floor. He dug through the pockets and pulled out three mimeographed sheets of paper. The cheapo typeface and multiple exclamation points screamed Sid Hudgens! I breezed through the text; it was the Sidster's privately circulated subscription scandal sheet.

The inimitable Sidster. Ever alert for watchful postal inspectors. He laid out the lurid lowdown—but stopped short of pure pornography. He used initials in lieu of real names. He gave you the tantalizing tattle and dystopian dish. Celebrity abortions, miscegenist liaisons, lezbo love nests. Alluring alliteration. Muff-munching matrons at the Lincoln Heights Jail. Doped racehorses and fixed fights. Draconian drag queens. A regular "Police Blotter" feature. Perennial poop. Filmland fellators and cunning linguists, caught "in flat-footed flagrante."

I laughed out loud. Bill said, "We shake down Sid for his subscriber list. We lay out Dudley and all the known Kameraden. You write the text, and insert the appropriate initials. We wallpaper Dudley, the comrades, and every conceivable man jack that might be inclined to do the Dudster dirt."

D.S.: that hellhound Hibernian. Malevolent Mexicans. S.L.: that sicknik psychiatrist and shitbird shrink. Feckless Fascists and riotous Reds. Waterlogged wetbacks. Pustulant policemen and jungle-bred Japs.

I fell off the bed, laughing. I'd never laughed so hard. I thought my roars would never stop.

(LONE PINE, 2:00 P.M., 3/30/42)

They reset the stage. The burn-ward room, the bed, the chair. Benzedrine in the fluid bag. The burn salve and charred-flesh stink.

The Mummy and Mr. Moto. Their second encounter. A vitalized Hanamaka. Ashida, poised to interrogate.

"Tell me about the klub*haus, Sensei.* You might begin by giving me your overall impressions."

Hanamaka plucked at his bedsheets. He was drug-vitalized. His mind sped. His limbs spastic-twitched.

"Egalitarian and degenerate. Those two words define the klub*haus.* Mr. Hudgens of the Herald is quite the cheeky man. The German spelling of house. A touch first bestowed by policemen, there on the scene. One can be certain of that."

Ashida said, "The sexual activity. The use of narcotics. The seemingly at odds political views."

Hanamaka grinned. Sensei Death rides again. His breath was foul. His teeth rattled. He oozed putresence.

"'At odds' aptly describes the atmosphere. 'Fugitives from normalcy' might best describe the klub*haus* clientele. There were no racial or political barriers to hinder conversation. The constant jazz music served to alleviate tension. There was a single consensus among the fugitives. 'The most discordant jazz is our voice.'"

Ashida prickled. The queer white boy. A jazz player. His Jap sword man pal. Elmer J. shared the lead.

"Jam sessions. Phonograph music. The proximity of the jazz strip. Diverse characters passing through."

Hanamaka jiggled his water cup. "You're leading me, Dr. Ashida. You want me to identify a specific denizen, and you're disingenuously setting the scene before you ask."

Ashida coughed. “A white youth. Blond and tall. Most often accompanied by a Japanese man given to licking blood off samurai swords. That was the Japanese man’s parlor trick. I’m assuming he performed it at the klub*haus.* The white youth was homosexual. Forensic evidence indicates homosexual activity upstairs.”

Hanamaka shrugged and shook his head. Sensei Death emits deceit.

“No. I did not encounter such men at the klub*haus.* I disdain homosexuals and Japanese who perform parlor tricks. Such individuals would most certainly catch my eye and rouse my indignation.”

Ashida jumped tracks. “Let’s discuss the gold. I want to conclusively determine the chain of possession.”

“The chain began with Leander Frechette and the Reverend Mimms. Meyer considered Leander reliable, because they dated back to Meyer’s previous incarnation, as Fritz Eckelkamp, and Leander was there for the conception of the robbery, along with Wayne Frank Jackson. Meyer trusted Leander, and, by extension, the Reverend Mimms. Meyer put great stock in Negroes, and held them to be avant-garde. The Reverend Mimms’ buffoonish black nationalism delighted him no end.”

Ashida undid his necktie. “Please continue, Sensei.”

“Leander had been exonerated by the Santa Barbara Sheriff’s. He had withstood the brutal ministrations of Deputy Karl Tullock, and had prevailed. The Reverend Mimms bailed Leander out of custody, and was a noted friend of Chief Jim Davis, a nativist huckster known to have close friends on the Left. He later became a comrade–Kamerad, as you must know.”

Ashida said, “The gold. Let’s continue with the chain of possession.”

Hanamaka sipped water. He’d cracked his glass straw. Blood dripped off his lips.

“You must realize that unforeseen events intervened, along with fortuitous circumstances. Dresden Polytechnic, for example. The serendipitous convergence of Hayes, Díaz, Pimentel, and Jamie. The Spanish Civil War converged. Meyer earned his share of battle stripes there.”

Ashida shook his head. “You’re repeating yourself, Sensei. Let’s return to the chain of possession. I’m trying to establish a chronology.”

Hanamaka shrugged. “Frechette and Mimms returned the gold to Meyer at some point. I don’t know where it was stashed during what I would call an ‘intervening period.’ Juan Pimentel took possession of the gold after the Baja conference, at Meyer’s directive. It has since gone to the Stalinist priest-killer. I mentioned him to you in the course of our first interview.”

Ashida said, “Wayne Frank Jackson. Where was he during this interim period?”

"He was in periodic touch with Meyer, but beyond that, I have no idea."

The room broiled. Steam heat jacked the burn stink. Ashida removed his suit coat.

"Frechette and Mimms returned the gold at some point, and Meyer once again took possession. Were Frechette and Mimms reluctant to relinquish it? Did a disagreement occur? Was force employed?"

"I was surprised at how easily they forfeited the gold. It shocked me at the time. Meyer gloated over the ease of the transaction. He held Negroes to be the most malleable of beasts. He considered them exalted, prone to whimsy, and subservient at their core. When one exalts, one is compelled to demean."

Ashida coughed into his handkerchief. The burn stink and salve stink accreted.

"Let's return to the klub*haus.* I find it illuminating that you decided to nest there, in a hotbed of degenerate behavior and impolitic discourse. Were you sent there? Were you told to observe, inform, or attempt to impose order?"

Hanamaka licked his lips. The blood had congealed. He looked worse today. The give-and-take taxed him more.

"José Vasquez-Cruz sent me in. I knew him from Meyer's cell, when he was Jorge Villareal-Caiz. He was a Kamerad, in both his guises, and in the latter he was a captain in the Mexican State Police. He smuggled me out of Baja in the wake of Pearl Harbor, at the behest of Governor Lazaro-Schmidt. So, yes, El Capitán installed me in the house down the street. As you state, I was told to visit the klub*haus* and 'observe and inform.' Most preposterously, I was also told to attempt to restore order."

The room went ice-cold. Ashida glanced out the window. Snowflakes brushed the screen.

"The klub*haus* offended you. You discontinued your visits. I'm wondering if you were told to investigate the murders of Rice, Kapek, and Archuleta, on your own. The comrades must have feared the police investigation. We had drawn very close to a number of your people. Were you told to investigate? Did you arrive at a suspect or suspects?"

The Mummy cranked his bed up two notches. The Mummy pushed himself off his pillows and bowed at the waist.

"I prevaricated on the topic of your white youth and his Japanese friend. I cannot tell you whether or not the youth was homosexual, but he was surely tall and blond. He played the saxophone, and he worshipped the Negro jazz greats most exaltedly. A woman frequently accompanied him to the haus. She was frizzy-haired and roughly thirty years of age. And, yes, the white youth had a Japanese friend, who was plainly psychopathic."

Man Camera. Time Machine. The klub*haus* job now stands some sixty days in. We're back in the upstairs hallway. There's dent marks on the wall facing the bedroom. There’s his working hypothesis.

Two killers. One male, one female. Rice, Kapek, and Archuleta—terped to the gills. The man and woman lead them downstairs. The woman stands to the right of the victims. She sways. She punctuates the death march. She kicks out at the wall and leaves shoe-mark indentations. There’s his overarching conviction. The crime was organically homosexual and homosexually spawned.

“The blond youth, the woman, and the sword man. Did you hold them to be murder suspects?”

“Instinctively, yes. They stood out as unique in a most unique milieu.”

“Once again, Sensei. Who possesses the gold at this moment?”

Hanamaka said, “Once again, the Stalinist Mexican. The most exalted slayer of priest-killers is our Führer and most exalted comrade. I would give you his name, but I don’t know it.”

114

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 A.M., 3/31/42)

They huddled at Kay's place. Bill Parker snagged four wire players and four earmuff sets. Four socket plugs supplied juice.

They worked at the dining room table. Elmer divvied up the spools. Lesnick had scrawled analysand names on the boxes. They stuck to Claire De Haven, Orson Welles, Otto Klemperer.

Those three adjoined the whole megillah. No Kameraden wires existed. That meant no Meyer Gelb.

Kay distributed coffee and ashtrays. Buzz plugged in the cords. El Buzzo crowed a bit. He'd triple-checked their subpoenaed phone bills and snagged a doozy.

Ed the Fed Satterlee. 2/14/42. He calls a bail bondsman, up in San Fran. Buzz calls the bondsman and hits pay dirt.

Here's the pitch. Leander Frechette's been jailed for a soft-prowl 459. Ed the Fed bails him out.

Attaboy, Buzz. You pin-mapped Big Leander. Now, what about these calls?

Ed's late-night calls. All to Lyman's and Kwan's. Interchangeable calls. All to pay phones there. Who you looking for, Ed?

Everybody set up and lit up. The room got smokeified. Everybody pushed buttons. Wire spools spun.

Elmer heard static and line fritz. It cleared inside six seconds. Doc Saul and Orson Welles schmoozed the big Leningrad siege. They exhausted that topic. Welles bemoaned his weight. Doc Saul said he'd prescribe pharmaceutical cocaine.

It got boring then. Welles pitched boo-hoo. He was a genius. Boo-hoo. America was a philistine encampment. Boo-hoo. "I get more ass than a toilet seat, Saul. How come I'm so damn unfulfilled?"

Boo-hoo. The government should subsidize his movies and pay him a hundred Gs per. Boo-hoo. “I should lose weight. A hatcheck girl at the Trocadero blew me. We steamed up the hatcheck booth.”

Kay pulled off her earmuffs. It cued the whole gang. Elmer dumped his earmuffs. Buzz and Whiskey Bill followed suit.

Kay said, “Claire’s weeping. Dudley takes his pleasure, and then ignores her. He spends hours tending to his clothes. A cobbler custom-fitted him for jackboots.”

Buzz said, “That’s a good one. All I’ve got is your maestro chum haranguing the doc about Beethoven. The late quartets are some shitfire ‘Apotheosis.’ Lesnick told him Beethoven’s got certified coon blood, which accounts for his rhythmic stance. He read it in some eugenics journal. Herr Goering is going to exhume the body and take bone samples. They’ve got some Nazi breeding farm in Norway. Kraut wenches and Norse-god men screw all day. The wenches pop frogs for the Fatherland.”

Elmer said, “Count me in.”

Kay laughed. Whiskey Bill rolled his eyes. They redonned their earmuffs and went back to work.

Boo-hoo, boo-hoo. Orson Welles talked drivel. Elmer listened in. Boo-hoo. The plight of the artist. Boo-hoo. The burden of social consciousness. “I drilled Norma Shearer, Saul. That old girl shtups with the best.”

Elmer switched spools. He swapped Welles for Claire De Haven. Claire defamed El Dudster and Joan Conville. “Really, Saul. She’s beyond Amazonian. She’s something out of the National Geographic.”

Parker pulled off his earmuffs. It cued the whole gang. Elmer dumped his earmuffs. Kay and Buzz followed suit.

Parker said, “Klemperer’s telling Lesnick about the headaches that he diagnosed as a brain tumor, and he’s fawning over Lesnick for saving his life. Then there’s a gap, where the two discuss the war, and then it gets good. Klemperer begins talking in fragments. He says that a man was ‘hectoring’ him and ragging on him as a Jew and a leftist, and the man says that he knows ‘Meyer’s girl Jean.’ Klemperer tells Lesnick that this man is taunting him, and he ‘plays horn’ in Negro jazz clubs. Klemperer repeats the phrase ‘He’s taunting me’ at least a dozen times. Then he states that he beats the man to death. Then he begins fawning over Lesnick again. Then he states, ‘And you took care of it, Doctor—you and your FBI friend.’ ”

Elmer went wooo. “The FBI friend’s sure as shit Ed Satterlee.”

Kay said, “Otto told me that story. He confirmed that Satterlee was the FBI man, but the story itself was fragmented to the point of incomprehension.”

Buzz said, “The part about this guy being a horn player gores me. For one, it takes us back to the jazz strip again, and we all know our current klub*haus* suspect is a queer and a jazzman.”

Parker shook his head. “Our homicides occurred on January 29. This Klemperer-Lesnick session occurred the week after Pearl Harbor. That exonerates this particular jazzman, and it’s not like he’s the only jazzman in captivity, queer or otherwise.”

Buzz shook his head. “Yeah, but this guy tells the Maestro he knows Meyer’s girl Jean. That’s fucking significant, and it takes us back to the klub*haus* job and the whole shooting match again.”

Kay lit a cigarette. “Yes, and I’m not convinced that Otto killed anyone, which means that this particular jazzman could be our jazzman, who’s good for the klub*haus* job and possibly a whole lot more.”

Parker shook his head. “Jazzmen are jazzmen. There’s millions of them. Gelb and Staley aside, I don’t consider this any sort of real lead.”

Elmer said, “We’ve got Hideo deposing Kyoho Hanamaka now. He’s our key source. Somebody should talk to Hideo and see what Hanamaka spilled on the klub*haus* angle, and if any of it pertains to our queer jazzman and his Jap playmate.”

Buzz lit a cigar. “Meyer Gelb. This whole deal comes down to him. He’s Fritzie Eckelkamp cut into Gelb, which takes him back to ’31 and the gold job. He’s all over this whole thing, and I am currently doing everything within my power as a member of this white man’s police department to find him and have a long chat with him.”

Parker sighed and redonned his earmuffs. It cued the gang. Talk gets us nowhere. Let’s get back to work.

Elmer redonned his earmuffs. Kay and Buzz followed suit. Elmer fish-eyed Buzz. El Buzzo radiated the lynch mob gestalt. Buzz had Meyer Gelb on the brain. Ditto El Dudster. Buzz figured Dud would kill him soon. Buzz figured he should kill Dud first.

Elmer switched spools and spun spools and smoked himself hoarse. He played the analysand field. Orson Welles boo-hoo’d and bragged up his conquests. Claire De Haven boo-hoo’d and skewered Dudley Smith. The Maestro extolled the Bruckner symphonies and the upcoming “exile migration.” Elmer perked up and took note.

Well, shit. There’s Meyer Gelb, again.

Elmer pulled off his earmuffs. It cued the whole gang. Kay dumped her earmuffs. Parker and Buzz followed suit.

Elmer said, “Here’s the Maestro. He’s talking up his comrades Ruth Szigeti, the Koenigs, and old man Abromowitz. They’re being repatriated to L.A., and he wants to help out. Lesnick talks the Maestro into getting them jobs as movie-studio musicians, then says to have them keep their snouts down and report to Comrade Gelb.”

Buzz cracked his knuckles. “I intend to have words with that whipdick.”

Kay said, “That entails finding him first.”

Parker four-eyed Elmer. He tapped his wristwatch. We’ve got pressing biz downtown.

They reconvened outside the Fed Building. Elmer lapel-pinned his badge. Parker displayed his search warrant.

“A Fed district judge signed it. He’s an old law school classmate, and he hates Fey Edgar like death itself.”

Elmer skimmed the legalese. Limited premises/custody vault only/all wire recordings on-site. On-site listening consent granted/one day only.

“We’ve got to erase the whole kit and caboodle. That’s the only sure way to cover ourselves and Sheriff Gene’s guys. It’s a whole shitload of work, with the Fed squadroom right down the hall.”

Parker pinned up his badge. “The judge called ahead. We’re covered there. We’ve got the means to scotch the whole probe, but they’ll know it was us. We’ll have to ride out whatever shit hits the fan.”

Elmer gulped. “Fey Edgar will wet his pink-lace undies. He’ll be on the horn to the U.S. attorney inside half a second.”

Parker winked. It fell flat. He possessed no savoir faire. He lacked Dudsteresque panache.

They breezed in and breezed up the side stairs. The Bureau owned the full third floor. A desk agent manned the lobby. They walked up. He looked up. Parker passed him the paperwork.

He read the full writ. He said, “The vault, huh? You fellows must be turncoats. A whole lot of PD guys are going to burn in this deal.”

Parker said, “We’ve been detached to the grand jury. We’re on your side as far as this one goes.”

The agent yawned and stretched. He passed the paperwork back. This rebop left him nonplussed.

“Judge Leffler called ahead. You know the rules, right? You can listen to whatever you want, but nothing leaves the room. You know how to use the machines?”

Parker nodded. Elmer broke a sweat. The desk man led the way back.

Elmer stared straight ahead. They passed boocoo doorways. Elmer heard squadroom bustle and counted his footsteps. He hit eighty-nine. The desk man turned right and unlocked a door.

Some vault. Just this dumb room crammed with boxes. Note the wire spools sticking out. Two player contraptions. Two earmuff sets. One beat-up desk and two chairs. A wire log clamped to a clipboard.

The desk man said, “I leave you to it.”

Parker saluted him. Elmer feigned nonchalance. The desk man vamoosed. Parker locked the door.

Elmer went wheeewww. Parker picked up the log and skimmed it. You had twenty-some pages. Maybe eight hundred calls and taps.

Parker scanned pages. Elmer dumped his coat and undid his necktie. He futzed with the gizmos. He plugged in the earmuffs and ID’d the erase switch. Parker got all bug-eyed.

He crossed himself. He waved wolfsbane. He did all this papist shit.

“The Feds bugged the pay phone at Kwan’s. We’ve got EX-4991 calling MA-2668. PC Bell tagged the call at 3:14 a.m., on March 6. It’s a West L.A.-to-downtown toll call, and it runs sixteen minutes.”

EX-4991. That’s Ed Satterlee’s home number. Holy heart attack—

The wire log listed box 56. They tore through four box stacks and found it. Two spools were stuffed in one envelope.

Elmer rigged the two gizmos. The wires spooled up tight. Parker passed him his flask. They traded pops and tamped down their wigs. Parker kicked the chairs back. They sat side by side. They donned the earmuffs and replayed the call.

The phone rang. Static and line fuzz bled into this:

“There you are. I figured I’d get you sooner or later, and 3:00 a.m. in a Chinatown slop chute doesn’t surprise me at all.”

Ed Satterlee speaks. He’s crusty, per always.

“Ed, I’ve been wanting to talk to you.”

Mike Breuning speaks. He’s servile, per always. Elmer and Parker swapped looks.

Satterlee said, “I gathered that. You called the Bureau nine goddamn times. You’re lucky I’m a night owl, or I wouldn’t have caught you at all. I’m just hoping you aren’t jerking my chain.”

Breuning said, “It’s Dudley, Ed. He’s gone batshit. You wouldn’t believe some of the stunts he’s been pulling.”

Satterlee said, “I’d believe anything you might want to tell me about Dudley Liam Smith, which is one damn good reason why I do my best to avoid him and stay on his good side.”

Breuning said, “I’ve got to get out from under him, Ed. He’s gone off the deep end, and I thought maybe you could help.”

Breuning speaks, frazzled. He’s caught the snitch virus. Oooga-booga. Snitch fever permeates the call.

Satterlee whistled. The phone line hissed.

“If you’re asking for help, you’ve got to pay for that help. If you’re offering me an up-to-date derogatory profile on Dudley, I'd be inclined to help you, if and when the time is right."

Breuning said, "That's awful damn equivocal."

Satterlee said, "Lay it out for me. And it better be a little spicier than Dud's framing a few jigaboos for the Rice-Kapek job."

Breuning speaks. He's delirious now. Dat snitch voodoo's gone to his head.

"He's hooked on Benzedrine and opium. He's geezing morphine, but he thinks nobody knows. Bill Parker's checkmating him. He's gone full-fledged Nazi. He parades around in Nazi uniforms and preens like a fruit. He's running heroin and wetbacks. He's selling Japs off as slave labor. He's in with this Sinarquista hump Salvy Abascal, who's playing him like he's the village idiot. He was in with Joan Conville and Hideo Ashida on some gold angle, but Joan's dead and Ashida will be heading to Manzanar, and now he's flapping in the wind all by himself. He told me he found the guy who killed Joan's dad and made Joan kill him. He killed a drag boy at a pervert party in '39, and Dick Carlisle and me cleaned it up. He's murdering Reds in Mexico. He killed a Statie captain who was screwing his Commie girlfriend. The Baja governor's sister has got him pussy-whipped, and Abascal's got him hoodwinked. I'm way far exposed, Ed. I've run point for Dud for eleven goddamn years. I need a safe-haven deal with an outside agency. He's a Nazi and a traitor, and he's chopping the heads off these Redshirt guys who kill priests. I'll depose, Ed. I'll give Dudley up. He's a feather in your cap, Ed. He's the biggest scalp you'll ever take. Ed, you've got to help—"

The line fritzed. The call died. It cut off Mike Breuning's sobs.

Doc Saul slogged it. His gourd was elsewhere. That was evident. Boolah, boolah. Annie gave it the college-girl try.

Elmer and Parker watched. Elmer ran the camera. They were dead bushed. They'd erased all the Fed vault wires. It took ten hours. They heard Mike Breuning's sobs the whole time.

They discussed the Breuning-Satterlee call. They caught Breuning's snitch virus. Ed the Fed was house-arrested. He posed no threat to Dudley Smith. They stole the Breuning-Satterlee wires. They could ditz Dud with them. They could pass the virus on.

The crawl space was tight-cramped. Elmer and Parker smoked it out. Smoke hazed the see-thru mirror. Elmer placed the camera lens flat on the glass. Their sound gear caught pillow talk.

Saul waved off the woof-woof. He was abstracted and limp-noodled. Two-minute Saul. He'd rather talk anyway.

Grave Saul. Distracted Saul. He suffers from de white man's burden. De chickens be comin' home to roost.

Annie said, "What is it, sugar? What happened to my stallion of the sack?"

Elmer yukked. Parker oozed pious censure. Annie smoothed out the bedsheets. Saul assumed a crucifixion pose. Nobody knows de trouble he's seen.

Annie goo-goo-eyed him. Annie tickled his ribs and got bupkes.

"You're remote tonight, baby. You're wearing that crown of thorns, as my preacher daddy used to say."

Saul said, "You wouldn't understand. I can't blame you for what you don't know. You're game, but you're not enlightened."

Elmer yukked. Annie winked at the see-thru. Old Saul sighed.

"Hoodlums laid waste to my office. They stole valuable recordings and smeared jingoistic slogans on the walls. I can't go to the Beverly Hills Police or the FBI, and I certainly can't go to my friend Ed Satter—"

Saul stopped cold. Annie tweaked on Satterlee. Old Saul tweaked her tweak. Elmer tweaked both tweaks.

Parker said, "He nailed her reaction."

Elmer went Yep. Old Saul eyeballed Annie. He pushed off his pillow and zoom-lensed her.

"Do you know Ed?"

Annie shrugged. What's with this Ed? I don't know this Ed whoever.

"I tricked with Eddie Cantor once. It was after this Save the Jews wingding. He's the only Ed I know."

Parker said, "She's not convincing."

Elmer went Yep.

Old Saul jumped out of bed. He was stooped and chicken-chested. His cashew dick flop-flopped.

He orbed the walls. He patted the walls. He poked at wall junctures. He's an old CP hand. He knows from wall bugs and honey traps.

He poked wall moldings. He pulled a spackled wire off a baseboard and yanked it out from under a rug. Annie jumped out of bed. She faced the see-thru, buck naked. She flashed this fetching Oh shit look.

Old Saul caught it. He dropped the wire and went for Annie. Elmer and Parker jumped.

They tore out of the crawl space. They tumbled into the bedroom and dog-piled old Saul. They floor-pinned him. He sissy-kicked and flailed. Annie snagged the sap in Elmer's waistband.

She applied a good grip. She whipped shots at old Saul's genitalia. Old Saul screamed. Elmer gassed the floor show. Annie yelled "You Fucking Traitor" roughly ten zillion times.

(ENSENADA, 8:00 P.M., 4/1/42)

Fat Boy unfurled a portable screen and set up his projector. Dudley cut the lights. His suite subbed for Grauman's Chinese.

Fats boomeranged. He returned to L.A. and shot straight back to Ensenada. He supplied that klub*haus* lead. He'd retrieved a memory. It spurred this return visit.

Orson met a fruit kid on his goodwill tour. The kid attended the Walpurgisnacht party. He was a jazz musician. He knew another fruit kid. That kid attended klub*haus* jam sessions. That kid was a jazzman. That kid bragged up the klub*haus* snuffs. That kid and "some Red-fasco woman" snuffed Rice, Kapek, and Archuleta.

It was secondhand drift. It comprised a hot lead, regardless. It supplanted prior leads. It confirmed the queer white boy and Jap sword man.

Here's Orson's memory. Orson met that other kid. The kid appeared in the Walpurgisnacht smut film. He'd bragged up his Jap sword-licker friend and some darktown clubhouse. It had to be him.

Hence, Orson returns. Hence, this home movie. Roll it, Fats.

Dudley pulled a chair up. El Gordo adjusted the film spools. He wore Bermuda shorts and a loud Hawaiian shirt.

"Your man's the clarinet player. When the camera pans to the woodwind quintet, you'll see him."

Dudley cued Welles. Lights, camera, action. Wagner hit the sound track. Trumpets and low strings. It's Götterdämmerung. Dig the bleak intercessional strains.

A title card: "Berlin, '29." It denotes bleak atop bleak. Here's Alban Berg's Lulu and grainy stock footage.

It's a street riot. It's Reds versus Brownshirts. There's Marxist banners and swastikas ablaze. Bullyboys wield two-by-fours. The Brownshirts outnumber the Reds. It's a rout. Blood flows in crisp black-&-white.

There's a quick cut. Weill and Brecht replace Berg. There's "Mackie Messer." Lotte Lenya warbles it.

Bam!—there's a new title card. "Near Munich, 6-30-34." Bam!—we're outside a country inn. There's a dumb paper moon. The inn looks one-dimensional. We're on a cheap studio set.

Four black-clad SS men approach the door. Two men are Negro. Two men look Samoan. Fat Boy Welles provides surreal laffs.

Schubert usurps The Threepenny Opera. It's a woodwind quintet. We're inside the inn. There's a Nazi-garbed ensemble. Three string men and one oboe. The queer boy's on clarinet. It's his skin flute in lieu of hard flesh.

Welles said, "That's him."

"Him." Their triple-snuff suspect. He's blond. He's innocuous. He's lanky, and seems to be tall.

A quick cut. Auf Wiedersehen, Schubert. "Mack the Knife" returns.

We're in a small bedroom. We're peeping an all-boy bacchanal. It's a daisy chain. The lads wear Brownshirts and nothing else. They're cinched groin-to-buttocks. They pump and gesticulate. There's pelvic thrusts twenty boys long.

The SS men enter the room and shoot them. They employ toy Lugers. Cap-gun pops hit the sound track. The daisy chain collapses. The bugger boys disengage.

Dudley studied the film. He'd seen stray cuts at the party. He recalled none of it now. He was gone on hop then. He was flat sober now.

The screen blurs. "Mackie Messer" goes garbled. Wagner rides again. It's Das Rheingold. More trumpets and more low strings.

The screen unblurs. The daisy chain replicates. It's men and women now. They're linked groin-to-mouth.

The camera cuts away. Walter Pidgeon appears and struts as Adolf Hitler. He's Homerically hung. He rubs his toothbrush mustache. Claire De Haven kneels and gobbles his schvantz.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 7:00 A.M., 4/2/42)

I'm writing a letter to Hideo Ashida now. I will hand-deliver it to Manzanar. I will include a wire recording of Ed Satterlee's phone chat with Mike Breuning. I may send the second recording to Dudley Smith.

It's beginning to cohere. Joan's "all one story" is careening toward final explication. Hideo recounted his first interview with Kyoho Hanamaka; second and third interviews may well have occurred. My letter will urge Hideo to move beyond mere dissembling and omission. I will demand that he repudiate and fully betray his dear Dudley.

I'm exhausted. I visited Claire at Terry Lux's retreat last night; we gabbed until dawn and had steak and eggs in the lounge. Jim Davis sat a few tables over; a male nurse attended him. Comrade Jim is faltering. He had trouble lifting his fork.

Claire's morphine cure is proceeding. She talks and smokes incessantly and rails against her once-dear Dudley. She reads the Bible and obscure prayer books and often coils a rosary around one hand and forms that hand into a fist. Dear Claire. She showed me letters that Beth Short and Joan Klein have sent her. I studied the girls' cursive styles and unformed sentence structures. Dudley has seven daughters; these two are his favorites. Their expressed condemnation would dismay and perhaps bitterly wound him. I would, of course, craft both texts.

Elmer and Bill leaned on Sid Hudgens. They imposed a gag order on Sid's scandal-sheet machinations and secured his subscriber list. I will write the text that Sid's 461 paid subscribers will read. The sheet will be sent to key SIS personnel and ranking officers in the Mexican State Police. Every known comrade/Kamerad will receive the sheet; it will go out to Jack Horrall, notable Feds, Archbishop Cantwell and L.A.'s papal high brass. It will go out to Dudley himself. I will smear Dudley Smith in the Salacious Sidster's trademark style. I will instigate insidious ink. Everything that I write will be true.

Hatred fuels me now. It fuels this letter I'm writing. I now pass my hatred along to Hideo Ashida.

I described the Saul Lesnick–Annie Staples misadventure. Bill and Elmer tossed Doctor Saul in the Lincoln Heights drunk tank and let him stew for six long hours. They hauled him to the City Hall DB then. I observed the interrogation through a wall mirror; a wall-mounted speaker served up sound. Lesnick vividly confirmed the Kameraden's postwar strategy and stoutly defended the grand ideals of enlightened dictatorship. Bill and Elmer let him blather. Lesnick laid out no less than the world as he saw it. It was one creepy credo. Sid Hudgens would label it "dippy dialectic" and a "miasmic manifesto." It featured the doctor's eugenic rationale for slaughtering infants. It ballyhooed Hitler's Norse breeding camps. It included a stirring defense of the Moscow show trials and Stalin's mass execution of deviationists and perceived traitors. Stalin's agrarian purges and Hitler's assault on the Warsaw Ghetto Jews were plain poppycock. Doctor Saul voiced an intense distaste for one Sergeant E. V. Jackson. He told Elmer that he'd be castrated and sold into slave labor once the comrades took over the world. Elmer turned to the mirror and winked at me.

Doctor Saul talked himself out; Bill got the interrogation down to brass tacks. He asked the questions. Elmer hovered and tapped a phone book on the sweatbox table. Lesnick gulped and credibly snitched.

He'd heard rumors about the gold but possessed no specific information. He was conversant with the Kameraden's mail drop and microdot shenanigans. He did not know who the prior Führers were and did not know who the current Führer is. He knew Meyer Gelb and Jean Staley. He did not know that Gelb was once Fritz Eckelkamp and did not know where Gelb hid out. He described Ed Satterlee as an apostolic theoretical Trotskyite and committed Marxist. Ed was the Kameraden's fix-it man. Lesnick professed ignorance of the klub*haus.* He had never been to the klub*haus.* He did not know Kyoho Hanamaka. He had never met Wendell Rice, George Kapek, and Archie Archuleta.

Bill released Lesnick. Go, shitbird. Twist in the wind. Describe your ordeal to your comrades. I watched Lesnick weave through the City Hall lobby. He bumped into an old friend on his way out the door.

The man was the L.A. Bürgermeister of the Negro Nazi League, and was known to pimp colored girls to DA Bill McPherson. The long-lost soulmates embraced. I overheard their conversation. Lesnick suggested lunch; the Bürgermeister suggested Kwan's. He went way back with Ace. Ace owned a sweatshop that enslaved eight-year-old kids. The kids stitched the League's banners and armbands.

The Fifth Column is everyone. Hideo Ashida told me that. It was New Year's Eve. Hideo had just returned from Venice. Joan Conville plowed a car full of wetbacks and left six dead. Bill Parker put the fix in. He had the hots for the big redhead. It's all one story, you—

We know most of it now, Hideo. There's a good deal still to be learned. It entails your betrayal of Dudley Smith. I command your loyalty in this moment. You know what he is. You know this is true.

Bill and Elmer are set to raid Bev's Switchboard. Do you recall the speech I gave two weeks after Pearl Harbor? Pershing Square was packed. I decried the Japanese internment. You were beaten for being there and being a Jap. I baited the crowd. I told them their options were do everything or do nothing. I'm telling you that now.

(LONE PINE, 4:00 P.M., 4/2/42)

Sensei Hanamaka, aka "The Mummy" and "Dr. Death." He's faltering. He's entered an implosive state.

His grin's stretching wider. His fangs protrude more. He's caving in. He'll die soon. He'll become a Jap Shrunken Head.

Interview #3. It reprised 1 and 2. The salve and burn stink. The visitor's chair and the hospital bed.

Ashida said, "I'd like to hear your impressions of Wendell Rice and George Kapek."

Sensei coughed. His fluid bag drained. Sledgehammer dope hit his veins.

"They were second-generation rightist. Rice's father was in the Silver Shirts. Kapek's father is a gauleiter in rural Czechoslovakia. I saw them the first time in the winter of 1939. They were chauffeuring America Firsters to a Nazi-themed party in Brentwood. They served well in the manner of henchmen, as evinced by their minor roles in moving illegals under the aegis of Carlos Madrano. Such employment continued into the era of José Vasquez-Cruz, abutting the era of your mentor, Dudley Smith."

Ashida flinched. He hasn't called Dudley. He's put it off repeatedly. Three crucial interviews. What to tell/what to omit/what to obfuscate.

"Again, were they homosexual? The crime seems to be homosexual in its origins."

"I would not call them homosexual. I would call them fetishistic. Their fetishism was fueled by dope and liquor, along with the trinkets that Archie Archuleta procured for them in Little Tokyo. What would you pay for a slaughter sword deployed at the Rape of Nanking? Your mentor, Dudley Smith, might well be described as a fetishist. Juan Pimentel considered him such."

Dudley was. Dudley is. Kay's faux Claire missive. Fetishism implies the lavender look. Dudley's "effete eye for callow young men."

Slaughter swords. The Jap sword man. His queer white boy friend.

Confirmations accrue and overlap.

"You appear to be deep in thought, Dr. Ashida. I consider it peculiar that you are not taking notes. Did Major Smith tell you not to? I could see where he might want to avoid a public record of our talks."

Ashida bristled. Don't torque me, Tojo. He'd heard Elmer J. tell a Jap suspect that.

"Major Smith is a close friend, and my former commanding officer. I consider all his suggestions, but do not consider them commands."

Hanamaka leered. Opportunist Ashida. Race traitor Ashida. The white man's lapdog. He heels at Major Smith's command.

"Let's return to the trinkets. What were the other types that Archuleta procured, in addition to the swords you mentioned?"

Hanamaka said, "Torture devices. Vile ones. Suits of armor in the shape of Japanese soldiers, fitted with interior spikes meant to inflict horrible death on the wearer. I would call devices such as these militaristically homosexual. Archuleta brought a sampling of them by the klub*haus* one day while I was there. He said he was the middleman for a 'fruit' who sold them to 'strange-o types' he encountered on the jazz strip, although the 'fruit' did his primary business through the U.S. mail. Archuleta mentioned the 'fruit's' sister very briefly. She was the purported brains of this mail-order business. The sister visited the klub*haus* one night. I recall her vividly."

Elmer on Jean Staley. Jean and her "froufrou" kid brother. Robby, ex-jailbird and would-be actor. Not a musician.

We're up against prior descriptions. The would-be killer's tall and blond. Jean Staley is short and dark-haired. A tall blond brother seems unlikely. Archuleta's fruit and the queer-white-boy killer? Probably separate men.

Hanamaka coughed. Blood dripped down his chin. Ashida cracked his evidence kit and pulled his Jean Staley mug shot.

He flashed it. Hanamaka nodded yes. His ID was conclusive. It tied Robby Staley to the Jap sword man. It tied Robby to the queer white boy, once-removed.

Hanamaka yawned and shuddered. The dope jolt had depleted him. Metamorphosis. Here comes your Jap Shrunken Head.

"I think I know you now, Dr. Ashida. One thing continues to perplex me, though. Do you consider yourself Japanese or American?"

Ashida said, "You don't know me at all. I'm as American as you're not."

The main-gate guard left him a package. It contained one letter and one wire spool. An MP sergeant lent him a player and listening earmuffs.

It snowed. Manzanar was socked in tight. Hold for the mid-April thaw. You freeze or broil here. Manzanar's a two-climate zone.

Ashida holed up. The heating vents hummed. He read the letter four times. He played the wire recording twice.

He paced his suite. He looked out at the snow. A mess corporal brought him his dinner. The burn-ward doctor called. Kyoho Hanamaka died at 8:29 p.m.

The letter rankled. Kay was nothing but Kay-like. She was imperious, didactic, jejune. Kommisar Kay. Categorical and Manichean. There is no way but my way. If I believe it, it's true.

Your options are do everything or do nothing.

The wire call revealed Dudley in extremis. Mike Breuning levied a multicount indictment. Mike closed with sobs.

Ashida sat in the dark. He sipped champagne and willed the Baja-to-Manzanar call. The MP's mess hall served chilled champagne nightly. He'd come to expect and enjoy it.

He thought about Kay. She tried to seduce him last December. Kay's faux Claire letter. Dudley's effete eye for callow young men.

The phone rang. Ashida grabbed the receiver. Static cut off his "Hello?" Dudley was Dudleyesque. His blunt approach channeled Kommisar Kay.

"You've been among the missing, lad. I've gotten secondhand reports, from Al Wilhite, but I haven't heard from you."

Ashida cleared his throat. "I wanted to conclude my interviews before I reported. I'm sorry if it inconvenienced you."

"Hanamaka's dead, lad. Lieutenant Wilhite just called me. You won't be seeing our fair Kyoho again."

Man Camera. Let's frame this moment. There's the dark room. There's his window view. It's all snow and prison-camp searchlights.

"He gave up nothing of note. He was incoherent most of the time, and he gave up nothing we hadn't already learned."

Dudley sighed. "The gold? The cabal's chain of command?"

Ashida said, "No. The decadent behavior at the klub*haus* amused him, and he provided me with a great many anecdotes. We spoke at length three times. It was very frustrating."

Dudley sighed. "Soldier on, lad. Study the files I sent you. Put that grand brain of yours to the task."

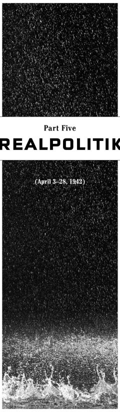
Ashida said, "I'm sorry, Dudley."

Dudley said, "I know you are. I hear it in your voice."

The line went dead. Ashida stifled a sob. Kommisar Kay had it right. There's no alternative. It's everything or nothing.

Part Five

REALPOLITIK



(April 3–28, 1942)

The El Lay Lowdown. Volume I, issue 4. Our motto? "All the news that's *un*fit to print." April 3, 1942 issue. Surreptitiously circulated since November 1941. Our serpentine circulation: 461 paid subscribers, and climbing via vile word of mouth. Dedicated to the proposition that YOU WANT THE DISH. All items written by Party Peeper 69. Subscription rate: $20.00 per year. Direct all inquiries to PO Box 69, Terminal Annex, Los Angeles.

Peeper 69 last left you in Nazi-nullified Paris, France. There was no need for insinuating initials in my climactic close-out piece. The frazzled frogs can't lasso me with libel suits from across the U-boat-undulating Atlantic. I joltingly j'accused piano putz ALFRED CORTOT of hunkering down with the Huns. I ditzed divaesque DANIELLE DARRIEUX for bedding down with the Boche. Cello cheese PIERRE FOURNIER? Shacked between the sheets with fetching filmstress LENI RIEFENSTAHL.

A barrage of bilious letters urged me to can the travelogues. If it ain't happening in El Lay, it ain't happening. Peeper 69 aims to please his rapacious readers. This issue repugnantly returns us to loopy Los Angeles—but with a twitchy twist.

The El Lay Lowdown speciously specializes in Hollywood dirt. Plus pulsing political scandals and the annihilating antics of El Lay socialites. Our regular "Police Blotter" feature features yet more Tinseltown tattle. And this issue turgidly turns its spotlight on the El Lay Police Department's most sinfully sinister and snaggled snafu.

Hear those surging saxophones and cloying clarinets? They announce the boogie beat of a big southside murder case. Dead men tell no tales—but we've got three stagnant stiffs grousing from the grave. Bent cops W.R. & G.K. demand justice; their Mex muchacho A.A. shrieks in español. Carrion cops case the corpses and lick their lips. This job's a maximum moneymaker and a shot to unseat J.H. as Chief.

W.H.P. Don't trust this guy. He'll sell his soul for the pomp of power and college cooze. Don't trust H.A. He's a Mr. Moto manqué and a jittery Jap. Don't trust pustulant policeman M.B. He's in league with furtive Fed E.S. There's a tapped telephone at a Chinatown eatery habituated by hellhound cops. M.B. and E.S. conspire via wire. Mr. B. rats out his maladroit mentor, that hellbound Hibernian hatchet man—D.S. himself.

D.S. is the duped deus ex machina of our dreary drama. Fifth Column finagling defines the big murder case. Caustic Commies M.G. and J.S. frame the fray. Feckless fascists W.J. and J.H. have joined them. Sicknik Sinarquista S.A. is playing D.S. for the fool. We've got riotous Reds and nutty Nazis galore. We've got farshtinkener factions out to glom gorgeous garlands of gold. Greed and graft, kats and kittens. Peeper 69's put his paws on the pulse of this story. He knows alllllllll about that perv party at the Maestro's manse in the winter of '39. She was really a He, and who can blame D.S. for taking ultimate umbrage? Thank heaven M.B & fellow cop D.C. cleaned up the mess.

It's hurtling to a head, dear readers. E.S. is under house arrest; H.A.'s joined the Jap diaspora and has been shipped out to Manzanar. Seditionist psychiatrist S.L. has been pounded by the police. Ex-Chief J.E.D. mutters murderous murmurs at a swank beachside retreat. Quo vadis, D.S.? You're the creepy crux of our drama. You've been spread cruciform, and demons of your own devising are coming for you.

(LOS ANGELES, 2:00 P.M., 4/4/42)

Double play. This raid and the scandal-rag blast. The rags went out, first-class mail. They should bull's-eye today.

And there's Bev's. It's straight across Fountain. It's transmitting Raid Me rays.

Elmer watched the door. Bill Parker watched the door. They sat in Bill's civilian sled. They brought shotguns and pry bars. It's a smash-and-seize job.

Parker smelled like Kay. That musky scent she wore. Elmer got all flustered and jealous. He teethed on them as bedmates. It hurt baaaaaad. He teethed on Wayne Frank Alive for relief.

Wayne Frank Alive hurt. He teethed on Ruth in the Kip. She'll call when she calls. That was her artiste's way. He teethed on Doc Lesnick. Thad Brown got a tip. Doc Saul ensconced himself at Terry Lux's place. He had company there. As in Claire De Haven and gaga Jim Davis.

Salvador Abascal. Teethe on that dink. He sprung Díaz, Carbajal, and Santarolo. He got them habeas. They waltzed out of Fed custody and rewaltzed back to Baja. That was baaaaad grapevine. Here's the gooooood grapevine. Fletch B. got preemptive acquitted. The grand jury pulled their true bills.

All charges were dropped. Mass acquittals were predicted. Guess who jump-started that shit.

Parker said, "I'm getting antsy."

Elmer said, "What's wrong with right now?"

They grabbed their gear. Riot guns and hefty pry bars. They ditched the sled and jaywalked. The front door stood open. They walked right in.

Raid Me rays?—shit. Here's what they got:

Mail-Drop Holocaust. Mail-Drop Inferno. Mail-Drop Mud Slide. All the mail slots were spread wide. There was no mail stuffed inside.

Elmer orbed the walls. Whiskey Bill, ditto. They saw open file drawers and no files visible. Plus open desk drawers in plain sight.

Plus Blow Job Bev and Wallace Jamie, perched in deck chairs. Looking smug. You can't seize vapors. You can't raid stale air.

Parker said, "You were tipped."

Jamie said, "People talk. Word travels. Fellow travelers travel, too." Bev giggled and flipped them the bird.

Parker went for Jamie. He kicked his chair over and smashed his head on the floor. Jamie bitch-yelped. Parker kicked him in the balls and cuffed his hands behind his back. Bev jumped up and whore-yelped. Her deck chair capsized.

Elmer scoped the room. He saw juncture cracks behind the file banks. He dropped his pump gun and ran to the east wall. He jammed his pry bar behind the A to D bank and pulled.

Metal screeched against linoleum. The file bank slid out. No paper scraps or mail debris got revealed. Elmer yanked out the E to J bank. Lice eggs got revealed. Elmer yanked out the K to R bank. A mousetrap and stale cheese got revealed.

Metal screeched against linoleum. Jamie and Bev screeched Fascist Assault! Elmer pulled out the S to Z bank. He saw boocoo mail debris.

Glossy stuff. Spilled catalogues. Jammed upside the walls. In there with mouse turds and soot.

Elmer knelt down and pored through it. S to Z skank got revealed.

The watch sergeant called in sick. It was SOP. He was an all-time goldbrick. He habituated the Blue Fox and White Dog Klub. His work went undone.

Dudley filled in. Major D. L. Smith, among the squadroom pogues. He worked at the sergeant's desk. He filled out the duty roster and sorted the mail.

The squadroom buzzed. SIS ran full Saturday shifts. Dudley buzzed. He had Benzedrine for breakfast and lunch. The Wolf was down in La Paz. Constanza doted on him.

Dudley slit envelopes. The mail was SOP-plus. Fourth Interceptor demands Jap head counts. The Staties demand liaison meets. There's Jap sub alerts. There's Redshirt rallies east of Piedra Rojas. Please infiltrate.

Plus a plain envelope. Addressed direct to him. An L.A. postmark and no return address.

Dudley slit the envelope. Three mimeo sheets were stuffed in. The cheap ink bled. The cheap paper wilted. Say what? It's Sid Hudgens' private rag.

The El Lay Lowdown. Sid's standard fare, free of restraints. 461 subscribers. William Randolph Hearst, take note.

Dudley skimmed through it. He skimmed through Holly*weird* tattle, couched in Sid's standard style. Men's room hijinks and gang bangs. Sid's standard fare. He skimmed to "big southside murder case." He hit "pustulant policeman M.B." He quick-skimmed to "D.S. himself." He went hot/cold/hot and skimmed the full text.

He made this noise. Code clerks glanced over. He threw an arm across the desk and dumped a file box. He made a worse noise. It just seeped out. More clerks looked over. He dumped his coffee cup and smashed a typewriter into the floor.

He made a worse noise. It was screechy effete. The whole squadroom watched.

Opium.

The tar, the match, the pipe.

Stopover, Dublin. He views James Conroy Smith's resurrection. A brotherly reunion turns sanguine. They go on the hunt together. Protty militiamen fall. The Wolf hunts with them. Bloodthirsty beast. He slays and eats his prey.

Stopover, Rome. Salvy's confession and papal audience. I did not betray Dudley Smith, Your Holiness. He is my Führer as thou art God's sole worldly lord.

Stopover, L.A. Meyer Gelb assumes a supplicant's pose. He bows. He bestows the gold. He explains everything.

Stopover, New York. Maestro Klemperer conducts at Carnegie Hall. It's the Shostakovich symphony. He's proud of Young Joan. She did her part. Uncanny child. Gray hair at fifteen. She's surely the spawn of the Wolf.

The bedroom door slid open. The Wolf followed Constanza in. He called her, or thinks he did. The night's been a blur. He thinks he described the letter. She must have sensed his duress.

The Wolf jumped on the bed. Constanza sat on the edge. She took his hands. Her voice was soft.

I journeyed up to love you and assuage your fear. It is all hearsay. It's a smear tactic employed by my brother, allied with Meyer Gelb. They are creating dissension among the Kameraden, because they fear you so. They possess the gold or know where it is. They fear that we will take it from them. We ourselves will live in fear as long as my brother remains alive.

I cannot believe that Salvy would betray me. You were his lover. Please refute the assertion and tell me that it isn't true.

You collect acolytes and younger brothers. It is not a trait I admire in you.

Harsh you. Your stern words wound me.

You have never been wounded as I have. Consider the horror my brother inflicted, as you permit him to draw breath.

You were approached and offered the minutes for the Baja conference. Has a sum been mentioned? Was the approach credible?

The approach was tendered through my mail drop in Los Angeles. The note was block-printed with a ruler, which bespeaks spycraft to me. The sender failed to explain himself further. The sum mentioned was ten thousand dollars.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 1:00 P.M., 4/5/42)

Chez Lux. Health retreat, dry-out farm, divorce hideaway. Sid Hudgens has dubbed it the "Nose Job Notre Dame." Jack Horrall and Gene Biscailuz boil the booze out under Terry's supervision. Fritz Eckelkamp was cut into Meyer Gelb here. The guest bungalows are enclosed by high hedgerows and pepper trees. The medical buildings resemble a Bauhaus college campus. There are tennis courts, putting greens, a first-run movie house. Noted comrades skulk in residence. Saul Lesnick, Two-Gun Davis. Lin Chung concocts eugenics potions in Terry's lab. Orson Welles will soon engage Terry's weight-loss regime. Steam baths and cocaine do the trick.

Claire and I sipped coffee on her terrace. Our own comrades were otherwise deployed. Buzz was chasing Meyer Gelb; Elmer was chasing J-town leads in the wake of the Bev's Switchboard raid. Bill assigned my own Lee Blanchard to bodyguard Sid Hudgens. The mock scandal sheet had been widely received; the Sidster feared Dudster reprisals.

The setting was lovely. Claire and I sat side by side; Claire kept a hand on my knee. It was companionable, more than seductive. Ten years separated us; the war enthused us equally; my enthusiasm was girlish and ghoulish when compared to hers. Claire saw the war as the culmination of her long leftist immersion. The current worldwide horror was the horror of her failed attempts to spark revolution. She failed to grasp the horror of her own profligacy and could not acknowledge its self-perpetuation. She viewed her personal life and the war as one inextricable struggle. I viewed my personal life and the war as an opportunity. I put my hand on Claire's hand on my knee. I thought of Edna St. Vincent Millay as I did this. "Through my mother's hand. / I saw the web grow, / And the pattern expand."

Claire said, "I'm not going to issue a false confession to Monsignor Hayes.

I've read your script a dozen times, and I've decided that I cannot and will not do it. I called Captain Parker this morning. We discussed the matter, and he told me that he has arrived at the same resolve. He said the monsignor has consented to a formal police interview. Your scandal mock-up must have frightened him, dear."

I squeezed Claire's hand. "You called Bill Parker. I must say I've heard everything now."

"God despises half-assed apostates. I can't justify that scripturally, but I know it to be true."

We lit cigarettes and blew smoke at the sky. The retreat caught sea breezes; cloud patterns expanded and swirled. I released my enclosing hand and let it fall free; Claire laced up our fingers.

"I did something you should know about."

"Yes?"

"It began back in Ensenada. It was shortly after I realized that Dudley had become involved with the Lazaro-Schmidt woman. I heard them talking on the phone, and eavesdropped. He was discussing a Nazi-Soviet conference with this creature, and I picked up quite a few details. The conference occurred in Ensenada, in the fall of '40. Dudley said he'd pay dearly to acquire any typed minutes that might exist."

I squeezed Claire's hand. "I know about that conference," I said. "It was all over Joan's diary."

Claire placed my hand on her knee. Mature woman, young woman. Edna St. Vincent Millay and early-wartime flirtation. Pinch me—I'm a South Dakota farm girl.

"I did something precipitous, Katherine. I recalled what you told me about Bev's Switchboard and mail drops, and I ruler-printed a note to the Lazaro-Schmidt woman. I told her I had the minutes, and I'd be willing to sell them to her for ten thousand dollars."

Claire, the bold apostate. Claire, the vengeful lover. Precipitous, indeed.

"Did you tell her where to contact you?"

"No. I wrote that I'd contact her again."

I said, "We can't overdo it here. We sent your letter to Dudley, as well as the scandal sheet. I was going to send notes from Beth Short and Joan Klein, but it may be altogether too much, and alert him."

Claire smiled. "I should mention that Joan has moved into Otto's guesthouse. She's become a yet-younger version of your still-young version of Mata Hari. If the Shostakovich symphony ever arrives in this country, it will be due to that rather outré child's efforts."

Jean Staley vacates the guesthouse; Young Joan Klein moves in. Otto Klemperer's Home for Wayward Women.

"Otto told me a horrible story, Claire. It goes back to the time of his blackouts, and it has the feel of a blackout itself. A man was making 'vile comments' to him, and he beat the man to death. He told Saul Lesnick about it. Lesnick and Ed Satterlee exploited the situation and hushed it up. Otto paid them a good deal of money, of course."

Claire said, "Otto killed no one, dear. Saul was drunk one night, and explained it all to me. The man was Japanese. He sold rather horrific curios, and he rented a few items to Orson Welles, to use as props in a smut film he was making—one that I appeared in, as a lark. The film was debuted at what I've been told was a rather decadent party at Otto's house, while Otto was here at Terry's place, taking a rest cure. Otto met the Japanese man at some point after that party. He beat the man, but not badly. He was insensate from the pain medicine that Saul had prescribed, and convinced himself that he'd committed murder. Saul and Ed Satterlee were more than willing to exploit this addled belief."

The drive to Manzanar consumed eight full hours. I journeyed from springtime Los Angeles to a bleak outpost of the California Sierras. Bill secured me a visitor's pass and warned me that an MP lieutenant named Al Wilhite was a Dudley Smith toady and had likely been assigned to watchdog Hideo Ashida.

Hideo was expecting me. Bill called him on his scrambler phone and arranged the rendezvous. Dudley might well learn of it; I didn't care; my visit was contrived to place Hideo in a state of moral jeopardy from which he could not run.

I drove into snow country; the temperature dropped at dusk; mountain winds slammed my car as icy blacktop skewed the traction. I concentrated on driving and nothing else. I learned to drive on winter prairie roads; this was more of that; I hit a flat plane right before Manzanar and slalomed just as I did in rural South Dakota.

Road signs announced the camp; I saw perimeter lights a half mile ahead and slid the last hundred yards up to the gate. I saw cabin rows, bisecting paths, barbed wire, and pivoting floodlights. The gate guard issued me a parking pass and gave me directions to the canteen. Visiting hours were over, he said. But they made exceptions for Dr. Ashida—he was a star boarder here.

I could have visited Hideo in the plush suite that Dudley had secured for him—but Hideo nixed that idea. He knew I was coming to further recruit and suborn him. He wanted me to feel ill at ease within a public context of his own people.

I parked and began my trek uphill. Mountain gusts pushed me forward, back, from side to side. The canteen was three paths up and three paths over. I trudged a good mile and a half; the family huts stretched just that far and wide. They were dimly lit and shuttered; no faces peered out at anomalous me.

I found the canteen. It was dim bulb–lit and hung with frayed Japanese lanterns. The interior walls were rough pine-planked and joined at severe right angles. One small room, rough wood furniture, wall photographs of majestic Mount Fuji.

Hideo sat off by himself. Four older men sat in a group. The canteen was a Japanese bachelors' club, prison camp–style.

I sat down across from Hideo. He said, "No outrage, please. It's spartan, but it's not the Warsaw Ghetto or the Lubyanka."

He'd lost weight. He wore gray flannels and a brown anorak. He warmed his hands on a thermos and poured me a cup of hot tea.

I took off my gloves and sipped at it. I played cutup and waved to the old men; they looked down and made me feel like a farceur and wretch. Hideo said, "At least you tried. I'd have thought you'd become someone else if you hadn't."

I smiled. "I subjected you to that wiretap," I said. "You're subjecting me to your fellow bachelors and this spartan accommodation."

"You didn't subject me to anything I didn't already know about Dudley. You tend to overplay your hand, Kay. Your subtext was 'he's finished,' but I'm not sure I agree with that."

Touché, Hideo. We're here to bargain, and I know you'll set boundaries. You fear implacable women. I know that about you.

"I spoke to Claire today. She told me Otto Klemperer crossed paths with our Japanese sword man. It confirms his presence in our suspect pool."

Hideo said, "I consider him tangential. The homosexual youth may or may not be an actual suspect. Kyoho Hanamaka placed him with a white woman, about thirty. It confirms my key thesis. Without actual names and evidence, these confirmations are no more than supposition."

I said, "You're a killjoy. You're like those old men over there."

"Since you're fishing for compliments, I'll provide one. Your epistolary approach is inspired. You surely got Dudley's attention with the scandal sheet, but I wish you hadn't sent it to the Staties."

"It lured Monsignor Hayes. He's coming in, with a lawyer. Bill's set to interview him."

Hideo sighed and stomped one foot. He was impatient. Tell me what you expect of me. You're a woman. I'm bored already.

"Tell me what you want. I'll say yes or no immediately."

"I want you to forge a document. Minutes for the Baja conference in '40."

"To be sent to whom, and under what cover?"

"Constanza Lazaro-Schmidt," I said. "It should be crafted to induce greed for the gold, and I want it sent anonymously."

Hideo drummed the table. "Quid pro quo? There's two specific concessions I require."

I said, "Tell me what you want. I'll say yes or no immediately."

The riposte sailed right by him. He said, "I want to conduct the interviews with Leander Frechette and Martin Luther Mimms."

"And, second?"

"I do not want Dudley Smith harmed. You may expose him and seek to contravene his designs. You may not kill him, physically harm him, or seek to imprison him. Tell your vindictive lover Bill Parker that. Tell your volatile friend Elmer Jackson that. Tell the trigger-happy Buzz Meeks that. All four of you must know that I will not permit Dudley Smith to be harmed in those specific fashions."

Touché. You trumped me. This girl knows when she's ceded the high ground, and when she's licked.

"I've never seen you this passionate."

Hideo said, "I love him. He gave me the world, and it was not an insignificant gift."

(LONE PINE, 10:00 A.M., 4/6/42)

You're a Jap.

The main drag bustled. The spring thaw hit all at once. It engendered foot traffic. Folks stormed the grocery store and the hardware store. Who's that big goon cuffed to that Jap?

The goon wore civvies. He was an MP PFC. Ashida wore civvies. The cuff chain dangled in plain sight.

You're a Jap.

Folks saw them. Folks passed comment. It was snide but civilized. Manzanar was close by. It juiced local business. The war had its upside. Why's this Jap on the loose?

Because he's Manzanar's star boarder. Because he's out shopping. Because he's buying forgery gear.

The MP mapped the excursion. They hit a stationery store and a bookstore. It created a mild upscut. Biz was biz, though.

Ashida purchased four reams of quality bond paper and four fountain pens. He bought corresponding bottles of ink and German- and Russian-language study texts.

They hit the hardware store. Ashida bought a rubber-stamp kit and three hobbyist's knives. Ranch locals cruised him. He bought a bottle of gum arabic. A ranch boy sidled close. He pulled his eyes into Jap slits and giggled. The MP moved him along.

His lab was well stocked and equipped. All praise to you know who. The shopping jaunt bypassed Al Wilhite. Subterfuge and spycraft. He slid the MP fifty scoots and made him pledge silence. You know who taught him well.

Ashida skimmed the usage books. He gained German and Russian vocabulary and enhanced his syntactical grasp. He was Spanish-fluent. He possessed one typewriter. It was a ’36 Underwood. Verisimilitude. The concept buttressed his Baja ’40 construction.

The minutes were composed and typed at the conference. The German and Russian factions shared this one machine. It was a late-vintage U.S. import. Verisimilitude. Staff flunkies typed in Ensenada hotel rooms. It was a rush job. Be sure to flub and overscore words.

Ashida composed at his desk. He typed off his hand-scrawled notes. He kept the German text lofty and ambiguous. The Kameraden fear committed words on paper. The Russian comrades are less circumspect.

Man Camera. Time Machine. Spring ’42 as the fall of ’40. Retrospective verisimilitude. You must express ridicule and contempt. It must wound Dudley Smith in the present tense.

Ashida assumed a Russian voice. He’s a high-up apparatchik. He castigates the Dresden Poly boys. Díaz, Jamie, Hayes, Pimentel. They are all rightist refuseniks and deviationists. They cannot comprehend the grand ideal of left-right amity.

Ashida played a hunch. He recalled Joan’s diary. She described a tract sent to the klub*haus.* Salvy Abascal wrote it. The tract critiqued the Baja conference and the postwar utopian dream promulgated there. The tract suggested Abascal’s presence at the confab. Call him a right-wing stooge at the prom and no more.

Here’s the hunch. He cruised through Dresden Poly. He knew the boys there. He withheld this from Dudley. He’s a longtime outlier in the left-right cabal.

That’s the hunch. Here’s the fictive reinterpretation.

Abascal is no more than a stooge racketeer. He’s out to grab the gold for himself. The apparatchik has heard rumors. Abascal’s militant Catholic stance is a ruse. He’s a Brit-loving monarchist. The Irish are subhuman pigs.

Salvador has hoodwinked Dudley. That’s confirmed evidence now. It should be retroactively advanced. The apparatchik should express it. Abascal’s goal has always been racket appropriation. He’s been looking for a U.S. sugar daddy. His goal foreshadows this:

He found his sugar daddy. Dudley Smith’s muddleheaded when it comes to wild young men. Exploit the Dudley-Salvador fissure. Render it a chasm. Grant Meyer Gelb retrospective Führer status.

Ashida wrote Russian text. The apparatchik defamed Salvador at great length. Meyer Gelb was conversely lauded. Ashida overscored and flubbed words deliberately. The German and Russian texts stood complete. He forged varying ink signatures.

The textual work took eight hours. He aged his paper next. He boiled a hydroxide solution and laced it with tap water. He filled an atomizer and sprayed his pages. He fan-dried them. It created a frayed yellow effect. He repeated the process four times. Verisimilitude. Quadruple-aged paper. He worked through the night and into the next day.

He built the stamp. He devised one symbol for one cause united. He cut rubber and sawed wood and glued ink pads tight. He worked through that next day. He forgot to eat.

Die Fahne hoch!!! Beastly ideology, one savage beast. He’s half Nazi eagle, half Russian bear. He’s a lumbering creature with wings. His claws drip blood. His contorted beak screams. Crossed hammers offset the swastika. The four points are sharp workers’ scythes.

(LOS ANGELES, 4:00 P.M., 4/7/42)

Papal slugfest. Bill Parker versus Padre Joe Hayes and some dioscean shyster.

They hogged a DB sweatbox. Parker wore civvies. Hayes wore his penguin suit. The lawyer wore a blue blazer with a Loyola crest. Elmer peeped the see-thru. He goosed the hall speaker up high.

Parker and Hayes indulged blah-blah. Elmer tuned it out. He gassed with Kay yesterday. She passed on Hideo's report. Kyoho Hanamaka was dead now. He supplied good drift, premortem.

It confirmed the Jap sword man and the queer white boy. The white boy had a white girl pal. Archie Archuleta peddled the sword man's trinkets. Jean Staley masterminded the mail-order biz. Fruit brother Robby helped out.

Padre Hayes told stale jokes. The prelude protracted. Elmer brain-revved. The sword man had to be Johnny Shinura. That Bev's Switchboard catalogue spelled it out plain. Shinura had no green sheet. Shinura was uninterned and out on the hoof. Shinura peddled his shit out of a J-town loft. The Feds seized the building a month ago. It was government-sealed. Where's Sword Man Johnny now?

The prelude deprotracted. Joe Hayes lit a cigarette. Shyster McBride lit a cigar. Parker pushed an ashtray across the table.

"The Sinarquistas, Monsignor. Their leader, Salvador Abascal. They're going on the Feds' 1-A subversive list next month."

Hayes said, "I wouldn't call them subversive. A great many Catholics support them, morally and financially, and I'm proud to stand among them. We're not subversives—we're just concerned Catholics, like you."

Parker said, "Like Dudley Smith?"

"Yes, like Dudley."

McBride said, "Captain Parker's a nonpracticing lawyer. I've got a hunch he's about to introduce People's Exhibit A."

Parker popped his briefcase. He pulled out a wire-player gizmo and plugged it into the wall. He tapped two switches. Hold tight, fuckers. Dud's in the hot seat now.

Mike Breuning and Ed Satterlee gabbed. Elmer gassed on the replay. Breuning finked El Dudster. Hayes got the scandal sheet already. This tapped call doubled it down.

Wetbacks. Heroin. Jap slaves. Nazi fucks and Red fucks and a lost gold cache. Dud's priest-killer snuffs.

Hayes went pale. McBride went all flushed. Parker turned the gizmo off.

"There are a few issues I'd like to discuss, Monsignor. Chiefly, your partial ownership of Bev's Switchboard, and your Dresden Polytechnic alliance with Wallace Jamie, Mondo Díaz, and Juan Pimentel."

McBride shook his head. "Monsignor Hayes declines to answer."

Parker lit a cigarette. "Continuing, then. Bev's Switchboard as a confirmed seditionist mail drop. Your own mail-drop collaborations, coded phone calls to a relay station in Ensenada, and the general range of your far-right, and/or far-left, alliances."

McBride said, "Monsignor Hayes declines to answer."

Hayes squirmed. He quick-lit a cigarette and fumbled the match. Elmer gassed on the show.

Parker said, "Continuing, then. Mr. Abascal as a possible saboteur and/or seeker and hoarder of a gold cache stolen from a U.S. Mint train in 1931."

Elmer squirmed. That saboteur query ditzed him. Frankie Carbajal blabs at the sweep. El Salvy plans sabotage in the San Joaquin Valley. Him and Buzz held back the lead. It's their fallback card. It's insurance against all forms of censorious shit.

Hayes and McBride huddled. They pressed heads. Whisper, whisper. Parker cleaned his glasses on his necktie. He looked devil-dog pissed.

McBride said, "Monsignor Hayes will issue a blanket statement that addresses your last few points. No rebuttals, Captain. This is a police interview, not a courtroom proceeding."

Hayes said, "I would never condone sabotage. I seriously doubt that the Sinarquistas would ever perform it or even consider performing it. I have heard vague rumors as to a cache of gold, including the rumor that Salvy took possession of it, and somehow all of this pertains to a leftist-rightist cabal out to establish their postwar credentials, regardless of which side wins. Concludingly, let me state that these rumors impressed me as poppycock, and the Salvy I know would never collaborate with anyone on the Left."

Elmer relit a cigar. Fuck you, Father Joe. You speak with forked tongue.

Parker said, "Continuing, then. A clubhouse on 46th Street, east of Central Avenue. Homosexual activity, on the premises. One Thomas Malcolm Glennon, one Robert Clinton Staley, a homosexual jazz musician and his known associate—a Japanese purveyor of fetishistic curios."

Hayes and McBride huddled. Whisper, whisper. They pressed heads again. McBride snapped his suspenders and kicked his chair back.

"The Monsignor admits to intimate relationships with Tommy Glennon and Robby Staley. Should you be fishing for leads on the murders of Wendell Rice, George Kapek, and Arturo Archuleta, I'll state that the monsignor has a beaut, and it's yours for across-the-board immunity."

Parker went all Donald Duck. Steam hissed out his ears. His eyeballs popped in rage. His glasses fogged up.

"DA McPherson has authorized me in that regard. I'm listening, Monsignor."

Hayes said, "I know of the musician, but I don't know his name. His Japanese friend is named Johnny Shinura, and his curio business is located on East 2nd Street. The musician has a friend. She's a high-strung woman, about twenty-eight years of age. I don't know her name, either. Rice, Kapek, and Archuleta purportedly raped a woman at the klub*haus.* I credit the rumor, but I don't know the victim's name. One might call rape a good motive for a triple homicide, although I've never seen the allure."

Elmer brain-drained the lead. It played good and backstopped Hideo Ashida. Hideo theorized a male-female deal.

A Vice bull walked up a desk phone. He looked bored. The phone cord was stretched taut.

"It's Meeks. He sounds agitated."

Elmer snatched the receiver. "Yeah, boss."

Buzz said, "I found Meyer Gelb."

123

(ENSENADA, 3:00 P.M., 4/8/42)

AWOL. “Absent without official leave.” Abdication, flight, retreat.

He trashed the squadroom four days back. He abandoned his command. SIS men witnessed his tantrum. He holed up with Constanza. They made love and sniffed cocaine. They donned Nazi uniforms and fondled his gold bayonet.

He told her he killed Cruz-Caiz with it. She told him to kill her brother with it. She reprised haughty words.

“I cannot truly give myself to a man as long as my brother remains alive.”

Dudley drove the coast road north. Constanza left this morning. She flew back to La Paz. She has a chamber recital tonight. Call him the widower, adrift.

Adrift, untethered, bereft.

He assigned himself tasks. Make phone calls. Shore up the home front. Visit the dope ranch. Issue command directives. Visit the Jap holding pens. Hold sway over your peons. Return to duty, starched and pressed.

Dudley cut inland. His phone task had backfired. He called Claire’s house in Beverly Hills. A maid brushed him off. He called Mike Breuning and Dick Carlisle at home and got no answer. He called Beth at her real dad’s place in Vallejo. She hung up on him.

He’d lost weight. His trousers hung slack. He stood two days awake. He’d brought Claire’s stash kit with him. He could geez and rest up at the ranch.

Constanza called him an hour ago. She told him that Bev’s Switchboard had contacted her. Bev said she’d received a letter. He told Constanza to read it to him.

She did. The note was ruler-block-printed. It restated a prior note she’d received.

“I’ve got the minutes. I want ten thousand dollars. I’m tired of waiting. I’ll write again soon.”

Dudley cut through scrub hills and desert patches. A warm wind kicked in.

Tumbleweeds hit the car and caromed off. He ran a tumbleweed gauntlet. Tumbleweeds scraped the windshield and rendered him blind. He floored the gas and plowed past them. He got scared and went whee! and laughed.

It hurt to laugh. He sounded shrill. Wisps passed in front of his eyes. The wind lulled and died. He saw the ranch up ahead. He saw cars he knew and cars he didn't recognize.

He pulled up and parked outside the lab hut. He saw the foreman's car and the head chemist's car. He saw no straw-boss jalopies. He saw a low-chopped '40 Ford and a '38 Packard. He smelled high-test gasoline fumes.

He got out and stretched his legs. He unholstered his piece. He weaved and saw wisps, wisps, and wisps.

The lab door flew open. The sound echoed loud. Three Blackshirt Staties walked toward him. He smelled burnt-almond fumes.

Boots scuffed gravel behind him. The Wolf growled, out of nowhere. A wet rag smothered him and scoured out the wisps.

Stench. Mildew and urine. Words—off to what we call left. Cognizance. Brain function. Spanish words. What we call language. Crackle sounds. What we call radio.

"Bombing attacks."

"Suspected sabotage."

"Crop-farm acreage."

"San Joaquin Valley."

Cognizance. Scent. Of blood and entrails, of rancid fur. His face burned. Burnt almonds means a chloroform tincture. That's brain function. It's the will to forge thought and isolate sensation. It's the ability to link sensation to thought.

Dudley Liam Smith, you've been sandbagged. Dudley Liam Smith—you took a nap.

He opened his eyes. He saw four squashed rats and his own bloody hands. Entrails and fur. Bite marks on his wrists. He'd squashed them himself.

The Wolf licked his face. It revived him. The Wolf supplied a travelogue.

We're in the Statie barracks jail. Blackshirts commandeered your biz fronts. Japs, dope, wetbacks. You've been usurped.

He kissed the Wolf and thanked him. The Wolf told him to torture and kill Meyer Gelb. Herr Gelb has the gold. Es la verdad. Kill Juan Lazaro-Schmidt. Constanza will leave us if you don't.

Cognizance. Brain function. They stole his gun, his watch, his money. He's on a bare cement floor. Cognizance. Language. "Sabotage," "San Joaquin Valley." Brain function. The ability to extrapolate.

You're still exhausted. You remain impaired. Let the Wolf explicate here.

Sid Hudgens spoke la verdad. Salvy Abascal has betrayed you. He smuggled saboteurs in with that last batch of wets. It's why he refused to ride north. Salvy es El Grand Jefe de los Kameraden. You are a dupe of your own sentimentality. Trust wolves before you trust dashing and fawning young men.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 7:00 P.M., 4/8/42)

The Crash Squad HQ stood abandoned. Daily briefings had been discontinued; the report boards drooped off the walls. The once-hot cop murder job now ran parallel to cases going back eleven years. Attrition and factionalism had decimated the squad proper. Mike Lyman's back room returned to what it once was: a rendezvous spot for married cops and their girlfriends.

Like Bill Parker and me, drinking highballs and dining on cheese puffs. Meeting in cop-assigned places. Utilizing them as love shacks and hole-ups, where we hashed out What the hell is all this?

Elmer was off somewhere; Buzz notched an address for Meyer Gelb and was staking out the location. He talked to that bail bondsman in San Francisco; the man kicked loose Leander Frechette's address. The DA granted Joe Hayes immunity. The Japanese sword man was ID'd as Johnny Shinura. The invert white boy had a gal pal. Hideo Ashida considered them viable klub*haus* suspects. Kyoho Hanamaka was dead. Hideo lied to Dudley. Sensei Death told me nothing. Hideo crossed the line over to God's side.

It might all be breaking. It might dwindle down to dashed leads and misinformation. None of us knew.

We had the back room to ourselves. I wanted to head to our Ambassador spot and make love. Bill wanted to hash out What the hell is all this?

I said, "Hideo wants to interview Frechette. It's part and parcel of his forged-document deal."

Bill said, "We'll have Lee bodyguard him. He can't go to San Francisco alone."

"Hideo called me this morning. He's completed the minutes, and he'll be sending them along to the Lazaro-Schmidt woman."

Bill just nodded. I dug through his pants pockets and pulled out his cigarettes. It was a regular routine of ours; Bill always gasped.

"Say something, please. It's a nice breezy night, and I'm antsy."

Bill smiled. "Here's two observations. First, you know how to get a man's attention. Second, I need to have a talk with Buzz Meeks. He most certainly intends to kill Dudley, and I have to dissuade him, before he goes off half-cocked."

I laughed. The Teletype clacked and rolled paper; Bill got up and detached the sheet. He read through it and crossed himself.

"It's from Fourth Interceptor. They're reporting multiple incidents of sabotage, up near Bakersfield. There's three dead at a private-plane hangar. A garage filled with bomb materiel was blown up in Taft, with two more dead there. Maricopa's got a Bund hall, arsoned. It was packed with illegal ordnance, and was torched to the ground."

I crossed myself. "It's truck-farm country. Dudley's running illegals up there."

Bill ran the full distance Code 3, lights and siren; we made the night trek to Kern County in probable record time. Bill called ahead and spoke to a Sheriff's captain. The man said his Subversive Squad had raided the Bund hall on Pearl Harbor Day. The ordnance had remained on the premises; the county and the Feds were embroiled in a big jurisdictional brouhaha. The man closed with "If you've got questions, I might have some answers by the time you get up here. And there might be an L.A. angle on this thing."

Kern County was low, wide, and flat; U.S. 99 north cut straight through it. It was farm and oil country. Pump derricks stood tall; they framed the low-lying terrain. We crossed the Maricopa city limits and saw lights beamed up a half mile ahead. It had to be arc lamps at the arson scene. Bill sighted in on the glow and drove straight to it.

Forty-odd lamps threw light on a half block torched to a husk. Rubble mounds stood ten feet high. Firemen probed them with axes and shovels. Bill parked beside a perimeter rope closing off a slew of fire trucks and prowl cars. The mounds hissed and spat embers. Uniformed deputies lounged around and watched.

We got out and walked over to them; a tall man noticed us and ambled up. He said, "Captain Parker and Miss Lake, right? Who else could it be at this time of night?"

Bill flashed his badge; the captain introduced himself as Bob Boyd and passed us calling cards and BIG BOB BOYD FOR SHERIFF campaign buttons. I pinned on my button; Big Bob all but swooned.

He said, “Here’s what we’ve got, and here’s the consensus. We’ve got eight dead at three sites, with three holed-up winos fried in this Bund hall. We think some ex-caped wetbacks from some farms south of here are good for all three jobs. They took off just preceding the blasts, so that has to be it. We tossed out a dragnet right quick, and we snagged a hinky Mex named Mondo Díaz at the Bakersfield bus depot. We ran a subversive-sheet check on him, and damned if he didn’t get nailed by your police department just recently. He bailed into Federal custody, hightailed to Mexico, then made his way back here. He’s not a righteous wet—but we think he’s the ringleader of these bomb-tossing sacks of shit. We leaned on him at the county jail, and he admitted as much. He’s in with some Nazi beaners called the Sinarquistas, so why they’d want to up and bomb a Bund hall, I’ll never know.”

Bill said, “Plant Mr. Díaz in a sweatbox, Captain. I’d like to have a few words with him.”

The All-Star PD hits Kern County. Big Bob Boyd proves himself a most gracious host.

The Sheriff’s Detective Bureau hopped at midnight. Off-duty deputies showed up for the show. They brought their wives and girlfriends; they were all Big Bob supporters and inclined to think I was swell. The incumbent Sheriff, “Kickback” Kit Denkins, was a notorious no-goodnik. He took bribes from crooked building contractors and solicited high school girls for their soiled underwear. Big Bob was running an insurgent campaign against him. He called up a group of his partisans and suggested a hoedown. The bite was a dollar a head. All the proceeds went to his campaign pot. Big Bob provided corn liquor and potato chips. Plus a gallery peek at the Bill Parker–Mondo Díaz tiff.

The gang convened in sweatbox #2. A see-thru mirror framed booth #1. I dropped a ten-spot in the kitty and drew a round of applause. It was an SRO crowd: eighteen deputies and their dates. Big Bob joined his fans. He jacked up the volume on the wall speaker and supplied us with swell front-row seats.

Bill and Mondo Díaz sat at the #1 table. Why mince words? Díaz looked beat to shit. The gang tossed back corn-liquor shots. A preperformance hush enveloped us. We crowded up to the see-thru and watched.

Bill dispensed commiseration. Those hayseed cops sure thumped you. I don’t feature that, myself. Mondo, you’re looking at a gas-chamber bounce. We’ve got you for eight counts of Murder One, easy. Plus capital-charge sedition and treason. You’ll suck gas inside six months.

The gang cheered. “Suck gas” spurred the ovation.

Díaz said, “Your mama sucks Chihuahua dicks.”

The gang booed. “Chihuahua dicks” spurred the response.

Bill pulled out his pocket flask and urged Díaz to take a few pops. The gang rumbled; they admired the ploy; the city-slicker cop knew his stuff.

Díaz chugalugged Old Crow. Bill spoon-fed him. Things look grim, Mondo. I won't lie to you there. One hand washes the other. There's a few things I'd like to know about Salvy Abascal and the Sinarquistas. If you'll provide a few answers, I'll see what I can do for you.

Díaz said, "Okay, pendejo. Ask me something simple first, so I don't get all gun-shy talking to you."

Bill slid his cigarettes across the table. He smiled as Díaz lit up.

So, Mondo. Tell me this, Mondo. Why would a right-wing cabal like the Sinarquistas blow up a Bund hall? I'm perplexed, Mondo. I'm out of my depth here. Call me a pendejo—but you're taking me beyond my ken.

Díaz killed off the flask. Entranced cops pressed up to the see-thru and left nose prints on the glass.

"Here's your primer on the new dialectic, pendejo. Sinarquismo's left as much as it's right. Suppose I told you La Causa's financed by the NKVD, out of Moscow? Suppose I told you the Hitler boys contribute to the Redshirt Brigade in Ensenada? Suppose I quote this Greek guy, Aristophanes? He said, 'Whirl is king.' "

A fat deputy said, "What's 'dialectic'?"

Big Bob said, "This guy's the guy talking Greek, not that Aristo-whoever guy."

Mrs. Big Bob said, "This is wearing me thin. Bob, you get in there and phone-book that creep."

I said, "Hush, now. You don't get a show like this every day."

Bill enacted deep befuddlement. I can't piece this together, Mondo. I know you went to this German technical college. You're educated, so you know all about the Greeks and all this other highbrow shit. I've read your green sheet, Mondo. You can't be a Red and a Nazi at the same time. Any fool with a high-school education knows that much.

Üntermensch Bill baited the hook. Übermensch Mondo snapped up the bait.

"Here's the thing about History, pendejo. Every so often someone comes around and explains that what's what ain't what. This is by way of saying that Salvy Abascal gave a talk at Dresden Poly. It was pro-Nazi, which wowed my little clique. He had this Jewish pal named Meyer Gelb, which conversely ticked us off. He explained the rudiments of totalitarianism, which allowed us to see that the Reds saw things the same way we did. He pointed out that Jew Hatred and Workers Unite was all the same shuck. Do you know what 'prescience' is, pendejo? It's when you predict the future and it comes true, against all empirical evidence. Which is by way of saying that Salvy predicted this war we're in, along with a U.S. and Russian victory, which necessitates the need for a potently inclusive new totalitarian alliance to surmount the inevitable postwar chaos and monkey-wrench the world's new idiot taste for democracy."

Bill said, "I read a Federal subversive summary. It described a conference, along the lines of what you just described. I'm wondering if you were there."

"Of course I was there. I was there when they signed the Magna Carta and when Moses parted the Red Sea. I was there when your puto forefathers signed the Declaration of Interdependence. You're wearing this look I've seen before, pendejo. You just figured out that what's what ain't what, and I'm not just some dumb pachuco."

Bill said, "Do minutes for the conference exist?"

Díaz laughed. "They're a myth. They're like Das Kapital and the Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion. They're some jive that the great unwashed thinks is real."

"The gold, Mondo? What about that? Is that just a pipe dream, too?"

"It's all a pipe dream. It's a nightmare, and nobody knows where the goddamn gold is. Ask Salvy and that cracker pal of his. For all I know, they cashed it in for S & H Green Stamps."

Big Bob said, "Miss Lake's right. You don't get a show like this every day."

(SAN FRANCISCO, 10:00 A.M., 4/9/42)

Blanchard crowed and groused. The Fed-probe acquittals. His domestic woes. He blew steam from Manzanar to Golden Gate Park.

"Whiskey Bill and Elmer J. That's the word. They pulled some mischief in the Fed vault. Nobody doubts that Bill Parker's smart. But he's out in the open with Kay now, and that ticks me off."

Ashida ignored him. They sat outside Kezar Stadium. Leander Frechette picked the spot. Leander will walk up. He'll ask how things stand. They'll trek memory lane.

The Alameda County Jail. Remember, Leander? You, Fritz Eckelkamp, and Wayne Frank Jackson. Your screwball alliance. You conceived a daring gold heist.

Blanchard arranged the meet. He called Frechette last night. Leander was affable. Blanchard assured him—this ain't a roust.

It's a waltz. He'll know that. His criminal actions preceded all legal cutoff dates. How's this shit stand now? That's easy. Chaos has intervened.

Blanchard said, "Parker's a pervdog. I respect him, but I don't like him. He's out to set the white man's world record for entrapping college girls. First Kay, then Big Joan. The war put a bug up his ass. His libido's overheated. He's been running roughshod since Pearl."

Ashida ignored him. Chaos has intervened. He sent the forged minutes out. Constanza Lazaro-Schmidt will receive them. Dudley Smith will read them. Dudley might note a grievous narrative lapse.

Elmer called him this morning. Elmer sobbed and begged forgiveness. He'd just heard a radio broadcast.

Eight dead in Kern County. Three sabotage attacks. Farmworker saboteurs. Mondo Díaz, in custody. Díaz, the ringleader. Wetbacks for the drudge work.

The report stunned Ashida. He'd interviewed Díaz at Hollenbeck Station. Elmer sobbed. He said he'd withheld crucial drift. The East L.A. sweep. Elmer and Buzz Meeks squeeze Frankie Carbajal. Frankie reveals the sabotage plan.

He reveals the plan under duress.

Escaped wetbacks. All torch men. Salvador A. was behind it. Dud S. didn't know shit. Elmer and Buzz withheld the lead. They'd gone rogue. The lead was their hole card. It's their redneck mea culpa now. Eight people got blown up.

Elmer sobbed and hung up the phone. Kay called a few minutes later. She'd been up to Kern. Bill Parker braced Mondo Díaz. Mondo riffed dialectic and finked the deal out.

The Kameraden pulled the sabotage. Salvador A. ordered it. He's Comrade Number One. That puto Irishman didn't know shit.

Chaos intervenes. It's hubris ascendant. Comrade Ashida perpetrates it. He plays a hunch based on a specious assumption. Salvador is not El Grande Jefe. Meyer Gelb is. The faux minutes proceed off that hunch. Comrade Ashida writes as Herr Apparatchik.

Herr Apparatchik defames Abascal. He's a cholo chump out for the gold. Herr Apparatchik ignores Comrade Hanamaka's lead. Hanamaka said the big boss is a "Mexican Stalinist." Here's a revised hunch. Abascal is that Stalinist.

The minutes go out. They are geared to spark two confrontations. Dudley versus Abascal, Dudley versus Gelb. Chaos intervenes. Dudley reads the minutes. They contradict breaking news. His wetbacks as saboteurs? Unknown to him? He might sense Salvador's hand. He might sense Salvador as El Boss Führer. He might sense the document had been faked.

Chaos intervenes. Statie goons pop Dudley at his dope ranch. Dick Carlisle shot that dizzy dish to Lee Blanchard. Dudley called Jack Horrall. Chief Jack pulled strings and got him released. Dudley's on the loose now. He's a gone-rogue Army major. He'll probably run to Constanza. He'll be with her when the minutes arrive.

Herr Apparatchik. Née Comrade Ashida. He sent the minutes out precipitously. He demanded no money. He disregarded consequences. He's culpable here.

Elmer's culpable. Buzz is culpable. They should have reported the sabotage lead. Kay's the most culpable. She's their La Jefa and queen bee. She bends men who want to fuck her to her impervious will. She assessed him as a man who declines to fuck women and adroitly massaged his love for Dudley Smith. The minutes have gone out. Dudley will know that Comrade Ashida forged them. He has the skill. No one else does. Dudley will know that he betrayed him.

Chaos intervenes. They're closing in on the klub*haus* killer. It seems like small recompense. Jean Staley and brother Robby. Johnny Shinura, curio broker. Johnny's the Jap sword man. Who's the queer jazzman? Who's the woman who got raped?

A clean solve looms. The details remain uncertain. Chaos may subsume all resolution. Winner take nothing—if he forfeits Dudley Smith's love.

Nannies pushed strollers by. Vendors pushed food carts. Storm clouds whooshed overhead.

Blanchard nudged him. "You got tears in your eyes, Hideo."

"I thought I could have something both ways, but I forgot to consider the price."

"Welcome to the world, son. Our friend Kay taught me that selfsame thing, quite a while back."

They walked and talked. Kezar to the rose garden, Stanyan Street to Fell. Ladies pushing strollers gawked them. It was relative size more than race.

Ashida was small and slight. Leander loomed high and blocked out the sun. Folks called him "Skyscraper" and the "One-Man Eclipse."

He confirmed Dr. Death's chronology. He confirmed the cabal's chain of command. Salvy was the Stalinist and Top Dog Comrade. Meyer Gelb deferred to him.

Leander was affable. He worked as a longshoreman. He eschewed agitation and indulged a yen for 459 PC. He had a wife and kid here in Frisco and a wife and three kids in L.A. He kept in mail-drop touch with select comrades. He refused to name names.

They bought ice-cream bars and lounged on the grass. Blanchard lounged twenty yards back. He was the bodyguard. Ashida ran the Q & A.

"Hanamaka told me the gold has lain fallow for some time. Gelb and Abascal are the only ones who know where it is."

Leander shook his head. "I've never known Comrade Kyoho to be mistaken about anything, but I think he's wrong here. I think Wayne Frank and the Reverend Mimms might be able to give you a more recent accounting."

"Why?"

"The Rev wanted to repo the gold, and I can't say that I blame him. I'd call him the first man among us who wised up to the way life plain old is. He'd come to see the Kameraden as a bunch of treacherous shitbirds who'd blow the whole world up if they got half a chance. All that 1931 idealism and commitment got to be ancient history, and the Rev wanted his fair share of the gold, just like any other properly self-interested man in your run-of-the-mill democracy. He heard that the Sinarquistas and some of their satellite thugs were looking for a clubhouse rental, so he had Link Rockwell rent them the 46th Street place. Link stayed on and did some infiltration. The Rev figured Link might get some leads on the gold there, which he sure as hell did. He heard Salvy and Wayne Frank took hold of the gold, not Comrade Gelb. That's as far as the Rev takes the story, because he always busts out laughing then."

Ashida said, "That's all you know? They took possession of the gold, and that's it?"

Leander winked. "The Rev's got the storytelling prowess. He can surely tell you more."

Ashida let it go. Leander ran intractable. He held his hole cards tight.

"Jean Staley. Her brother, Robby. A Japanese curio peddler named Johnny Shinura. A purportedly homosexual jazz musician. He's tall and blond, and he has a female companion, purportedly very nervous and roughly thirty years of age. The three klub*haus* victims purportedly raped her."

Leander tossed his ice-cream stick and wiped his hands on the grass. A stroller lady strolled by. She gawked the jig and the Jap.

"Jean's brother was a homo, for what that's worth. Johnny S. was bughouse crazy, but you must already know that. I don't know any woman who got raped, but the jazz quiff has got to be Chuckie Duquesne."

126

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 A.M., 4/10/42)

Ruth practiced. She played Sibelius and lit the whole courtyard. He recognized composers now. He heard concerto strains out here on the street.

Elmer fought the jimjams. He'd had the sweats and frets since he got the word. Eight Kern County dead. Him and Buzz could have stopped it. They held it back and covered their backsides.

He sobbed to Kay and Hideo. He sobbed to Buzz. He sobbed himself into these frets. He sat in his sled and waited out Sibelius. Don't interrupt Ruth. She'll bite your head off. She's caught the muse.

She fed her lovers cues. Morning practice meant Get Out. Elmer sat in his sled. He had a clear courtyard view. Some geek will exit her bungalow. Ruth sustained heavy bed traffic. Kay called her "relentless" and "egalitarian."

Elmer fought the frets. He fretted up the Kern County dead and Meyer Gelb. Buzz found Comrade Meyer. Buzz conceived a bold approach and pin-mapped that shitheel.

The hump lived in L.A. The hump had to. The hump attended Otto Klemperer's parties. He always arrived alone. Joan's diary stated that. How'd Gelb get to the parties? Let's try taxicabs.

Buzz called the Maestro. He laid out a line of officious shit and coaxed a list of party dates. He canvassed cab dispatchers then. He had the party dates and the Maestro's address. He checked evening pickup logs for dates going back to Pearl Harbor. He checked sixteen cab companies. Company seventeen—tilt.

He tagged seven parties and seven pickups in Beverly Hills. The Simon's Drive-in at Wilshire and Linden. It's a neutral pickup spot. Comrade Gelb's cautious. Comrade Gelb must live nearby.

Buzz tagged seven pickups. Buzz tagged the same hackie three of those times. Buzz braced the cat and lubed him. The hackie had good recollection. He remembered this guy. The guy had burn-scarred hands.

Buzz pounded pavement then. He made Gelb for an apartment-house dweller. The blocks south of Charleville were all house blocks. That restricted his range. He schlepped Wilshire to Charleville, Charleville to Beverly Drive. He entered apartment-house foyers. He scanned mailbox slots. He got no Meyer Gelbs and no hinky M.G.s. That approach tapped out. He ran block-to-block stakeouts then.

He car-perched and peeped doorways on Linden. He saw Gelb on stakeout night #3.

We got him pin-mapped. What's next? That's obvious. We kidnap him and turn on the heat.

Elmer eyeballed Ruth's bungalow. He had peeper tendencies. He liked to perch and watch. He saw nifty shit that way.

Sibelius diminuendoed. Babs Stanwyck breezed out Ruth's door. Note her wet hair and love-struck demeanor. Woo-woo! Round Heel Ruth rides both ways!

Babs breezed to her boss Packard coupe and peeled northbound. Elmer breezed into the courtyard. Ruth sat on her steps. She looked flustered and distractified.

"Sergeant Elmer has once again been lurking. It is a leitmotif with him. He lurks to allay his restlessness and to sate his curiosities. Sergeant Elmer is a voyeur. He should move to Berlin and join the Gestapo."

Elmer yukked. Ruth had that mordant streak. It played off-kilter now. She still played distractified.

"I liked the Sibelius."

"There was nothing to like. You are an undiscerning listener. Barn-dance music is more your métier."

Elmer sat down beside her. Their arms brushed. He felt tremors. Round Heel Ruth, electrizized.

"You seem shook up, sweetie. You'd think a sleepover with Babs would have you all pacified."

Ruth lit a cigarette. "I was at the Musicians' Local on Vine Street all night. I filled in for an absent first violin and recorded the third Bartók Quartet. Babs came by to pick up a book I'd borrowed, and to wash her hair. She enjoys my shampoo, more than she appreciates my prowess. You are ever the policeman, Elmer. You attribute motive in a most paranoic way."

Elmer laughed. "Let's hit the hay. It's been too long, and I've missed you."

Ruth X-ray-eyed him. "You've been crying. Your face is flushed and mottled, and your beady eyes are bloodshot. Am I the source of your tears? I would think a man as promiscuous as you would engage a woman such as I with more distanced affections."

Elmer teared up. Not that much. He was done in and sobbed out.

"I withheld a confession. Eight people died. I'm in some shit I can't step out of, in more ways than I can count.”

Ruth flicked her cigarette. It hit a wet grass strip and fizzled.

“Scheiss, eh? Are you in the scheiss as the Koenigs, Sandor, and I seem to be? We are facing a Federal deportation order, my callow friend. The lawyer Otto secured for us explained the motive behind it, so I will explain it to you. Your Mr. Hoover is perturbed, because our names were mentioned in a memorandum pertaining to extortion and an FBI agent under house arrest. Expulsion from the United States. Does not my scheiss exceed your scheiss, mein herr?”

Extortion. House arrest. That meant Ed the Fed Satterlee.

“I didn’t come here to brawl with you, love. I didn’t show up to compare notes on who’s got it worse, either.”

Ruth said, “You have blood on your hands. Allow me to commiserate, and add that it is not Jewish blood, and not the blood of three hundred.”

“Are we going for volume here? Is Jewish blood any better than plain old white and Mexican blood?”

Ruth wheeled and slapped him. She knocked off his hat. Her nails raked his cheek and drew blood.

Buzz said, “I’m going to kill him. Dudley Liam Smith, muerto. It’s the only way this deal makes any sense.”

Elmer relit a cigar. “This deal has never made sense, and it never will. There’s too much to it, and it goes back too far. It’s not supposed to make sense. Kay told me that, and if Kay says something, it’s true.”

Daylight stakeout. Elmer’s sled. Four eyes on 562 South Linden. This four-flat apartment house. This pink mock château. Gelb had the upstairs-left spot.

Buzz relit a cigar. “I rented a motel room, up the Ridge Route. Nice and secluded. We’ll put the blocks to El Comrade there.”

Elmer said, “Bring your pet scorpion. One look at him, and Gelb’ll shit his britches.”

Buzz scoped Elmer’s cheek. “Ellen clawed you, right? I’ve seen a couple of her pictures. She’s got that caged-tigress thing going.”

Elmer tiger-growled. “Girlfriend #4 scraped me. She’s your jungle cat.”

Buzz said, “I mixed a terp and chloral hydrate cocktail. We’ll sedate Gelb and toss him in the trunk.”

Elmer blew smoke rings. “You don’t seem too upset about those dead folks up in Kern.”

Buzz said, “Easy come, easy go. It’s not like losing your own near and dear.”

Elmer dozed. He dipped to some torrid locale. Jungle Cat Ruth scratched him. Jungle Cat Annie loved him. Jungle Cats Brenda and Ellen tossed him out in the rain. Jungle Cat Kay took him home to her glade.

Some stray cat nudged him. Elmer blinked and opened his eyes.

Buzz went Looky, looky. He pointed across the street and up. Frankie Carbajal ambled toward Comrade Gelb's place. He wore a Sir Guy shirt and loose flannels. Note the creepy-crawler tennis shoes and gun bulge.

Elmer rubbed his eyes. It's no mirage. Frankie's out of custody and up from Mexico. El Whipout Man de Sinarquismo. He's loose in Beverly Hills.

Buzz said, "We'll give him five minutes. If he comes out with Gelb, we'll grab them from behind."

Elmer said, "We'll work singles otherwise. I'll flip you for who takes Gelb."

Frankie jogged up to Gelb's door. He knocked. The door stayed shut. Frankie whipped out a set of lock picks. He had fast hands. He picked the lock and crept in. The door slammed shut.

Buzz dug out a quarter and flipped it. Elmer called heads. The quarter hit tails. Elmer went Shit.

They timed Frankie's visit. Elmer orbed his wristwatch. It ticked off two minutes flat. The door popped open. Frankie stumble-walked back out. He looked all of a sudden fright-wigged and racked with the frets.

He stumble-walked down the stairs and weaved back toward Wilshire. Elmer and Buzz piled out and foot-dogged him. They closed the gap. They closed too fast. Frankie looked back and saw them.

Buzz pulled his roscoe. Elmer pulled, likewise. Frankie pulled his waistband piece. They all got their bearings. They all dug in and aimed straight and threw shots all at once.

Frankie stood his ground. He popped two rounds. They hit parked cars and zinged wide. Elmer and Buzz ran up, shooting. Buzz cracked this Chevy's windshield and tore up the ragtop. Elmer nailed Frankie, waist-high. Frankie pitched ass over elbows and popped shots at the sky.

Elmer and Buzz ran up. Frankie sprawled, supine. Elmer kicked his gun hand. Frankie spit blood and dropped the piece. Looky-loos craned out their windows. What's this big noise about?

Buzz looked around. Frankie bit his lips and pawed at his hip wound. Elmer went Aw-oh. An old lady across the street screamed.

Elmer reholstered. Buzz grabbed Frankie's neck scruff and dragged him down the Wilshire-flank alley. Frankie wailed and flailed. Buzz looked around. Parked cars and hedgerows covered him. He shot Frankie three times in the head.

Muzzle job. Frankie spilled the sabotage lead. Dead men tell no—

Elmer wheeled and ran. He ran to the mock château and stumble-tripped up the stairs. He kicked the door off the hinge plates. It caved in and crashed upside Meyer Gelb's legs.

He's flat on his back. He's been tortured. There's congealed cuts on his arms and his neck. There's a bullet hole in his forehead. It's small caliber. The blood's dried maroon.

Elmer prowled the room. The walls were plastered with pix of Boss Man Hitler and Butcher Stalin. Note the scrawled-up margins. It's all weird shit about fires and storms.

127

The plaza newsstand hawked the L.A. papers. The Herald headlined the Fed-probe acquittals. They ran the snuff piece, page two.

BEVERLY HILLS SHOOT-OUT! POLICE KILL SUBVERSIVE! MAN SLAYS COMMUNIST BOSS!

Dudley stood by Constanza's PO box. He read the snuff piece three times. Sid Hudgens inked it. Jackson and Meeks blew up Frankie Carbajal. Frankie torture-slashed and shot Meyer Gelb. "'Gelb snuff open and shut,' B.H. cops state."

Constanza was late. Like Salvy was late. Like Welles was late. People stood him up now. People sandbagged him and jailed him. People ignored his phone calls.

Hideo was nowhere. He was AWOL himself. He'd bolted the squadroom and relinquished his command. Jack Horrall bailed him out. The Staties seized his biz fronts. Jack told him to lay low in Baja. "We're holding your job for you, Dud. The PD's your home, and always will be. Poke some señoritas, and work on your tan."

Constanza was late. She said she'd meet him at 9:00. She was expecting a package. From Russia, no less.

From a "Comrade Dimitri." A package of "grave import." Constanza spoke in riddles now. She ignored him in bed. His squadroom outburst and jail stint provoked the retreat. She patronized him. She urged him to buck up and fly right.

Dudley chain-smoked. He reread the Herald piece. Sid Hudgens, ubiquitous. Sid's scandal rag slandered him. It was true drift, regardless. He called Sid and left a message with the copy chief. Sid ignored his call.

Constanza showed. She ran a sorry-I'm-late number and kissed him on the cheek. Put some oomph in it, you chola whore. I'm still Dudley Smith.

She unlocked her box. Two packages were crammed in. One rolled package. One flat package. The rolled package was V-mail-stickered and Russian-postage-stamped. It was addressed to Comrade C. Lazaro-Schmidt.

The flat package was ruler-marked. Straight edges, right angles, no cursive exposed. It was sent from Bev's Switchboard. It's the minutes, dear Lord.

They read in Constanza's bedroom. The text was Russian and German. Constanza was fluent in both. The paper looked authentic. The seal looked authentic. The Nazi eagle and Russian bear were conjoined as one beast. The Wolf disapproved.

Constanza read him through the text. Inconsistencies accrued. Dudley considered them. Constanza read him through again. Dudley nailed a basic falsehood.

The text read wrong, overall. It stooped to defamation. It defamed Salvy Abascal as it exalted Meyer Gelb. It plainly stated Salvy's presence at the confab. That was patently untrue. Dudley plumbed connective threads and nailed the source.

Joan Conville. She reads a tract Salvy wrote. It was sent to the klub*haus.* It critiqued more than praised the Baja confab. The minutes ridiculed Salvy. He loved the British monarchy. He hated the Irish. He despised Catholicism. He wished to appropriate the Baja rackets. He needed a ruthless American front man for this.

Joan reads the tract. She tells him about it. She tells Hideo Ashida. The basic falsehoods of these minutes germinate there.

The minutes have been forged. They were retroactively composed and geared to provoke confrontation. Salvy is underestimated. The forger lays out divisive fodder. He seeks to spark a Smith-Abascal war. His duplicitous design reveals itself here:

The sabotage incursion. It violates D. L. Smith's no-sabotage decree. Salvy declines to ride north with the wetback saboteurs. It underlines D. L. Smith's jailhouse revelation. Salvy is Comrade #1.

He is locked-in fucking certain of it. These minutes were composed and sent before the attacks. They exposit a preattack assertion.

Meyer Gelb is Comrade #1. He believes it. Hideo Ashida believes it. A second confrontation is provoked here. It's D. L. Smith versus Comrade Gelb. The forger cannot foresee the attacks or Comrade Gelb's death. Genius is one thing. Prescience is another. The minutes are brilliantly conceived and executed. The technical skill. The boldness and glibness. Hideo Ashida forged the minutes. Hideo Ashida betrayed him and trashed his deep love.

Dudley said, "They're a fake. It's Hideo Ashida's work. He's the only one capable of it."

Constanza said, “Betrayal does not occur in a vacuum. Ashida had to have help. You will notice that my brother is not mentioned in this document. The omission is deliberate. Ashida wants to protect Juan. First he rapes me and pimps me to his Kameraden. Now he attempts to rape you. Dry your wet eyes, my frail darling. Kill Juan in my name. Kill him before I cease to love you.”

El Governor always worked late. Constanza told him that. He worked at home and at the Baja Government Palace. Go by the palace. Look for a fourth-floor light burning. He might be there. He might be at home.

Dudley drove by the palace. No fourth-floor light burned. He brought his gold bayonet. Constanza decreed death by blade.

They’d sniffed cocaine and made love. She encouraged him. She urged him to seek her favor and atone for his recent sloth. She bundled him off with the Wolf.

Dudley drove by the house. Juan’s office light burned. A winding footpath led to a backdoor. Juan kept it unlocked. Constanza told him that.

He parked streetside. He consulted the Wolf. They discussed political and romantic alliance. Constanza had coupled with Salvy and Kyoho Hanamaka. She admitted the liaisons. She did not withhold love affairs past. Lovers past withheld from her. They withheld the truth of the gold. She knew no more than he did. The Wolf told him that.

Dudley left the car unlocked. The Wolf walked point. He sniffed the footpath and low-growled. They hooked around to the back door. Dudley swung the bayonet and mauled rosebushes and shrubs.

The door stood ajar. They entered the house. Turn right and then left. Constanza told him that. “Juan never shuts his office door. He’ll look up from his desk and see you. I know him as a sister and lover does.”

They followed her dictates. They stepped into the office. Constanza failed them here. The office was lit bright. There was no Juan.

Dudley dropped the bayonet. The Wolf cocked his head. Dudley walked to Juan’s desk. A note had been placed on the blotter. Juan employed an elegant cursive. It covered a single sheet.

April 11, 1942

Dear Major Smith,

She will convince you to kill me sooner or later. Having no wish to die, I have resigned my governor’s position and have flown to Havana. I will remain there for the war’s duration. You have mutilated me, but I will not let you kill me.

Terry Lux has allayed the marks of your mutilation, and we had quite the chat about you. I brought up your union with Constanza; Terry found the notion perturbing.

"Those two only love efficaciously," he said. "Dudley must be after more than Constanza's favors. Don't tell me. He's heard about the gold, and has fixed upon your luscious sister as integral to the prize."

We laughed ourselves silly. I won't shilly-shally here—Terry's a long-standing Kamerad. He's heard about the gold. He's coveted it, and dismissed it as so much piffle in much the same manner as the rest of us have. Terry turned serious at this point. He said, "What was Constanza after? She's as jaded on the gold front as you and I."

I said, "She wants Dudley to kill me." Terry replied, "Go somewhere safe, Juan. Dud will go to outrageous lengths to appease women. He's quite the child in that regard."

I'll close now, and head to the airfield. Has Constanza told you that I raped her and took her as my incestuous child bride? The truth is altogether more subtly complicitous than that.

All best,

J. Lazaro-Schmidt

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 A.M., 4/12/42)

Claire was off at Mass. She intended to pick Joan Klein up at Otto's place and bring her back here for a visit. Young Joan had a surprise for us; it entailed the piano in Claire's suite. I had joyous notions about that surprise—but the swirl of what I now call All of It ruled my thoughts.

I enjoyed the view from Claire's terrace. The setting was lovely; the passing parade was provocative. Terry Lux walked Saul Lesnick by a few minutes ago; a doddering Jim Davis had preceded them. All of It. Supporting cast glimpses. Joan Conville's All One Story.

Elmer, Hideo, and I conferred on the phone, at least once a day. I was kept up to speed on All of It and shared the information with Bill. Meyer Gelb, once Fritz Eckelkamp, had been murdered. Elmer and Buzz shot and killed the fleeing Frankie Carbajal. The Beverly Hills PD made Frankie for the homicide. Elmer saw the body and thinks otherwise.

The corpse was stiff-cold. The torture cuts had congealed. Elmer talked to Dr. Nort Layman. Dr. Nort had performed the postmortem; he tagged the time of death as 2:00 a.m. Elmer found the body at 11:30. Dr. Nort removed a .25-caliber bullet. The cause of death: one small-bore gunshot wound to the head. The postmortem exonerated Frankie Carbajal. The Beverly Hills cops liked him, regardless. A Mex fascist kills a Communist. Cops slay the slayer. It played nicely open-and-shut.

The Carbajal shooting troubled Elmer. It came on the heels of the sabotage revelations. Frankie had pretipped Elmer and Buzz. They sat on the lead. Then Frankie appears and enlivens their stakeout. Elmer may confirm my hunch or play it mum. Buzz killed Frankie in cold blood. It silenced Frankie. He could not snitch the held-back lead now. His death bought Elmer and Buzz a skate.

What they hath wrought. What we have all precipitated.

The forged minutes have gone out. Constanza Lazaro-Schmidt must have received them; Dudley must have read them. How will he react? The minutes pushed him toward Meyer Gelb and Salvador Abascal. Dudley could not have killed Gelb. He was ensconced in Baja and did not know where to find him. Gelb was killed by a small-bore weapon. Dudley employed big-bore weaponry.

Thad Brown passed Bill a tip. Jack Horrall had issued an ultimatum. Dudley has one week to turn himself in or suffer PD-sanctioned reprisals. Call-Me-Jack has sought outside-agency help here. A Federal posse stands on call. Postal inspectors and Treasury agents. Ex–Texas Rangers. The hard boys who took down the Ma Barker mob, along with Bonnie and Clyde.

What fate hath wrought. What we have all precipitated.

Dudley might go after Salvador. Dudley might deem the minutes a ruse and comport circumspectly. Dudley might surmise that Hideo Ashida forged the minutes. What Hideo hath wrought, in the name of love. What early-wartime L.A. has done to us all.

I heard voices out on the walkway. Young Joan sounded gleeful; Claire kept going Ssshhh, people sleep late on Sunday. The terrace door swung open; Joan saw me and crashed into me and waved a poster tube.

I noted the V-mail sticker and Russian postage stamps; I saw that the tube had been resent by Constanza Lazaro-Schmidt. Confluence. Comrade Shostakovich to a fascist seductress to Maestro Klemperer. What this war hath wrought. Otto could now upstage Maestro Toscanini and stage his benefit show.

We ran inside. We crash-landed the piano and pulled out the score. I sight-read my way through it and isolated the best three-handed part. It was the tanks-approaching-Leningrad passage that Otto had already played for me. Claire arrayed the appropriate sheets on the music stand; Joan sat down at the bench between us. We were the just-formed Dry-out Farm Trio. We poised our hands over the keys. Claire gave the downbeat.

Boom, boom, boom. Nazi tanks circle Leningrad. It was bluntly ominous music that made us all roar. We hit true notes and flubbed notes and laughed through it all. Boom, boom, boom. What life hath wrought. How did I get this pigshit lucky? I'm a rogue prairie girl from Sioux Falls.

(LOS ANGELES, 1:00 P.M., 4/12/42)

Coffee klatch. Crash Squad alumni, at loose ends. Lyman's back room, now moribund.

The alums kicked their chairs back and got cozy. Ashida, Lee Blanchard, Buzz Meeks.

Buzz sipped coffee. "BHPD likes Carbajal for the Gelb job. Elmer and me are breathing a big sigh of relief."

Blanchard sipped coffee. "Dr. Nort disagrees."

Ashida sipped coffee. "I gave Elmer Frechette's lead on Chuckie Duquesne. He's on his way up to the Musicians' Local right now."

Buzz said, "Elmer's a busy bee. He told me he went by Johnny Shinura's building and did some shinnying up a drainpipe. Johnny's roost had been cleaned out, but he found two bedrolls on the third floor. He figures Johnny and Chuckie were hiding out there, up until the Feds seized the place."

Blanchard lit a cigarette. "If Chuckie's our queer white boy, then who's the woman who got raped? Joe Hayes says that's our motive, right there."

The back room oozed sloth. Ashida tidied up. He straightened the report boards and emptied ashtrays. He tossed stale cold cuts. He dumped booze empties.

Buzz lit a cigar. "I caught Jack Horrall and Brenda A. going at it here. The '36 Olympics were on the radio. Jack's a floor man from way back."

Blanchard said, "Hideo's due back at Manzanar. I'm driving him up."

Buzz tossed a paper sack. Ashida snagged it on the fly. Buzz said, "I almost forgot. Elmer snatched this from Shinura's place. He wanted Hideo to see it."

Ashida emptied the sack. Leather strangling gloves fell out.

Black leather. Fetishistic. A Weimar Berlin and red-light Tokyo item. Palm-weighted. One size fits all.

Buzz whistled. Blanchard went oooh-la-la. Ashida held the gloves up.

"They explain the single-hand-span bruises on the victims' necks. All the killer had to do was apply moderate pressure. The palm weights would do the rest."

Buzz said, "Hideo's theorizing here."

Blanchard said, "As theories go, I like it. It fits Hideo's man-woman theory. The man holds the ice pick and keeps our guys immobilized, while the woman applies the elbow grease."

Buzz waved his cigar. "I'll bite. But who is this crazy ginch?"

The Teletype tapped-tapped and furled paper. Blanchard tore it off the spool.

"M. L. Mimms is back from his rouse-the-natives tour. Two airport cops saw him get off the late New York flight. The Navy JA's kicked Link Rockwell loose. He was on the same flight as the Rev."

He saw Dudley everywhere. Cri de coeur. He saw him conjured and unbidden. All men looked like him. No man looked like him. Je m'excuse, pour ma trahison.

Ashida cabbed southbound. The hackie You're a Jap'd him. Ashida shut his eyes and saw Dudley. The cab passed through darktown. Je ne te verrai pas blessé.

Kay pledged him the Mimms interview. It secured their forgery deal. She stipulated a co-interviewer and suggested Elmer. He tried to find Elmer. He called the DB and Brenda's house. Elmer was out. He called Kay's place and got no answer. He tried the Musicians' Local. He asked if a Sergeant Jackson had been by. Sergeant Jackson was looking for a horn man named Chuckie Duquesne.

The clerk said, "No, but that's an odd coincidence. An Army major named Smith called and asked for Chuckie's address, which I sure don't have. This major was some mick with a brogue. He told me a nutso story about how he identified Chuckie from some smut film that Orson Welles showed him. I told him Chuckie's a clandestine sort of guy, but he'll be gigging at the Taj Mahal tonight. Orson Welles himself. Don't that take all?"

The hackie cruised Central Avenue. They hit a midday traffic lull. Ashida steered him by the klub*haus.* It was a flat vacant lot now. Jordan High footballers scrimmaged. They were colored. The white coach looked like Dudley Smith.

The hackie U-turned back to Central. There's the jazz strip. Club Alabam, Port Afrique, Club Zombie. The façades have been refitted. Rioters had torched cars and business fronts. He killed two of them. Dudley Smith killed many more.

The cab dropped him at 48th Street. The Congregation of the Congo hogged half a block. A wide storefront with wide picture windows. Easel-propped window art.

Colored pilgrims in Africa. They rode lions and zebras and boiled white folks alive. The Rev offered steerage and deluxe passage rates. The USS Negro sailed monthly.

Ashida walked in. White janitors dusted the pews and swept the aisles. The Rev and Link Rockwell stood by the pulpit. Link wore Navy khakis. Both men smoked corncob pipes.

They saw Ashida. Looks flew, bilateral. He's that Jap cop.

Ashida walked up. Both men grinned. Both men proffered handshakes. Both men jut-jawed their pipes.

Rockwell said, "Leander told us you might drop by."

The Rev said, "Dr. Ashida's hipped on the gold. I don't think I'm being precipitous by stating that. Will you give him a gander, Link?"

Rockwell went After you. Ashida trudged a short hallway. The Rev trailed him. Rockwell opened a closet door and pulled a light cord.

Hosanna. At long last. Come let us adore it. Behold the sacred vault. It's a good-sized closet. Gold bars are stacked floor to chest-high.

The Rev chortled. "Too bad it's not real. If you've got a moment, Link will elaborate."

Rockwell said, "As Leander told you, the Rev had me infiltrate the klub*haus.* I made friends with the late Frankie Carbajal, who had developed quite a dislike for his onetime hermano, Salvador Abascal, along with his close friend, Wayne Frank Jackson. Frankie coveted the gold, which was then believed to be in the possession of the late Meyer Gelb and Señor Abascal. The late Frankie put together some leads and learned that the gold was stashed in a bank safe-deposit vault in San Diego. The Rev and I brought in Ed Satterlee then. Ed secured a seizure writ that allowed him to secure the gold and sequester it in a nearby warehouse. I flew the gold up to L.A., and the Rev brought in a metallurgist to weigh the bars and calculate their value. He was the one who determined that they were all fake."

The Rev kicked at the bars. The Rev jabbed his pipe at Ashida.

"Cast iron, and thick-gold-plated. Formed to exactly resemble and weigh the same as solid-gold bars. Even the mint markings match, down to a tee. The bars were designed to fool the naked eye, and no more than that."

Ashida grabbed a bar and hefted it. He'd held a real bar. The fake bar was indistinguishable.

"The robbery itself. The chain of possession and levels of dispersal. Did factionalism occur? The robbery preceded all known accounts of the forming of the Kameraden. I have a well-developed theory, and I'm wondering if you'll confirm or refute it."

The Rev winked. Link Rockwell winked. Mr. Moto's got the floor. Both men jut-jawed their pipes.

"Leander walked the bars off the train. He portrayed the dumb Negro kid. The Reverend Mimms portrayed a colored sleeping-car porter. Kyoho Hanamaka portrayed a Japanese chauffeur, and Wayne Frank Jackson portrayed a white swell, perched in a limousine. Salvador portrayed a Mexican youth, hovering in the background. Skin color as disguise. Racial prejudice as a means of obfuscation. The switch was accomplished in that manner."

The Rev bowed. "You left out Eddie Leng and Don Matsura. They were in on the job. They played Oriental train-yard workers. They also helped out with the escapes and the track-switch snafus."

Rockwell said, "Otherwise, you're right with Eversharp."

Ashida said, "The initial cadre of Kameraden was formed at Dresden Polytechnic. Kyoho Hanamaka underplayed its importance to me. Abascal gave a speech, and Carbajal, Pimentel, Jamie, and Hayes heard the message. The Spanish Civil War loomed. The big war loomed, and Salvador saw it as a fait accompli. He prophesied the Hitler-Stalin pact and Hitler's ultimate abrogation. The idea of a left-right postwar alliance took hold and flourished intellectually. The initial heist conspirators—Eckelkamp-Gelb, Wayne Frank, Leander, Salvador, Hanamaka, the Reverend Mimms, Leng, and Matsura—were watching gold prices escalate and waiting out the statute of limitations on the robbery. The statute clock stopped on May 18, 1940. The original conspirators were caught up in the crazy politics of upcoming war, but not to the extent of the Dresden Poly boys. The boys had been to Spain, the Fatherland, and Russia. Kyoho and Salvador had spent time there, and forged connections. High-level Nazis and Soviets knew the war would go bad for them, as early as the late '30s. Salvador and Kyoho exploited their fear, and proposed the Baja conference of November '40. The gold lured the bigwigs in. They capitulated to Abascal's vision of postwar alliance, but the gold cinched the deal."

The Rev bowed. Rockwell said, "Right with Eversharp."

Ashida said, "You were perpetrating a shell game. The gold achieved the status of an open secret and a wet dream. Your informal alliance grew as the war loomed that much more palpably close. Kyoho and Meyer Gelb went back to the heist and the fire. They were Communists and arsonists and God knows what else together. Saul Lesnick signed on from the Left. He was in Gelb's CP cell. Ed Satterlee played tangential to the heist. He signed on in a fix-it man capacity. Jim Davis signed on from the Right. Salvador killed priest-killers at Meyer's behest. It all blew chaotically out of proportion. Idiot ideologues shot their mouths off, and rumors spread. Terry Lux, Lin Chung, Wendell Rice, and George Kapek. The Lazaro-Schmidts, Villareal-Caiz, crazy Bundists, Reds, and Sinarquistas. Come, one and all. We'll survive this war or we won't. The bigwigs were over in Russia and Germany, engaged in a fight for their everyday survival. They had no idea that the original conspirators had no intention of sharing the gold with them, after postwar gold prices had skyrocketed. Factionalism and personal rivalries raged within the original robbery band. Rancor fell short of fatality. The chain of possession shifted along those lines as gold prices and war catastrophe escalated. Salvador Abascal succeeded Meyer Gelb as the Kameraden's top dog. The title is surely meaningless, if illustrative of how deep this self-deluded madness goes. Salvador got the job because he was in the original robbery band and because he recruited the Dresden Poly boys. The Nazi bigwigs loved him because they thought he was a fascist. The Soviet bigwigs loved him because they considered him a Red, and because he'd slaughtered Trotskyites. The Rev's got his back-to-Africa con. Gelb was extorting Jewish refugees that the Kamerad-Nazis had cut loose. You're all criminals first, and ideologues a distant second. You'll split the gold on Armistice Day, and you'll sell out the comrades overseas to the highest intelligence-agency bidder."

The Rev went whew. Rockwell wiped his face with a handkerchief.

Ashida wiped his face. "Here's a prudent guess. Wayne Frank shipped the real gold to Switzerland, right after the Baja wingding."

The Rev said, "Mr. and Mrs. Ashida didn't raise any dumb kids."

Rockwell said, "I met some real hot dogs at the wingding. I got Ernst Kaltenbrunner and Anastas Mikoyan's autographs."

The Rev jabbed his pipe. "Take a bar with you, Doctor. Makes a swell paperweight."

(LOS ANGELES, 4:00 P.M., 4/12/42)

Peep job. Girlfriend #4 evinced hinky behavior. That mandates brainwork and eyeball scrutiny.

Elmer peeped Ruth's courtyard. He car-lounged. He popped bennies and gargled Old Crow. 1 plus 1 equals 2. He pondered a quick-toss B and E.

He'd gone by the Musicians' Local. A clerk fed him a hot lead on Chuckie Duquesne. Chuckie, aka "Kid Lightning." He was gigging at the Taj Mahal tonight.

The Taj. A *coon*verted garage at 28th and Budlong. He schmoozed the clerk and got her phone number. She just loooooved policemen. He brought up his friend Ruth Szigeti. She played the violin. She recorded a Bartók piece, here at the Local. That was three nights back. The quartet worked dusk to dawn.

The clerk went nix. She worked the late shift that night. No such quartet passed through.

That's 0 plus 1 equals 1. Add this to that:

Ruth lied to him. Ruth came off flustered that last time they gassed. He talked to Nort Layman. Dr. Nort autopsied Meyer Gelb. Dr. Nort confirmed his I Was There/I Saw The Stiff call.

Gelb was cold. Frankie Carbajal didn't snuff him. Nort fixed the TOD as 2:00 a.m. The torture cuts were inflicted postmurder. Said cuts were all fussy. It felt like a squeamish-woman job. The small-bore gun, the cuts, the prissy gestalt. Cherchez la fucking femme.

1 plus 1 equals 2. 2 plus 2 equals 4. Gelb was a shakedown man. He extorted Ruth and her refugee chums. He victimized Ruth. La Ruth brooked no shit from man or beast. That's 4 plus 4 equals 8. 8 equals confirm or refute.

Bennies and booze equals pins and needles and juiced-up intent. Elmer got out and breezed through the courtyard. It was pin-drop quiet. Ruth's door was locked.

He got out his pick set. He pulled a thin-edge pick and jabbed the keyhole.

He pushed deep and rode the door in.

He shut the door. The front room looked okay. No hink details jabbed him. He walked through the kitchen. It smelled like fried eggs. Ruth left her breakfast dishes out. No hink details jabbed him.

He shinnied through the bedroom and checked out the porch. A taut clothesline ran through it. Damp clothes were pinned on.

Two brassieres. One camisole. One pinned-up white blouse. Spots down the front of it. Almost removed. Blood red fades to pale pink.

Elmer cut back to the bedroom. He'd slept with Ruth here. He knew the layout. He went straight for the one chest of drawers.

The top drawer featured underwear. He ran a hand through it. The middle drawer featured scarves and folded skirts. He ran a hand through it. His hand hit metal. He pulled a small revolver out.

A purse gun. .25-caliber. A five-shot cylinder. 1 plus 1 equals 2.

Elmer sniffed the barrel. He caught cordite fumes. He broke the cylinder. He saw one shell gone.

The front door jiggled. Stacked heels tapped the floor. He caught cigarette smoke and bath scent.

She walked straight to the bedroom. He gave her a heartbeat to see him. She stopped short. He turned around.

She wore a flower-print dress and a mousy cardigan. He held up the gun. She grabbed an ashtray off the bookcase and crushed her cigarette.

"So?"

"So, why?"

"So, what can one more death mean to me now?"

Elmer shook his head. "You'll have to do better than that. I don't want to hear 'the war made me do it.' "

Ruth said, "He called me and ordered me to his apartment. He ordered me to lure Otto Klemperer into my bed and make him admit his Communist Party allegiance. I told him that he had created enough chaos, and condemned him for the idiotic ideals his idiotic alliance had foisted upon us. I was enraged in that moment. I demanded the gold that I had heard so many rumors of. I told him that I would use it to ransom Jews out of Germany. He said, 'Why should I care about Jews?' I knew he was Fritz Eckelkamp then, and that was when I shot him."

She was touch-me close. He smelled her breath and counted her gray hairs.

"It's a gas-chamber job. You'd do better with a jealous-lover plea."

"What will you do?"

Elmer said, "I don't know."

The Taj was unlicensed and nouveau-swank. It was couched behind a house row. Four garages got bulldozed and comprised one cabaret. The refurb job was par excellent.

You had booths, tables, and a raised bandstand. There's an ebony bar and blue-flocked wallpaper. It's a boss swami's playpen.

You had standard booze and bootleg booze. There's absinthe and Everclear. You've got colored waitresses in saris. The Taj welcomes a race-mixed clientele.

Elmer and Buzz showed early. They grabbed a prime wallside booth. They figured they'd take Chuckie backstage. Chuckie foxed them there. He was onstage with his sidemen already. Chuckie played bass sax. A white dink played trombone. A black hepcat played fluegelhorn.

Chuckie was tall and blond. He ran six-two and 140, tops. He sported a ducks-ass haircut. He wore zoot pants and a plaid Sir Guy shirt.

Buzz craved results. Let's move now. Elmer nixed it. Let's wait. Johnny Shinura might show. A Chuckie's gal-pal type might materialize.

The Taj filled up. A good crowd filtered in. They snatched the wallside booths and floor tables. They swarmed the bar. They flirted and gassed. They craved Le Jazz Hot and distraction.

Elmer and Buzz drank Green Lizards. Their swell waitress made them as cops. Green Lizards were 151 rum and crème de menthe. Buzz was half-tanked. Elmer was benzified out of his gourd. Killer Ruth ruled his thoughts.

The combo tuned up. Kid Lightning and his Bolts from the Blue. They honked and blatted. The blue motif prevailed. Blue spotlights lit them up.

The low ceiling trapped cigarette smoke. Elmer and Buzz orbed the premises. Where's Sword Man Johnny? Where's the Gal Pal? Elmer watched the door. Oooga-booga. Dudley Smith walked in.

Elmer nudged Buzz and pointed over. Looky, looky. Dud wore civvies and looked whippet thin.

Buzz clenched up. Dud walked to the bar. He ordered a drink and glanced around. Elmer and Buzz were perched off aways. Dud didn't see them. Dud eyed the bandstand and Chuckie D.

The Bolts tuned up. Chuckie's king-sized sax weighed him down. Elmer watched the door. Race-mix cliques filed in. Hideo Ashida followed them.

Elmer nudged Buzz and pointed over. Looky, looky. Buzz saw Ashida. Hideo stood barside. He saw Dudley. Elmer and Buzz caught that, plain. Dud was preoccupied. He missed Ashida and eyeballed Chuckie D.

The music wasn't music. It was fucking noise stew. Elmer killed his drink and watched the door. Where's the gal pal? What does she look like? Fuck—Johnny Shinura walked in.

Elmer saw him. Buzz saw him. They swapped oooga-booga looks. Ashida saw Johnny. Elmer caught that. Dud missed Johnny altogether. He sipped his drink and eye-drilled Chuckie D.

Ashida stood upside the pay phone. He eye-clicked Dud to Johnny. Jap Johnny stood tiptoed and waved his arms at the bandstand. Chuckie caught it and unstrapped his sax.

Chuckie tromped Johnny's way. Dud caught it. He unbuttoned his coat and touched his belt piece. Oooga-booga. A colored doorman braced Johnny. Hit the road, Tojo. We don't seat no Japs.

Ashida crouched by the pay phone. The doorman missed him. Johnny pitched a fit. I'm an American, Sambo. You're just some nigger to me.

Folks looked over. Folks hubbubbed. Johnny pitched that loud fit. The doorman pulled a waistband sap and swung it. Johnny pulled a hip piece.

He drilled the doorman. Two shots echoed. The doorman collapsed and convulsed. Folks started screaming.

Chuckie flinched. Chuckie did this big double take. Chuckie made the big man at the bar.

Dud caught it. They drew down simultaneous and fired point-blank. Chuckie blew out a shelf of booze bottles. Dud shot muzzle-tight. Chuckie's face blew up, muzzle-burned. His hair shot flames.

Buzz froze and unfroze. Elmer froze and unfroze. They stood up and unholstered late-late. Ashida stumbled toward Dudley. Elmer and Buzz aimed and let fly.

More bottles exploded. Elmer shot high and off left. Buzz nailed Johnny. Sword man pitched back and shot back. His shots hit high and off right.

Elmer braced his gun hand and aimed real careful now. He triggered in on Dudley Smith and squeezed off two perfect shots. He caught a blur simultaneous. He saw Ashida's suit coat. He blew Ashida up against Dudley. They toppled bar stools and crashed to the floor, all tangled up.

Elmer screamed. Buzz crashed tables and ran to the bar. Johnny slumped up against it. He'd dropped his piece. He was gut-shot and woozed. Buzz shot him straight in the face.

The whole room screamed. Elmer screamed over it. He kicked screamers out of the way and pushed to the bar. Ashida's suit coat was powder-scorched and tattered. He'd bled up the floor. Dudley sobbed and held him tight.

FOUR DEAD IN NITECLUB BLASTOUT!!!!!

Hero Cops Prevail in Juice-Joint Holocaust!!!!!

An ill wind blew the blues last nite, at the noxious near-southside nitespot, the Taj Mahal. It's unlicensed; it's unsanitary; it serves bilious booze and jittery jazz out of season. It caters to caustic cats and kittens, and a catastrophic convergence has caused it to close its doors for good.

Police Sergeants Elmer V. Jackson and Turner "Buzz" Meeks appeared, hot on the trail of jazz jackal Charles "Chuckie" Duquesne, and his jackalesque Jap henchman, John Kimoji Shinura—suspects in the baffling "klub*haus*" slayings of January 29. Policemen Wendell Rice and George Kapek were killed, along with their savvy Sancho Panza, Arturo "Archie" Archuleta. Sergeants Jackson and Meeks tracked Duquesne and Shinura to the tempestuous Taj, where four fearsome fates fatally intervened.

Enter legendary Police Sergeant Dudley L. Smith, currently on leave to serve with the Army's crack Secret Intelligence Service. Enter Hideo Ashida, the PD's crack forensic chemist and sly sleuth, who puts Charlie Chan and Mr. Moto to shame. They were on the Jackal and Johnny the Jap's trail, as well. Enter the Taj Mahal's tipsy doorman, Willis "Big Daddy" Gordean. Shots shattered the smoke-smacked air as the Bolts from the Blue blasted onstage. The police contingent made their move, and Duquesne, Shinura, Ashida, and Gordean lay dead. Colored canary Loretta McKee caught the two killers' dying declarations and last words. "They were in awful bad shape, and on their way out," she said. "But I managed to hear what they were mumbling."

And, what's that, our sepia songbird?

"Chuckie said, 'I am the klub*haus* killer,' and 'Man, what a gas.' Johnny said, 'Viva Hirohito' and 'Pearl Harbor was cool.' "

Infamous last words, dear reader. But here's our heroic happy ending. Police Chief C. B. "Jack" Horrall has stamped the coruscating klub*haus* job "Case Closed." Mayor Fletch Bowron will bestow the Los Angeles Civic Service Award on Hideo Ashida, posthumously. Elmer Jackson and Buzz Meeks will be feted with the Los Angeles Police Department's Medal of Valor. Citing nervous exhaustion, Sergeant Dudley Smith has resigned his Army commission and is now recuperating at a swank beachside retreat.

Niteclub Blastout to wartime exile. Official forfeiture and unofficial censure. Malibu is rarely intemperate. He goes back with Terry Lux. The Wolf carries news from the outside world.

Deals were struck. Jack Horrall brokered them. The Staties commandeered his biz fronts. He resigned his Army commission and will not be court-martialed. He will not be prosecuted for his misjudged stateside misconduct. Here's a cheeky footnote: "Sepia Songbird" Loretta McKee is DA Bill McPherson's girlfriend.

The Baja authorities will not seek indictments. Terry's dry-out farm is not Folsom or San Quentin. He enjoys a grand suite of rooms. They remain locked at all times, and thus constitute custody. Two-man guard teams police him. He's permitted late-night strolls around the property. His guards eavesdrop on his chats with the Wolf. They consider him whimsically insane.

Meyer Gelb is dead. The true killer remains unknown. El Salvy remains at large. Jack H. has implied that he will be sternly rebuked. Mexican cops have been charged to infiltrate the Sinarquistas and disrupt them from within. Ed Satterlee remains under house arrest and has cut immunity deals. Monsignor Joe Hayes has been granted immunity. Wallace Jamie has divested his financial interest in Bev's Switchboard and has pledged to leave L.A. The klub*haus* job has been officially stamped a clean solve. Chuckie Duquesne's woman friend remains unidentified.

Jim Davis and Saul Lesnick also bunk at Terry's farm. Lesnick resides in a locked ward and is prone to screaming fits. The gold remains unfound. Postal inspectors grabbed Bev Shoftel and arrested her on eighty-four counts of felony mail fraud. Treasury agents raided mail drops in twelve U.S. cities. The comrades-Kameraden have been nullified to the point of extinction. Jack H. was blunt here. Bill Parker told him the whole story. A ragtag band of opposed comrades engineered the coup. Parker, Elmer Jackson, Buzz Meeks. Kay Lake—most spectacularly.

Claire has kicked morphine. She'll leave the farm soon. Constanza joined her brother in Havana. She plays in a string quartet there. Terry said they've received a recording contract with RCA Victor. Resourceful Constanza. She's taken Cuban strongman Prío Socarrás as her inaugural lover.

He spends his time reading and contemplating his ultimate release. He'll remain a policeman as long as Jack Horrall remains Chief. He plays the Bruckner symphonies. Otto Klemperer's interpretations hold him spellbound. He plays Tristan und Isolde most obsessively. Kirsten Flagstad sings the latter part. He listens and transmogrifies her to Kay Lake.

He sips mint juleps with Jim Davis. Chief Jim is lucid on one topic only. The Fifth Column is everywhere but rarely achieves coherence. It's no more than an amalgam of mischief-minded souls hooked on current dangerous ideas. Jim mentioned a pervert party, back in '39. Salvy noticed you then, Dud. He was there, but he was costumed and masked up. He had plans for you from that time on. He's not really a fascist. He's a Stalinist. He killed those priest-killers because they were Trotskyites. It's a wild and fucked-up world, ain't it?

Yes, it certainly is. And he must absent himself for a spell.

He needs rest. He's earned this interval of meditative renewal. He's a privileged dry-out-farm inmate. Kwan's Chinese Pagoda caters his meals. Special chop suey cartons conceal opium. Uncle Ace visits him often. They guardedly discuss their postwar plans.

The Wolf sleeps at the foot of his bed. Their dialogue takes in the world and the cosmos. They mourn their most dear Hideo Ashida.

He misses Hideo. He snipped a lock of his hair in the ambulance that transported him to the morgue. Hideo's betrayal does not trouble him one whit. The great gift of Hideo himself renders it small.

Hideo was put to rest at Manzanar. He wires graveside flowers each week. He sent condolence notes to his mother and brother and got thank-you notes back. He keeps the lock of hair in a Japanese lacquered box.

His bedroom window overlooks a tree-lined walkway. He keeps vigilant watch for Kay Lake. She wears cashmere dresses and heather-toned skirts. Her eyes are so dark brown that they're black.

Stunning girl, I can't begin to imagine your fate.

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 A.M., 4/27/42)

A certain Kamerad was due. I expected her to be prompt and to be candidly forthcoming. It took a great deal of effort to ascertain her identity and determine her whereabouts at the time of the klub*haus* killings.

I sat on a walkway bench near Claire's bungalow. I was within view of Dudley's locked domicile. Extensive records checks and cross-checks brought me here. I began pulling paper in the wake of the Niteclub Blastout. The Blastout was a local sensation. Elmer Jackson was its most auspicious surviving casualty. His stray shots killed Hideo Ashida. He aimed at Dudley Smith, fully intending to kill him. He told me this and told no one else. The papers pinned the blame on the conveniently dead Big Daddy Gordean and Johnny Shinura. My dear Elmer. Volatile and impetuous. Sweet-natured and tolerant for a cop. Guilt-racked now. Done in by internal sabotage and Hideo Ashida's death. The man who reminded me that Hideo had sussed it all out. A woman attended the klub*haus* deaths and may have helped commit them. We owed Hideo his clean solve. Elmer said, "Maybe there's some records checks you can run."

I was at loose ends; Elmer was at loose ends, verging on shell shock. He was estranged from Ruth; Annie was visiting her ailing dad in rural Idaho. Ellen was off with her husband and son; Brenda was tending to their call-service business. The Blastout remained hot news. Loretta McKee replaced Lena Horne as Charlie Barnet's colored canary. Mrs. Big Daddy sued Los Angeles County. Duke Ellington was busy composing his "Niteclub Blastout Suite." A land baron purchased the Taj Mahal, with plans to refurbish and reopen it as the Klub Blastout. Jo Stafford and the Pied Pipers will play the gala opening.

This blithe exploitation enraged Elmer. He raged against himself and the Kameraden and his long-gone brother, who started the whole thing. He told me to run directory and phone-call checks on Chuckie Duquesne. "You might turn something there."

Bill swore me in as a PD clerk-typist. He assigned me a cubicle with a desk and a telephone. I ran jail checks first. I learned that Johnny Shinura was in Lincoln Heights on the night of the murders. Chuckie Duquesne had never been arrested. Johnny and Chuckie were bunked in at the East 2nd Street warehouse then. That was their collective last known address. They squatted there after the Federal seizure and Johnny's formal eviction. Chuckie lived somewhere before that. He had to have had a formal address. I ran DMV checks and turned up an address in Echo Park.

Chuckie rented a house there, and had a telephone installed. I called PC Bell and secured his phone bills from October '39 up through last year. One suggestive female name repeatedly popped up.

I recalled Hideo's theory. The case was definitively homosexual. It derived from two-person animus. The foot scuffs on the upstairs hallway wall had been made by a woman.

I ran DMV checks. I learned that Chuckie did not own a registered automobile. I secured car stats for Chuckie's female friend. I spent many hours in the former Crash Squad command post. I studied the master file; I studied the initial canvassing sheets in particular. I noted the north/south/east/west canvassing perimeters. The crime occurred on a Wednesday night into Thursday morning. The proximity of the jazz strip troubled me. I walked the strip and saw that most of the clubs possessed no parking lots or assigned parking spaces. The strip hopped on weeknights; patrons had to park their cars somewhere; the somewhere within the canvass perimeters would be packed with club hoppers' cars. The klub*haus* killer or killers would have had to park outside those perimeters and walk to the haus.

I drove to 46th and Central and walked my own expanded perimeter. I noted NO NIGHTTIME PARKING signs in all directions. That's when I knew I had a chance to solve it; that's when I knew that the debt to Hideo might be repaid.

It took one more phone call. I buzzed the PD's Traffic Bureau and requested a list of parking tickets issued on the night in question. Her name was on it. She had parked on 41st Street, east of Hooper. It was three blocks past the northeast perimeter.

I placed my cigarettes and matches on the bench beside me. I'd met the woman twice before; she bummed out of my pack on both occasions. She smoked too much and talked too much and divulged inappropriately. I beckoned her here. I wrote to her and told her I knew. She had my full consent to divulge inappropriately.

Andrea Lesnick walked up. She sat down and went straight for the cigarettes. Her fingers were nicotine-stained; her nails were bitten down to the quick.

She said, "Miss Lake knows my secret. She figured out what the dumb cops couldn't."

"You parked in a red zone. They missed the citation you were issued."

"They raped me."

"I know."

"I've been to Tehachapi. San Quentin can't be any worse. 'Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord.' I'll enter the green room with my head held high. I've groveled enough in my lifetime. Chuckie convinced me of that."

I lit a cigarette. "I was wondering how you met him."

Andrea said, "I met him at a party at Otto's place. Everybody who was anybody was there, but we all wore masks. Chuckie was gigging there. Wendell and George were there, but they were chauffeuring some America Firsters, so they had to stay outside. Archie stayed outside, too. The car-park boys were Mex, so Archie spoke Mex to them, and Jewed them for half of their tips."

"I've heard of this party, Andrea. People wore Nazi costumes. Orson Welles screened a pornographic movie."

Andrea shook her head. No, no, no. Let me tell it my way.

"Miss Lake's a C.T., and a provocateur. She's a snitch, and she's in with the cops. It's my story, and I don't have to let her prompt me or tell me how I should confess."

I touched Andrea's arm. She pulled away and chained cigarettes.

"Wendell and I got stoked on each other, and we necked in this limousine he was driving. We petted, but he wanted more than I wanted to give him, so I said, 'Whoa, son.' Wendell got ticked off, because the party was very libertine, and he told me I should give him what everybody else was getting, but I left him high and dry instead. Chuckie and a boy Robby Staley set him up with were necking, outside by a pergola. They witnessed some horrible thing that gave Chuckie nightmares for the rest of his life, but he never told me what it was."

I glanced out at Dudley's jail suite. Andrea poked me and brought my gaze back to her. Look at me, look at me. It's my story I'm telling you.

"Wendell was hateful and spiteful. He started sending me letters and snapshots of him and his wife, doing you know what in the you know where. It went on for a year and a half or so, then it stopped, and some time passed. Then my daddy sent me to the klub*haus* to pick up a eugenics book he'd lent this boy Link Rockwell. Wendell, Georgie, and Archie were there, alone. That was when they raped me."

She'd dribbled ash on her blouse and sweater. Both garments were burn-marked already. Her fingers were gnawed. She gnashed her hands when she wasn't smoking. She was unbearable to behold. She condemned me as glib. She commanded my prayers for the rest of my life.

"'Vengeance is mine,' saith You Know Who. Which is just what Chuckie and I started planning. It was a double-dip. I got keestered, and he got nightmares from that party. We started frequenting the klub*haus,* and Chuckie poked boys upstairs. I told Wendell, Georgie, and Archie that I wanted to do it again with them, while Chuckie watched. That's how we got them alone at the haus."

Her hair. She curled strands around her fingers and twisted them taut. She maimed herself. She left bald spots. Self-inflicted stigmata. Collaborator women shaved bald.

"We lured them upstairs. Chuckie gave them terp cigarettes laced with poison. They smoked them and became woozy, and we led them back downstairs. Chuckie sat them down on the couch. He was left-handed, so I had to scooch around him just so. He held an ice pick to their necks, and I put on these strangling gloves that Johnny Shinura gave me, and I strangled them right there."

I looked in her eyes. One was blue, one was gray. Her eugenicist daddy. I suspected experiments gone awry. She sat on her hands so she wouldn't gnash or pull her hair out. What would Hideo Ashida do? It came down to that. I said, "I wish you safety," and walked away.

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 A.M., 4/28/42)

Union Station. The Welcome Wagon awaits. They're packing brass knucks and belt saps. Bienvenidos, señor.

Jack Horrall dispatched them. His orders ran succinct. Beat the fuck half dead. Tell him no sabotage. Return to Mexico. Come back, we kill your spic ass.

Elmer and Buzz lurked outside the station. Cars clogged the front lot. The breezeway hopped. Porters schlepped suitcases. Tourists hailed taxicabs. The Baja train was past due.

Elmer and Buzz lurked. They got their orders. They got their reward. They were acknowledged whizbang detectives. Jack H. shot them two Homicide slots.

El Salvy walked outside. He scanned the front lot. Cars zigzagged through. Elmer and Buzz swooped.

They grabbed him and hustled him. They pinned his arms. He went along, peaceful. They worked the two-man accordion press.

Salvy complied. They waltzed him off to the side of the building. Elmer grabbed his hair and elbowed him in the windpipe. Salvy gasped and squeaked. Buzz pinned him against the wall. Elmer stuffed a sock in his mouth. They unhooked their knucks and saps and let fly.

Octopus job. They worked him, four-fisted. Elmer smashed his ribs. Bones crunched and snapped. Buzz squatted low and ripped uppercuts at his balls. Elmer punched his teeth out. The sock trapped loose choppers and sopped up blood.

Buzz hurled sap shots. They sliced Salvy's ears half off. Buzz intoned the edict. Elmer hummed the "Marine's Hymn." He checked the parking lot. He saw this man upside a Cadillac. He thought, Maybe, maybe not.

He dropped his hurt kit and walked over. Well now—and amen. It was good old good-looking Wayne Frank.

He sported some gray hair. He wore wingtip shoes and a swell chalk-stripe suit.

He said, “Try not to kill Salvy. Him and me share a history.”

Elmer said, “I like your car. Life’s been good to you.”

Wayne Frank spit tobacco juice. “I’ve got a wife and two kids in New Orleans, and a wife and three kids in Atlanta. If I can avoid this here futile war, I’ll have it made in the shade.”

Elmer smiled. “You always believed in the Resurrection. It was your favorite Bible story. You always said you might die young, but you’d just as likely return.”

Wayne Frank smiled. “I visited Wisharts last year. Sue Bailey asked about you. She’s with the TVA now. She had herself a damn fine job with the Willkie campaign.”

Sue B. was a six-foot blonde. She justified the climb. Him and Wayne Frank fought over her. He kicked Wayne Frank’s ass good.

“Those New Year’s rainstorms stirred up some grief, didn’t they?”

“Let’s not talk about that.”

“New Year’s is New Year’s. Remember? We always listened to Cliffie Stone’s Hometown Jamboree.”

Wayne Frank spritzed tobacco juice. “You look pretty good, for a man who’s just seen a ghost.”

Wayne Frank said, “I always told you I’d make something of myself.”

Ghosts. Apparitions. Warlocks, poltergeists, ghouls. Wayne Frank’s alive. Hideo Ashida’s dead.

Elmer drove out to Santa Monica. He hadn’t seen Ruth in a coon’s age. He should put her at ease. You never know. She might throw him some woof-woof.

Wilshire was bright and breezy. The beach air felt sweet. He parked outside Ruth’s courtyard. Longhair music wafted over. Ruthie sat on her porch. She played her radio full blast.

Elmer got out and walked over. Ruthie saw him. She primped and turned off the radio. She looked grim—per always, these days.

“I’ve been reading about you. The widow Big Daddy Gordean asserts that you are trigger-happy.”

Elmer dittoed Wayne Frank. “Let’s not talk about that.”

“Shall we discuss Brahms? That was the Double Concerto I was enjoying.”

Elmer relit a cigar. “Let’s discuss what’s eating you. Maybe I can help you out."

Ruth said, "You have not the cachet. A deportation order has been issued against me. I am held to be a seditious alien, and I have no means of redress."

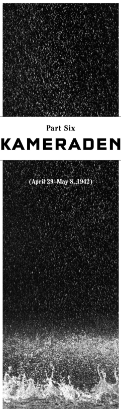
She had green panther eyes. He had beady eyes. They discussed it their first night. Elmer slalomed in and dialed their eyes tight.

"You can't deport the wife of a U.S. citizen. Husbands can't fink out their wives for Murder One."

Ruth turned on the radio. A violin and cello tangled chords and fought. She kept the volume low.

"Might we have a Jewish wedding?"

Elmer said, "Don't press your luck."



Part Six

KAMERADEN

(April 29–May 8, 1942)

KAY LAKE'S DIARY

(LOS ANGELES, 4/29–5/8/42)

Early-wartime L.A. The blackouts, the attendant car wrecks, the impromptu race riots spurred by enveloping dark. The grinding shame of the Japanese internment. The revelry of fearful folks disinclined to step outside. The unexpected pregnancies and great volume of kids expected in the fall of '42.

The muzzle flash of Pearl Harbor burned bright through the spring, as the phenomenon of the war was subsumed by the war as our refuge and justification. Early-wartime L.A. was a time of great crimes and witheringly ambiguous solutions. It was a time to celebrate the shit-kicking American spirit and our mass resolve to see this thing through. Early-wartime L.A. The booze and the muzzle-flash love affairs. There was no better time to howl and throw parties.

Jack Horrall hosted an acquittal bash at Kwan's Chinese Pagoda. It celebrated Bill Parker's and Elmer Jackson's bold move to squelch the Fed probe. The PD and City Hall crowd showed up in force. The acquittals formally justified the soirée. I held it to be a wrap party for the span of events preannounced by a New Year's Eve rainstorm. The gang was there. We were there. Comrades and adversaries crammed into Ace Kwan's back room. Bill, Elmer, Buzz, Brenda. Thad Brown and Nort Layman. Mike Breuning and Dick Carlisle. Ray Pinker, Fletch Bowron, my beleaguered Lee Blanchard. DA Bill McPherson, with Loretta McKee in tow. Reconciliation overwhelmed rancor. Something big had ended as the war progressed. I chatted with Mike Breuning. He said, "Whew, Kay." I said, "Whew, Mike" right back. Our conversation fizzled then. There was no need to say anything else.

We were there. Provocateurs and profiteers. Bill Parker danced and drank with Claire De Haven. They argued the Baltimore catechism and defamed my most revered Martin Luther. Then something extraordinary happened.

Jack Horrall gave a speech. He blew raspberries at the Feds and crowed over the mass acquittals. He praised the diligent detectives who solved the klub*haus* job and notably omitted Dudley Smith. He broke down and wept as he lionized the "late and surely great" Hideo Ashida.

Elmer married Ruth Szigeti two weeks later. There had to be a hidden story there—but Elmer refused to divulge it. The Protestant service dismayed Ruth. The wedding party vacated the church and reconvened in Mike Lyman's front room. Fake gold bars served as dinner-table settings. The Reverend M. L. Mimms supplied them.

Buzz brought his pet scorpion. He slid steak tidbits into his cage and dared people to stick a finger in and pet him. The acquittal-bash crowd celebrated the Jackson-Szigeti nuptials. Otto Klemperer and Joan Klein joined us, along with the Koenigs and Sandor Abromowitz. Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Taylor dropped by and heckled Ruth. We've lost you to a cop bumpkin. Say it ain't so. You've lost nothing, Liebchens. My husband understands me as I understand him.

Indeed. Brenda Allen, Ellen Drew, and Annie Staples had served as Ruth's maids of honor. Ellen hawked her new Paramount oater; Annie told Elmer not to lose her phone number. Bob Taylor took Brenda aside. He slid her a roll of bills and told her to set Babs up with "Ten-Inch" Tony Mangano.

I sat with Elmer and Ruth at the head table and overheard their conversation. Ruth thanked Elmer for his great generosity. Elmer said, "Hush, now. It's not like I'm suffering, and it's not like I don't like you."

Early-wartime L.A. Profiteers and privateers. My most valued Kameraden.

Otto debuted Shostakovich's Leningrad Symphony the following week. The performance was not billed as such. The five-hundred-dollar-a-pop tickets were sold via hushed word of mouth. Otto was preempting Maestro Toscanini's formal premiere of the work. He had put together an orchestra of relocated exiles and film-studio musicians. Ruth Szigeti was the first-chair violin; the Koenigs and Sandor Abromowitz played alongside her. The occasion was strictly black-tie. The Wilshire Ebell Theatre held roughly one thousand seats. The proceeds were earmarked for European war relief. Every woo-woo movie star and local hotshot of the day was there. I squeezed Bill Parker's hands as Otto raised his baton and went Now.

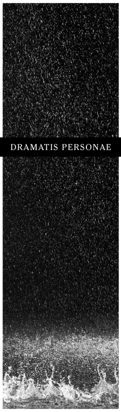
The symphony was brutal, at the expense of majestic and elegiac. It was an hourlong disruption of my most dear hopes and my most conceited dreams. I rode with the shock of it. Foreshortened crescendos dashed my sense of savagery as beauty and the beauty of art itself. Human love will not sustain us in this time of horror. Comrade Dimitri mocked the assumption. He sought only to instill a brutalized survivors' resolve.

So be it, then.

The antithesis of resolve is relinquishment. It's wartime L.A., and I am a brilliant and passionate young woman with stories to tell. Circumstance is destiny. I may never live as boldly and adroitly as I live now. This is my war and my country. Do not mock the love that I hold for both. I willed thunderstorms as a child in Sioux Falls, South Dakota. I must do that here and now. Reminiscenza, this storm, this savaging disaster. My options are do everything or do nothing. My hot date with History continues. It is now May 8, 1942. These final strains of the Leningrad Symphony mark my refusal to die.

DRAMATIS PERSONAE



This Storm is the second volume of the Second L.A. Quartet. The first volume, Perfidia, covers December 6 through December 29, 1941. The L.A. Quartet—The Black Dahlia, The Big Nowhere, L.A. Confidential, and White Jazz—covers the years 1946 to 1958 in Los Angeles. The Underworld U.S.A. Trilogy—American Tabloid, The Cold Six Thousand, and Blood's A Rover—covers 1958 to 1972, on a national scale.

The Second L.A. Quartet places real-life and fictional characters from the first two bodies of work in Los Angeles, during World War II, as significantly younger people. These three series span thirty-one years and will stand as one novelistic history. The following list notes the previous appearances of characters in This Storm.

SALVADOR ABASCAL. A real-life Mexican fascist.

SANDOR ABROMOWITZ. An exiled Hungarian musician.

A NOTE ABOUT THE AUTHOR

James Ellroy was born in Los Angeles in 1948. He is widely considered to be the greatest living crime novelist and a major literary figure, genre designations aside. His L.A. Quartet and Underworld U.S.A. Trilogy novels have won numerous awards, were international best-sellers, and are now available in Everyman's Library editions. This Storm is the second volume of Mr. Ellroy's Second L.A. Quartet. The first volume, Perfidia, was much honored, and achieved international best-seller status. The Second L.A. Quartet places real-life and fictional characters from Mr. Ellroy's first two bodies of work in Los Angeles, during World War II, as significantly younger people. The design is monumentally ambitious.

Mr. Ellroy currently lives in Denver, Colorado.

SHAKEDOWN

Freddy Otash Confesses, Part I

CELL 2607

Penance Penitentiary
Reckless-Wrecker-of-Lives Block
Pervert Purgatory
7/16/2020

I've spent twenty-eight years in this fucking hellhole. Now, they tell me I can memoir-map my misadventures and write my way out.

All that religious shit I disdained and disobeyed has played out true. There's Heaven for the good folks, Hell for the beastfully baaaaaad. There's Purgatory for guys like me—caustic cads that capitalized on a sicko system and caused catastrophe. I've sizzled in my sins for two decades plus. I've relived my earthly life in dystopian detail. My cunning keepers are currently dangling a deal:

Record your jaundiced journey. Trumpet the truth, triumphant. Hop to Heaven, and hit that high note.

Baby, it's time to CONFESS.

Purgatory is shitsville. You're stuck with the body you had on Earth when you died. You eat nothing but coach-class airplane food. There's no booze, no jazzy intrigue, no wilt-your-will women. Violated victims bop by my cell. They remind me of my many misdeeds and jab me with red-hot pokers. Gay gauchos hurtle down from Heaven and scold me for outing them back in the homo-hate '50s. It was my job. I entrapped soiled celebrities and putzo politicos, and cornholed them in Confidential. I sold my soul to that maladroit magazine. Now, I'm sordidly SORRY.

So what?

Sorry's for limp-dick losers. Confession salves the savage self and rips it to righteous redemption. Hear my plaintive plea, O watchful world:

Get me the fuck out of here!!!!!

My keepers have poised me with pen and paper. They've compiled a complete run of Confidential. My synapses soar with a million malignant memories. Freddy Otash, 1922–1992. I'm a rogue cop, a private eye, a shifty shakedown artist. I'm the demonic deus ex machina of my tattered time and place. I'm the hellhound who held Hollywood captive. I'm the man with the sex-scorched secrets you irksome earthlings want to hear.

Confidential presaged the infantile Internet. Our gobs of gossip were repugnantly real. Today's blowhard bloggers and their tattle texts? Pussyfooting punks all. We stung the studios. We popped the pooh-bahs. We hurled the hurt, wholesale. We voyeur-vamped America and got her hooked on the shivering shit. WE CREATED TODAY'S TELL-ALL MEDIA CULTURE. We crazily crafted a lurid language and made it our own.

It's the lexicon of the lowdown. It's the dialogue of the dish. It's the slithering slur and the thrill of the threat. I think and write in algorithmic alliteration. Language must lambaste and lay on the lash. Language liberates as it offends. Confidential taught me that. My confession will make this dizzy dialect divide you in two. There's Sin and Atonement, fuckers—there's nothing else.

Purgatory's a punitive proposition. Montgomery Clift pitchforked me yesterday. Confidential labeled him "the Lavender Lilliputian" and "Princess Tiny Meat." JFK followed Monty. I dumped the dish on his dope habit and call-girl cavalcade. Marilyn Monroe penance-poked me next. Marilyn was a snout trout. She dispensed head to rogue pharmacists, XXX-exclusive. They dispensed noxious Nembutal back. Maybe I shouldn't have tattled the tale—but I was within my First Amendment rights!!!!!

I'm consumed with candor and wracked with recollection. I'm revitalized and resurgent. My meshugenah march down memory lane begins NOW.

NATE & AL'S DELI

Beverly Hills

8/14/92

I was working Hollywood Vice in '51. We got word on a fuck pad, operating out of a crib at the Villa Elaine. I hotfooted it over there."

We're bopped back in my booth. There's my audience: four showbiz machers in worse shape than me. Walkers, canes, and oxygen tanks clog the aisles to the kitchen. Fractious Freddy O.'s holding court.

It's late summer, '92. I'm seventy and in baaaaad fucking shape. I've consumed scads of scotch and sucked three packs a day since I shot out the chute. I've got emphysema and a bum pump. I'm aching to make eighty. It's a lunar-looped long shot.

Sol Sidell said, "Get to it, Freddy. You roll to the pad, and then what?"

Sinful Sol. A jailbaiter from jump. He produced beach-blanket flicks in the sick '60s. I pulled him out of the shit, circa '66. He was reefer-ripped and poking two underage twists.

I said, "Okay, I roll to the crib and peep a side window. Shit—there's Sam Spiegel, the cat that produced Lawrence of Arabia and The Bridge on the River Kwai. He's muff-diving a three-hundred-pound chick. That was a boss beef, back in '51. I told Sambo it's dues time. It's a morals bust, or a monthly donation to the Fred Otash Retirement Fund."

My pals yukked. I wrapped into my Reuben sandwich and felt a twisted twinge in my chest. I downed digitalis. I saw Jules Slotnick suck on his oxygen mask and light a Camel Light. Julie produced turgid turkeys about farmworker strife. Call him Mr. Guilt for Gelt. He made all his live-in maids blow him. He held their green cards as a hedge against their refusal to bestow daily head.

Sid Resnick said, "Give us another one, Freddy."

The Sidster was Mr. Holocaust Heartache. He produced *schlock*umentaries for Islamic TV. He was the King of the Chubby Chasers. He longed for it laaarrrge.

I cruised my cranium cracks for a story. Two elderly gay cats sashayed by the booth. That fed me my cue.

I pointed to them. “I got tipped to an all-male pajama party, back in ’56. I paid some LAPD hard boys a yard apiece to bust it, and brought my camera along. Those cats were piled up in a five-way with Rock Hudson, Sal Mineo, and a dude with giant acne cysts. Confidential wrote it up. Universal paid me ten g’s to keep the Rockster’s name out of the story.”

The booth roared and re-roared. Julie Slotnick gasped for breath. Al Wexler yukked out a bagel chunk. It flew and flopped to the floor.

Alky Al owned six porno bookstores and nine nose-job clinics. He plowed a truck full of migrant Mexicans and left six dead. I got it mashed down to a Mickey Mouse misdemeanor. Al owed me, laaaaarge.

I killed my sandwich. Alky Al blew a faux fanfare. I laid out my lifelong credo: “I’ll do anything short of murder. I’ll work for anyone but the Reds.”

My boys clapped and guffawed. A bad twinge hit my heart. I downed digitalis and deep dips of scotch.

Corned beef and sauerkraut socked my system. I got floaty and deep dyspeptic. I brought up a bread crust. It popped on my plate.

The booth tumbled. My pals vaporized. My vision blurred black. Calendar sheets shot backward. Decades disappeared and devolved. Maybe I’m dead. Maybe I’m just dreaming this shit—

ROBBERY DIVISION SQUADROOM

LAPD Detective Bureau
City Hall
2/4/49

There I am. I'm fetching fine in '49. I'm beefcake, boss, and bangin' them bonaroo bitches, three at a pop.

I'm handsome and heavy-hung. I'm a lustful Lebanese. Call me a camel cad from the get-go. I'm an ex-Marine. I trained troops at Parris Island and sent them off to Saipan, savvy. I joined the LAPD in late '45. I went on the grift faaaaaast.

I formed a 459 ring. They worked my downtown foot beat. They popped pawnshops and dumped dope-pushing pharmacies. I fingered the jobs. My gang cadged cash and dope. They were 2:00 a.m. creepers. I was their Rogue Cop Rajah.

I'm corrosively corruptible and tempted by the take. I live for the scurrilous score. It's my existential fate. I had a squaresville home life in bumfuck Massachusetts. My mom and dad loved me. Nobody butt-fucked me in my bassinet. I live by a cool-cat code. There's shit I won't do. My code got catastrophized on 2/4/49.

I hogged a hall mirror. I combed my hair and noosed my necktie. Sy Devore tailored my formfit uniform. The squadroom buzzed baaaad all around me. It's a Code 3 squawk—shoot-out at 9th and Figueroa.

Two men down. One traffic cop/one heist geek. The cop's nudging near death. The geek suffered superficial wounds. Both men—ensconced at Georgia Street Receiving, right now.

The squadroom bebop buzzed. The squadroom phones rang incessant. The buzz bombarded me. I heard murderous murmurs laced with a lynch-mob gestalt.

I heard heavy footfalls. Booze breath bristled me.

"If you're through admiring yourself, I've got something."

I turned around. It's a Robbery bull named Harry Fremont. Harry has a rancid rep. He stomped two pachucos dead during the zoot suit riots. He pimped transvestite whores out of a he-she bar. He was shit-faced drunk at noon.

"Yeah, Harry?"

Harry said, "Be useful, kid. There's a cop killer at Georgia Street. Chief Horrall thinks you should take care of it. This is an opportunity you don't want to pass up."

I said, "Take care of what? The cop he shot isn't dead."

Harry rolled his eyes. He passed me a key fob. He said, "4-A-32. It's in the watch commander's space. Look under the backseat."

I got it. Harry locked on my look. He went Nooowww, he gets it. He winked and waltzed away from me.

I steadied myself and stood still. I loaded up on that lynch-mob gestalt. I lurched through the squadroom and zombie-walked downstairs. I hit the garage.

I found the watch commander's space. There's 4-A-32. The key fits the ignition. The garage was dark. Ceiling pipes leaked. Water drops turned wiggy colors and morphed into wild shapes.

I gunned the gas and pulled out onto Spring Street. I drove slooooow. The heist geek was jacked in the jail ward. It was a lockup-transfer ruse. It was forty-three years ago. It's still etched in *Sin*emascope and surround sound. I can still see the passersby on the street.

There it is. There's Georgia Street Receiving.

The jail ward sat on the north side. The squarejohn ward sat to the south. A narrow pathway bisected the buildings. It hit me then:

They know you'll do it. They know you're that kind of guy.

I reached under the backseat. I pulled out transfer papers for Ralph Mitchell Horvath. I grabbed a .32 snubnose revolver.

I put the gun in my front pocket and grabbed the papers. I slid out of the sled. I popped down the pathway and went through the jail-ward door.

The deskman was PD. He pointed to a punk cuffed to a drainpipe. The punk wore a loafer jacket and slit-bottomed khakis. He sported a left-arm splint. He was acne-addled and chancre-sored. He vibed hophead. He looked smack-back insolent.

The deskman did the knife-across-throat thing. I handed him the papers and uncuffed and recuffed the punk. The deskman said, "Bon voyage, sweetheart."

I shoved the punk outside and pointed him up the pathway. He walked ahead of me. I couldn't feel my feet. I couldn't feel my legs.

My heart hammered on overdrive. I lost my limbs somewhere.

There's no telltale windows. There's no pedestrians on Georgia Street. There's no witnesses.

I pulled the gun from my pocket and fired over my own head. The gun kicked and lashed life back in my limbs. My pulse topped 200 rpms.

The punk wheeled around. He moved his lips. A word came out as a squeak. I pulled my service revolver and shot him in the mouth. His teeth exploded. He dropped. I placed the throwdown piece in his right hand.

He tried to say "Please." This dream's a routine reenactment. The details veer and vary. The "Please" always sticks. I'm alive. He's not. That's the baleful bottom line.

The cop lived. He sustained a through-and-through wound. He was back on duty inside a week.

Vicious vengeance. Wrathfully wrong in retrospect. A crack in the crypt of my soul. Harry Fremont passed the word. Freddy O. is kosher. Chief C. B. Horrall sent me a jug of Old Crow. The grand jury sacked him two months later. He got caught up in a call-girl racket. An interim chief was brought in.

Ralph Mitchell Horvath. 1918–1949. Car thief/stickup man/weenie wagger. Hooked on yellow jackets and muscatel.

Ralphie left a widow and two kids. I got the gust-wind guilts and shot them penance payoffs. Money orders. Once a month. Fake signatures. All anonymous. Dig—Ralphie's dead, and I'm not.

Memory Lane. I'm fetching fine in '49. I'm full-fuck filleted in '92.

I holed up at my pad. I lingered through Labor Day. I looped the lane and took last looks at my loved ones, lewd ones, and lost ones.

I scoured scrapbooks. The old photos got my gears going. I'm there with Frank, Dino, and Sammy. I broke legs for them. They cringe and crawl away. There's boocoo pix of my bed at my old pad. I called it "the Landing Strip." I was Mr. Three-Way then. I swung with stewardesses, starlets, and stars. Liz Taylor and I swung with a stew named “Barb” on many groin-grabbing occasions. There’s pix of my lost love, Joi Lansing. There’s pix of my true love, Lois Nettleton. I was young and hung then. Aaaahhhh—sweet motherfucking mystery of life!!!!!

There’s my dictionary and thesaurus. They were teaching tools for the wrathful writers at Confidential. Utilize alliteration and instill intensive slurs. Homosexuals are “licentious lispers.” Lesbians are “beefcake butches.” Drunks are “bibulous bottle hounds” and “dyspeptic dipsos.” Vulgarize and vitalize. Create a craaazy populist parlance. Make it sinfully siiiiiing.

My pals popped over on Labor Day. We built burgers and boozed big. They left at 2:00 a.m. A male nurse corps shagged them and shot them down to their limos. Walkers wobbled, oxygen tanks toppled and rolled. It rubbed me raw, Daddy-O.

I settled in and watched a Dragnet rerun. I bought the juicehead judge in four of Jack Webb’s drunk-driving beefs. I shtupped Jack’s wife, soaring songstress Julie London. She said I was the biggest and the best.

I noshed a dozen Famous Amos cookies. I’d seen the episode before. Sergeant Joe Friday busts some hirsute hippie punks. I missed Jack. We shared some yuks. He kicked off back in—

A hydrogen bomb hit my heart. Mushroom clouds claimed me. Monsters morphed out of them. Johnnie Ray. Monty Clift. Politicians pounded and movie stars mauled. It’s a calamitous kaleidoscope of condemnation.

They jumped me. They went J’accuse, j’accuse, j’accuse!!!!! I gasped. My left arm exploded. I hit the medical-emergency button on my phone.

Then some pixilated pops. They’re the Herald’s horror headlines. TATTLE TYRANT, MR. FEAR, SHAMAN OF SHAME. Then a crunching crash. My door’s down. There’s a mask on my mouth.

I’m dead. Thence comes Purgatory and this confession.

MY FUCKED-UP FOOT BEAT

Downtown L.A.

Central Division. The doofus day watch. Freewheeling Freddy's at loose ends.

I disbanded my 459 gang. My main men got hooked on Big "H." They were decidedly desperate and snitch-prone. I'd gambled away my gelt. I was living on a schmuck cop's pay and was suffused with the blues. William H. Parker became Chief in '50. He instituted righteous reforms and riddled the ranks with a phalanx of finks to sniff out miscreants and misconduct. I drove a Packard pimpmobile. I won it in a darktown dice game. Parker's punks tattled to the hellhound Jefe. I got called in and grindingly grilled. Parker warned me not to be a Bolshevik. He said, "I've got my four eyes on you."

It rained that day. It was some mad monsoon. Wild winds whipped me along on my foot beat. I stopped at a lockbox phone and called the station. The deskman told me to hotfoot it to 668 South Olive. They were shooting a Racket Squad episode in the lobby. They needed a hard boy to shoo off autograph hounds.

I headed over there. I caught a taut tailwind and slalomed in the slush. It was a medical building. The lobby was all lit up. I caught a frazzled fracas, right off.

Lights, cameras, boom mikes. Here's the action, straight up.

A jug-eared cat was hassling a boss blonde. He wore pegged chinos and a gone jacket. She was built, va-va-voom.

The cast and crew orbed the scene. Jug Ears grabbed the blonde's arm and applied abrasions. It gored my gonads and hit my heartstrings. I walked up behind him. He saw my shadow and swift swiveled. I notched his nose with a palm shot. I looped a left to his larynx. I kneed his nuts as he dropped.

The blonde genuflected. I tipped my hat. Jug Ears cradled his busted beak and moaned for his mama. The cast and crew clapped.

The blonde said, “He’s my ex-husband. He stiffed me for three months’ alimony.”

I kicked him in the head and lifted his wallet. Jug Ears mama-moaned anew. The cast and crew whistled and stomped.

The wallet weighed in heavy. I fanned the cash compartment and counted a sea of C-notes. I handed them to the blonde. She dropped them in her purse and dropped a dollar on her ex-hubby. She said, “For old times. He was good in the sack.”

I laffed. I reached in my pocket and handed her a card. Understated class shows. There’s my name, phone number, and “Mr. Nine Inches.”

She dropped the card in with her cash stash. A guy yelled, “You’re up, Joi. Scene 16-B.”

She winked and walked away from me. I cuffed Jug Ears behind his back and pay-phone-called the station. Holly*weird:* they filmed the scene with the ex coma-conked and cuffed on the floor.

I walked outside and smoked a cigarette. A black-and-white cruised by and hauled the ex to Georgia Street. I thought of Ralph Mitchell Horvath. A kid returned my calling card. She wrote on the back: “Joi Lansing. 39-25-38. Googie’s, tonight at 8:30.”

I’ve got a boss bachelor pad, straight up from the Strip. It’s jammed with Jap flags and shadow-boxed Lugers. There’s a periscope perched on my porch. I peep neighbor women and gas their gestalts.

I’m a voyeur. It’s vampiric. I study people. I rage to know their secret shit.

My bedroom features a biiiiiiiig walk-in closet. I’ve got sixty Sy Devore suits. My dresser drawers drip with lacy lingerie. My lynxlike lovers leave me mucho mementos.

I’ve got a file on Ralph Mitchell Horvath. I culled it from PDs and penitentiaries statewide. I know all Ralphie’s secrets.

He poked a Mexican sissy in reform school. He fathered two half-wit kids. He pimped his wife to cover his poker debts. He scored prescription goofballs from a Chink pharmacist.

I dug up that dirt. It bought me distance on Ralphie. It held off his hold on me. Know your foe. I’ve known that godless gospel since my crib.

I dressed sharp for Joi Lansing. I wore my crocodile loafers and hid my heater in a shoulder rig. A spritz of Lucky Tiger—and a short stroll to the meet.

Googie's was a coffee cave on Sunset and Crescent Heights. The space-age aesthetic rubbed me raw. Fluorescent lights/Naugahyde/chrome. A hip hive for showbiz shitheels headed for Hell.

I walked in. Joi Lansing table-hopped. She wore a too-tight gown and a meager mink stole with a pawnshop tag attached. The joint buzzed per a sneak peek in Glendale. A Googie's regular played a love scene with Bob Mitchum. Bad Boy Bob slipped her tongue. They toked a reefer in the RKO backlot. She blew him in his '51 Ford.

A hubbub juked the joint. I knew I radiated FUZZ. I crashed into a booth and unbuttoned my jacket. A flit flamed by and ogled my piece. He hopped to a hen party, one booth over. Dig this dirt: the barman at the Cockpit Lounge ran an all-boy slave auction. Adlai Stevenson got embroiled and embarrassed. The hens hooted—ha, ha, ha!!!

Joi sat down. I pointed to the pawnshop tag. She pulled it off and dropped it in the ashtray.

I said, "Thanks for the invitation."

Joi said, "Thanks for the revenge. That guy fractured my left wrist on Saint Patrick's Day, '49."

"You're too young to have an ex-husband."

"Yeah, and I'm estranged from number two. I'd head to Reno for a quickie, but it might not work. We got hitched in T.J., so the paperwork could get dicey."

"Is there anything I can do?"

"Well, you're a policeman."

I lit a cigarette and held the pack out. Joi shook her head.

"He's on parole, and he's a grasshopper. You could call Narco. That might do me some good."

I shook my head. "Give me his address. I'll think of something."

"He'll be here at nine-thirty. He's been living at the Y since I kicked him out, and the fry cook here takes his phone calls. He's a nonunion grip. I stiffed him a fake message after I met you. You're a producer at Fox, with a job for him. You're meeting him in the parking lot."

I laffed. "You just assumed that I'd do it?"

Joi laffed. "Come on, Freddy. That stunt you pulled downtown, and 'Mr. Nine Inches'? What won't you do for money or gash?"

A Mex busboy sidled by. I grabbed a belt loop and stopped him. He saw my roscoe and got the shiver-shakes.

I socked him a sawbuck. “Go to the kitchen and get me a bag of weed. You’ll be on the night train to Culiacán if you don’t deliver.”

Manuel went Sí, sí and moved out. Joi laffed and bummed a cigarette. I blew a high smoke ring. She blew a higher one. They hit the ceiling and mushroomed, Hiroshima-esque.

Manuel meandered back with the mota. I told him to scram. The hen party parsed a new nugget. Ava Gardner sacked Sinatra. She’s shacked with a heavy-hung extra at Monogram.

I said, “What’s your real name?”

Joi said, “Joyce Wassmansdorff.”

“Give me the fill-in.”

“I’m from Salt Lake City. I’m twenty-four. I went to the MGM school, and went nowhere.”

“But now you’re up-and-coming?”

Joi stubbed out her cigarette. “I’m uncredited in six pictures, and credited in four. I’ve got Racket Squad, Gangbusters, and a comedy with Jane Russell in the can.”

“Give me some dirt on Russell.”

“What’s to give? She’s a Goody Two-shoes married to that quarterback for the Rams.”

I eyeballed the room. Paranoia pounds me, periodic. The two crew cuts by the take-out stand? They’re Bill Parker’s boys. I’d seen them at Central. They were purse-lipped puritans out to bag bent cops.

Joi said, “You’ll need money to enjoy my company.”

I re-eyeballed the room. I exercised my X-ray vision. A punk I popped for flimflam made me and beat feet.

Joi said, “It’s nine-thirty. Look for a little guy with a big pompadour.”

I bopped back to the parking lot. Pompadour lounged upside a ’51 Merc. I closed in close. He orbed my shoulder rig and went Oh shit. He wore light-colored slacks. Piss coursed and covered his cuffs. I dug in, diplomatic.

“Don’t contest the divorce. I’ll negotiate your alimony payments. Send the check directly to me. I’ll take my cut and deliver the rest to Miss Lansing.”

Pompadour held up his hands. It was Don’t hit me, hoss. I pulled out the bag of weed and caught his left mitt in one motion. I pressed hard and finagled a full fingerprint spread.

A drizzle drifted down. I gestured toward the street. Ex-hubby #2 took off running.

“Hollywood could use a guy like you.”

I turned around. There’s Jolting Joi. She knows from opportunity.

“You mean I could use Hollywood.”

She kissed me. I kissed her back. That’s how it all started.

I know from opportunity. It costs money, honey. I heisted a bookie room two days later.

A Hitler mask hid my face. I entered with an empty grocery sack and exited with four g’s. I blew half the swag on Joi. I bankrolled my biz with the remainder. A Beverly Hills pharmacist fed me piles of pills to push. Harry Fremont sold me eight ice-cold roscoes. Joi scared up a scrape doctor. I told him I’d be out seeking nice-girls-in-a-jam. Guns/dope/a felonious physician. My girlfriend as conduit to a coruscatingly corrupt culture.

Joi hit Hollywood in ’42. She was fourteen. She matriculated at MGM and met Everybody. She was luridly low-rent and confoundingly connected. She knew Everything. She was a one-babe Baedeker. She knew bartenders, bellhops, busboys, call girls, casting directors, and cads. She knew pornographers, pushers, and pimps. She knew troves of tramps in trouble. She was out to crown me King Shakedown. Joi greased Holly*weird* with my handouts. Scores of scurrilous scamsters licked up my largesse. We were buying bleak and blowsy blackmail dirt.

I worked LAPD. I scored an off-duty gig. I was now the security boss at the Hollywood Ranch Market. It was licentiously legendary and open-all-nite. I bagged shoplifters and check kiters. I lived within my means and never gave Bill Parker’s goons a hook to entrap me. I took Joi to Ciro’s and the Mocambo. I saw Intelligence Squad cops cataloguing the scene. I braced them as a brother. I ballyhooed my big nights, financed by big days at the track.

I sold guns. I sold pills. I brokered abortions. I hawked a filthy film called Mae West’s Menagerie. Shack jobs were verboten for LAPD men. Joi and I trysted at her mom’s pad in Redondo. She said the word was moving out and metastasizing: Freddy O.’s The Man to See.

Gigs rolled in. I pounded a perv who’d whipped out his whang on Duke Wayne’s wife. Duke paid me five yards and gave me the skinny on Red Hollywood. Dino Martin called me. He knocked up his maid with soon-to-hatch triplets. I bribed a Customs cop and got Dolorous Dolores deported. Dino paid me two g's and dished the dirt on a stunning string of starlets. They bounced on my bed and dug up dirt on my regular retainer. Want C-notes and riotous ruts in the hay? Call Mr. Nine Inches.

I got Lana Turner a scrape. She banged an alto sax named Art Pepper in a bout of bebop abandon. Putzy Pepper wanted her to keep the kid and threatened exposure. I planted two reefers in his sax case and buzzed the fuzz. He got nine months at Wayside Honor Rancho.

Joi knew a classy clique of Hancock Park housewives. They were unbearably unbodied and entrenched in ennui. They needed furtive fucking. She saw money in it. Put "pimp" on my résumé. I'm on Stud Patrol as of now.

Opportunity is love. That cold concept socked my sick soul.

Joi said Liberace had a job for me. We were in the sack at her mom's place. Her eyes twinkled and twirled me some all-new way. She drew dollar signs in the air.

The moment vibrates in VistaVision and swervy Swish-O-Scope. A piano noodles a nocturne and pounds a polonaise.

LIBERACE'S SWANK SWISH PAD

Coldwater Canyon
4/29/53

A fey factotum met me. The yard was tropically tricked out and football-field size.

Flamingos flitted. Toucans tooled and bit bugs. A path cut through ten-foot-high fronds and floral explosions. Everything was green, purple, and pink.

We hit a clearing. It was paved with stones embossed with musical clefs. The pool was shaped like a piano. Liberace sat in a deck chair. A leopard with a mink collar snoozed at his feet.

The factotum sashayed off. I pulled up a deck chair. The leopard stirred and snarled at me. I scratched his neck and kissed his snout. He went back to sleep.

Liberace said, "You're fearless. You're the kind of man I need."

"I'm here to help you out, sir. Joi said you've got a guy bugging you."

The factotum sashayed back with cocktails. Two highball glasses glowed pink. The guy served us and skedaddled. My drink tasted like radioactive bubble gum.

Liberace said, "Bottoms up."

I yukked. "A kid's putting the boots to you, right? Pay up, or he'll rat you to the Legion of Decency. All those dago mob guys that book your act in Vegas will hightail it. Your TV show will be canceled if word gets out you go Greek."

Liberace sighed. "Inimitably candid, and so, so true. He's a dishwasher at Perino's. What was I thinking?"

I sipped my pink drink. "Pictures?"

"Of course, dear heart. He lured me to a motel with a wall peek."

A hi-fi speaker sparked and kicked on. Judy Garland belted, "Someday he'll come along / The man I love." The leopard lolled and licked his balls. Liberace goo-goo-talked him.

"Five thou, sir. You get the pictures and the negatives, along with my assurance that it won't happen again."

Liberace pouted. His chest heaved. Sequins popped off his toga. The leopard loped to the pool and arced his ass over the edge. A giant shit ensued.

The factotum ran up. He wielded a turd-scoop contraption. Liberace reached under his chair and snagged a scrapbook.

"Ex-convicts are a weakness of mine, I'm chagrined to say. I've got mug shots of him, and quite a few other rough-trade conquests. It's my new hobby. I paste pictures, when I'm not wowing my fans or practicing Chopin."

I grabbed the book and leafed through it. It was the fucking lavender lodestone. I counted twenty-six K-Y cowboys wearing neck boards. Names/dates/penal-code numbers. A smutty smorgasbord of malignant maleness. Parole holds and prosty beefs galore.

Liberace jabbed a pic of one Manolo Sanchez. The guy vibed baleful bantamweight.

"He broke my heart, while his evil lezzie sister took snapshots. Feel free to get tough."

I nodded and flipped ahead. Three glum glamour boys popped off the page. Ward Wardell, Race Rockwell, Donkey Don Eversall. All booked for possession of pornography.

I pointed to the pics. "Blue-movie actors, right? They peddle it on the side. You see the movies, you get a yen, you make a phone call."

"That's correct. I went to a screening at Michael Wilding and Liz Taylor's house. Michael screened Locker Room Lust and Jailhouse Heat, and supplied the referral."

"Referral" ripped me. "Could these guys get it up for women?"

Liberace whooped. "Could, can, and do, sweetheart. And Donkey Don is the eighth wonder of the world, if you follow my drift."

I tingled. I thought Parlay. I saw dollar signs and movie-star movement on my Landing Strip.

"So, Michael Wilding's a gay caballero?"

"In spades, love. His house is known as the 'Fruit Stand,' which perturbs lovely Liz no end."

I yukked. "And Liz wants a divorce, so she can move on to her next husband and break the all-time world record?"

Liberace slapped his knees. "Yes, and she's pulling ahead of your girlfriend in that department."

I cracked my knuckles. Liberace swooned. The cat almost creamed in his jeans.

"Tell Liz to meet me at the Beverly Hills Hotel, tomorrow night. Fill her in on my résumé."

Liberace re-swooned. The leopard snarled and shooed a toucan up a tree.

Perino's was high swank and old money. It catered to sterile stiffs and dotty dowagers. I drove over at close-up time and parked by the back kitchen door. It was whipped wide open. Sassy Sanchez was scour-scrubbing pots.

I slid out of my sled and hunkered low on my haunches. I ran reconnaissance. I noted a line of lockers by a walk-in freezer. I had Salacious Sanchez alone.

He mambo-minced to his locker and primped. A mirror magnified his mug and tossed it back at me. I squinted and claimed a close-up. Aaaaaaaah—the top locker shelf. There's a stack of photo sheaths.

He picked his teeth. He squeezed blackheads. He dewaxed his ears. I walked in and crept up behind him. I pulled my beavertail sap. His neck hairs bristled. He wheeled and pulled a shiv.

Flick—the blade sliced my Sy Devore blazer. He shrieked shit en español. It ran the your-mama gamut.

He pirouetted and parried. We were in knife-fight tight. I risked a ripe stab wound and roundhoused him to the head. My sap socked him, full force.

The seams ripped his face. The business end tore an eyebrow loose and gnashed in his nose. He dropped the knife. I kicked it away. I grabbed his neck and squelched a scream. The deep-fry dipper was four feet away. It was spitting hot grease off spuds lyonnaise.

I dragged him over. I stuck his knife hand in the grease and frog-fried it. He screamed. I held his hand in the grease and burned it to the bone. Spatters spotted up my London Shop shirt.

I dropped his hand. I walked to the locker and grabbed the photo sheaths. I flipped through them.

Ooohhh, Daddy. It's Liberace Goes Greek—Kodacolor prints and negatives.

Sanchez screamed and careened through the kitchen. He dumped a dish rack and spasm-smacked the walls. His hand was charbroiled and crackle crisp. Flayed flesh flew off.

The night was young. I was up five thou and blasphemously blasted on blood and aggression. Revelation ripped me. I knew I could mix my own fruit shakes. I pocketed two Liberace negatives.

I called R&I. They delivered the dish on the smut-film troika. The boys shared a pad in Silver Lake. Plus a bent for the sex-soiled and seditious. Semper fi—they met in the Marine Corps and ran rackets out of a bondage bar down in Dago. They sold forged green cards. They peddled Spanish fly. They led Rotary groups to T.J. for the mule act. They sold dildo dupes of Donkey Don's sixteen-inch whanger.

They fell in the shit in '50. They sold Spanish fly to a nervous nympho and pledged a date with Donkey Don. The Donkster reneged. The nympho impaled herself on the gearshift of a '46 Buick. San Diego PD filed Felonious Assault. The judge tossed the case. Here's a ripe rumor: he was Race Rockwell's regular trick.

I popped out to their pad. It was a wizened wood-frame job, buried in bougainvillea. I rang the bell at 11:00 p.m. and got no answer. I picked the door lock and let myself in. I crept flashlight-first and inventoried their shit.

The boys possessed Nazi armbands/Mickey Spillane novels/combat-pinned Marine blues. Plus mucho moviemaking equipment. Plus cheesecake mags going back to '36. Plus souvenir snapshots from the Klub Satan, Tijuana, New Year's '48. El Burro sports spiffy red devil ears.

I walked out to the porch. I chain-smoked and sucked on my flask. I recognized the ribbons on their uniforms. The boys savaged Saipan and stormed Guadalcanal.

I sipped bonded bourbon. I got a light load on. A jalopy jammed up at 1:00 a.m. The boys bounced out and made for the door.

I whipped out my badge and flashlight-lit it. It was deep dark out. I couldn't catch their capitulation. Call it a cool coup d'état. The dominant dog now rules their pack.

"My name's Otash. You're going into business with me."

Extortionist. Entrepreneur. Enterprising Enforcer. I ran that roundelay as I licked my lips for Liz.

I got half looped with the lads and laid down the law. I'm taking 20 percent of your smut biz. You get police protection. You're now the naughty nucleus of Freddy O.'s stud farm. Get ready to bring the brisket to some housewives in heat.

Donkey Don laid a ladle of bennies on me. I buzzed through my day-watch duty downtown. I broke up a fistfight at the Jesus Saves Mission. I chased a raft of Red agitators out of Pershing Square. I popped a whipout man at the Mayan Theater. I busted a psycho kid blowtorching two lovebirds in a '49 Ford.

My tour of duty tapped down. I went by the Criminal Courts Building and read up on divorce law. I reserved a bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel and scrounged refreshments off local merchants. Lou's Liquor Locker supplied champagne. Hank's Hofbrau coughed up cold cuts. Fast delivery was assured.

I swooped by my pad. I traded my cop suit for a choice chalk-stripe ensemble. Oh yeah—it's your ardent arriviste poised to pounce!!!!

The bungalow was big, boss, flouncy, and flamboyant. The bellman harrumphed at my ham and cheese hors d'oeuvres. He rolled his eyes and split. I paced and smoked myself hoarse. The bell rang at 8:00 p.m. sharp.

There she is—Elizabeth Taylor at twenty-one.

She stood in the doorway. I fumbled for chitchat. She wore a tight white dress. It caressed her curves and clambered up to her cleavage. She said, "If I move too fast, I'll split a seam. Help me over to that couch."

I grabbed an elbow and steered her. My hand trembled, my heart trilled. I sat her down and poured two jolts of '53 domestic. We perched on the couch and offered up toasts.

Liz raised her arm. A dress seam split down to her hemline. She said, "Shit. I didn't have to wear this. You're just the bird dog for my divorce."

I yukked. Liz said, "Don't marry me, okay? I can't keep doing this for the rest of my life."

"Have I got a chance?"

"More than you think. Hotel heirs and queer actors haven't worked out, so who's to say a cop wouldn't?"

I smiled. I sipped champagne. Liz snagged a slice of ham and snarfed it. Her wicked white dress constricted her. She looked plaintive, plain, and pure.

I unzipped the back. I slid in some slack and brought breathing room. Liz sighed—Aaaaah, that's good.

The shoulder straps slid slack and fell down her arms. Liz deadpanned it. Our knees brushed. Liz retained the contact.

"How do I cut loose of Michael? I can't cite mental cruelty, because he's a sweetheart, and I don't want to hurt him. I know you have to show just cause in order to sue."

I refilled her glass. "I'll bug your house. You get Wilding looped and get him to admit he digs boys. I levy the threat in a civilized manner, and he consents to an uncontested divorce."

Liz beamed. "It's that easy?"

"We're all civilized folks. You probably earn more money than him, but he's older, and has substantial holdings. You broker the property split and the alimony along those lines."

"And how are you compensated?"

"I get ten percent of your alimony payments, in perpetuity. You keep me in mind and refer me to people who might require my services."

Liz lounged on the couch cushions. Her dress collapsed past her brassiere. Our eyes found a fit. The rest of the room vaporized.

"And how will I keep you in mind? There's lots of people vying for my attention."

"I'll do my best to make this a memorable evening."

It started out clumsy and sweet. My punch line cued the first kiss. Liz was victimized and vanquished by too-tight attire. She shrugged her dress off. It wiggled down to her waist.

I carried her into the bedroom. The hoist popped buttons off my shirt. They shot across the room. We laffed. I heard the radio a bungalow over. Rosemary Clooney sang, "Hey, there—you with the stars in your eyes."

We got naked. We were built boss, stratosphere stacked, and hung home wrecker heavy. We were the boffo best of L.A. '53.

We made love all night. We drank champagne with Drambuie chasers. We smoked cigarettes and spritzed gossip. We put on robes and climbed to the roof of the bungalow at dawn.

An A-bomb test was scheduled in nowheresville Nevada. The newspapers predicted priceless fireworks. Other bungalow dwellers were up on their roofs. There's Bob Mitchum and a young quail with the quivers. There's Marilyn Monroe and Lee Strasberg. There's Ingrid Bergman and Roberto Rossellini. Everybody looks fuck-struck and happy. They've all got jugs for the toast.

Everybody laffed and waved hello. Mitchum brought a portable radio and tuned in the countdown. I heard static and "…eight, seven, six, five, four, three, two, one."

The world went WHOOSH. The ground shook. The sky lit up mauve and pink. We raised our booze bottles and applauded. The colors bristled into bright white light.

I had my arm around Elizabeth Taylor. I looked Ingrid Bergman straight in the eyes.

L.A. '53 was my ground zero. That blast still shoots shock waves through me.

There was smog in the air then. People coughed and gasped. I never noticed it. That bomb-blast moment made me. My L.A. was always mauve and pink.

I worked LAPD. I walked a downtown foot beat. I rousted Reds during the "Free the Rosenbergs!" fracas. I pinched pervs, purse snatchers, and pickpockets in Pershing Square. My smut-film biz laid in loot. Donkey Don Eversall plied his python all over Hancock Park. Joi was Donkey Don's dispatcher. She koffee-klatched with horny housewives and set up the dates. Liberace gave me girl-talk gossip. Liz Taylor and Michael Wilding went to Splitsville. I got 10 percent of Liz's alimony bite. Joi, Liz, and I threeskied on my Landing Strip. Liz knew a Pan Am stew named Barb Bonvillain. She flew the L.A.–Mexico City route and had half of Hollywood hooked on Dilaudid and morphine suppositories. Bad Barb was six-three, 180, 40-24-36. She scored high in the women's decathlon, Helsinki '52. All four of us locked loins. The Landing Strip lurched. We murdered the mattress and banged the box springs down to the floor.

Joi and I crashed the Crescendo and the Largo most nights.

Cocktail waitresses fed me slander slurs. I tipped them, titanic. It brought back my kid-voyeur days, rabidly redux.

A fragmenting frustration set in. I had the dirt. It would take an armada of shakedown shills and photo fiends to deploy it. I racked my brain. I knocked my noggin against the bruising brick wall of unknowing. Extortion as existential dilemma. A confounding conundrum worthy of those French philosopher cats.

My cop life could not compete with the lush life. I was a double agent akin to that Commie cad Alger Hiss. Liz Taylor drove me to Central Station and signed autographs for the blues. I knew that word would leak to Chief William H. Parker. I was full of a finger-stabbing FUCK YOU.

Ralph Mitchell Horvath haunted me. Nightmares nabbed me as I slid into sleep. Joi and Liz nursed me with yellow jackets and booze. My bedtime mantra was He Deserved to Die. It was beastly bullshit. I couldn't convince myself that it was true.

I spent nuke-bomb nights at the Hollywood Ranch Market. My office was two-way-mirrored and overlooked the aisles. I scanned for boosters and looked down at the legions of the lost.

Their pathos pounded me. Bit actors buying stale bread and short dogs of muscatel. Six-foot-two drag queens shopping for extra-long nylons. Cough-syrup hopheads reading labels for the codeine content. Teenage boys sneaking girlie mags to the can to jerk off.

I watched. I peeped. I lost myself in the losers. A goofy ghost came and went with them.

He was about twenty-three. He slouched in windbreakers and wore cigarettes as props. He breezed through the aisles at 3:00 a.m. He always looked ecstatic. He talked to people. He cultivated people. He studied people the way I peeped windows as a kid. I saw him out on the sidewalk once. He played the bongos for a clique of fruit hustlers and junkies. A girl called him "Jimmy."

The fucker appeared intermittent. I made him for an actor living off chump change and aging queens. I saw him kiss a girl by the bread bin. I saw him kiss a boy in the soup aisle. He moved with a weirdo grace. He wasn't froufrou or masculine. He was in on some exalted joke.

I saw him boost a carton of Pall Malls. I cornered him, cuffed him, and hauled him upstairs. His name was James Dean. He was from bumfuck Indiana. He was an actor and a bohemian you-name-it. He said that Pall Mall cigarettes were queer code. The In hoc signo vinces on the pack meant “In this sign you shall conquer.” Queens flashed their Pall Malls and ID’d each other. It was all-new shit to me.

I cut Jimmy loose. We started hanging out in the office. We belted booze, looked down on the floor, and gassed on the humanoids. Jimmy habituated the leather bars in East Hollywood. He ratted off pushers and celebrity quiffs and filled a whole side of my dirt bin. I told him about my smut-film and male-prosty gigs. I promised him a date with Donkey Don Eversall in exchange for hot dirt.

We’d hit silent stretches. I’d scan the floor. Jimmy would read scandal rags.

They were just popping up. Peep, Transom, Whisper, Tattle, Lowdown. Titillation texts. Lurid language marred by mitigation. Insipid innuendo that left you craving more.

Politicos got slurred as Red—but never nailed past implication. Jimmy loved the rags but cruelly critiqued them. He said they weren’t sufficiently sordid or precise in their prose. He called them “timid tipster texts.” He said, “You’ve got better skank than this, Freddy. I could give you three issues’ worth from one night at the Cockpit Lounge.”

A bell bonged. It was faint and far off. Memory is revised retrospection. Oh yeah—fate fungooed me that night.

A newsboy pulled a red wagon into the market. It was stacked with magazines. He started filling up racks.

A cover caught my eye. Priapic primary colors and hard-hearted headlines screamed.

You get the picture. The magazine was called Confidential.

THE BEVERLY HILLS HOTEL

8/14/53

Joi woke me up. I was nudging off a nightmare. It was a dark double dip. Ralph Mitchell Horvath, shot in the mouth/Manolo Sanchez with skeleton claws.

I looked across the bed. Shit—Liz was gone.

Joi read my mind. “She had an early call. She said to remind you that Arthur Crowley wants that phone date.”

I lit a cigarette. I chased bennies with Old Crow. Aaaaaaah, breakfast of champions!!!!

“Remind me again. Who’s Arthur Crowley?”

“He’s that divorce lawyer who needs your help.”

I said, “I’ll call him when I go off-duty.”

Joi stepped into a skirt and pulled her shoes on. She dressed as fast as most men.

“No more girls for a while, okay, Freddy? Liz is great, but Barb is like Helga, She-Wolf of the SS. Really, that stunt with the armband and the garters? That, and she hogs the whole bed.”

I laffed loud and lewd. My wake-up whipped through me. It canceled out all dreary dreams and coarse cobwebs. Late summer in L.A.—ring-a-ding-ding!!!!

Joi kissed me and bopped out of the bungalow. I shit, showered, shaved, and put on my uniform.

The phone rang. I snagged it. A man said, “Mr. Otash, this is Arthur Crowley.”

I buffed my badge with my necktie. A mirror magnetized me. Man-O-Manischewitz, I look good!!!!

“Mr. Crowley, it’s a pleasure.”

Crowley said, “Sir, I’ll be blunt. I’m swamped with pissed-off husbands and wives, looking to take each other to the cleaners. Legal statutes are in flux, and divorce-court judges are demanding greater proof of adultery. Liz Taylor told me you might have some ideas.”

I lit a cigarette. Benzedrine arced through my arteries and piqued my pizzazz.

"I do have ideas. If you have flexible scruples, I think we can do biz."

Crowley laffed. "I'm listening."

I said, "I know some Marines stationed down at Camp Pendleton. I was their DI in '43 and '44, and now they're back from Korea and looking for kicks. It's a parlay. Hot rods, good-looking shills, walkie-talkies, phone drops, and Speed Graphic cameras."

Crowley hooted. "Semper fi, sir. You're a white man in my book."

"Semper fi, boss. We'll work out the details at your convenience, and I'll round up my boys."

"And, in the meantime? Is there anything you need?"

Benzedrine was a groin groper. One thing did come to mind.

"My Landing Strip's got two empty runways tonight. Liz told me you're conversant with the concept."

Voices vibrated outside the bungalow. They were mucho male and brazenly brusque. I heard foot scrapes and coughs.

Crowley said, "Liz explained the concept, so I called you prepared. I'll send two stenos over."

"Mr. Crowley, you're a pisser."

"It takes one to know one, sir."

We hung up. The voices vibrated. I caught key-in-lock sounds. I walked into the living room. The door whipped wide.

It's William H. Parker.

With two plainclothes bulls. Both six-four. They live to hurl hurt. They're mastiffs on a mission to maul for their master.

"Send not to know for whom the bell tolls—"

I unpinned my badge and tossed it at Parker. It hit his chest and dropped on the floor. The mastiffs moved. Parker went Get back. The mastiffs pawed the carpet and growled loooowwww.

I unhooked my gun belt and dropped it on a chair. I called up some cool. Freon Freddy, the Shaman of Shakedown.

"Hit me, Bill. Shack jobs, living above my means, bending the rules here and there. My head's on the chopping block, baby. Guillotine me."

The mastiffs smirked smug. Pious Parker parsed out a grin.

"You are currently engaged in an intimate relationship with a Pan American stewardess named Barbara Jane Bonvillain, now in Federal custody for possession of narcotics procured in Mexico. I must inform you that the outsized Miss Bonvillain is a Communist agent and a personal emissary of Marshal Tito, the Red boss of Yugoslavia. As if that weren't enough, Miss Bonvillain is really a man. She underwent a sex-change operation in Malmö, Sweden, in late 1951, before her stellar efforts impersonating a woman at the '52 Olympics. You fucked a man, Freddy. You're a homo. Get the hell off my police force."

You're a homo."

"You're a homo."

"You fucked a man."

"You fucked a man."

"You're a homo, you're a homo, you're a homo."

I drank myself into a stunned stupor. I passed out on the floor. I got intimate with insects inhabiting the rug. They were dung desperadoes. They were my filthy fellow travelers, lower than lice.

"You're a homo, you're a homo, you're a homo."

I drank, I passed out, I woke up. I went eye-to-eye with a big beetle. We discussed the man-bug metaphysic. It was infused with frissons from that freaky frog Camus.

The beetle said that life was horrifically happenstance and that we were all fucked by fate. Bugs were biologically bid to live off larvae and leaves. Men were massacred by lascivious lust and bumbled into bed with he-shes. You didn't know that she was a he. Hit your bennie stash and find your way out of this funk.

I obeyed the beetle. The Benzedrine outrevved the booze. I talked shit with the beetle for hours. We went feeler-to-feeler on the floor.

I called Abe Adelman at the State License Bureau. I promised him two g's for PI's ducat, quicksville. I bid the beetle adieu and climbed back into my civvies. I drove straight to the Hollywood Ranch Market.

L.A. looked like Pompeii, postearthquake. The summer sun skimmed the sky and scattered death rays. Hes were shes and shes were hes and the most gorgeous girls were gargoyles. I got to the market and ran up to my office. Jimmy was scanning the August Lowdown.

He said, "You're wigged out, Freddy."

I said, "I've been talking to a bug."

"What did he tell you?"

“Some shit you wouldn’t believe.”

“I would believe it. It’s the basis of our friendship. We tell each other shit the world wouldn’t believe.”

I smiled. “Tell me something typical. I’ve had a jolt. I need to get my feet back under me.”

Jimmy said, “The barman at the Manhole is pushing horse.”

I said, “I’ll file it away, in case I need him.”

Jimmy said, “I’ve got a picture of Marlon Brando with a dick in his mouth.”

“I’ll give you a C-note.”

Jimmy passed the Old Crow. I took a pull and felt the floor meet my feet.

“How was your date with Donkey Don?”

Jimmy held his hands two feet apart. Jimmy said, “Ouch.”

I roared. We passed and repassed the jug. Jimmy lit a Pall Mall.

“I’m up for a role on GE Theater, but this Paul Newman punk will probably get it.”

“I’ll plant a bag of weed on him, and lay on the fear. You’ll get the gig.”

“Thanks, Freddy.”

I thought about the talking bug. I looked down at the aisles. I felt fate beaming back at me.

“I’ve got all this good dirt and no place to put it. It’s driving me fucking crazy.”

I assembled my ex-Marine cadre. My porno-prosty boys proceeded priapically apace. My Camp Pendleton pals came up to L.A. and joined Operation Divorce. The two crews crossed over. I had six certified psychos, culled for my command. My Pendleton pit dogs were blood-blitzed from killing Commies in Korea. They were out for chaotic kicks and required tight tugs on their chains. Our marks were adulterous wives and husbands. Donkey Don lured ladies to hot-sheet hotels and instigated insertion. Flashbulbs flared as I kicked in doors, camera cocked. My Pendleton pits were adroit and adept at rolling surveillance. They tailed wayward wives and whorehound hubbies to hotels and walkie-talkied me. Joi was the mouthwatering man bait.

She worked off Arthur Crowley's craaazy crib sheets on the hubbies' habits. Joi was sinful seductress and cold cocktease. I kicked the doors in just as Joi's zipper dropped.

Operation Divorce was a Marine Corps maneuver and a mad moneymaker. Operation Otash was the ultimate umbrella command. I had an army of snarky snitches on my payroll. My PI's license arrived and served to cinch my sinful sanction. I did not much mourn my severed service with the LAPD. I paid vulture Vice cops for tips on quivering queers, jittery junkies, dipsos deep in the DT's. I built fat files on celebrity secrets and hoarded the horrors hard in my heart. Knowledge is power—the Beverly Hills Hotel bug told me that. The one puzzle piece still missing: how to systematically carve cash from all of it.

Jimmy joined in. I kicked putzy Paul Newman's ass and held a bag of maryjane primed with his prints. Jimmy got the GE Theater role and groveled with gratitude. I hired him to hump the husband of a divorce-seeking dowager sick of hubby's hijinks. Jimmy was a swift switcherooer—if it mamboed, he'd move on it. He boffed five babes in one week—topping Donkey Don's extant record. I camera-caught the wives as Jimmy shot them the schvantz.

L.A. '53—radioactive ring-a-ding-ding!!!! That mauve-and-pink sky, ever mine.

Then, at long last—the confounding convergence.

I was on the Landing Strip. I was lolling with Liz and a winsome waitress from Biff's Charbroil. My mail slot creaked. An envelope hit the floor.

It was a Western Union telegram. I opened it and read:

> Dear Mr. Otash,
>
> We here at Confidential are looking for a man conversant in the celebrity secrets of present-day Los Angeles, preferably a man with prior police experience. Would you be willing to meet me in a week's time, to discuss a possible collaboration?
>
> Sincerely,
> Robert Harrison,
> Publisher and Editor In Chief

"Johnnie Ray's Men's Room Misadventure."

"Bad Boy Bob Mitchum: Back in Reeferland AGAIN?"

Oh yeah—Confidential contaminated. Confidential kicked up chaos. Confidential came to work.

I wired Harrison and confirmed the meet. I booked a boss bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel. I borrowed textbooks from Arthur Crowley's library and studied libel, slander, and defamation of character. I learned to think and talk like a language-lucid lawyer.

Jimmy bagged back issues of Peep, Lowdown, Whisper, Tattle, and Confidential itself. I studied linguistic loopholes and cultivated codes of mitigation, equivocation, ambiguity. There's innuendo, inference, implication. There's many wicked ways to scandal-skin a cat.

I alter-egoed myself in a week's time. I discovered *sin*uendo and scandal language. I moved into the bungalow a day early. That talking bug and I conferenced and concurred:

Confidential was the grooved-out grail of this shook-up generation. Disillusionment is enlightenment. Confidential trafficked truth and harpooned hypocrisy. It was a devoutly decorous document. It was the meshugenah Magna Carta of our hopped-up and fucked-up age.

It's now 9/21/53. It's now precisely 10:00 a.m. The doorbell rings.

Caviar, canapés—check. Martinis mixed magnifico—check. My dossier on Bondage Bob—malignantly memorized.

I opened the door. There's the Sultan of *Sin*uendo. He's a nervous nebbish in a dreary drip-dry suit.

He said, "Mr. Otash."

I said, "Mr. Harrison."

He walked in and went Oooh-la-la. I poured two mighty martinis and pointed to the couch. We raised our glasses. I said, "To freedom of speech."

He said, "The First Amendment. What it hath wrought."

We clicked glasses. He made the you-and-me sign. He said, "Strange bedfellows."

You're stranger, dipshit. You wear women's lingerie and love the lash. You published "Honeys in Heels," pre-Confidential.

"Get my attention, Mr. Otash. Open strong, baby. I need dirt, and a man to excavate it. Hit me, sweetheart. Show me why the cognoscenti says, 'Fred Otash is the man to see.' "

I flashed my Marlon Brando snapshot. Bondage Bob perused it. He spazzed and spritzed me with a mouthful of martini.

It drip-dried on the sofa and my silk suit coat. Bondage Bob coughed and called up composure. He said, “Holy fucking shit.”

“May I give you a candid assessment of your situation, and explain how I might best serve you?”

“Hit me, doll. I didn’t fly three thousand miles for some namby-pamby chitchat.”

I shot my cuffs and showed off my Rolex. Twenty-four-karat gold/diamonds/rubies. I buzz-bombed Bondage Bob with my bold opening thrust.

“You publish what is rapidly becoming the premier scandal magazine in a very crowded field. You compete with Whisper, Tattle, Peep, On the Q.T., Lowdown, and others. Your competitors rely largely on true-crime exposés, reports of miracle cures for various diseases, and rehashes of your own articles on celebrity misbehavior. The specific strengths of your magazine are its staunch anti-Communist stance and sex. Frankly, I find your articles that play on the greed of your readers are both unbelievable and devoid of the heat that people turn to Confidential for. There are no emerald mines in Colorado, and no Uruguayan herbs that triple the size of the male member in two weeks’ time. You’re lying, sir. You’re hoping that bilking your readers with stories like that will both boost your sales and help defray the costs of the libel suits that are being filed against you with greater and greater frequency in circuit courts all over America. My good friend, the esteemed jurist Arthur Crowley, has informed me that magazines that publish filler pieces chock-full of boldfaced lies create what he calls a ‘gap in credibility and verisimilitude.’ This calls into question the veracity of all the articles published in said magazines over time, leaving said magazines vulnerable to both individual lawsuits and the looming specter of what Mr. Crowley calls the ‘lynch-mob-like and Communistic specter of the emerging class action suit,’ wherein aggrieved parties band together under the aegis of left-wing lawyers in order to posit a common beef and destroy the First Amendment right of free speech that we hold so sacred here in America. The mitigating, equivocating, and temporizing language that runs through your groundbreaking articles on celebrity misconduct will not save you. You may use alleged, purported, and rumored as much as you like, but they will not legally extricate you in the end. My first two salient points are these: you must dramatically boost your sexual content, and everything you publish in Confidential must be entirely true and verifiable."

Wooooooooo!!!! Bravura breath control and artful articulation!!!! Bondage Bob's flabbergasted and flushed.

He fidgeted. He licked his lips. He crossed his legs and went submissive sissy. I saw restraint-rope scars on his wrists.

"Nuisance suits are costing us twenty-five thou a month. Those Commie lawyers are coming out of the sewers like rats."

I socked him my Second Soliloquy:

"Informants must be both credible and coercible, as well as vulnerable to exposure of their own misdeeds. I served as an officer of the Los Angeles Police Department for close to a decade. I have access to every crooked cop in this town, and they will rat out any celebrity, socialite, Communist, miscegenist, or alluring lowlife that they know of for a simple retainer. The scum that they rat out will rat out six others to stay out of your magazine, and the mathematical equation that I am positing will extend indefinitely. I can tell that you're thinking, Informants alone will not suffice, and that assumption is correct. You may know that we are entering a bold new era of electronic surveillance. I propose that we install standing, full-time bugs in every high-class hotel in Los Angeles. I will bribe the managers and desk clerks of said hotels to steer celebrity adulterers and queers to specific rooms, where their sexual activities and conversation will be captured on tape. The best bug man on earth is a hebe named Bernie Spindel. I will meet with him soon. Mr. Spindel would love to enter your employ, and has a gift for you. He bugged a bungalow at the Miramar Hotel in Santa Monica last week. The manager of the hotel is a masochistic child molester with a quite understandable urge to be punished for his aberrant behavior. I will physically chastise him on a monthly basis, which will deter him from hurting children, as well as keep him under my thumb. He will have strict orders to place all celebs in bungalow number nine. Bernie's gift is a tape of Senator John F. Kennedy fucking Ingrid Bergman, and detailing his preposterous plans to run for president of the United States to her, while she yawns and prattles on about her kids. Be forewarned: the fucking is short-lived. I'll be frank: Senator Kennedy is a two-minute man."

Bondage Bob. He's gaga, goo-goo-eyed, gone.

"So, we—"

I cut him off. "So, we also bug all the gay bathhouses. So, I have extortion wedges on the informants who supply the dirt for our most explosive pieces. So, I polygraph-test them to assure their veracity. So, I create a climate of fear in Hollywood, which is the most gorgeously perverted and cosmetically moralistic place on God's green fucking Earth. Because, I have an unerring nose for human weakness and have sensed for some time that we have entered an era where the gilded and famous all secretly harbor a desire to be exposed. Because, I am willing to burglarize any psychiatrist's office in order to get the dirt on their celebrity patients. Because, I am willing to quash lawsuits through the threat and application of physical force."

Bondage Bob guuuuuuuulped. "What won't you do?"

I saw Ralph Mitchell Horvath. I said, "Commit murder or work for the Reds."

A pin-drop silence sizzled. I let it linger loooooong.

"Would you consent to an audition? To test your inside knowledge?"

I nodded. Harrison hit me. I bopped to his beat, beatific.

"Senator Estes Kefauver?"

"Whorehound. Shacks with Filipina prosties at the downtown Statler."

"Sinatra. Give me the latest."

"Caught his new girlfriend muff-diving Lana Turner, went on a six-day bender with Jackie Gleason, and wound up with the DT's at Queen of Angels."

"Otto Preminger?"

"Mud shark. Currently enthralled with a sepia seductress named Dorothy Dandridge."

"Lawrence Tierney?"

"Brawling, psychopathic brother of noted grasshopper Scott Brady. Digs the boys at the Cockpit Lounge, and the occasional girl who looks like a boy."

"John Wayne?"

"Quasi–drag queen. Fucks women and looks stunning in a size fifty-two-long muumuu."

"Johnny Weissmuller?"

"King Schlong. Well known to have fathered nine kids out of wedlock, with nine different women. Current holder of the White Man's World Record."

"Duke Ellington?"

"Current holder of the Black World Record."

“Van Johnson?”

“The Semen Demon. Sucks dick at the glory hole at the Wilshire May Company men’s room.”

“Burt Lancaster?”

“Sadist. Has a well-appointed torture den in West Hollywood. Pays call girls top dollar to inflict pain on them.”

“Fritz Lang?”

“Known to film Burt’s torture sessions, and screen them for a select clientele.”

“The Misty June Christy?”

“Alfred Hitchcock?”

“Peeper.”

“Natalie Wood?”

“Child actress in transition. Rumored to be ensconced at a dyke slave den near Hollywood High.”

“Alan Ladd?”

“Dramatically underhung snatch hound. A man on the horns of a brutal existential dilemma.”

Bondage Bob. The big magazine mogul. He’s gaga, goo-goo, pulled into putty. He’s martini-mangled and mine.

“Mr. Otash, the job is yours.”

I said, “The bite is fifty grand a year, and expenses. My operating costs will go at least double that.”

Now, he’s green at the gills. Now, he knows there’s No Exit. It’s a fabulous fait accompli.

“Yes, Mr. Otash. We have a deal.”

We shook hands. We jacked gin and vermouth. Bondage Bob said, “Jean-Paul Sartre’s a pal of mine. He’ll love The Stacked and the Hung.”

That talking bug rocked across the rug and waved at me. I swear this is true.

Jimmy timed the fuck. It ran 1:46. Jack Kennedy and Ingrid Bergman banged the beast with two backs.

Pillow patter tapped the tape. Jack said, "Aaaaah, that was good." Ingrid said, "Vell, for vun of us, perhaps."

I roared. Jimmy howled. The market was 3:00 a.m. dead. We gargled Old Crow.

Jimmy said, "We wrapped GE Theater. I invited Ronnie Reagan to the premiere."

I said, "He hates the Reds. I'll hit him up for some snitch-outs."

The tape groaned and ground down to squelch. Jimmy turned it off. I looked down at the floor. A dippy denizen bought this month's Confidential.

Jimmy said, "When I'm famous, keep me out of the magazine."

I said, "When you're in it, you'll know you've arrived."

My first ops check arrived. I retained Bernie "the Bug King" Spindel. We spent a week whipping wires to wainscoting and laying mike mounts into mattresses. I bribed hotel honchos up the yammering ying-yang. We drilled, bored, spackled, threaded, planted, and wired all the high-end hotels. Regular retainers would result in records of sicko celebs sacking up in those rooms. Bondage Bob had bountiful bucks. We wire-whipped full-time listening posts at the Beverly Hills Hotel, the Hotel Bel-Air, the Beverly Wilshire, the Miramar, the Biltmore, the downtown Statler. A Biltmore bellboy tipped us, right off. Gary Cooper and a jailbait jill jumped into that bugged bedroom. BAM!!!—our system socks in sync. Bedsprings bounce, voices vibrate, mikes pick up tattle text and lay it to the listening post. BAM!!!—my Marine Corps mastiff retrieves the tape. BAM!!!—the babe is sixteen and a Belmont High coed. Coop says, "You're built, honey. Tell me your name again." The girl gasps, "I've always loved your pictures, Mr. Cooper. And, wow, you're really big."

The dirt. The dish. The scandal skank. The lewd libels revealed as real. It all came to me and to Confidential. Freddy O.'s in unstoppable ascent.

Jimmy cut his movie and dubbed in a sizzling sound track. The proud premiere was the L.A. Moment of Fall '53. I served pizza, booze, and pills from a felonious pharmacy. My pad was packed with movie machers and Marines, stupid starlets, stars, and studs. Dig: Liz, Joi, Ward Wardell, Race Rockwell, Donkey Don Eversall. Ronnie Reagan, Harry Fremont, Arthur Crowley, Bondage Bob, and Jean-Paul Sartre—existentially seeking the scene. A six-foot-six drag queen, Rock Hudson, ex–U.S. Congresswoman Helen Gahagan Douglas. Charlie "Yardbird" Parker, nodding on Big "H."

It's the egalitarian epicenter of postwar America. It's a colossal convergence of the gilded and gorgeous, the defiled and demented, the lurid and the low-down. This seedy summit set the tone for the frazzled and fractured frisson that is our nation today.

I dimmed the lights. Race Rockwell ran the projector. The sound track hit: Bartók, Beethoven, bebop by way of Bird. There's the opening titles: The Stacked and the Hung, starring Donkey Don Eversall and June Christy. Photographed, edited, produced, and directed by James Dean.

The applause ran apoplectic. There's the first shot. It's a Holly*weird* motel room. It's a through-a-wall-peek peep at you know what.

June Christy enters the room and drops her purse on the bed. She looks apprehensive. She lights a cigarette, she checks her watch, she taps her toes and paces. It's soundless cinema. The camera stays static—the lens is lashed to that peek.

June hears something. She smiles, she walks offscreen, she walks back on with Donkey Don. Donkey Don winks at the wall peek. He's in on it. June sits on the bed. Donkey Don whips it out and wags it. My pad shakes and shimmies. There's gasps, wolf whistles, shrill shrieks.

I looked around for Jimmy. June devoured Donkey Don, tonsil-deep. Where's Jimmy? Fuck—he's jacking off by the pizza buffet!!!

'53 to '54. My mauve-and-pink skies. Sales-graph lines in escalation. Confidential hits a million a month. Confidential makes two million in rabid record time.

It's all ME. I'm awash in the sicko secrets I've cruelly craved my whole life. I've got L.A. hot-wired. My city teems with tattle tipsters on my payroll. Hotel rooms are hot-sheet hives hooked up to my headset. I know everything sinful, sex-soiled, deeply dirty, and religiously wrong. It's wrong, it's real, and it's MINE.

My Marines lived in listening posts. They caught Corrine Calvet cavorting with a car-park cat at the Crescendo. They caught Paul Robeson, ripped to the gills at a Red rally. They caught Jumping Johnnie Ray again. I verified all of it and fed it to Confidential. Gary Cooper and Miss Belmont High? Quashed for ten grand.

’53 to ’54. A-bomb parties on Liz Taylor’s rooftop. Cavalcades of color against the dim dawn. The camaraderie and opportunity. The sense that this march of magnificent moments would never stop.

Sales graphs. Confidential covers. Dipsos, nymphos, junkies, and Commies, exposed. That cover I regret, that ball I dropped, that malignant moment. That page in Purgatory as I pause my pen.

It’s January 16, 1954. I’m at my pad. I’m booking a threeski for the Landing Strip. I quashed a story on Marilyn Monroe’s Mexican marriage. Marilyn grovels, grateful. She knows a sapphic sister with a sometimes yen for men.

The phone rang. I picked up. Arthur Crowley said, “There’s trouble, Freddy.”

I said, “Hit me.”

“I got a tip. Johnnie Ray’s been to a libel lawyer, and he’s suing the magazine. I know that you verified the story, but he’s going forward anyway. I strongly suggest that you nip this in the bud.”

“Men’s Room Mishegas: Jittery Johnnie Strikes Again.” I verified the story. Confidential ran it. This was untold grief.

“My Marines are on maneuvers, Art. There’s no one to handle it.”

“You handle it, Freddy. Take care of it, before that tip gets back to Bob Harrison.”

I hung up. My nerves were nuked. I took three quick pops of Old Crow. Joi was tight with Johnnie. They girl-talked regular. I liked Johnnie. Jimmy screened The Stacked and the Hung for him, personally.

I dropped three yellow jackets and obliterated the day. I woke up at midnight. Johnnie always hit Googie’s after his closing set. He always parked in the same spot.

I walked over. I recall spring heat and a brisk breeze. I lounged on Johnnie’s Packard Caribbean. Johnnie bopped out at 1:15.

He saw me. He got the gestalt. He said, “Hi, Freddy.”

I said, “Don’t make me, kid. I’ll keep you out from now on, but you’ve got to stop it here.”

Johnnie said, “You’re a parasite, Freddy. You feed off the weak. I’m not backing off. I don’t see any of your goons around, so you’ll have to do it yourself.”

I said, “Let it go, Johnnie. You can’t win this one.”

"You're the weak one, Freddy. Joi told me you cry out for your mother in your sleep."

I trembled. "One more time, Johnnie. No lawsuit. Do this for me, and the magazine will never come near you again."

Johnnie spit on my shoes. "You're a mama's boy, Freddy. Joi told me you fucked a tranny, which makes you more queer than me."

I saw red and black-red. I hit him. My signet ring slashed his cheek. He went down on his knees. I picked him up and hurled him against his car. I heard bones crack and teeth shear. The bumper ledge gouged his head. I kicked him and tore a chunk of his scalp free.

He said, "Okay, okay, okay."

I said, "I'm sorry, kid."

Johnnie spit blood. Johnnie spit teeth and gum flaps. He shot a big fuck-you finger my way.

The market was 2:00 a.m. deadsville. Jimmy and I quaffed Old Crow. We stood by the mirror and gassed at the ghoul show. I was spritzed with Johnnie Ray's blood.

Jimmy said, "I'm up for the lead in East of Eden. Elia Kazan's waffling. It could go either way."

I said, "I'll lean on Kazan. He's susceptible. There's some pinkos he didn't rat to HUAC."

Jimmy gazed down at the aisles. My hands hurt. I cracked my signet ring. My shirt cuffs were soaked red.

The Legions of the Lost. They're down there. They're damning me. They're hexing me to Hell. They're my comrades in chaos. They're saying You're One of Us.

"Jimmy, do you know why you're a freak?"

"I don't know, Freddy. Do you know why you are?"

I said, "I don't know, but sometimes it all gets to me."

Freddy Otash Confesses, Part II

CELL 2607

Penance Penitentiary
Reckless-Wrecker-of-Lives Block
Pervert Purgatory
8/25/2020

I'm balefully back. It's time for my next contaminated confession. I'm still stagnantly stuck in the Hell Adjacent Hilton and yammeringly yearn for a heavenly reprieve. I'm still stuck with the fucked-up and failing body I had when I crapped out, back in '92. It's still confession/repentence/atonement. It still comes down to that. Here's the draconian drill:

I'll repugnantly reprise some shit I pulled in phantasmagoric '54. I'll be freewheeling Fred Otash at thirty-two. '54 was a ring-a-ding-ding year. I'm going to diiiiiiig going back.

So, succumb to the seditious soul of a scandal-rag scoundrel—because wicked words on paper are pop-pop-popping your way.

Freaky Freddy O. rides again.

ATOP MATTRESS JACK KENNEDY'S BOSS BUNGALOW AT THE BEVERLY HILLS HOTEL

It's a wind-whipped winter nite. It's cloudless clear all the way to noxious Nevada. Uncle Sambo is detonating a payload-packed A-bomb in some deserted desert burg. We're here to grok, groove, flip, flash, and gas on the show.

We've got a ripe rooftop perch. I'm here at Bondage Bob Harrison's behest. Confidential's running a farkakte feature on radioactive waste as a dick-enlargement bonanza. Bob's got a mad chemist brother. He's calling his priapic product "Megaton Man."

We're here. That means me and my Marine Corps mastiffs: Race Rockwell and Ward Wardell. Mattress Jack has slipped his gilded guests binoculars and Hyannis Port toggle coats. My cool contingent carries burglars' tools and comes with B and E know-how. The plan: burglarize Senator Jack's bungalow in the wiggy wake of the blast.

Dig the guest list. There's Jack the K. and insolent Ingrid Bergman. There's Bob Mitchum and Juicy Jane Russell. There's Tarzan-toned Lex Barker and liquor-looped Lana Turner. Jimmy Dean's on my guest card. He's still peddling snapshots of Marlon Brando with a dick in his mouth. Jimmy's got director Gadge Kazan in tow. He's this close to snagging the top role in East of Eden. Gadge is a maladroit midget. His flicks send me somnambulistic. He ratted some Comintern cads to HUAC and earned Confidential's fevered fealty. He snitches recidivistic Reds to Bondage Bob, subversively sub rosa.

Senator Jack served rum drinks topped with floating hashish cubes. I opted for the Benzedrine-spiked reefers. Jack Baby loves my larcenous Lebanese ass. I flew a bitching bevy of call girls down to Acapulco last year. They trashed Jack's paparazzi-pounced honeymoon and made Jackie jump into my bed. Jack's a c'est la vie, Daddy-O, noblesse oblige sort of guy. Jackie was grovelingly grateful.

A portable radio announced the countdown. Waiters stood by with postblast drinks and hors d'oeuvres. A doomsday disc jockey intoned: "ten, nine, eight, seven, six, five, four, three, two, one—zero."

Bombs Away, Motherfuckers!!!!!

A magnificent mushroom cloud morphed into mauve and pink. Man, what a suck-your-soul sight!!! My balls contracted. My boys and I hopped off the roof, down to ground level. Ground zero popped pink particles high in the sky. The gilded gang applauded and roared.

We deviously ditched the party. None of the bomb babies saw us. Jack's bungalow was right there, off the roof. I demobilized the door lock with a celluloid strip. We locked the door behind us and worked with pocket penlights. Chop, chop—fuckers. I'm giving us eight minutes, tops.

Our top target was address books. They were stashed in handbags and overcoats discarded for Jack's toggle togs. It's a scandal-rag caper. I'm out to notch names/numbers/addresses. The lurid love shacks of the heavy-hung and hard up. Nubile names and fuck-struck fone numbers. Noxious names and homo-hideout addresses. Non sequitur names that might mandate bracing break-ins themselves.

It was all for Confidential. Knowledge is power. You naïve nudniks know that. My misanthropic motive? A demonic desire to know the world's secret shit and hoard said shit for my personal titillation and shakedown potential.

The clock's ticking. We crisscrossed the crib. Ward and Race went for all the boss booty. Ooooohhh—overcoats draped on hotel-suite chairs, high-line handbags galore. My job was forensic frame-up. I secretly secured three fingerprint cards from Beverly Hills PD Burglary.

Dig: three hot-prowl/rape-o/459 men. Bad lads, already ID'd. At large for six Beverly Hills jobs. Forced oral cop/straight rape/thirty-four thou in stolen furs and jewels.

It gets wicked worse. There's a Little Lindbergh Law kidnap. She's a Beverly High cheerleader. There's multiple motel-room rapes before she's cut loose. The BHPD wanted these fucked-up fiends, baaaaaaaaad. Heh, heh—I made Scotch-taped transparencies of the three print cards. George Collier Akin, Durwood N. M. I. Brown, Richard "Rattlesnake" Dulange. Fred O. judge-and-juries a frame job on YOU.

I got out my print cards. I laid the treated transparency tape across three thumb and full-fingerprint spreads. I pulled off my single-digit tapes. I laid prints on chair backs, waist-high wainscoting, touch-and-grab bedroom planes.

J'accuse—Akin, Brown, and Dulange—you were here. You robbed Senator Jack Kennedy's hotel suite. You done been FRAMED.

Ward and Race dumped furs and address books. They stacked them in Senator Jack's ostrich-skin suitcase. We were six minutes in. I saved the best booty for last.

Mattress Jack was a hellacious hophead. He had legal scripts from half the pharmacists in L.A. I made for the bathroom and Jack's mad medicine chest. Oh yeah—Dilaudid, Dexedrine, Dolophine sulfate. Ooooohhh—the nifty new Nembutal suppositories!!!

Jack collected lissome locks of women's pubic hair. He traveled with them and kept them in unscented sachets. I found his stash in an attaché case under the bed. They were lewdly labeled. I've always gassed on La Bergman and Anna Magnani. I left the attaché behind. I took two love-lashed sniffs on my way out the door.

Ward and Race left me the address books. Bomb blasts and burglary—the total take vibed ten g's. Don Wexler knew a fence. We'd lay off the furs soonsville. We split the wallet cash three ways.

I popped two of Jack's delectable dexies and leveled the load with a one-grain Dilaudid. I drove to Googie's to log tattle tips from the late-nite legions who lingered there.

Tipsters crept up and crowded my table. Here's baritone sax Gerry Mulligan. He lays out alto sax Art Pepper's yen for lush high school chicks. Pepper pounded his pud at the sight of pom-pom-girl garb. He haunted Hollywood High and Hami High and left drool stains on the football field bleachers.

Comme ci, comme ça. I laid twenty clams on Gerry. He amscrayed to score some Big "H."

Billy Eckstine dropped by to schmooze. The mellifluous Mr. B. was mad for miscegenation. He played all the colored clubs on 46th and Central. He loved Confidential and lauded its sheer linguistic flair. He called it the "scatterbrained scat of white men working hard to be hip." Billy was right. I told him I'd insert the quote in the next issue. Billy went on to *coon*fide his own recent affairs. And, Freddy, dig—all these bints want to see themselves linked to me in Confidential.

"All these bints." As in Ava Gardner, Bette Davis, ex–U.S. Congresswoman Helen Gahagan Douglas. Lezbo basketball player Joan "Stretch" Perkins—hiding her secret yen for men from her sapphic sisters on the USC team. Plus the Misty June Christie, Anita O'Day, four boss bitches on work furlough from Tehachapi, and smack-back Chet Baker's willowy white wife.

I laid two yards on Billy. He showed me a pic of Stretch Perkins. She's sinking a loooooong hook shot against UCLA. I emitted low growls. Stretch ran six-six and 190. Billy grokked my Landing Strip antics. He affirmed that Stretch dug threeskies. He said he'd set Joi and me up with her.

Low growls and bilious boredom. Billy bopped off. Jilted lovers bopped up. They ratted out their cheating wives and hubbies as the Black Dahlia killer. The Dahlia was stale bread. I fobbed them off with a five-spot apiece.

It was 2:00 a.m. My dope cocktail coursed through me. My thoughts tumbled and tossed. That A-bomb blast blazed behind my eyelids. I saw three big squarejohns in gray suits by the bar. They vilely vibed fuzz. I thought of William H. Parker, still running spot tails on me. I blinked, the squarejohns squiggled, they might have been A-bomb/dope fantasia.

I thought about the magazine. Sales were up 16 percent for January '54. Shame shot through me. I thought about my thump job on Johnnie Ray. Johnnie was tight with Joi. They koffee-klatched and gal-talked. Johnnie threatened to sue Confidential. He refused to desist. I had one rancid recourse. Johnnie gave Joi the blow-by-blow. Joi was righteously repelled. She resisted my rigorous romancing and refuseniked threeskies with Liz Taylor. Maybe Stretch Perkins would loosen her libido and liberate her heart.

Another jacked-up Joan jumped me. Joan Hubbard Horvath. Ralphie's widow. I had two grand in my pocket and no place to go at 3:00 fucking a.m.

So, I cadged an envelope from my waiter.

So, I went by the penance pad.

Lower Holly*weird*. Camerford between Vine and El Centro. A smudgy small wood-frame job, just short of a shack.

I parked across the street and bopped over. I popped the envelope in the mailbox and bopped back to my sled. A light popped on. The Horvath hut glowed internal and infernal.

I'm a devious dipshit. I made too much noise on purpose. Hey, lady—I killed your husband. It's been five years and eleven days now. I've never seen your face.

Just newspaper pix. Pixilated pokes at you in wilted widow's weeds. The Herald ran headlines. WOUNDED COP SURVIVES SHOOT-OUT. GUNMAN SLAIN IN ESCAPE ATTEMPT.

There's a biiiiiiig pic of Fractious Freddy. There's zero per throwdown guns and Ralphie's unarmed status.

I lit a cigarette and sat there. I played "Willow Weep for Me" in my head. Time tipped by. Joan Hubbard Horvath walked out on the porch. The front-room lights boffo backlit her.

She wore a dark wool dress and brown loafers. She sported a short shag hairdo and wire-rimmed specs.

She looked toward me. I looked at her. I'm a good whistler. I whistled "Willow Weep for Me" all the way through. I made the crescendo a cri de coeur and a long-suppressed sob.

Joan Horvath looked in her mailbox. The song went sooooooooo soft—

THE SECURITY OFFICE AT THE SLEAZOID HOLLYWOOD RANCH MARKET

2/15/54

Jimmy Dean and I lolled by the two-way mirror. We looked down at the dregs and the dreck and the dreamy drag queens dragging themselves through the aisles. Shifty shoplifters shot their gaze to our opaque eye in the sky.

Jimmy said, “Aisle six. That fat guy slid a Swanson’s TV dinner down the back of his pants.”

I lit a cigarette. “The checkstand guy will spot the bulge and nail him.”

“You’re abstracted today, Freddy.”

“I had a late night, and I don’t feel like messing with chumps.”

Jimmy pulled a chair up. I collapsed on my couch. Jimmy tossed a magazine on my lap.

“I talked to Billy Eckstine after you left Googie’s. He told me you’re entranced with a certain lezzie athlete. I heard she frequents Linda’s Little Log Cabin, and I thought you might appreciate page twenty-six.”

The Trojanette Sporting News. Glittery glossy and a boss booster rag. Page twenty-six: a fulsome foldout of Joan “Stretch” Perkins.

Woo-woo!!! She’s a Viking Valkyrie. She’s a blitzkrieg blonde with bleached-blue eyes. She’s bigger than Barb Bonvillain—richly revealed to be a man some quack diced and dehomoized.

There’s Strapping Stretch. She’s Stunning Stretch in USC crimson-and-gold silks. She wears no makeup. She looks heavenly wholesome. She’s smiling because she’s bigger than everyone—men insistently included. And I know and dig that that means ME—you towering temptress.

I tossed the magazine back to Jimmy. He said, “Something’s eating you.”

“Joi moved out last night, while I was at Googie’s. She left me a note: ‘Fuck you and go to hell. You’re a storm trooper, and the world is wise to your shit.' "

Jimmy yukked. "Joi's vivid, but I found you a new roommate—at least for a while."

"Stretch Perkins?"

"No such luck. Liberace called me. He wants you to look after his leopard while he goes on tour. You're the only man for the job. The fucking leopard would kill anyone else."

I yukked. "I'll consider it. Tell me some other shit I don't know, and make it entertaining."

Jimmy lit a cigarette and blew concentric smoke rings. Gadge Kazan told me the trick got him East of Eden.

"I did two days on Ride Clear of Diablo, at Universal. Lew Wasserman knows we're pals, and he chatted me up on the set. He said Rock Hudson's going batshit with boys of all races, colors, and creeds, and Morty Bendish at the Mirror's getting ready to blind-item it, and he's passing the specific dirt and some motel-room infrareds on to some guys at Transom and Whisper. He wants you to put the squelch on it and find Rock a wife, so maybe the appearance of being married will put the skids to all those persistent and wholly accurate rumors."

I roared righteous and laffed lewd. I folded my fitful funk and tossed Jilting Joi and Jittery Johnnie Ray aside. I popped two of Jack Kennedy's Dexedrine and went rippled and revitalized.

"Call Lew, and put him on your side in all matters pertaining to your career. Tell him we're in. I'll lean on Bendish and the Transom and Whisper guys. We'll negotiate the wife search when I glom the infrareds, and we'll split Lew's paycheck fifty-fifty. Hit the studio casting pools and hustle up some good-looking skirts who know an opportunity when they see one, and who know how to keep their mouths shut. No semipros, nothing garish. Withhold the 'He's a fruit' punch line until we've narrowed down our list of candidates. Call Rock now and tell him to be discreet and order in his woof-woof, for the time being. Tell Lew that he's the one to break the news to Rock—and to tell him the good news that as far as women are concerned, nothing lasts forever."

Rippled, revitalized, ready to roll. Bam!!!!!—scratch a righteous and reptilian American, and the lines between OPPORTUNITY and LOVE blur.

Jimmy split to find Rock Hudson a wife he'd never pour the pork to. I checked the a.m. papers and ran the radio. As expected—the 459 at Jack Kennedy's suite went unreported. As expected—a BHPD Burglary dick called me. As expected—he called everybody on Senator Jack's A-bomb-bash guest list. As expected—he mentioned the burdensome B and E in sooooo-discreet terms. But—he laid the vivid verismo on ex-cop Otash, X-clusive.

"We know who did it, Freddy. It's those rape-o shitheads who kidnapped that cheerleader chick. They left prints up the wazoo. Those humps are bought and paid for."

Don Wexler called half an hour later. Dig: we got 11.6 thou for the furs and jewels in Jack the K.'s hotel suite.

I went through the five address books we stole. Confidential thrived on insider tattle. I had pink and red leather books for Ingrid Bergman, Lana Turner, and some society sob sister named Connie Woodard. She scribed for the Hearst rags and wrote up the pampered party lives of the L.A. elite. I had black books for Baaaaaad Bob Mitchum and Senator Jack his own self.

I tapped La Grande Bergman first. The names and numbers were prissy predictable. Fat voyeur Alfred Hitchcock. Yawn-meister Gregory Peck. Dago directors Roberto Rossellini, Vittorio De Sica, Michelangelo Antonioni. So far, so what? Ingrid swung with Rossellini, circa '50. She popped his out-of-wedlock whelp and caused a stir. So what? Confidential ran that stale story already. The rest of the numbers? Studio stiffs, fag hags, anonymous suck-ups to the stars. Plus—Jack the K., biiiiiiiig surprise: Ingrid was a WOMAN—if it mamboed, he'd move on it. Plus this: all the dizzy data was in Confidential's master file already.

I tapped Bob Mitchum's black book. It was all call girls/all day and all nite. Note the boffo bust measurements next to the numbers. Half these babes peddled their poon out of Googie's. Yawn. They were all in Confidential's comprehensive call-girl file. Note to Bondage Bob Harrison: run an All Call Girl Issue soon!!!!

Next up: Hearst hack Connie Woodard. Aha—here my hackles hopped.

Call girls to Commies. That's a puzzling parlay. Note these noxious names. We've got Joe Losey and John Howard Lawson. We've got Comintern cultural commissar V. J. Jerome. There's dyspeptic Dalton Trumbo. Don't stop now. There's blustery blowhards blasted and blacklisted, Moscow's minions all, plus all the mock martyrs known as the Hollywood Ten.

We had all the names and numbers in our "Known Commo" file. So what? It's the confounding connection to the Woodard cooze that made it all pop!!!

And—here's a hot one. Gnaw on this non sequitur. He ain't no apoplectic apparatchik. He ain't no rank Red, no way.

Steve Cochran.

Steve the Stud. Mr. Twelve Inches. B-movie thug and cad supreme. Star of dreary drive-in drivel like Highway 301, White Heat, and The Damned Don't Cry. Steve the Stud's ruff and tuff, on- and offscreen. He's a brawler and a sicko psychopath. Men fear him, women crave him. He's the hungest among us. He treats women ruff and tuff—like they licentiously like it. He beat two pachucos who tried to mug him half dead. A fruit honked him at Grauman's Chinese. He bit the guy's nose off and spit it back in his face.

Woooo-woooo!!!!

A hunch hit me, hard. Call it the Cochran Confluence. I had two address books left. Lana Turner's and Jack K's. Said books would yield boring bupkes. Except for this: said books would unify the Cochran Confluence.

I cracked the books and riffled pages. Steve the Stud's right there, alphabetical.

Bingo. Both books. Add on Commophile Connie Woodard. Here's my hunch: it all meant Something Big.

I drove back to my pad. I brooded and worked the phone until 10:00 p.m. sharp. Then I dressed sharp and drove out to the Valley.

Something Big.

My phone work confirmed it. I tapped my contact at PC Bell. I gave him four names and pledged him a thou to run phone bills. Dig this, demonic:

Jack Kennedy called Steve Cochran nineteen times the past two months. He called from his Senate office and his Hyannis Port home. Steve the Stud called Jack fourteen times. He called from his well-known fuck pad in West Holly*weird.*

Connie Woodard called Steve Cochran twenty-four times the past two months. She called from her crib in high-rent Hancock Park. Steve the Stud called Connie twenty-one times.

Lana Turner called Steve Cochran thirty-four times the past two months. She called from her Holmby Hills manse. Steve the Stud called Lana twenty-six times.

I logged the insidious info and let it pulse and percolate. Dumb domestic shit ditzed me. Joi left a note, taped to the bathroom mirror. She called me a "Merchant of Hate and Violence" and preeningly prophesied my short and loveless life. I checked my answering-service messages. Liberace begged me to babysit Lance the Leopard. I left a message with his service: "Okay, I'll do it."

I popped two dexies and leveled the load with four belts of Old Crow. I put on my choice chalk-stripe suit and spritzed on Lucky Tiger. I pondered the Cochran Confluence and Joan "Stretch" Perkins, nonstop. I called Bernie Spindel on my way out the door.

I said, "We're working tomorrow. It's a bug-and-tap on Steve Cochran's place."

Bernie said, "Oy," and hung up.

Linda's Little Log Cabin: a lezbo lair and rustic rendezvous raft. A shadowed shack. Shellacked wood beams and show tunes tuned low. A make-out mood. Wraparound booths wrapped in cigarette smoke. Butch bunkers and fetching femme nests.

I walked in. I knew the drill. Central Vice validated the dive and took 5 percent. Linda Lindholm owed me. She liked lewd Latin stuff. She went through wetback wenches, mucho mas. Linda laid las chiquitas low. Linda went from burning love to boredom in six seconds flat. Frame-up Freddy stepped in then. I reefer-rousted the girls and bounced them back over the border.

Linda saw me. She stood at the bar and made that gimme sign. I dipped a double sawbuck her way. She pointed to a back booth.

I walked over. I smelled Jungle Jaguar perfume—straight up/no chaser. She stepped out of the booth and stood up to meet me. Gilded goddess, I'm yours.

She towered tall. She backlit and bashed my base desires and made me simmer soooooooft in her glow. She wore a sleeveless madras shirtdress and saddle shoes sans socks. She emitted Valkyric vibrations. She looked like Kirsten Flagstad sang Tristan und Isolde. She said, “Hello, Mr. Otash,” and held out her hand.

I took it and bowed. She had a husky kid voice. It was cool contralto cut with prep school—straight up/no chaser.

We slid into the booth. We sat across from each other. A table lamp lit Stretch, A-bomb mauve and pink. Her bare arms were my size. She raised a hand and tossed her hair. Her underarm hair showed. Her craaaaazy credentials crackled by torchlight. Kirsten Flagstad to Anna Magnani. She took on an Italian Neorealist glow.

She said, “Billy told me that you wanted to meet me. I like meeting new and interesting people, so I said okay.”

I said, “I saw your picture. That’s why I’m here, and I know you can guess why. But my intentions went out the window the second I saw you.”

Stretch smiled. “Billy said you’re the man to see in L.A. He considers me trouble-prone, because I sort of like girls. I’m training for the ’56 Olympics, and I don’t want to bollix that up.”

Drinks appeared. On the house. Linda brought them herself. A Manhattan for Stretch. Old Crow for me.

We tipped glasses. “You’re nineteen. Everyone’s a new and interesting person to you. That leaves you vulnerable. Lezzie girls, and colored guys like Billy, and guys like me are trouble, so if you’re trouble-prone, you should consider who you let into your life.”

Stretch sipped her drink. I held my hands back and tried not to touch her.

“If the stern-big-brother routine is a ploy, it’s a new one. People usually don’t meet me and start warning me away in the same breath.”

“I like the idea of you being reckless, and me getting you out of jams. Here’s my first bit of advice. Billy told me you want to be linked to him in Confidential. That’s a dumb move. It’ll mess you up with the USC regents and the Olympic people.”

Stretch shrugged. “I’m nineteen. I’m restless. I’m as notable as an intramural athlete who happens to be a girl can be. I’m big, and I’m rather awkward, and a certain type of man and woman go for me, and want to meet me and test themselves with me, and I’m very curious as to who those people are.”

I folded my hands on the table. Stretch folded her hands over them. Her hands were bigger than mine.

“So, I go for you. I wanted to meet you, and I’ve met you. I’ve explained my intentions, so here's something you might find interesting. I'm looking after a real-live leopard for the next three weeks. You can visit my pad and meet him, and I won't let him maul you or kill you."

Stretch laffed. She temptress-tossed her hair. It was straight and dirty blond and center-parted. She had big buck teeth.

I locked up our fingers. It went to a cute tug-of-war. Her hands were stronger than mine.

"Are you in a jam right now?"

"No."

"Can you sniff out bad intentions and walk away, fast?"

"Yes."

"Will you call me if you're unsure about somebody?"

"Yes."

"Have you got enough money to live on?"

"Yes, and I'd never let man, woman, or beast set me up in a place and expect favors."

I yukked. "It's a code you've got, right? It's like me. I'll do anything short of murder, and I'll work for anybody but Communists."

Stretch yukked and unlaced our hands. The booth was warm. We popped sweat. Stretch wiped her brow and her underarms. She tied her hair back with a rubber band and gave me This Look.

"I'm glad you like me there. It means that you're discerning, and that you dig the offbeat."

My nerves were shot to shit. Stretch scared me and scattered me and lust-lashed me some new way. Stretch read me her restricting riot act.

"I like to make out and take naps with men. I'm putting the rest of it off until I sort some things out."

I lit a cigarette. Stretch lit up out of my pack. She blew four concentric smoke rings to my three. I felt dope-ditzed and sex-socked —and lost-lifed some new way. I laid my head on the table. Stretch ran her hands through my hair.

"You're okay, Uncle Freddy. I know you killed a man when you were a policeman, and Billy said maybe you shouldn't have. I'm forgiving with people, if they don't mess with me directly."

I raised my head and pulled her hands down and kissed them. I caught her scent and my scent, all merged up.

"What else did Billy tell you about me?"

"He said we were both curious and lonely, in the exact same way."

Jungle Jaguar. The widow’s withered scent. The Joan-to-Joan parlay at 1:00 a.m. A penance payment in my pocket and a picture in my head.

Liz Taylor in A Place in the Sun. The final shot. Monty Clift walks the last mile. The mad mise-en-scène goes silky subjective. There’s a climactic close-up. Liz looms, laaaaarge.

She parts her lips. Transposition/transfiguration. I kiss the merged Joan Perkins and Joan Horvath for the fade-out.

Camerford and El Centro. There’s the house. There’s late living room lights.

I parked and walked over. I mimicked Monty’s last mile and made the mailbox drop laaaast. I looped back to my sled and waited. I whistled “My Funny Valentine” at dirge speed.

Joan Horvath walked out. She wore the same stay-at-home ensemble. She held a cigarette and a highball glass. She tossed her dumb wool skirt and sat down on the porch.

She caught me mid-chorus. I hit a high note and made the secondary theme soar. I looked at her. She looked toward me. The moon moved out of a cloud bank. I saw gray flecks in her shag cut.

Those steel-rimmed glasses gave her 3-D vision. She saw through me like some creature in a monster matinee. I shut my eyes to shut her gaze out and deploy the big close-up. A black curtain closed off her kiss.

BERNIE SPINDEL'S BUG VAN

Outside Steve Cochran's Apartment Complex
West Holly*weird*
2/16/54

Bernie said, "I'm wary of this job. This psycho cocksucker scares me."

Studly Steve lived on Havenhurst between Fountain and the Strip. Three sparkle-Spanish buildings/one cool courtyard. Six pads per building. Call girls and minor movie minions ensconced within.

It's 9:14 a.m. now. Steve's home. His coon maroon Merc's parked out back.

I lit a cigarette and gargled Old Crow. I had a case of the yammering yips and the mean megrims. I kept seeing things. Strongarm cops in surging surveillance. Women I wanted wicked baaaaaaaad and weren't there. Waiting wilted me. I wanted WORK. I popped two Dexedrine to goose things along.

Bernie said, "He's got four rooms, plus bathroom. I checked with the County Planning Office. The walls are soft stucco, and all rough-finished. They'll be easy to drill and respackle. I broke in last night and carved some paint chips. It's a new paint job, so it should be easy to match."

We wore TV repairman jumpsuits. Master keys would get us in. Steve the Stud was filming some crime lox called Private Hell 36. Bernie spot-tailed him yesterday. He said Steve got his all-day calls at 9:30 a.m.

I said, "We'll piggyback the listening post on Sweetzer. Burt Lancaster's got his torture den in the same building. My Marines will monitor both locations. We'll have a man hot-wired in at all times."

Bernie went Oy. "Burt swings both ways. Ward Wardell told me. He buys his boys from a swish named Dwight Gilette."

I said, "To each his own. You're a big cheese at your synagogue, and you've got eight schvartze girlfriends."

Bernie went Oy. I pointed across the street. Studly Steve's rolling. His cherry Merc's wheeling southbound.

We loaded up. Drills, spackle paste, paint and brushes—check. Wire rolls, condenser mikes, friction tape—check. Wire clamps, spatulas, industrial vacuum—check. Toolbox packed with close-work tools—check.

We packed two big metal cases. They were marked "Acme TV Repair." We vacated the van and coursed through the courtyard. We hit Steve's door at a sprint. Bernie jabbed keys at the door lock. Key #3 got us in.

I popped through the pad. It was cool, cozy, and tidy tight. Living room/ bedroom/kitchen/bathroom/washroom. One connecting hallway. One demented decorating motif:

World War II. Ripe real regalia. Booty from Berchtesgaden and Jap flags salvaged from Saipan. Swastika wall banners. German helmets as cereal serving bowls, sunk in the sink. SS-motif ashtrays. Rising-sun rugs. Showy shadow-boxed Lugers. Beaver pix of Eva Braun—der Führer's freaky Frau. Choice tchotchkes on chairs/tables/wall racks. Dig this, deranged: Jap shrunken heads, beady-eyed beasts, all wearing fit-to-size Brooklyn Dodger hats.

Bernie slavered, slack-jawed. I got out my Minox spy camera and shot it all. I smelled Smear Job. Let's foto-fuck this creep.

Steve Cochran, the Big Dick Bürgermeister of the L.A. Reich. Nazi nests at Warner's, Metro, and Fox. We'll loose-link it to last year's Nazi/flying saucer piece. Bondage Bob Harrison partied with Paraguayan parasite Alfredo Stroessner and wicked Juan Perón. They hid hordes of Hitlerites, circa '46. Commie columnists called Confidential "fascistic," "nativistic," "hucksteristic," and "the voice of vile volition in the vox populi." The coruscating Cochran exposé would lash those leftist lies!!!!!

Bernie jerked at my jumpsuit and jacked me half off my feet. "Freddy, let's go. Quit gawking. We've got work to do."

So, yeah—we worked. We whipped wires to wainscoting and wiggled them under rugs. We drilled white walls and wedged in bug mounts. We rigorously respackled and repainted. We vacuumed up Spackle dust. We planted microphones in cracks, crevices, crawl spaces. We ripped the receivers off the two telephones and planted condenser mikes. We studied standing lamps and stuck bug mounts under the shades. We bugged the bedroom and looped the living room. We supersocked in the sound.

Tick, tick, tick. Four-plus hours' work. I was sweat-swacked and dexie-ditzed and stomp-the-stars elated. We repacked our gear. Bernie sighed and went Oy. Opportunity is love. That maladroit maxim moved through me.

The Sweetzer listening post. A two-bedroom flop in a Deco dive off Willoughby. We recorded Burt Lancaster's torture tilts with stacked starlets there. Plus three call-girl cribs. Plus an opium den in the back of the Hunan Hut—"Home of the Shanghai Shipwreck Cocktail."

The pad was wire-whipped, floor to rafters. Cable cords and outlet plugs jammed up the joint. We manned tape rigs round the clock. Bernie set up a transceiver in Steve Cochran's living room. It went optimum operational at 6:00 p.m. 6:00 sharp came and went. I slipped on headphones and listened to dead air.

Jimmy Dean dropped by. He brought nudie pix and brief bios for Rock Hudson's wife candidates. Dig: six backlot babes who cadged coffee for cast and crew and blew select directors. I told Jimmy they looked gooooood. Jimmy donned earmuffs and manned the Hunan Hut rig. He passed on choice *sin*uendo. The delivery dinks pushed pills packed in with their pupu platters and pork fried rice. Bela Lugosi and Peter Lorre toked "O" in the den. They schmoozed their guest shots on Vampira's late-nite TV show. Vampira went lez in the Los Amigas home for girls. She was running a lez string out of Googie's, as we speak.

More dead air. I got bored and called my answering service. Oooooh—Miss Joan "Stretch" Perkins called. She wanted to know if she could pick up Lance the Leopard and install him at my crib. I called Stretch back and set it up. I urged caution. Stretch blew me a fone kiss and said she'd make out with me soon.

Joi called. Johnnie Ray called. The answering-service girl said they got catty. "Tell Mr. Otash he's hung like a cashew—and who knows better than me?" "Tell Mr. Otash he's an evil storm trooper—and soon the whole world will know."

Fuck that shit—I went back to line hiss and dead air.

Time ticked. I chain-smoked and scratched my balls. The Hunan Hut delivered dinner. I noshed Noodles à la Chang and China Joe's Chop Suey. Steve Cochran's phone rang at 8:29.

Steve picked up. The voice activator vibrated. "It's Lew's War Surplus. We've got a clearance sale on Schmeisser machine pistols, Nazi daggers, and Jap shrunken heads—flamethrower-fried on Iwo Jima." Steve bought three daggers and three heads. The guy said he'd fix them up with Dodger baseball caps.

More dead air. I doodled on scratch paper. I wrote "Freddy & Stretch" and drew a heart around it. Time ticked. Steve's phone rang at 10:52.

I picked up. Static and line fuzz futzed with the call. I got a woman's voice. I got Steve's voice. I got static, fuzz, garbles, line lint, lewd laffs, and static stew.

I cuffed the console. I hit the squelch switch. I ditzed dials and got this:

The woman said, "Well…I don't know…are you…can sign up the talent?"

Steve said, "Are you kid…concept…time has come….Celebrity smut. You want to talk—"

The call static-stuck, fuzzed and futzed, and diminuendoed to dead air.

Googie's hop-hop-hopped. The Iris Theatre ran a sneak peek of some 3-D dog. The Googie geeks retained their 3-D glasses and goofed themselves out of their gourds.

Jejune jerkoffs. Their revelry ran rampant and rubbed me raw. Tattle tipsters took note of me. I got stuck with stacks of stale bread.

Yawn. Orson Welles sliced the Black Dahlia. Check The Lady from Shanghai. Grok the symbiology. Yawn. Bill Holden's in the DT ward at Queen of Angels. He's banging night nurses two at a pop. Yawn. I've got morgue pix. The Carole Landis suicide, back in '48. All-nude. Full bush. Kodachrome color—if I'm lyin', I'm flyin'!!

Snore. There's a plot to throw the '54 World Series. The *Jew*nited Nations is pulling the strings. Snore. Grace Kelly's a nympho. She turned Johnnie Ray straight in a mop closet at the Crescendo. Snore. I know you won't believe this—but Pat Nixon hatched Count Basie's mulatto love child!!!!!

I believed all of it and none of it. I was back at the listening post. Unknown woman: "Can sign up the talent?" Steve Cochran:

"Concept…time has come….Celebrity smut."

Quivering question marks broiled my brain and skimmed under my skin. I couldn't stop the scurrilous scroll.

Then:

The Googie's geeks froze. I froze. Four fuzz walked in and waltzed the floor. Not just any cops. The LAPD Hat Squad. Sergeant Max Herman. Sergeant Red Stromwall. Sergeant Harry Crowder. Officer Eddie Benson.

LAPD Robbery. Hunter-slayers of heist men. All six-four and 220. All in pearl gray suits and white panama hats. The PD's hardest hard boys. Chief William H. Parker's personal pit dogs. Mastiffs on a mission to maul for their master.

I stood up. They whipped up and braced me. Red Stromwall said, "Hi, Freddy."

Max Herman said, "The Chief wants to see you, Freddy."

Harry Crowder said, "I like your suit, Freddy. Where'd you steal it?"

Eddie Benson said, "You were always a dipshit, Freddy."

Max Herman tugged a belt loop and made me his bitch. Red Stromwall poked me with a beavertail sap. Harry Crowder and Eddie Benson flanked me and dwarfed me and made me mince minuscule.

We marched out to the parking lot. A PD plainclothes car rumbled, off by itself. Bill Parker sat in the backseat. I looked in. He looked out. I said, "How's tricks, Bill? Your wife still doing her act with the mule?"

Harry Crowder kidney-punched me. Red Stromwall sapped me. Max Herman said, "Don't screech, Freddy. You'll sound effeminate." Eddie Benson tossed me in the backseat.

I caught my breath and caressed my kidneys. Parker wore civvies. Parker spoke in his foghorn South Dakota drawl.

"Joan Hubbard Horvath, the widow of the man you killed in the line of duty, was murdered in her home last night. Her kids were off on a school trip. It appears to be a hot-prowl sex snuff. The house was ransacked, and the woman was strangled and stabbed. We found a total of fourteen envelopes bearing your fingerprints. Two of them were stuffed with twenty- and fifty-dollar bills."

Parker paused. He evil-eyed me. He made with the malocchio.

"The victim fought. We found beard and skin fragments under her nails, and I can see that you're unmarked. Her assailant had AB-negative blood. Your PD file reveals that you have O positive. This exonerates you as the actual killer, but not as an accomplice or a material witness. I would advise you to provide me with a plausible explanation for your prints on those envelopes."

I evil-eyed Parker. I made my malocchio more hopped-up and hateful than his.

"I killed Ralph Mitchell Horvath under the PD's implied dictum that cop killers must die. He was unarmed. I planted a throwdown gun on him and shot him in the back. Then the cop he shot recovered, which rubbed me the wrong way. I've been laying penance payments on Joan Horvath, going back five years. I've never spoken to her. You're a good Catholic boy, Bill. You get the guilts sometimes, so you know how it is."

Parker lit a cigarette and blew smoke in my face. I coughed the smoke back in his face.

"There's more to this, and most of it makes you look bad. First off, we've seen you talking to the Beverly Hills PD, and we make you and your boys for the 459 on Senator Kennedy's hotel suite. You screwed up the print transparencies, though. You laid down prints for all three of those shitheels who've been terrorizing Beverly Hills. That was a big mistake. George Collier Akin left the gang two weeks ago. We have very sound intelligence on this. He insisted on killing the girl they kidnapped, but Brown and Dulange held him back, and the girl was released. George Collier Akin is alleged to be casing solo hot-prowl jobs in my jurisdiction, and I've told Max and the boys to find him and kill him. They may seek to consult you in the course of their investigation, and I would advise you to cooperate. It might prevent the Beverly Hills PD from filing charges on you."

Parker paused. Parker went Shoo, you cockroach. I stepped out of the car. The Hats surrounded me, hail-fellows all.

Max Herman shook my hand. "Here's to you, Freddy."

Red Stromwall shook my hand. "Be good, kid."

Harry Crowder shook my hand. "We miss you, Freddy. Keep your chin up."

Eddie Benson shook my hand. "Stay clean, dipshit."

I cut free and stumbled back into Googie's. I beelined for the front door and plowed busboys and waiters, en masse. I knocked over drink trays. Customers went eeeek and crap-your-pants cringed. I grabbed a double scotch off Gene "the Mean Queen's" table and guzzled it, sans consent. I capsized a waitress and sent milk shakes and club sandwiches airborne. I crashed out the front door and snagged my Packard pimp sled at the curb.

The Strip was one block north. I blew a red light and whipped westbound. Ciro's was close. I floored the gas and flamed through late-nite traffic. I swung hard right and racked my undercarriage all up the porte cochere. I fender-bended Ferraris and Facel-Vegas and didn't give a fucking shit. Two car-park kids tried to corner me. I decked them and downed them and bashed them in the balls. They went ball-bashed falsetto and mewed for their mamas in Miami and Milwaukee.

I crashed into the club. The floor was packed tight-tight. Johnnie Ray stomped the stage. He woman-wiggled and wanton-warbled his hit song, "Cry." He wiggled the mike and wailed like a jilted fishwife. He sobbed, he sighed, he tossed his spit curl and spun his hearing aid out into the crowd.

Joi and Liberace sat front-row center. I charged up. Patrons saw me. They stood up and went Whoa and Halt now!!!!! I dumped waiters and a fat broad at Bing Crosby's table. I made the front row. Joi and Lee looked up. Joi lip-synched, "You loser cocksucker."

I poured her Tom Collins down her dress and ice-cubed her chichis. Joi roundhoused me and fell flat on her ass. Patrons yowled. Johnnie blew his crescendo and cried for real. I dumped Joi's purse and found her Seconal stash. I guzzled out the contents. I chased five fat red devils with Lee's double martini. Lee looooved it. He pinched my cheek and swooned. I lurched and lunged and levitated my way out of the club. I slid into my sled and sluiced eastbound on Sunset.

Some new solar system subsumed me. Streetlights went mauve and pink. A-bomb particles parsed and pierced my windshield. I eyeballed passersby. Every man's face went gargoyle, every woman's went succubus. Steve Cochran sang "Das Horst Wessel Lied." I ripped Nazi flags off his walls.

There's Vine Street. I cut south and cut east on Camerford.

The Horvath house was hot-lit, postmidnite. Nosy neighbors gawked. Outside arc lights glare-glowed the pad and strafed the sky. I parked behind a row of black-and-whites and K-cars. Plainclothesmen and bluesuits pounded the porch. Kids' toys and furniture were loose on the lawn. The front door stood open. Print men dusted walls. Foto men snapped fotos. Lab men fiber-swept the floors.

Burglary dicks checked window openings and cluck-clucked. I saw Harry Fremont at work. The red devils ripped me and turned it all topsy-turvy. I went blank. Arc-light glare burned my eyes. Joan Horvath and Joan Perkins kissed me like Liz in that close-up. I went black-blank and blinked. I saw Bill Parker and Red Stromwall pass a flask on the porch. I slid my car seat back to deflect the arc light. I got snug and supine. I said, “Please, God—make me safe,” and passed out.

I passed out cold and woke up windshield-warmed by the sun. My windows were up. A cop type stood in the street and eyeballed me. I didn’t recognize him. He got into an unmarked unit parked in front of me. I grabbed a stray piece of paper and wrote down the rear plate number.

It all came back. I prayed my way out of the sunlight and blinked back to black. Rosie Clooney sang, “Hey there, you with the stars in your eyes.”

THE SECURITY OFFICE AT THE SLEAZOID HOLLYWOOD RANCH MARKET

2/17/54

I made the Mirror. NITEKLUB INFERNO: P.I. FRED O. IN FRANTIC FRACAS. I made the Herald: Confidential COP OTASH IN CIRO'S BROUHAHA. The hot headlines heartwarmed me. They instilled instant pride. Joan Horvath dead-deadened it. Freddy, what thou hath wrought.

Bondage Bob called and congratulated me. The insidious ink spiked Confidential's early-morning sales. Ciro's was Sheriff's turf. Bob called Gene Biscailuz and pledged ten thou to his reelection campaign. It covered the cost of my ten-minute tantrum and frosted out possible beefs.

Joan Horvath got a bleary blip in the Herald's local spread. WIDOW WOMAN SLAIN IN HOLLYWOOD HOME. BURGLARY-SEX MOTIVE CITED.

Bob and I biz-talked. I tossed him the tattle on the Rock Hudson wife hunt and laid out the lowdown on the would-be wives. Bob knew candidate Claire Klein. She played shakedown shill at Whisper, back in '51. Her part-time gig at Universal was a plain ploy to meet extortable men. I weighed in: We've got to scoop the fan mags on this one. Dole out the dish on Rump Ranger Rock's disingenuous dates with real women. Sock in the subtext. It's a shadow shuck. Hollywood will fuck you when no one else will.

Bob agreed. He added, And we'll double-cross Rock on his wedding nite and expose his boy bent. We yukked the irksome irony. I dumped the dirt on the Steve Cochran gig. Bob pooh-poohed the Nazi-Jap fetish trove and called Steve a history buff and no more. He himself paid five thou for a swastika-print bikini once worn by Leni Riefenstahl. His girlfriend turned heads at that big Polio Fund pool party.

"And, Freddy—I heard Cochran leans left, if anything."

I closed with the cloying clue of "Celebrity Smut." Bob told me to work the listening post my own self. “And—if it pans out, we’ll send in a female ringer to entrap Steve—Claire Klein might be good.”

Bob signed off with “Sayonara.” I offered “auf Wiedersehen,” boss. I shit, showered, shaved, and made myself march to the mirror. I saw myself and saw where all this was going. Freddy, what thou hath wrought. I called Harry Fremont and made a lunch date.

I drove home. A basketball hoop was nailed beside my front door. Stretch sank long hook shots. She wore her USC silks. Neighbor kids watched. Lance the Leopard lounged in my doorway. Kids patted him and fed him potato chips.

I snuck up behind Stretch. I said, “If you convince me you’re really nineteen, I’ll toss your hair and kiss your neck.”

Stretch laughed. She dropped the ball and pulled her hair to one side. The kids scoped the exchange. What’s this repob? She’s bigger than him.

“I was born January 18, 1935, at Good Samaritan. That means you can go ahead.”

I caressed her bare shoulders and kissed her neck. I stood tiptoed to do it. The kids clapped. Lance the Leopard looked over and growled.

Stretch sank three long ones and swiveled. She grabbed my belt and pulled me inside my own pad. Lance followed us in. He detoured to the front bathroom and guzzled toilet water. Stretch waved to the kids and kicked the door shut.

I crapped out on the couch. Stretch stretched out and laid her head on my lap.

“My mom showed me the Mirror. Did you have fun at Ciro’s last night?”

“Do you live with your mom and dad?”

“I live with my mom. My dad was killed on Saipan, when I was eight. What did you do in the war?”

“I was a drill instructor at Parris Island. I trained Marines who got killed at Saipan, but I never went overseas myself.”

“Why not?”

“Because I knew I’d get killed, and I didn’t have the stones to take the risk.”

"Why?"

"Because I'm fearful and selfish, and I have to get whatever it is that I want, and that's as far as I'm going with this line of questioning."

Stretch balled my hands into fists and kissed the knuckles. She kicked off her sneakers and dangled her feet off the couch. Lance hopped on my favorite chair and licked his balls.

"You're watchful, too. You forgot to mention that. And you're diffident and circumspect around me. And none of the girls at Linda's hates you, even though you broke half the liquor bottles during that Beverage Control raid in '48. And you're chagrined for digging on me, even though you spy on people and expose them in print, and beat the crap out of people who threaten to sue your low-life magazine."

I smiled. "I stole the bottles I didn't break, and Billy Eckstine bought them off me at half price."

"Billy likes you. I wouldn't be here if he didn't."

"Billy's Billy, and he's not all moonlight and roses. He tried to promote you to me and my recently ex girlfriend."

Stretch pried my fists loose and placed my hands on her breasts. Hey there, you with the stars—

"Billy overrates me, in lots of different ways."

"You're nineteen, and you're looking around. I get that you're bold—and you think the rules don't apply to you. That's as far as I'll take that line of chat, until I see you start making mistakes."

"You're saying the only thing that you can teach me right now is efficacy?"

"I'm saying that for some people, opportunity is love, and you might be one of them."

The dizzy duo at the listening post. Leashed Leopard and Large Lady. Race Rockwell and Ward Wardell swoooooooned.

Stretch wore a tweed skirt, saddle shoes, and a pink oxford shirt. Lance wore a spiked collar that Bondage Bob bought him for Christmas. I brought three pizza pies and a cold case of Brew 102.

Stretch loomed and she-lorded it over three big men. Lance roamed the rooms and let people pat him. Race fed him anchovy pizza. Ward showed off our new corkboard. There's Operation Rock

Wife bold-bannered—with nude pix and dippy dossiers tacked below.

We snarfed pizza pie and went to work. Race worked the Hunan Hut tap, I worked the Cochran line. Ward worked Call-Girl Line #1. Stretch got Call-Girl Line #2. Cool kicks motivated me. It was the lez line. Bernie Spindel and I hot-wired the crib—Flores south of Sunset. The *sin*sational sapphic scene sang dusk to dawn and entrapped occasional big-name babes and butches. Let's see how Stretch registers and reacts.

We pulled chairs up to the consoles. We plugged in. We donned headphones. Lance noshed pizza crusts and crapped out on the floor.

I sat close to Stretch. We played kneesies and lazy-linked hands. I got two hours of dead air. Some unknown male called Steve the Stud at 8:19 p.m. Steve called him "Cal." They schmoozed Private Hell 36. Steve dished Howard Duff and wife Ida Lupino. Duff was a souse. La Lupino was a snout trout. She blew him behind the food truck. Dorothy Malone sizzled. "I've got this celebrity smut angle I'm working on. She'd be a prime candidate."

Bingo!!!—Celeb Smut Lead #1/8:27 p.m.

The call capped at 8:33. Dead air dinged in its weary wake. I watched Stretch work the lez line. Her headset was clamped tight. She notched notes in her fone log. She evinced deep delight and entrenched ennui.

Boredom banged me. I snagged Claire Klein's buff shot and dossier off the corkboard and sat back down. Stretch snatched the buff shot and studied it. She winked and went Oooh-la-la. She said, "Rock should marry her."

I winked back. Claire was boss-built and credibly credentialed. Born: New York City, 8/11/21. World War II Wave lieutenant. Court-martialed and DD'd on a pandering beef. Emigrated to Palestine, '47. Seduced and tortured Arab spies for the Irgun and the Stern Gang. Shit—the A-rabs are my put-upon people!!!!!

Claire hits America. She moves to L.A. and gets a California teaching credential. She teaches algebra at Le Conte Junior High. She gets part-time studio work. Claire's a climber. She takes scalps and moves on. Bob Aldrich, Otto Preminger, Henry Hathaway, Willy Wyler. She visits Burt Lancaster's torture den. Burt wants to spin her on his wall-mounted dartboard and toss darts at her legs. Claire won't play. Burt comes on coercive. Claire shows him the shiv strapped to her left leg. Burt amps up the ante. Claire drops names.

Mickey Cohen, Lou Rothkopf, Sammy Dorfman, Baldy Stein. The kosher kowboys in the L.A. rackets. All zany Zionists. All demented and dyspeptic. Burt backs off—Claire's bad to the bone and calamitously connected.

Steve the Stud's phone rang. Log it—10:21 p.m.

Steve picked up. Unknown Male #2 jabbered. Steve called him "Fritz." They schmoozed the Jap sword and Jap-shrunken-head market. Fritz called it "a growth industry." Biz was up, up. Biz was bullish per Nazi-knife cutlery, all swastika-embossed. Plus Nazi helmets recut into chafing dishes and soup tureens.

Steve said, "I'm moving out of my kraut phase, Fritzie. Find me some Makarov pistols and some NKVD memorabilia. I wouldn't say no to daggers from some Ivan's Lubyanka stash."

The call droned on. I exhumed Bondage Bob's dish: "Cochran leans left, if anything."

The call capped out—10:42 p.m. Dead air doused me and slid me into sleep. I went someplace safe and soft. I snored in sync with Lance the Leopard, laid out at my feet.

Time ticked. Safe and soft became wet and warm. I swam in the River Styx. Joan Horvath rebaptized me. She wore a Nazi-print bikini and swim fins. Stretch jerked off my headset. Such innocence, such glee.

"Dig this, Uncle Freddy. The dots connect. Claire Klein's hooking, part-time. She tricked with that Communist Party cultural guy V. J. Jerome, who's supposedly infiltrating Hollywood, and the third spoke of the wheel was Babs Payton, who's been on the skids since she dumped Franchot Tone, according to the fan mags my mom reads. They went at it for two hours straight, and then they drank vodka and slurped borscht."

OLLIE HAMMOND'S ALL-NITE STEAKHOUSE

Wilshire and Serrano
2/18/54

We drank lunch. My appetite was up, up. I kicked assiduous ass all morning. Morty Bendish at the Mirror. The Transom and Whisper guys. I told them Rock Hudson was my gig, X-clusive. They kvetched, moped, and moaned. Blood bloomed on my beavertail sap. I sacked their civil contracts and ratched their rights of free speech.

Harry badged our waiter. He slipped us a jug at the PD's stock half price. Old Crow and Dexedrine—va-va-voom!!!!!

"Let's get to it. You want in on the Joan Horvath snuff. You've been waxing sentimental on that nutty broad for years. The price is five yards to buy in, and a yard a pop for special favors."

I flashed my flash roll and peeled off ten C-notes. Frazzled Freddy always comes flush. Harry cadged the cash and smiled smug.

"It looks like a hot-prowl 459, gone way bad. The guy came in a cracked window and left rubber-glove prints on the sill. He had Joanie's purse in his hands when she woke up and fought him. She scratched him, and we took AB-negative blood spill and dark and coarse beard fragments out from under her nails. That's good, so far. But there wasn't enough blood to run individual comparisons on. In this case, that means that blood type can exonerate, but it can't convict."

I gargled Old Crow. "Go on, and tell me why you called Joan a 'nutty broad.' "

Harry made the jack-off sign. "One, she married Ralphie Horvath, had two kids with him, and stuck with him. Two, she was overqualified for a low-life thief and punk like Ralphie. She had some big education, and was some kind of Russian-history scholar, but all she did was stay at home and tend to her snot-nosed kids."

I lit a cigarette. "Here's the big question. Did George Collier Akin do the job?"

Harry shook his head. “I’m not so sure. Bill Parker’s convinced himself, he’s convinced the Hats, and you know what that means. Parker saw the hospital pix of that girl that Akin, Brown, and Dulange abducted, and now he’s running hot, with a thermometer so far up his ass that it hurts. He wants Akin dead, the Hats want to kill him, and it’s true that Akin broke with Brown and Dulange when they wouldn’t agree to snuff the girl. Okay, we can assume that Akin—who’s a hot-prowl man from way back—is off working solo, and most likely in L.A. city. So far, so good—but I go back to ’43 with this evil cocksucker—and the Horvath caper doesn’t look like his kind of deal.”

I stubbed out my cigarette. “How so?”

Harry said, “Okay. He’s got dark and coarse facial hair, so that matches. I checked his Quentin file, and he’s got AB-negative blood, so that matches, and it’s pretty rare. But I popped Akin for eight hot prowls in ’43, and he always wore a rubber red devil mask, cut down low on his neck, to protect him from scratching and gouging, and to further terrorize his victims—because he is the most sadistic son of a whore I’ve ever met—so if the Hats want to put him down, who am I to raise a stink?”

I gargled Old Crow. It rerouted my dexie surge, molto bene.

“He wanted to kill the cheerleader girl, but he’s never killed any women, prior to that, that you know of.”

Harry twirled his glass. “Never. He spent ’43 to ’51 in Quentin. He paroled out in November, hung up his parole, and went rogue. We’ve had six more hot-prowl/assaults possibly attributable to the Red Devil Bandit since then—all with grievous bodily harm short of murder. Then this fuck hooks up with Brown and Dulange, and it’s the BHPD’s grief from that point on.”

I said, “He split from Brown and Dulange two weeks ago. You ‘assume’ that he’s working solo, but you’re ‘implying’ that he’s not strictly adhering to his Red Devil Bandit MO, and you’ve got no reported hot prowls that you’re sure he’s good for.”

Harry sighed. “You nailed it. Never let it be known that the infamous Freddy O. drew a dumb breath.”

I chained cigarettes. “What else? Describe the crime scene.”

“The pad was ransacked. I think he was looking for something besides purse cash and whatever else he could carry away. There was over six grand of your penance money stashed in Joanie’s clothes closet, and he didn’t bother to find it or steal it. This whole deal reeks of personal animus. It’s an I-hate-you-and-I’m-going-to-kill-you job, and that spells revenge."

I flashed my flash roll and rolled off five more C-notes. Harry snatched them up.

"You're a white man, Freddy. I'll have complete background paper on Joanie by tomorrow."

I got noxiously nostalgic. "Harry," "Ralphie," "Joanie." '49 to '54. A kid cop THEN. A Pervdog of the Nite NOW.

"I remember that day in the squadroom. You were younger and not quite so fat. 'Hey, kid, you look bored. Go shag this Ralphie guy and kill him.' "

Harry went nix. "Can it, Freddy. You can't pull the shit you pull in your everyday life and think that this jive crusade of yours will render you squeaky-clean."

Clean," shit. "Jive crusade"—malignantly more so. Harry Fremont was bent and bought and paid-for since the year one. He knew bewilderingly bupkes per Opportunity is Love.

I drove back to my pad. The door was whipped wide open. I heard screeches, yowls, growls, eeeeks, and roars. I ran inside and grokked on the grief.

Catfight. Lance the Leopard versus Joi Lansing—my exultant ex and extortion partner par excellence.

Joi was packing left-behind undies. Lance smelled thievery. He pinned Joi to the back wall and clawed her clothes to torn tatters. Her dress dripped off of her. He sharp-shredded her brassiere. His claws caught frayed fabric and rip-rip-ripped. I sensed sexual intent. Lance lashed at Joi. He orgiastically ordered up a cross-species striptease.

I laffed. Joi screeched, "Freddy?" I grabbed Lance's spiked collar and pull-pull-pulled. Lance went sulky submissive. He cursory-growled and slither-slunk to the bathroom. I heard him lap up a toilet-water aperitif.

I said, "What's shaking, baby?"

Joi said, "You loser shitheel."

I stepped toward her. She stepped toward me. She launched a left hook and landed it mid-face. She ripped a right. I let it land and pushed her down on the bed.

She said, "One for what you did to Johnnie, and one for that stunt you pulled at Ciro's. And tell Lee to get that rape-o cat declawed."

I pulled a chair up. Joi grabbed her purse and dug out her cigarettes. I lit her up.

"It's good to see you, kid."

"You insouciant shitheel. I'm never coming back to you, and I'm never working with you again—not in this lifetime."

I laffed. "How's this sound? Rock Hudson needs a wife. Lew Wasserman's protecting his reputation and Universal's investment. I could let you be the girl, for ten percent of the alimony deal when you dump him."

Joi kicked out at me. Her shoes flew wide and missed me. Her nylons were nicked and rife with runs. Lance clawed clooooose.

"I'm never coming back to you."

"I heard you the first time."

"No more shakedowns, no more bait jobs, no more three-ways."

"Come on. You're saying no more Liz Taylor in the sack?"

Joi blew smoke up at me. Her fierce façade cracked a tad. She'd landed two good ones. I wiped blood off my lips.

"The world's hip to you, Freddy. Your 'Tattle Tyrant holds Hollywood hostage' shtick is wearing people thin."

"Who's 'people,' babe? Come on. Name some names that mean something to me."

Joi rehooked her brassiere. "How's Steve Cochran sound? He said he's seen you and Bernie Spindel lurking around his place. He ran a bug check and came up empty, but he's got you pegged as Public Cockroach Number One, and he said you're heading for a good ass kicking."

Steve the Stud. There's a grabber. It's an irksome inkling of Something.

I lied loud. "His building's full of call-girl cribs. Bernie and I were planting some taps. 'Lurking,' shit. He's talking out of his ass, and the magazine's got no stake in him."

Joi flipped her burning butt at me. It singed my Sy Devore coat.

"You're jealous. Steve's got all the goods you're envious of. I know you, Freddy. You've got to know what's going on with him, and you'll pay me for the debrief."

My throat clamped and closed tight. My hands shimmy-shimmied. I whipped my wallet out and tossed bills on the bed.

Joi culled the cash and counted it. Confidential comes up flush. A grand for a five-minute snitch.

"I ran into Steve at Johnnie's. He told me he's making a 'message' smut movie, based on a hillbilly song by Bill Haley and His Comets, whoever the hell they are. He's trying to recruit some name actors and actresses, because the film will only be shown privately, so no one's career will get hurt. The song's called 'Thirteen Women and Only One Man in Town.' The atom bomb destroys the world, except for thirteen women and a man in this little desert burg, and the man has a giant dick, and he's on a crusade to repopulate the world. Get it? Steve's out of his gourd, and he's the director, the writer, and very obviously the star. He said he's got financial backing, but I don't believe him. Get it? He wants to lure thirteen women to the desert and get laid, and odds are, there's no film in the camera, and it's all some pipe dream."

"Celebrity smut." Steve Cochran's name in Jack Kennedy's address book. The phone records. Steve calls Jack/Jack calls Steve/Steve calls Jack.

I smelled Something.

"Five grand, love. I'll hot-wire you and send you in to bait him."

Joi smiled. "You're malleable, Freddy. You've always been easy to manipulate. It's the only thing that attracted me to you."

I rolled to the Ranch Market. A radio broadcast broiled, up in my office. Dig: sodden Senator Joe McCarthy rips Reds and socks out southland subpoenas. Dig, ditto: Jolting Joe and Bondage Bob are jungled up—larcenous land deals and sleazoid slum holdings. Heh, heh—Fractious Freddy knows all and holds all trump cards tight.

I turned off the radio and checked my in-box. Harry Fremont delivered, quicksville. Bingo!—a background brief on Joan Hubbard Horvath.

Joan, the big brain and undulating underachiever. She matriculates at UCLA, circa '39–'45. She logs advanced degrees in Eastern European languages. She speaks fluent Italian, Polish, and Russian. She works as an interpreter for the California State Senate, circa '46–'47. She marries riotous Ralphie Horvath, circa '48. She hatches his second-rate seed. She's got no visible means of support, then to now. But—this bodes BIG—Red Stromwall finds a Bank of America passbook tucked in Joan's undie drawer. AND—the current balance exceeds fourteen grand.

That's a brain broiler. That's prongingly provocative.

I recalled that cop car parked at the crime scene. I recalled that rear plate number I wrote down. I buzzed Central Burglary and braced Harry Fremont. Who's this cop cad working for? The plate number ain't LAPD. Harry said the suffix denoted a Fed sled. Maybe FBI or Treasury.

I downed two Dexedrine and gargled Old Crow. Aaahhh—my bloodstream blossomed and swelled. I called my answering service and checked my messages. Aaahhh—the wide world wants Freewheeling Freddy!!!

Joi called. Her koffee klatch with Steve the Stud was set for 7:00 p.m. Stretch called. She said she'd pop by my pad later. Bondage Bob called. Update me, sweetheart—what's with heavy-hung Steve? Jimmy called. It's official—Claire Klein's in for the Marry Rock gig. Midnite at Googie's—be there for the meet and greet. I called Bernie Spindel. Six-fifteen at Havenhurst. Joi's jamming up Steve the C.

Wow—Frantic Freddy's in demonic demand!!! He's THE man to see!!!

Joi kvetched. She emphatically emasculated my last stirring statement. We wire-whipped her in the back of Bernie's bug van. Freddy, the mike-mount's too tight. Freddy, the lead wire's bunched up in my brassiere. Bernie, quit honking me—get your fat paws off my tits.

The wire job ate up fifteen minutes. We shooed Joi out and reparked on Steve Cochran's side of the street. Joi broadcast static and high heels hitting pavement. Our earmuffs caught every rustle and riff. Bernie worked the transceiver. The live feed fed furtively in. Knock, knock—Joi's at Studly Steve's door. Creak/gnash—door-lock noise—Studly Steve's letting her in.

Static/voice burble/sound overlap. Bernie ditzed dials and recalibrated the rustles and riffs. We got settle-in sounds. Glasses clink/Steve serves drinks/cigarette lighters click.

Joi sighs. That's her "We're seated" signal. It's laying in, loud and clear. Incriminate yourself, shitbird. Smut's a felony bounce. Confidential gonna get yo ass. San Quentin's surging yo way.

Joi said, "Who decorated this place, Hermann Goering?"

Steve said, “It’s set decoration for the movie. I’m deep into the immersion aspect of it all. There’s this subplot I’m working on. The guy who’s out to repopulate the world is a former Nazi sympathizer, and he renounces Nazism and moves into a one-world mind-set. Apostasy is a major theme of this movie. It’s not all fun and games, and hide the salami.”

Joi hooted. “Baby, you’re avant-garde.”

“I’m beyond it, you mean.”

Joi: “Yeah? Well, who else thinks so? By that I mean, how many name people have you signed up, other than yourself as the star?”

Steve: “Anita O’Day and Barbara Payton have inked contracts, as they say in the trades. Lana Turner’s on the ropes and considering it.”

Joi: “That’s week-old bread at half price, sweetie. Anita’s a junkie, and Babs is turning cheapie tricks out of Stan’s Drive-In. And, Lana—she’s just jerking your chain.”

Steve: “Hang on to your hat. I’ve inked Gene Tierney. You’ve got to gas on that one. She scored in Laura and Leave Her to Heaven, and she was Jack Kennedy’s fiancée, back before he married that lockjawed stiff Jackie.”

Ooooh—Jack the K. jumps in. Ooooh—his name in Studly Steve’s address book.

Joi: “My ex, Freddy, sent some girls down to Acapulco, to spice up Jack’s honeymoon. I know from Jack, believe me.”

Steve: “And I know from Freddy O. My pals in politics have been passing along rumors. The studios are putting together a slush fund to put the skids to Confidential. Freddy and his storm troopers have been ratting out all these fags, dykes, and politically enlightened people. The boom’s coming down on Freddy, mark my words.”

Bernie made the jack-off sign and went Oy. The sweats swept over me. “Slush fund.” “Politically enlightened people.” That read RED in my book.

Joi: “Name names, lover. Your pals in politics. Who’ve I got looking over me, to make sure that the you know what don’t hit the fan, if I appear in this movie of yours?”

Steve: “Jack Kennedy, for starters. Joe McCarthy, even though he’s a fasco in the Confidential mode. Also, we’ve got Senator Bill Knowland, and Senator Hubert Humphrey. All these heavy guys are pals of mine, and these guys will put the squelch on any rumors that might seep out about the film, and you’ve got my word that it will only be screened for high-ticket people in politics and the industry—people who want to see—pardon my French—movie stars fucking and sucking and preaching the anti-A-bomb gospel as only I can write it. This is a high-ticket endeavor from jump street, lady—and you can get in on the ground floor."

Bernie went He craaaazy. Bernie grabbed his crotch and went Oy. Static broke through the broadcast. I doused dials and cleared the feed.

Joi: "…and it's not like I don't need the coin. But I'll tell you, though—the idea of screwing on film flips my switch. As long as the film doesn't make the rounds, like that photo of Marlon Brando with his mouth full."

Steve: "Marlon wants to appear in the film. I have this on good authority."

Joi hooted. "You're out of your gourd. As Bondage Bob Harrison says, 'I've got your good authority swinging.' "

Steve scoffed. "Mr. V. J. Jerome's my good authority. How's that for naming names? All the Group Theatre actors take their orders from him. And don't give me that fasco smear that he's in the employ of the Comintern. V.J. knows quality entertainment when he sees it."

Joi scoffed. "Okay, we're naming names. Okay, name me one name that can do me some good if and when my movie and TV career goes in the tank."

Steve: "Harry Cohn. How big is that? He runs Columbia, and he's bankrolling my film. He will personally see to it that nobody outside of a very elite circle of people see this movie. This is not a smut flick like you see at those Elks Club smokers."

The transceiver fritzed and glitched and broadcast stark static. It consumed the conversation. Bernie doused dials and replugged the console. I snared snippets of chat.

Steve: "Come on. It's not like you've never auditioned."

Joi: "Well…it's…not like I'm in any kind of ordained situation."

Line buzz/fuzz/stuck static. Wire warp and burned bulbs—the console's coughing smoke—

I dumped my headphones and hauled out of the van. I ran across the courtyard, rapidamente. I circled Steve the Stud's building and peeped ground-floor windows. I saw Steve's noxious Nazi regalia and Joi's skirt and shoes, shorn in a heap. I saw Jap flags and shadow-boxed shrunken heads, and heard gruff growls in bass-baritone. I tracked a trail of nylon stockings and men's Jockey briefs. I peeped one last Walpurgisnacht window—

And saw Joi gobble Steve the Stud, tonsil-deep.

Call me Cornuto. Call me shame-shattered and shit-shorn of power and agency. I made the midnite meet at Googie's. I surged with self-pity. Stretch called my answering service. She dumped our date and cited early practice. The Pervdog of the Nite knows better. Stretch now roils recumbent in savage sapphic embrace.

I sat alone. I nursed a numb-your-soul highball. Joi walked in the back door. She saw me and glimpsed my sick sorrow. I was l'étranger out of cool Camus—gallows-bound of my own device.

Joi went oooh-la-la. She rolled her eyes and held her hands two feet apart. She shot me the finger and walked back out the door.

I bebopped to a boo-hoo beat. Cuckold/Cornuto/jilted Johnny left in the lurch. Somebody save me. I'm sunk in this sink of self-hate.

Jimmy Dean and Claire Klein walked in the back door. La Klein wore blue jeans, Bass Weejuns, and a baleful Beethoven sweatshirt. She was rangy, busty, dark-haired, and unadorned. She had that proud/New York Jew/don't-fuck-with-me look.

I stood up. I primped. I blew off the blues and bloomed in the glow of new love.

They ambled over. This was biz on Bondage Bob's timecard. I snapped my fingers. My funk went finito.

A wetback waiter wafted into view. I ordered a pitcher of off-the-menu/high-test lemonade. 150-proof bourbon. Some ambiguous amphetamine. Pounded potions from Hop Ling's Hormone Hutch.

Jimmy played emcee. "Claire, this is Freddy. Freddy, this is Claire. I'm here as a full partner in this enterprise, and to ensure that Rock doesn't get hurt."

Claire said, "I'm here to marry him, not skin him alive."

The waiter bopped back. I played host and poured drinks. I said, "Don't smoke. This stuff tends to ignite."

We settled in. I studied Claire. I gassed on her crooked teeth and bold brown eyes. Here's my first fitful impression:

She's an agent provocateur. She lives to make shit shimmy to her own beat and bounce to her terms.

She said, "Jimmy's been briefing me. Steve Cochran, and all that."

She lived to pry. I caught that. I rerouted a reply.

"All that's the Rock deal, for the moment. Now that I've seen you in person, Miss Klein, I've got some ideas."

Jimmy sipped laced lemonade. "We're listening, boss."

I sipped lemonade. Claire sipped lemonade. Her pupils popped, instantaneous. Her brows broiled with sweat.

"Here's the drift. Six dates, covered in Confidential. Atypically wholesome by Confidential's standards, but we'll lay in some anti-Commie repob, to justify that. You play yourself. You're the bohemian algebra teacher at Le Conte Junior High. You meet Rock at Scrivner's Drive-In. You were sipping a pineapple malt, and some pachucos hassled you. This works an antipachuco message into the text. Rock walks into this fracas and beats up the pachucos. A flame sparks. He gives a pep talk to your algebra students. It's heartwarming. You have six dates. Your separate worlds collide and merge. Rock takes you to Ciro's and the Mocambo. You take him to culture caves and groove on le jazz hot. He proposes, you accept, the squarejohn press covers the wedding. You shack for the foreseeable future, and Jimmy watchdogs Rock and diverts him off boys. There's some bylaws I'll run by you when I know you better, and I'm not so afraid you'll scratch my eyes out."

Jimmy hoot-hooted. He eye-strafed the room and pupil-popped a built boy with bleached-blond hair. He ducked off to cull contact. I had Claire Klein to myself.

She said, "Let me guess the bylaws. Then I'll tell you what's acceptable, and what's not."

"Shoot, baby."

Claire said, "No side deals with Rock, his boyfriends, or any men I meet through him. No obvious extramarital liaisons with men I want to work on my own, or men I just plain like. Quit my job at Le Conte, or turn it into some jive fable of me helping underprivileged kids. Fink out all the skeevy goings-on I see in my swanky new Hollywood life."

I sipped laced lemonade. I made This Gesture. It meant bravo/stalemate/your move, mama-san.

Claire lit a cigarette. Bold girl. Brilliant girl. She understands chemical combustion. Her lemonade fails to ignite.

"No deals. Your bylaws stink. And, before you ask, yeah—I did pull a knife on Burt Lancaster. And, before it comes up, I was at Ciro's the other night, and caught your act with Joi Lansing, and if you think she'll ever play bait for you after the Cochran gig, think again. I'm better at this line of work than she is, and I'm not letting you lay down restrictions, even if it means blowing this 'Rock's wife' caper sky-high."

I took it in. I lit a cigarette. Freon Freddy. My lemonade fails to ignite.

"Okay. Do what you want. And, before you ask, yeah—I'll consider you for any bait gigs that might come up for the magazine."

Claire blew smoke rings. "It's not all a one-way street, baby. I've got quite a bit of inside dirt, and I've got no qualms about sharing it, especially as it pertains to the Reds and their sort of filth. I've finked to HUAC, and I'll fink to you—and at least you'll properly compensate me."

I made This Gesture #2. It meant capital C capitulation and wrung-out relinquishment.

Claire laughed. She flashed her crooked teeth. I went all woo-woo. Hey there, you with the stars in your eyes.

"Freddy O.'s a pushover. It's the last thing in the world I expected."

I said, "Let's go someplace and fall down. Let's crawl into a hole and not come out for a while."

Claire said, "Not tonight. I've got test papers to grade, and I can't let those disadvantaged kids down."

OUTSIDE THE HORVATH DEATH PAD

2/19/54

Late nites become me. They obfuscate and overtake me. They send me where I'm supposed to be.

I pulled up and parked on Camerford. LAPD yanked their crime-scene guard. The shit shack now stood dark. The clock marched toward midnite. I ran my radio and notched Nachtmusik.

Stan Kenton's "Machito." Jimmie Lunceford's "Uptown Blues." Gonesville, Daddy-O. Mad music to B and E by.

I ditzed the dial and extended the interlude. I got bop, by way of Bird and Deranged Dizzy. Bop bops me and sends me where I'm supposed to be.

I brought my evidence kit. I brought my burglar's tools. I was jazzed and jacked-up exhausted.

I'd worked Operation Rock Wife all day. Sexville, Daddy-O. Close contact with Claire Klein had me gooooooone.

Jimmy handled Rock and played director. Confidential supplied a foto man. I called Harry Fremont and brought him into the gig. Harry sprung three badass beaners from the Lincoln Heights drunk tank. They portrayed the pachucos who mob-menace Claire. We staged our stirring scene at Scrivner's Hollywood. Claire sips a pineapple malt in her '51 Ford. Rock lurks nearby. Swish carhops swarm him. He signs mucho autographs.

Jimmy feeds the cholos their motivation. He stamps them Stanislavskiites at the gate. Dig it: you want white pussy baaaaaaad.

They surround Claire's car. They coochie-coo her and weenie-wag her. Claire shrieks. Rock rocks to the rescue. He pounds the three pachuco punks to the pavement. LAPD rolls up and rousts the beaners. Harry Fremont cued them in advance.

It all worked, perfecto. Our fotog shot film and stills and got it all in four takes. Rock meets Claire. It's love at first sight. Jimmy counseled reluctant Rock. Brother, you have to. Lew Wasserman decrees that you take a wife.

I called Harry and pledged him five yards for his work. Harry shot me leads per the Horvath snuff.

Lead #1: he ran the plate number on that cop car I saw at the crime scene. Bip—it's a Fed sled/FBI/on loan to serpentine Senator Joe McCarthy and his L.A. Commie hunt. Lead #2: the Hats pulled in a shitbird pal of George Collier Akin's. He was a hump hot-prowl man himself. The Hats were hammering him haaaaaaaard.

Bird bopped me. Dizzy dinged me. I pulled on rubber gloves. I grabbed my evidence kit and rolled.

Shadows shrouded me. Streetlights were dim. I poured across the porch and braced the front door. I pulled a #4 pick and jammed the jamb upside the latch spring. The door popped open, faaaaast.

I pulled my penlight. I locked myself in. I laid my evidence kit on a chair. Harry got me the PD's print manifest. Joan's prints and her kids' prints were inked in.

Smudge-and-smear locations were noted. No other known or verified prints were found and logged in. Here's my job: roll overlooked touch-and-grab surfaces. Contrast and compare.

Chez Joan. It's all there for you to touch and taste. She's there for you as your own. Go forth, Pervdog—contrast and compare.

I roamed. I spread print powder on unlisted surfaces and pulled up dust and palm sweat. I worked back toward Joan's bedroom and saved it for last. I hit the kids' bedroom. It broke my hard heart. I pulled an unlogged little-kid print off a bed rail. I checked shelves and drawers for stashed booty and got zilch.

The kitchen reeked of overripe food and dumped trash. I rolled it, regardless. I dusted the breakfast-nook table and pulled up a full-digit print. I checked the print manifest and compared tents, arches, and whorls. Eureka—it's an unknown.

I inked it on a fresh print card. My pad prowl was now two hours and ten minutes in. My heart hurtled on overdrive. I stepped into Joan's bedroom and stood there.

Stale perfume stung me. It was Tweed or Jungle Gardenia. The Pervdog's a scent dog and knows whereof he speaks. I caught Joan's underscent. It jazzed me and fucked me up, in caustic concurrence. I penlight-flashed the walls and saw something.

A small borehole. Right there. The east-facing wall. Just above the floor. White Spackle paste caked at the edges. One frayed wire sticking out.

I knelt and flashed a close-up. I'm a bug-and-tap pro. I know bug-and-tap work when I see it. This was a bore-and-tap access point. The frayed wire was old. The bug-and-tap mounts had been removed. The Spackle paste was old and crumbled. The bug-and-tap removal man did a shit camouflage job.

Stale perfume. Tweed or Jungle Gardenia, mixed with her—

I went through the bedroom drawers. Joan's underthings were stacked neatly. The stale perfume scent became her scent, all by itself.

I racked out at the Ranch Market. Bondage Bob called early and drilled me out of a dream. Joi rolled her eyes and held her hands two feet apart. Joi flipped me off and walked out of my life.

Bondage Bob reprised my dreary dreamscape. He demanded dish on the Steve Cochran gig. I laid out the lowdown on Joi's bait job. Bondage Bob popped his perceived punch line:

Luscious Lana Turner On Skids—Soon To Sign Smut Contract!!!

We discussed Steve the Stud's phone bills. He called Jack Kennedy and society scribe Connie Woodard. We discussed my address-book thefts at Jack's hotel suite. Connie's a Hearst hack. But—she's got listings for the blustery blacklist boys of the Hollywood Ten. Plus V. J. Jerome and other Red rogues. Bob considered Commophile Connie the key to my perceived Something Big. Joi's bait-and-bug job confirmed it.

Steve the Stud blathers per his "political pals." The address book/phone bill parlay. Connie Woodard calls Steve twenty-four times. Steve calls Connie twenty-one times. Jack Kennedy calls Steve nineteen times. Steve calls Jack fourteen times. Commophile Connie's once removed from Jack the K. Bondage Bob called it all a "pinko porridge"—now running into Red.

I told Bob I'd jump on Connie Woodard, and hung up. I omitted the time-consuming cost of my Horvath-snuff crusade. Time tumbled down on me. I reflex-popped two Dexedrine and turned time my way.

I had a pile of pilfered paper from the L.A. DA's Office. Writs and rejoinders, summonses and subpoenas—all signed, sealed, and loaded with legalese. I crafted a subpoena for Joan Horvath's college transcripts. I stamped it and forged it under the seal of DA Ernie Roll. I filled in the blur of blank paper and laid in the lawyeresque. I figured the UCLA admin hacks would kick loose within one week.

Rain and wild wind whipped me west on Wilshire. The run to Westwood Village took an hour and a half. My Packard pimpmobile carved a course westbound. Water-wilted pedestrians got out of my way.

I parked and ran into the main admin building. I flashed my Special DA's Investigator badge at a wowed desk lady. Ernie Roll shot me the shield. I'd pulled him out of the shit with two Jailbait Jills at a Jonathan Club soiree.

The desk lady pledged quick compliance. I winked to seal the deal. L.A. was winter storm–struck. The haul back to Holly*weird* would take two hours plus. I had time to kill. I schlepped over to the north campus library and ordered up microfiche.

The Hearst-hack Herald. Constance Woodard's column. Look for pro-Commie calumny cloaked in society slush. Look for Steve the Stud and Jack the K. puff pieces and mere mentions. See what jumps out.

The microfiche ran from December '53 back to August '51. Connie's column was called "Connie's Column." A small pic denoted all her one-page spreads. I recalled La Woodard from Jack K.'s A-bomb party. She was a knock-kneed redhead of the spinster-idealist ilk. She'd be richly ripe for Red recruitment.

I moved microfiche through a machine. I read Connie's columns. My hackles hopped at the start. Every Hancock Park hoedown, every debutante do and cutesy cotillion contained a rip on the Reds. It was tooooooooo much of a good thing. It was waaaaay out of print proportion. I scrolled back and hit May 16, '53. Jack K. attends a lawn bash. It fetes limp-wristed loser Adlai Stevenson. Connie properly prongs Adlai and calls him "pink in more ways than one." Ooohhy, Connie—you got dat right. But—she singles out Jack's kid brother, Bobby the K. She suck-up cites his tight ties to Joe McCarthy. And, dig: McCarthy has already disgraced himself. He's now anathema to astutely informed anti-Reds.

Tooooo much of a good thing. Waaaaay out of print proportion.

What's going on here? Connie's got Jack's name in her address book. It's right beside John Howard Lawson and V. J. Jerome. She calls Jack. She calls Steve Cochran. Steve's anti-A-bomb. That's suspect in itself. Steve's making "celebrity smut." He's "leaning left these days."

I scrolled back through Connie's columns. I skimmed for Jack and Steve worked into the word stew. '53, '52, '51. There—August 18.

Steve's captivating kids at a Shriners wingding. Connie's ever the muddled muckraker and gooey gadfly here.

"B-movie heartthrob Steve Cochran broke hearts at the Shriners last night, and not the hearts of the willing women so often attributed to him. No, readers—and he didn't brawl his way through the corridors of Children's Hospital, nor did he hit any doctors or slap any nurses who got in his way. He simply showered affection on those less fortunate than he, and in the process he claimed the hearts of many, including myself. Isn't it time the world looked at this very talented and humane young man as the gifted and sensitive artist that he is?"

I was floored, flabbergasted, and flipped into a rage. It's the Parthenon of Puff Pieces. It's the deus ex machina of disingenuousness. Connections, deflections, lies unworthy of me. I sensed it was Something Big at the start. Now I knew it was Something Wrong.

I levitated out of the library. Something Big/Something Wrong. I surfed the tsunami east on Sunset. It was some mad monsoon. A homing instinct homed me in on Havenhurst Avenue. I cut south and pulled up by Steve Cochran's courtyard.

Sit-still surveillance. Hard rain to hide me, couched curbside. Old Crow to kill the cold.

I dialed down the defroster and kept the windows clear. I strafed eyeball paths to the rear carport and Studly Steve's door. Time faltered and failed to trample my trance. Hours passed. Steve Cochran and Joi Lansing came out of the carport and headed for home.

His home. Her home now. They lugged her luggage. The matched set I bought her. Monogrammed at Mark Cross.

Some cute couple. A matched set. The Stacked and the Hung. Joi wobbled on too-high heels. A Band-Aid on Steve's right cheek set off his jawline and failed to mar his good looks.

Boo-hoo. Nobody knows de trouble ise seen, nobody knows my sorrow. Somebody, save me. Who said size doesn't count? I'm sunk in this sink of self-hate.

I bolted. I cut down to Fountain and came back up Crescent Heights. I parked in the rear lot and entered Googie's. I saw her, straight off. She wore her culture-cave ensemble. Blue jeans, Bass

Weejuns, baleful Beethoven sweatshirt.

I primped. I popped two Sen-Sen for instant fresh breath. She was alone. She sat in a back booth. I feigned the nonchalance of the cool and the callous and walked straight up.

She twirled her ashtray. She sipped absinthe on the rocks and nibbled french fries.

"Joi's shacking with Steve Cochran. Jimmy called and told me. He said he helped Joi pack the rest of her stuff."

I said, "The Teletype travels fast. I just found out myself."

"I hope this consoles you. Jimmy said there was a very big girl asleep in your bed. She's about as tall as that colored guy from KU. Joi hexed her and poured liniment on her basketball shorts."

I laffed and took a jolt of Claire's absinthe. It stung my too-taxed liver and looped to my head. Claire tossed french fries on my place mat.

"Bondage Bob cut you a check for your wardrobe. He wants you dressed to the nines for your Mocambo date next week. You're doubling with Rock and Jimmy. Jimmy's bringing Liz Taylor. He's inked for some big oater set in Texas, soon. Rock and Liz top-bill him. Jimmy and Liz are strictly platonic. They'll make sure Rock doesn't light out after some hunky chorus quiff."

Claire lit a cigarette. "I'll sell Liz some Israel bonds. She's devoted to the cause now. She's sub rosa with this wheeler-dealer, Mike Todd. She never stays unmarried for long. Mike's a landsman of the old school. Liz is forbidden fruit to him."

I laffed. "Liz is low-hanging fruit of the new school. Confidential winks at divorces, and the magazine will always be kind to her."

Claire tossed a changeup. "I shivved that Mex who whipped his chorizo out on me. Jimmy got him lit up on the Method, but he whipped it too close to my face."

I tossed a changeup. "Harry Fremont saw a Fed intel file. He said you were in on the King David Hotel bombing, back in the British mandate."

"I planted the bomb. And then I played girl sabra and lovingly carried out dead Englishmen."

"The PD guys took the Mex to Georgia Street Receiving. You were kind. It was a superficial flesh wound. He got off easy."

Claire twirled her ashtray. "You've got a history with Georgia Street. Harry loves to dish. He said your guy didn't get off so easy."

"Let's not get into scalp counts. I couldn't possibly compete with you."

Claire smiled. "You've got lineage. The Lebanese come to fight. You're a Christian, so your people were surely considered elites."

I made the jack-off sign. "I fell off my camel and landed in L.A. My whole life's nothing but a prelude to you."

Claire yukked. "I'll never say yes, and I'll never say no. At some point we'll want to fall down together, and we'll both know the moment when it comes."

I got chills. I chugged Claire's absinthe. Wormwood whipped my wig and winged me back to Weimar Berlin. I joined a bevy of bohemians at the Hotel Adlon. We're there to cull the cusp of the abyss.

"What are you doing in L.A.? You didn't come here to teach school and see what happens next, and you're overqualified for studio gigs and bait jobs."

Claire said, "People here love to talk. Jimmy, Harry, Bob Harrison. I've come to understand that you're interested in Connie Woodard, and I'm interested in her, too."

I said, "Don't stop now."

Claire said, "I came to L.A. to kill a man. I don't know his name, but I think Connie Woodard might. It's all design and opportunity with me, as it is with you."

I drove home. I drove home jazzed and jacked to the gills and SCARED down to my shit-stained shorts.

The pad was queerly quiescent. Stretch dropped her USC silks on the living room floor. She left a note propped by the phone.

"Harry Fremont called. Meet him at the Central DB tomorrow. 10:00 a.m. Hat Squad. A 459 suspect. Mandatory."

I walked back to the bedroom. A bedside night-light was on. Stretch was crapped out on my bed. She was tucked in under the covers and dead asleep. Lance the Leopard was curled up on top of the duvet. Stretch was too tall for the bed. I covered her feet. Lance growled at me. Don't mess with my woman, you hump.

I know when I'm licked. I walked back to the living room and fell asleep on the couch with my clothes on.

CENTRAL DIVISION DETECTIVE BUREAU

Interrogation Room #3
2/21/54

The Hats had a hump in the hot seat. A claustrophobe closet/one table/six chairs. One fat phone book in vivid view.

He's Delbert Davis Haines/white male American/DOB 6-12-18. He's tight with George Collier Akin. They met and compared notes at Quentin. Haines did a doomsday dime for 459 plus rape-sodomy.

Harry Fremont dragged a dragnet and hauled him in. He was alibied up for the Joan Horvath homicide. He blew blues clarinet at a round-the-clock romp at the Riptide Room. Dexter Gordon, Chet Baker, and Art Pepper alibied him.

Harry said he'd made pay-phone contact with Akin. Haines said Akin was casing cooze for a Red Devil Bandit comeback. He's bidding Beverly Hills bye-bye. He's back on L.A. city turf.

The Hats hovered. They straddled chairs and loomed over Haines. I kicked my chair against a side wall and scoped it. Haines was a junkie. He skin-popped Big "H" and held off a habit. He was snaggletoothed and pustule-pocked. He wore a Sir Guy shirt and slit-bottom khakis. He was one mean motor scooter and bad actor.

Max Herman said, "You could waltz, Delbert. We've got nothing on the books we can hold you on."

Red Stromwall said, "Or we could concoct something and hold you indefinitely."

Harry Crowder said, "Or we could get ugly."

Eddie Benson said, "You know what we want and who we want, and the sooner you give it to us, the less likely it is that we'll lay on the grief."

Haines said, "Who's that guy kicking his chair back? I think I've seen him before."

Max Herman said, "That's Mr. Otash. He's a former Los Angeles policeman, currently employed as a private investigator."

Haines said, "He's a greaseball. I'm very much attuned to racial distinctions. I'm on the editorial board for the National States' Rights Party, and I write for Thunderbolt Magazine."

Red Stromwall said, "Let's stick to the topic at hand. George Collier Akin. You know what we want."

Haines picked his nose and ate the goober. He said, "I want your wife to suck my big dick."

Red phone-booked him. Wham!—a big roundhouse shot. His face hit the table. His nose cracked. Blood blew out.

He tried to wipe his face. Harry Crowder grabbed his hands and cuffed them to his chair slats. The ratchets racked deep and drew blood.

Haines giggled and licked blood off his lips. He wagged his well-hung tongue at the Hats.

"I'm the Lizard of Love. Check my rap sheet. I'm a go-down man from way back."

Harry Crowder said, "We like Akin for a burglary-homicide two nights ago. Lower Hollywood. Camerford off Vine. The victim's name was Joan Horvath. Does that ring a bell with you?"

Haines said, "Your wife rings my bell, eight nights a week. She's a go-down girl from way back."

Harry phone-booked him. He sidled a sidewinder shot. Haines' head whiplashed. Nose blood and mouth blood blew wide. Two teeth hit the far wall.

Eddie Benson said, "Joan Horvath. Camerford off Vine. The B and E snuff there. She wakes up and fights him. Does this sound like Akin? Has he mentioned the job to you?"

Haines licked his lips and torqued his tongue. He said, "Your wife mentioned that you're hung like an amoeba. That's why she brings me all the woof-woof."

Eddie phone-booked him. He ripped a reverse sidewinder. It tore one eyebrow loose. Blood spattered the opposite wall.

I said, "Joan Horvath was pushing forty. She had some gray hair, and she was on the stout side. I bet Akin likes it younger and firmer, and Harry Fremont told me the Red Devil Bandit doesn't range that far north and west."

Haines licked blood off his lips. "Hey, the greaseball speaks, and he don't speak with forked tongue."

Max Herman said, "Tell us what you mean by that."

Haines said, "I mean the greaseball speaks la verdad. The Red Devil Bandit likes young gash he can terrorize. He likes the pads off Washington and Jefferson, down near USC. I can get more specific if you give me that waltz and lay a big dinner-and-drinks chit for Kwan's Chinese Pagoda on me."

Max Herman said, "You're on."

Red Stromwall said, "We'll throw in a shower and a run by Georgia Street. We know all the doctors there. They'll fix you up."

Harry Crowder said, "Delbert's a white man."

Eddie Benson said, "Let's not go overboard."

Haines looked straight at me. "Severance Street, the first block south of Jefferson. The Bandit's casing a pad there. He might hit tonight. The chick's a predental student. She's got short dark hair in a pixie cut."

Max uncuffed Haines and handed him his handkerchief. Haines wrung his wrists and grabbed the chair back. He staggered and struggled to stand up.

I said, "You don't make him for Joanie? There's no way he'd go for that?"

Haines haw-hawed. " 'Joanie?' Do I detect something there?"

The Hats haw-hawed. They shared wicked winks. Max said, "We make him for Joanie, and that's all that counts."

Harry and Eddie took Haines to Georgia Street and ensconced him with the jail-ward doc. I went with them. Georgia Street, redux. I walked the wicked path I walked when I whacked Ralphie Horvath.

Eddie ribbed me. "Must bring back some memories. Eh, Freddy?"

Haines had no fixed address for George Collier Akin. The Hats preferred to hit hot-prowl men in the act. Max dug up a map of Severance south of Jefferson. Red stiffed cold calls to every house on the block. He pinned the pixie cut. She was one Louise Marie Vernell, age eighteen.

Red laid out the sick situation. Louise gave in to gasps. She rented a room in a coed boardinghouse. Max decreed evacuation. Red dispatched three patrol sleds. Patrol cops took the tittering tenants and their landlady to the downtown Statler. The PD picked up the tab. The girls gassed on the service and posed for pix with the cops.

We waited. The dead-of-winter day dipped to dusk. Max buzzed

Bill Parker. I heard his side of the call. He said, “Yes, Chief” fourteen times and hung up.

I packed my .45 automatic. The Hats packed Python Magnums. Harry made the booze run. He brought back six short dogs of bonded bourbon and boocoo potato chips.

We rolled out in two K-cars. I rolled with Max and Red. Max laid in Ithaca pumps and a box of throwdown guns. We pulled ahead in the pole spot. Harry and Eddie bird-dogged behind. We hit South Severance at full dark.

Louise left her lights on, upstairs. They beamed I’m-home-alone/come-and-find-me rape rays. The pole car took the back-alley slot. The follow car took the Severance slot.

Max and Red played host. We shared short dogs and potato chips. The car was cold. The booze built its glimmering glow. Max and Red teased and taunted me.

You’re okay, Freddy. We miss you, Freddy. Confidential’s a shit rag, Freddy. How many felony extortions have you pulled this year, Freddy? The Chief’s got his four eyes on you.

It sailed sadly by me. I was off with Stretch and Claire and the mystery man she vowed to kill. Plus Studly Steve and Commo Connie Woodard. Claire per Connie: “I’m interested in her, too.”

Time ticked by. Tick, tick, tick. I entertain ripe revelations. Claire scares me more than Georgie Akin and the Hats. Tick, tick, tick. The hellhound Horvaths. They’ve haunted me and hurtled me here.

The teasing and taunting ebbed. Time ticked toward 10:00 p.m. Max and Red booze-dozed their way through ten-minute naps. I popped two Dexedrine and wound myself up.

I saw something. It was something evil and something wrong. The something walked northbound. In our direct direction. There’s a red blur where its head should be and black below that. It’s getting close. It’s veering toward the boardinghouse back gate.

The boys woke up. The Something’s très close. It’s got its hand on the gate latch. Said latch is unlocked. Our K-car’s shadow-shrouded. We see it. It can’t see us.

The Red Devil Bandit. That red-rubber mask. The fangs and horns. He rapes and maims. He didn’t maim and kill Joan Horvath. We’re past all that now.

Max and Red pulled their belt guns. I pulled mine. The Red Devil Bandit opened the gate and closed it behind him. Max mouthed One, two, three, four, five. We got out and followed him.

We were silent. We went tiptoed. The Red Devil Bandit heard zilch. He stood in the walkway and eyed the upstairs light. Harry and Eddie stepped out of a shadow. The Red Beast saw them. They held pump shotguns.

The Red Beast turned to run. He saw three more men and three more guns out. He saw me.

Max said, “Kill him, Freddy.”

I stepped up. I aimed. The Red Beast stood still. I fired at his face. It blew up, red-on-red. Red rubber and red blood exploded. The shot rang loud loud.

Harry and Eddie shotgunned him and tumbled him back off his feet. He’s dead now. He’s no danger. This is how this works. All five of us walked up and emptied our guns. We fired point-blank and shot him to bits.

INFERNAL INTERMEZZO:

My Furtively Fucked-up Life

2/22–3/18/54

Yeah, I did it. Yeah, it was wrong. Yeah, I enjoyed it. He got what he paid for. I knew I'd pay for what I did—somewhere down the line.

The Hearst rags loved it. HATS SLAY RED DEVIL BANDIT!!! CELEB P.I. ASSISTS!!! Dig the fetching fotos. I stand with Max, Red, Harry, and Eddie. They dwarf me. We point to something red and dead on the ground.

More headline hullabaloo. TIPSTER TATTLES RED DEVIL BANDIT!!! DARING BLASTOUT ENSUES!!! More fetching fotos. Georgie Akin's 1943 mug shots. A posed my-hero shot. Fractious Freddy with Max Herman and Red Stromwall. We strut. Louise Marie Vernell smarmy-smiles up at us.

BHPD blew a stakeout on Durward Brown and Richard Dulange. The Hats hunted them down and killed them four days later. The Hearst rags loved it. More headline hullabaloo. MOTEL MASSACRE!!! HATS GUN DOWN KIDNAP-RAPISTS!!! ALL GANG MEMBERS NOW DEAD!!!

Many more fetching fotos. The Hats with Chief Parker. Mastiffs maul for their master. Big backslaps and yuk-yuks. Many mentions of me. Max Herman sez, "We needed Freddy O. on this one. Freddy's our boy. He's the Man to See." Red Stromwall sez, "God bless Freddy O. What's a daring blastout without him?"

Yeah, I did it. Yeah, I knew it was wrong. Yeah, I loved the hack hullabaloo. Don't fuck with Freddy O. He's the Man to See. Too bad the world sees back. Too bad the world's inside him.

The Googie's gang saw me and tipstered me and fed me scandal skank. I scored scads of *sin*uendo for the magazine. Homos, lezbos, dipsos, hopheads. Underhung Untermenschen and big-dick barracudas. Heavy hermaphrodite action sunders the Sunset Strip!!!

Freddy O.'s the Shaman of Shame. He's got to see you. Meanwhile, you see him.

I saw Joan "Stretch" Perkins and Claire Klein. We talked about things and around things. I saw them, they saw me. They taunted, tickled, and teased me. Stretch wanted kid love, with all the va-va-voom verboten. We slept in my bed. Stretch wore basketball silks. I wore pajamas. We necked to a naughty nexus and stopped cold. Lance the Leopard got between us. It was nighty-night then.

Stretch taunts and teases me. She knows things about me. She knows I killed the Red Devil Bandit in cold blood. She knows it all pertains to the hellhound Horvaths—and that I'm not done with them yet. Claire Klein taunts and teases me. She won't fall down with me. We meet at Googie's most nights. We smile and drink. Our hands often brush. We discuss Operation Rock Wife. I'll be taking over Jimmy Dean's stewardship soon. He'll be off to shoot East of Eden with Gadge Kazan and that big Texas flick with Liz and Rock. Claire wants to kill a man. I see that. It consumes her. She sees that I'm going at the Cochran gig and the Commie Connie connection circumspectly. She's an I-want-to-see-it-and-know-it-all-now girl. And most assuredly a psychopath. She withholds from me. I withhold from her. Our boundaries wiggle, wilt, and hold firm. She scares me. I don't scare her. I'm not the Man to See. I'm the man to help her fulfill her murderous destiny.

Stretch provides innocence. Claire turns my lifelong voyeurism back in on me. I want to know her secret shit—but fear the price she'll make me pay. She knows that I killed the Red Devil Bandit to impress her. She intends to kill a man. I intend to kill the man who really killed Joan Horvath. The hellhound Horvaths. It all comes back to them. Claire sees that and knows that full well. I told her that I killed a man so she'll love me. She failed to reply. She won't love me until I find the man that she wants to kill. In the meantime, my will to work rages.

I work the Cochran gig. Bondage Bob wants a wild and sex-soiled serialization. I live at the listening post. The bugs and taps work gooooood. I listen to Studly Steve fuck my ex-woman Joi Lansing. They deliriously defame me. They underestimate me. Joi tattles, taunts, and teases me. She knows there's bugs and taps in place. She hasn't told Steve. She knows I'm listening. She wants me to hear. That means she wants me to see.

Sound equals sight. My imagination seals the sensory gaps. Information insistently issues. Steve's recruited Lana Turner and hunk hubby Lex Barker. Lurid Lex loooooves underage stuff. The casting-call aspect of the celeb smut film proceeds. I'm on it. I'm on the Connie connection just as assiduously.

I haunt the UCLA library. I bug the admin folk: where's the Joan Horvath transcripts? The admin folk go Soon, soon. I read and reread Connie's columns. Connie's a codified Commie. She's Comintern. She's a Red Reptile couched in cold cover. She's seditiously subtle. Her words work on a mini-microdot level. She's linked to Steve Cochran. Steve rolls Red. I'm building a scandal-rag exposé and a damning derogatory profile. I'll leak it to Joe McCarthy or some more rigorously responsible cat. I'll get Claire the name of the man she wants to kill in the process. She'll love me then or she won't. I'll love her whatever the outcome.

Work. Operation Rock Wife. Rock and Claire like each other and look good together. Lew Wasserman's pleased. Rock orders in bunboys from a dial-a-dick service owned by Bondage Bob's wayward kid brother. He gets his regular woof-woof.

I fotograph Rock and Claire's at-the-doorway kisses. It's sterile stuff. Rock's a movie star and a very sweet man. He's engaged to wed a batshit bomb thrower and more. Only in America, only in L.A., only in Holly*weird.*

Work. Allies and adversaries. Old friends passing through.

The Hats hold their hands in. They swing by Googie's and torque me as I tally tipster dish. How's the boy, Freddy? Do you miss us, Freddy? The Chief misses you, Freddy. You're always in his thoughts.

I looked for them when they weren't there. I listened for them at the listening post. They imparted the impudent theme of We See You. I saw them everywhere. I popped pills and saw them. I drank and saw them. I adamantly abstained and saw them most of all.

Work. I got my FBI kickback on that Horvath house print. Bad news: there's no file print extant. I lived at the listening post. I wore headphones and willed the next static-stung stammer that would tell me something big and something wrong. I waited for UCLA to call. Commie Connie confounded me. She never left her Hancock Park home. I needed to prowl the premises. I needed to booby-trap bugs and hot-wire the whole hut.

Connie hid from me and hindered me and immolated my imagination. I parked across the street and ran my radio. Joe McCarthy proclaimed his presence in L.A. Bondage Bob told me a Fed listening post had been set up someplace/somewhere. I saw my wires crossed with their wires, strung as strangling cords.

Work to constant communion. The Horvath house as soiled sacristy. I vowed vengeance. I exonerated the Red Devil Bandit and ran my rationale for his death. Joan heard me. I know that. Vigilance is love. I hold vigil most nights. I know that Joan hears me and sees me.

OUTSIDE CONSTANCE WOODARD'S HANCOCK PARK HOUSE

3/19/54

Connie's casa: a cool contemporary job at 1st and Beachwood. Two stories. All aluminum and glare-glinted glass, up and down. Some dippy Dane's idea of swank.

Sit-and-brood surveillance. A raging rainstorm brings a brainstorm. Hey, lady—we've got fone lines down. Let me in to check your fones, willya?

I perched in my Packard pimpmobile. Bernie was due. He had the pseudo repair tools and the know-how. He'd wing it, wham-bam. One fone/one condenser mike/one half-ass tap. No time to tackle bug mounts.

Raging rainstorms rip me, recollective. They wash my broiled brain and cleanse it clean. Last month. The Willoughby listening post. Stretch Perkins works Call-Girl Line #2. She hears Claire Klein and Barbara Payton trick with V. J. Jerome. The appalling apparatchik's in Connie's address book. That's Cold Connection #1. Here's Cold Connection #2:

Last month, ditto. Claire and I nosh the news and flare-flirt at Googie's. Claire lights me large with this line:

"I came to L.A. to kill a man. I don't know his name, but I think Connie Woodard might."

Hence, my bristling brainstorm. Hence, my ripe resolve. Work the Connie Connection now.

I yawned. My ass dragged. I was up late last nite. My landlord lashed my lease and tossed me out, temporary. Lance the Leopard laid waste to his rose gardens and crotch-sniffed his crotchety wife. I rented a boss bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel. Stretch helped me move. We hung up corkboards and tacked on Confidential sales graphs. Plus notes for my tricky troika: Operation Rock Wife/the Cochran Gig/my Horvath Crusade.

Lance looooooved his new lair. Room service served his cheeseburgers and fries in a dog dish. Lance slept with Stretch. I slept on the couch.

I yawned. I dexie-dosed my case of the blahs. Bernie showed. He'd scrounged a PC Bell repair truck, for vivid verismo. He parked in Connie Woodard's driveway and drilled her doorbell.

She opened up. There she is. She's still rangy, nervous, and knock-kneed. She's the Specious Spinster and Miss Soviet Suck-Up of 1924.

Bernie schmoozed her. I rolled down my window and heard it. He went Oy, lady. She went Oh dear—are you sure? Ooohhh—she talked butch bass like Lauren Bacall.

She let Bernie in. He shut the door. I timed the house call.

Twenty-two and a half minutes. Bernie tips his cap and walks back out the door. Connie holds the door. Her russet hair's wrapped in a bun now. She waves toodle-oo.

Paydirt.

Bernie tapped the living room fone and shoved a short-range transceiver under the couch. We rented an upstairs office at a bank building off 1st and Larchmont. We laid in listening-post paraphernalia. Casa Connie to the post: two short-range blocks. We should get goooood signal feeds.

Bernie donned earmuffs and manned the tap. I called Harry Fremont from a pay phone. I groused and proclaimed my predicament.

There's this woman. She's a shut-in. I've tapped her. I need to pad-prowl her. Rig me a ruse. I need four hours. She's a Commie. Uncle Sambo needs you. Violate her sissified civil rights. I'll pay you five yards.

Harry said, "Jawohl, boss."

Babs Payton car-hopped and hooked out of Stan's Drive-In. It was hard by Hollywood High. She hit her Holly*weird* high with Kiss Tomorrow Goodbye, circa '50. She was Mrs. Franchot Tone for six seconds. Tom Neal beat Timid Tone half dead and battered Babs with his lurid love. Tattle told the torchy tale, circa ’51. Babs screeched into the skids. Yeah—she was ripe for Steve Cochran’s *sex*ploitation.

I pulled into Stan’s. A comely carhop cadre caught sight of Big Freddy O. Babs and I go back. We badger-gamed businessmen in my cop days. Babs snared the schnooks at the Kibitz Room at Canter’s Delicatessen. She lured them to the Lariat Motel on Lankershim. She socked the saps into the saddle and made with the moans. I kicked the door in and played irate husband. I glommed the gelt and kicked the cads back out the door.

Babs roller-skated over. She wore red-and-white jodhpurs and a too-tight jersey top. She said, “Here’s trouble.” She hooked a tray to my passenger-side door.

I dropped a C-note on the tray. Babs got the gestalt. She got in and sat beside me. The C-note went poof!!!

“Okay, I’ll play.”

“I thought you might want to.”

Babs scooched down and swung her legs up. Her skate boots nudged her knees and fit fetishistic. She posed pouty and ran the rollers on my dashboard.

“I’m on my break for the next fifteen minutes. Before you start, let me state no more shakedowns. I’m not going back to the Kibitz Room or the Lariat Motel.”

I laffed and lit a cigarette. Babs bummed a smoke and lit it off my lighter.

“Freddy, the point of all this is—”

“Steve Cochran. The smut film he’s making, and don’t ask me how I know about it.”

Babs said, “Ha-ha. You’re jealous, because Joi’s in the flick, and she left you for Steve. I don’t blame you, I’d be jealous, too. Ha-ha, and too bad for Joi, because as crummy men go, she’s gone from the frying pan into the fire.”

I rebuffed the rude remark. “Update me. The film, who Steve’s conned into appearing, the start date, the whole schmear.”

Babs shrugged. “Smut’s smut, and I know from smut on an intimate level. Okay, Steve’s wrapping Private Hell 36 this week, so we’ll start pretty soon. Probably within the next two weeks. Lana Turner, Lex Barker, and Gene Tierney have dropped out, which I know don’t surprise you. Steve’s stuck with me, Joi, and Anita O’Day, and he’s recruiting an additional ten girls out of one of the call services some of us have been known to work for, which makes the full thirteen women that Steve and his big dick will repopulate the world with, after the A-bomb wipes everybody else on Earth out. Need I say that Steve's hipped on the A-bomb like nobody I've ever seen."

I went Don't stop now. Babs rolled her rollers on my red leather dashboard. It rubbed me wrong. I nudged her knees and kiboshed it.

Babs tapped ash out the window. "The premiere is sometime later this spring, in Harry Cohn's rec room. Smut's smut, and what's smut without some straitlaced boys to let their back hair down while they watch it. And since Harry's Harry, and a tyrant, a perv, and, most especially, a suck-up, these are some powerful boys, as in Senator Bill Knowland, Senator Joe McCarthy—if he don't trip on his dick between now and this so-called 'premiere'—and Senator Jack Kennedy, who I know you know from, but probably not on the intimate level that I do."

"Why would Jack's name be in Steve's address book? Why would Jack and Steve be calling each other, regularly?"

"Because Steve's Jack's pimp and dope supplier in L.A. Because Steve rolls left, and Jack's a barely suppressed bleeding heart, right below the surface."

I dipped through the dish. I strung it and strained it and microscoped it minutely. Nothing surprised me. Babs bops banal, so far.

"Claire Klein. I know you trick three-ways with her, and don't ask me how I know. If you start by saying she scares you, it wouldn't surprise me—because she scares me, too."

Babs made the hex sign. Babs waved faux wolfsbane. Babs made the sign of the cross.

"Claire don't scare me. Claire terrifies me. She likes to shave men's pubic hair with her switchblade, and half the tricks we go out on love it. She carries a Makarov pistol with a silencer in her purse, and we've been tricking with these Russian consulate guys, and they speak Russian with her, so I don't know what they're saying—"

I cut in. "And V. J. Jerome, that Commie culture-vulture guy—"

Babs cut back in. "Yeah, there's him, and Claire's cutting side deals, to swing with these Russian guys and shave their wives, and all the time she's pressing them, and she's digging for leads on some Commie scientist back in the '30s and '40s, who's got this weirdo 'Robin Redbreast' code name, and then she's pressing them on some society writer named Constance Woodard, and about this time I lose track of all Claire's crazy shit, and start praying to the Good Lord that

I never have to work with her again."

I drove to Googie's. I perv-peeped Claire through a back window. I trembled. I smeared nose prints on the glass.

Claire sat in her back booth. She sipped absinthe and nibbled french fries. She wore tight blue jeans. Note the knife bulge on her left leg.

I walked in. The dinner din diminuendoed. There was just my heartbeat and hers. I trembled and tumbled toward her. She saw me. She read me right and tumbled telepathic. She knew that I knew.

I sat down. She read me. Here's fright-fraught Freddy. Freddy's got the frets.

"I saw the bug mounts when Babs and I tricked with V. J. Jerome. I thought it might get back to you. Babs even joked about it. 'Half these trick pads are hot-wired, and you never know who's listening. Most likely it's Freddy Otash."

I guzzled her absinthe. I grabbed the goblet too hard. The glass sheared and shattered. Sharp shards cut my hand.

Claire pressed her napkin into the palm and balled my fist around it. Claire unbuttoned my shirt cuffs and rolled up the sleeves in one go.

She ran her hands up my arms. She tugged at the hairs. She removed the napkin and blotted blood off my hand.

"You should assume that I want you to know everything that I do and say, and that it's all in our common interest. 'Opportunity is love,' as you've put it before. I'm sure you've spoken to Babs. And I'm sure she's told you a few things. You know why I'm here in L.A., and I know you're not here to deter me or prevent me from doing what I intend to do. From here on in, we should credit each other with the ability to learn and extrapolate. We'll have our moment together when we've accomplished what we need to, and it will be all that much sweeter then."

I said, "Robin Redbreast" and "Connie Woodard." My voice sheared. Claire pulled her shiv and picked glass shards out of my hand.

Stretch said, “You’re scared. It’s like you’ve seen the world’s worst ghost.”

My bungalow bid me to safety. Stretch was safe. Lance was safe. I needed that. I wanted to be someplace dark and depraved with Claire Klein.

I held my hand up. I heal fast. My cuts had crusted into crisp little crosses. I’d been stigmatized.

Claire was a Navy nurse, circa ’43. Claire knew from knives. She cleansed my wound with high-test absinthe. She placed my hand on her breast and held it there. A part of me passed into her.

“Uncle Freddy, you’re shaking. And what’s with your hand? Don’t tell me you’ve had some kind of religious visitation.”

I walked up to my wall graph. Confidential’s daily sales had spiked spectacularly. I scanned my treacherous troika graph. I drew arrows between Operation Rock Wife and the Cochran Gig. I linked former to latter and wrote “Claire Klein & Babs Payton” below. I arrow-linked “V. J. Jerome” & “Connie Woodard.” I wrote “Russian consulate guys” & “Robin Redbreast” below that.

Stretch walked over. Her eyes grazed the graph and ran right to “Robin Redbreast.” She got goose bumps. They sprouted and spread up her arms.

I said, “The Sweetzer listening post. Monitor Lez Line #2, every chance you get. I’ll pay you two yards a week.”

She orbed my hopped-up hieroglyphics. She said, “As long as you tell me how all this plays out.”

THE NORTH CAMPUS LIBRARY AT UCLA

3/20/54

Transcripts. One fat file box. She was Joan Marcelline Hubbard then. She's Joan Horvath of My Heart now.

The admin folks delivered. They called me this a.m. They stridently stressed that rules and regulations apply. View the contents here. Return the box by 9:00 p.m. Don't snitch documents. Don't mooch monographs. The honor system applies.

I took a table all by myself. I tallied tabbed file folders and crafted a chronology. Joan Marcelline Hubbard. DOB 11-6-18. She hails from the hellish-hot San Joaquin Valley. She's farmworker stock. She graduated high school in '35. She picks fruit with a wetback work crew. She digs her way out of the Depression. She applies to UCLA.

She's accepted. She hits Westwood in the fall of '39.

It's all language labs and lit crit. She learns Russian/Polish/Italian. She flaunts her fluency in class and stages stirs. La Hubbard's a hambone. She's a distaff disc jockey on Bruin Radio. She shoves Shostakovich down the throats of the campus illiterati. She rewards them with reductive Rachmaninoff and cheesy Tchaikovsky. She riffs on Russki literature. She writes her own commercials for Russian restaurants. She's a regular at Karlov's Kasa Kiev. Karlov kicks back kash. She writes her own commercials for Polish Pete's Pirogi Palace. Pete pays her in cold cash and kielbasa cutlets. She works her way through college in this mad manner. She's a noted campus cutup. She's a sinfully self-promoting cheerleader chick.

She gets the grades. Woooo!!!—Straight A's across the board. She studies the Russian romantic poets. She cruelly critiques the movement. It's all marginal and mystical malarkey. She links Polish piano pounder Paderewski to nattering Nazi composers of the oompah-band ilk. Her professors know that she's a gallivanting gadfly—but stress the solid soundness of her rigor. '39, '40, '41. Joan Marcelline Hubbard makes her mark and goes forth.

She graduates. She goes on to grad school. That crisp chronology cruised me through her academic life. Course names/dates/test scores/grades/the names of professors. The transcripts tripped by as La Joan's light fantastic. File pages blew by in a blur.

I hit late '41 and the cusp of '42. I hit my first chronological misfile. Spring '40: An Introduction to Polish Labor Movements/ Professor Witold Kirpaski. I put the transcript aside and plowed through late '41. Then this, then this, then THIS:

Fall '39. The Political Content of the Post-Revolutionary Russian Novel/Guest Professor Constance Woodard.

The nite becomes me. I assume my Pervdog pose. My hophead side sidles forth and fuels me. I'm the Red Devil Bandit, one crazed chromosome removed. It's kid shit shorn of pretense. I've peeped since I was fourteen years old in bumfuck Massachusetts. Thus, I peeped NOW.

I parked outside Connie Woodard's pad. I popped three Dexedrine and adjusted my adrenaline load. Midnite marched to 1:00 a.m. All Connie's lights were off. I pondered a B and E—but abstained.

My wall graph walloped me. Lives and lines linked on paper. Fall '39. Connie Woodard links to Joan Hubbard. Connie's linked to Steve Cochran. Claire Klein links to Connie. She's marked a man for murder. She thinks Connie may know things. She knows I know things. She knows I've got L.A. hot-wired. I'm the Man to See. Claire talks to me through a mad medium. Listening posts broadcast two ways under her spell. She pounds me, paranoiac. Freddy, what thou hath wrought. She Bible-bashes me. The Book of Revelation 3:8. I know all the things you do, and I have opened a door for you that no one can close. She has made me the Man to Be Seen.

I eyeballed the Woodard house. I fought off B & E urges. I felt seen. I kept seeing things that might or might not be there. Cop cars clustered in close surveillance. Women wielding shivs. Claire stamped me stigmatized. We merged heartbeats. She marked me the Man to Be Seen.

I worked the phones all afternoon. I talked to Harry Fremont. He froze on the get-me-into-Connie's-house front. "I can't come up with a ruse or diversion, Freddy. Give me time to think this through." I talked to Stretch. She reported from the Sweetzer listening post and Lez Line #2. She said Claire and some unknown Russki talked mucho McCarthy. Jabbering Joe and his feckless Feds were working L.A., through and through. Joe was set to serve subpoenas and roust Red cliques clicking back twenty years. Joe needed gooooooood publicity baaaaaad. Newspapers gnashed him. Radio reporters rebuffed him. TV pundits punished him for his sins. Brother, I empathize. We're both Men to Be Seen.

I hid out at the Larchmont listening post and listened to listless dead air. I killed dusk and half the nite there. Connie called nobody, nobody called her. I dozed and dreamed of Stretch and Claire, nude like I'd never seen them. I woke up and drove two blocks to here.

Late nite becomes me. 1:00 became 2:00. I noticed empty milk bottles outside Connie's front door. I got This Nutty Notion That Just Might Work.

Time ticked. I chain-smoked and chewed Chiclets. The milkman arrived at 4:13 a.m. He grabbed the empty bottles and left a fresh four-pack. I grabbed my sodium secobarbital stash and removed eight capsules. Connie might mix milk with her morning coffee. If so, she's cooked.

I walked up to the door. I pulled off the bottle caps and whipped in my witches' brew. Four bottles/eight pills/Freddy O.'s merry milk shake. I shook the bottles and condensed the contents. I slid back to my sled to wait.

Dawn dimmed nightfall. Low clouds closed in and reigned rain. Connie opened her front door at 7:14. It was quick. She filched the four-pack and went back inside.

I waited. Waiting wilts me and wears me thin. I waited, regardless. 7:14 to 8:14. One hour, no more. She's had coffee or she hasn't. The kitchen's the likely location. It's peepable. Note those low windows facing the driveway.

I peeper-popped over. I peeped one window, two windows, three. There's Connie. She's passed out flat on the kitchen floor. There's spilled coffee au lait. She's inviting me in.

My #6 pick fit the keyhole. The back door wiggled wide open. I cut into the kitchen. Connie snored. She should inhabit Dreamsville for ten to twelve hours. I had time for a top-end toss.

The kitchen. Chromium and bleached-blond wood. Nothing succulent or suspicious. The living room. All mid-century modern miasma and murky abstract art. A blitzkrieg of black leather. Glare off glass walls. A Kandinskyesque carpet, cobalt-colored and loaded with goofball gewgaw shapes. Nothing succulent or suspicious. Just Connie's suspect taste.

I checked the downstairs bathroom. Nothing nudged me. I walked upstairs. No surprises sandbagged me, straight off. One bathroom/one bedroom/one office. I always work up to women's bedrooms. I checked the bathroom first.

No, nein, nyet. Cold-cobalt walls and threadbare throw rugs. No medicine-chest mishpokeh—no dizzy dope/no ribbed rubbers/no diaphragm dusted with cornstarch.

The office. Here it gets gooooooood.

Note the red walls. They're all poster-pinned. It's a treasonous triptych. Free the Scottsboro Boys!!!!! Communism is 20th Century Americanism!!!!! Ben Shahn's screechy screed: "You have not converted a man because you have silenced him."

I grabbed my crotch. Hey, Connie—convert this, you Red Reptile!!!!!

There's a desk/a swivel chair/a typewriter. There's three drawers packed with dumb desk supplies. Connie's column for today was tucked in the typewriter. The Marlborough School for Girls, the winter '54 ball, the Hancock Park elite attends.

I checked the top drawer. There's a red leather diary marked "1954." Yesterday was March 20. I dipped to the date and read this:

"I fear what I presume will be Senator McCarthy's last stand before a long-overdue U.S. Senate censure. I fear what will happen when less strident anti-Communists take up the cause that once he owned and has now all too overtly besmirched, and that those subtle fascists will assume an aura of respectability. I fear that my Party membership will be exposed, along with those in my cell—which seems likely, as Senator Joe has set up shop here in Los Angeles, rather covertly, and seems determined to do damage to those I love in the city that I love and call home. All of us have sworn allegiance to the Soviet Union. How could any sane person not? But I fear that we will never have the chance to put forth our public case, as we conduct our more pertinent tasks in secret. McCarthy has been our most consistent goad and the most persistent face of fascist vituperation since the early days in Korea. What will happen when he goes? We require intense persecution to prove the solvency of our war on capital. We must never be tolerated. Tolerance militates against revolution. We must be violently opposed, so that our reaction in kind will be considered the only true and sane reaction by the oppressed masses that we strive to liberate."

Woooo!!!!! That is some dippy dialectic and convoluted confusion!!!!! Connie's a stagnant Stalinist—with Uncle Joe now a year dead!!!!!

I dipped diary pages backward. It was more, more, more—maladroitly more of the same. I hit February 17. Simple sentiment stunned me and stopped me in my tracks.

"JMH is dead. She is dead, the only she I've ever known. It was in the papers and briefly on the radio. The police suspect a burglary gone awry."

I flipped back to New Year's. It was all agitprop and agitation. I got no more Joan jolts, no incriminating initials, no named names.

I bopped to the bedroom. I saw more red walls. They were garlanded with Goyaesque portraits of women. Ooooh—they were nuke-bomb nude and clad in the wicked wardrobe of revolution. They wore black boots and fur-trimmed hats emblazoned with hammer and scythe. They wielded whips and laid the lash on men marked "Fascist Oppressor."

I got it. It's Goya as comic-book artiste. It's savage satire. It's the annihilating antithesis of Connie Woodard's toooooooo-tame life as a Hearst hack. It's communism as contraband pornography. It's a staggering strain of the jejune jive WE ALL jerk off to. It's the jack-off juvenilia that has enslaved half the world.

I opened a closet door. Connie's spinster threads channeled Chanel No. 5. A top shelf featured comely camisoles and slithery slips. I ran a hand under them. Scented envelopes slid out. I knew they were lesbian love letters.

I let the butch billet-doux lie. A file cabinet couched against the wall caught my eye. Three file drawers. All unlocked. I tornado-tore through them.

Red-leather diaries. Connie's Red message, beaming back to '38. The Moscow show trials. Connie justifies Stalin's purges. She confoundingly cosigns death, death, and more death. There's photographs tucked between pages. Connie cultivates young women and preens proud with them. Perdition, catch my soul—there She is.

Connie and Joan Hubbard. A UCLA backdrop. The foto is dated 8/12/41. There's Joan. She's twenty-two. It's faded Kodachrome color. Connie's russet-haired and knock-kneed at forty. Joan wears a red beret.

I tore through Connie's August '41 diary. I went to 8/12/41 and found this:

"I spent time with Joan H. today. I think she's ready to join the Party. I told her my cell was small and all were utterly loyal to one another. She'd be safe there."

It wasn't enough. I wanted more of what all of this was. I found diaries dated up to 1946. Connie's prose went crypto-clipped. Initials replaced names. "All of this" had to be Commie cell minutes.

I hit my first "JH" in May '42. I followed "JH" at weekly intervals, up through V-J Day. "JH," "JH," "JH." My Joan's a certified subversive. I know who "CW" is. Who's "SA"? Who's "RJC"? Who's "EPD"? I didn't know and didn't care. I only wanted Joan's name and Connie's scent on the pages.

JH, JH, JH. She's mine throughout the war years. She's left UCLA. I'm in the Marine Corps and dodging combat duty. She translates for the California State Senate. I join LAPD. JH, JH, JH. We're into '46 now. I'll murder Joan's husband in three years' time—

Googie's. My unfailing fallback and righteous retreat. The Tattle Tyrant held sway here. Confidential was king. Bondage Bob Harrison's handouts bought me all the love I could take.

Late-a.m. tipsters almost toppled my table. Orson Welles snuffed the Black Dahlia. The rumor raged now. I told the tipsters to fuck off and bought them off with chump change. Joe McCarthy's in town. No shit, Sherlock. Yeah—but he's shacked at the Chateau Marmont with Danny Kaye. Okay—here's ten scoots, don't bug me, my heart's heavy, and I'm all alone with some shattering shit.

Boo-hoo, boo-hoo. I'm in existential exile. I've got boocoo opportunity, but the love eludes me.

I wolfed pancakes and pondered my doofus dilemma. I told my wetback waiter to bring me a phone. I called Harry Fremont at the City Hall DB. Harry boo-hoo'd me. He hadn't rigged a ruse or devised a diversion to get me inside Casa Connie. I told him I got inside. I trashed my tracks and blew a blistering shot at reentry. In the meantime, I'll pay you to do this:

There's Feds in town. They may be running rogue. They're jungled up in jumpy juju with Joe McCarthy. They must have a field office somewhere. Find them and suborn them with Bondage Bob's payola. I need three hours with their files.

Harry said, "And this pertains to Joanie?"

I said, "Yeah—it sure as shit does."

Harry coughed up compliance. I hung up. Claire Klein and Rock Hudson sat down with me. They held hands. I held up my hand and showed them my stigmata. Claire laffed. Rock went Huh?

They looked good together. They glowed. They were actors to their core. They were Strasbergites maimed by the Method. The homo heartthrob marries the sicko psychopath. This mock marriage sends them, Daddy-O.

Rock said, "You're green at the gills, Freddy. You should take a Bromo and hit the sack."

Claire said, "Freddy has things on his mind."

I laffed. "Have you set a date yet?"

Rock lit a cigarette. "Jimmy's working on it. He's with Liz and me on Giant, you know. He thinks two ceremonies is the way to go. Claire's Jewish, and I'm a Presbyterian. Jimmy wants to emphasize the interfaith angle. You know, one synagogue gig, and one church gig."

Claire lit a cigarette. "There's no need for Rock to convert. I know a rabbi who performs a good ceremony and works cheap. We met in the Sinai, back in '48."

Rock said, "Claire's got a history."

I said, "Don't I know it."

Autograph hounds hit the table. Rock threw up his hands and winked at Claire. I'm in demand, babe.

Claire winked at me. Rock signed autographs. Claire slipped me a note under the table. I peeped the piece of paper.

Tipster Claire. The insidious insider. She's got news on the celeb smut film.

The start date had been moved up. They shoot tonight. Here's the address. It's an abandoned motel in Cathedral City.

The Jolly Jinx Motel. A desert dump. Off a deep-rut road between Indio and Palm Springs. It's sandwiched by sand dunes and next door to nowhere. It's a baleful bank foreclosure, circa '31.

It's a film set tonite. Thirteen Women and Only One Man in Town.

Steve "L'Auteur" Cochran mans the megaphone. The Jinx is a horseshoe-shaped hellhole. There's twelve beat-to-shit bungalows, sans doors. Note the parked cars. Note the arc lights outside bungalows 8,9, and 10. Note the camera up on casters and the boom mike. There's a cameraman and a soundman. I've seen them at Googie's. They're headed-for-hell hopheads and rancid racetrack touts.

Dig: it's finito. The A-bomb wipes out the world. It's Steve the Stud's delicious duty to repopulate it. He's got titillating talent to siphon his seed and assist. Joi Lansing, Anita O'Day, and Babs Payton. Plus ten call girls headed for Holly*weird* stardom and felony smut raps.

I hid hip-deep in a high sand dune. I brought binoculars and Bernie Spindel's sound-receiver. It was battery-juiced and sent sound to headphones-cum-earmuffs. The set was forty yards down. I had open-door and smashed-window sight lines. The arc lights and malignant moonglow made me Johnny-on-the-spot.

The courtyard was Cochran's command post. Steve mingled with the thirteen lucky ladies. They wore crocheted bikinis cut hairpie looooooow. The girls scrolled script copies and learned their lines. They moved their lips and traded quips.

"How can we live with such devastation?" and "I don't want our kids growing up with Strontium-90 in their bones." Joi said, "First, we've got to have the kids. Do you think Big Steve's up to the task? The motel is the Garden of Eden. Big Steve is our Adam, and all thirteen of us are his Eves." Babs said, "I heard he's hung like a barracuda." Anita said, "People blame the Communists and the Soviet Union for everything bad in the world. But I say, 'Let he who is without sin cast the first stone.' " And, dig: "It's the good old USA who A-bombed the Japs."

Ooohhh—Studly Steve's script toes the repugnant Red line. Shuddering shades of Red Connie Woodard!!!

Steve walked actress to actress. He pulled down their bikini tops and looooooow-leveled the bottoms. The arc lights lit hairpie glow. Steve lined up the cast. They stood thirteen strong. The nite was cold. Goose bumps popped pandemic. Steve microphone-mauled his talent pool.

"Achtung, meine Kinder. Comrade Steve speaks, and your job as my Fertility Guard is to listen. We're shooting scene one now. Bungalow nine has been decorated with some Nazi gear I've collected. Babs portrays Hilda, She-Wolf of the SS. My job is to impregnate and reindoctrinate her. Chop, chop, comrades. Babs and crew to bungalow nine. The rest of you huddle up in your cars and stay warm."

Twelve girls beat feet out of the courtyard. Steve and Babs as Hilda hit Bungalow 9. The camera guy and sound guy followed them. The setup took six seconds. I had live sound and a smashed-window view. Roll it, Big Steve.

Lights, camera, action. Big Steve rolls it. The camera caught the swastika wall banners and the rising-sun bedspread. Steve as Adam and Babs as Hilda squared off.

Steve/Adam: "Look, you fascist bitch, you've got to atone for your sins and submit to reeducation, like Comrade Stalin did with the Moscow trials in the '30s."

Babs/Hilda: "Don't sound me, muchacho. The Moscow trials were a shuck—and I know it because I subscribe to Klansman magazine. I'm hip to geeks like you. If you think you're going to repopulate the world with me, you'd better stow the lecture and show me what I'm getting into."

Steve/Adam whips it out. Man, what a schvantz!!!

Babs/Hilda says, "I'm impressed, but der Führer was bigger. Eva Braun told me he packed a hard yard. But I guess twelve inches is better than nothing, especially if the fate of the world is at stake."

Steve/Adam says, "I'm radioactive, baby!!! You know what I want!!!"

Babs goes woo-woo and shucks her bikini. Big Steve dumps his duds. They forgo foreplay. They hop on the Jap bedspread and instigate insertion. Steve's a two-minute man. It's over that quixotically quick. Steve climbs to a climax and wails in rapturous Russian. Say what? Babs/Hilda chortles and lights a cigarette.

The whole night went listlessly likewise. Up to the pustulating point that it changed.

Babs/Hilda does it with Steve. Ditto Anita as Nuke-Bomb Nellie. Joi plays Evil Eve. She does it with Steve—and fails to jolt me jealous. The collective call girls strip and dog-pile Big Steve. Half the sizzle sex fizzles. Steve can't get it up. He's a wilted wonder boy. His beast is bushed. He's auf Wiedersehen, adios, sadly sayonara. His priapus is proschai.

I watched for hours. My vulturous voyeurism nudged toward its nadir. It bid me to boredom. Man, what a drip-dry drag.

The camera guy and sound guy packed up their shit. Steve moped around the courtyard and mumbled to his muse. I bent my binoculars to Bungalow #7. I saw Anita O'Day and Babs Payton prep jolts of Big "H."

They cooked it. They fed a spike. They tied off tourniquets. They geezed and went smack-back. They hit Cloud 9 as Steve entered the room.

He backhanded Babs. She hit the floor. Anita backed up to the bed. Steve stood over her. Anita brandished the spike. Steve grabbed it and stabbed her in the leg.

Anita screamed and sobbed. I heard it high up on my dune. Steve stormed out of the bungalow. He glowed radioactive red. The red was Strontium-90. It's got a half-life of ten thousand years. I glowed rage-red myself.

Stretch was asleep. Lance the Leopard cleaved close to her and snarled at me. They ordered room service. Lance left paw prints on the white tablecloth.

I changed clothes. I put on black gloves, black slacks, and a black turtleneck. I stopped at an all-nite novelty store on my way over. I bought a rubber red devil mask.

I tried it on. I posed in front of the bathroom mirror. I'm George Collier Akin, reborn. I capered and preened.

Havenhurst was a short shot up Sunset. I got my sled and slid there in the slow lane. I cut south and parked. It was 3:00 a.m. His lair lights still glowed.

I put the mask back on. The Red Devil Bandit resurrects. I beelined to his door and rang the bell.

He opened up. He screeched and backed away. Size isn't everything. I pulled my beavertail sap and bitch-backhanded him.

It tore him a high harelip and took out some teeth. The reverse shot ripped him a new widow's peak. He hit the floor like Babs Payton did.

I picked up a Russian-helmet ashtray and dumped butts on his head. I hurtled high and drop-kicked him. I heard ribs crack. Rib bones sheared out of his shirt.

He screeched. His eyes rolled back. I forced open the lids and put my red devil face upside his. He sputtered and coughed up Camels and Kool Kings. I wiped ash off my red devil face.

ROGUE FBI FIELD FACILITY

Office Building at Wilshire and Mariposa

3/22/54

Harry said, “This is pricey. I’ve got palms to grease. Bondage Bob’ll have to dig deep on this one.”

Some office. One confined cubicle. Thoroughly threadbare. Bare-bones and strictly cut-rate. It’s twenty feet by twenty feet. There’s three desks/three chairs. There’s one file cabinet, no fone, no Teletype.

“These guys are black bag, all the way. McCarthy’s kaput. He can’t call old man Hoover and say, ‘Hey, Johnny—I need some men to hunt Reds.’ ”

Harry shrugged. “They’ve got some Federal motor pool vehicles. At least three, by the looks of this place. Remember that plate number I ran for you? That car was checked out to these guys.”

I said, “See if you can put a name to it, okay? The car might have been specifically assigned.”

“Sure, kid. You and Bondage Bob say, ‘Jump,’ and I say, ‘How high?’ ”

I thought it through. The word Hollywood hit me. I prowl Casa Connie. Her current diary drivel drills me. She fears jumped-up Joe McCarthy’s last gasp and fears for her cell. Joe’s working a Hollywood angle. It’s in tight and spicy specific. He thinks he’ll bag big names somewhere down the line. It’s his loopy last hurrah. It’s a Hollywood headline hunt. Here’s a hunch. He doesn’t quite know where it all is or what he’s got.

Harry harumphed. “Freddy, get to it. We’ve got three hours, not three weeks.”

I popped the top file drawer. It was Bug City. Bug mounts, bug mikes, bug transceivers and cords. Plus looooooong-range broadcast shit. I popped the middle file drawer. It was Hurt City. Brass knucks, rubber truncheons, ball-bearing saps.

I popped the bottom file drawer. It was Rat City. A file sticker spelled it out: “Security 1-A: Coded Informant Index.”

Four thin files. Thin gruel. Thin carbon sheets couched within.

File #1. Code name: “Big Duke.” These notes: “No remuneration. Subject has said his motive is ‘love of country.’ Has numerous contacts within the entertainment industry.”

I’ll say. It has to be John Wayne. He’s ratted Reds since the ice age. It doesn’t say he’s a cross-dresser. He’s strictly straight—but still. My Marines foto-fucked him at the Big Girls Boutique in Balboa. He bought his way out of a biiiiiiig exposé.

File #2. Code name: “Mama Zee.” These notes: “Noted writer (Negro) turned anti-Communist zealot. Has numerous contacts within the Negro community in Los Angeles.”

I’ll say. It has to be Zora Neale Hurston. She rats Reds to Bondage Bob. She’s fetchingly featured in Confidential’s “Darktown Strutters’ Ball” clips.

File #3. Code name: “Mr. Webfoot.” These notes: “Subject hosts local L.A. kiddie show. In hock to bookmakers. Always needs $ & knows people within the CP.”

I’ll say. It has to be Jimmy Weldon. He’s a venal ventriloquist. Webster Webfoot’s a downscale Donald Duck. Jimmy’s a Googie’s geek. He peddles piles of the Carole Landis nude morgue pix.

File #4. Code name: “Redbird.” No summary notes. One bank-deposit summary.

The deposits ran from March ’47 up to last month. $150 per week. ’47 to ’54. Almost seven full years. Account #8309. The bank branch: the B of A at Melrose and Cahuenga.

I’LL SAY. Melrose and Cahuenga. It’s four blocks from the Horvath House of Death. Red Stromwall found a B of A passbook in Joan’s undie drawer. The balance: fourteen g’s. The weekly snitch pay stopped last month. Joan Horvath esta muerto.

I’ll say. What would you say? How does this sound to you?

My Joan. Communist Party infiltrator/FBI snitch.

I’m a Pervdog. We’re nativistically nocturnal. Our genus genuflects at moon fall and comes alive at nite. We seek succor in the scent of secret lives, half hidden. We peep, prowl, break, enter, SEEK.

Day dimmed to dusk. I parked across the street from Connie Woodard's house. I was half gone on high-test lemonade. The Pervdog percolates.

I holed up at the Larchmont listening post, all afternoon. I called the B of A branch at Melrose and Cahuenga. I impersonated Joe Fed. I demanded the name attached to account #8309. The timid teller gave it up: Joan Hubbard Horvath.

It felt right. It felt wrong. I reacted, reflexive. I sought Connie Woodard's scent.

I hooked on headphones. I caught calls. Connie called her cleaner's and a Chevy dealership. I heard backup bips on my line. My hackles heaved.

The looooong-range transceiver. It's packed at the pathetic pocket office. It's expensive equipment. It hints of a centralized eavesdrop apparatus. Jolting Joe McCarthy. Not as pointedly pathetic as one might think? Communist Connie—quite possibly bugged and tapped?

Rain clouds eclipsed the moon I came to howl at. The sky unzipped and ripped rain. I ran my heater and warmed my canine coat. Connie Woodard walked out her front door.

She wore a formal kilt ensemble. A tartan sash was cinched across her embroidered black crepe blouse. Tartan pleats ran down to her knock-knees. White kneesocks and black brogues filled the ensemble out.

She shagged her '52 Chevy and cut southbound. It felt right. It felt wrong. I felt summoned suddenly. Take note of what you are seeking, for it is seeking you. Some sweaty swami said that. I get it now, Daddy-O.

I walked across the street and picked the back-door lock. Connie left the kitchen lights on. She left lurid leads out in plain sight.

The broken milk-bottle glass and milk mulch in the sink.

The Milk of Magnesia bottle on the counter. Milk of Magnesia absorbs ingested barbiturates.

Connie's coldly outraged. She's been vilely violated. She's left those leads out to address me. You contemptible coward—will you fling your hands high and flee?

I wimp-wavered. I almost flipped out and fled. Her summons seduced me. I ran upstairs instead.

Connie left the bedroom lights on. I went straight to her clothes closet and her scent. I opened her file drawers. She left her 1949 diary out and bookmarked for me. 9/10/49. Connie carves her pen across the initials JH and scrawls "Traitor" boldface.

I sat in a red leather chair. The red walls closed in on me. I pulled my roscoe and jammed it under the seat cushion. I looked over at the bed. She'd left those lezbo love letters out for me to read.

Take note of what you are seek—

I read at them and through them. I looked for the name Joan and/or the initials JH. They weren't there. There were no torrid texts. It was all kiss and swerve and breath and scent. I failed to determine gender or genus—male/female/moon-mad beast.

I shut my eyes. I summoned seconds of safety and solace and slid into sleep. It was kiss and swerve and breath and scent and scent on wool and black crepe. Take note of—

I stirred and stretched and saw her. She stood by the bed. She held a Makarov automatic. The kilt ensemble caught me and held me. She was fifty-two. We're May and September. She dressed this way to meet me. It's some furtive first or one-and-only blind date.

I said, "Redbird. You must know that this is about her."

She said, "There's some high points here. She betrayed the Party, and you killed her husband. I saw your photograph in the paper. I thought, He is certainly a young man who intends to go places, and you certainly have. 'Tattle Tyrant' suits you, but 'Peeping Tom' and 'Slander Merchant' might be more apt."

I sprawled. She stood. Her bed stood between us. I felt underdressed and outmaneuvered and called out in calm contempt. She's verging on rude rebuke, and I still want to touch her.

"You're wearing battle kit. I saw you at Jack Kennedy's bomb party, and you didn't evince this sort of flair. I've found some things out about you, and you know me by reputation. That stands as the basis of some sort of discussion. I'm a peeper, and you want me to see you. You left your diary and your letters out for me to read. You're begging a stranger who's assaulted your home and your person for intimate comprehension, and I want to know why."

She messed with her Makarov. She had fast hands. She racked out the round in the chamber and popped out the clip. She tossed it on the red leather chair. My piece was stuffed under the cushion.

" 'Intimate comprehension.' It works both ways, you know. Perhaps I should tell you what I know about you, so that we might turn this into an opportunity."

I said, "Tell me."

She said, "I was in love with Joan Horvath. You weren't the only one inclined to park outside her house and moon. I've counted the money you left in her mailbox on more than one occasion, and I'm convinced that you intend to kill the person who killed her, since the man that you've already killed certainly didn't do it. You have my consent for this, and my word that I won't report the act, or any act that might have transpired between us up to this point."

I said, "I've read your diaries. Comrade, your whole life's a deception. Your word's about as good as mine is, and that's hardly an indictment."

She put one knee on the bed. Tartan battle kit. The pleats/the wool/the scent. One long leg exposed.

"It's all about Joan, you see. It's your willingness to act, and my willingness to suborn your intention. I would never betray anyone who possessed the grit to do what you intend to do, despite my shoddy track record with veracity for its own sake."

I stood up. Connie stood still. I reached under the seat cushion and grabbed my piece. I have fast hands. I racked out the chamber round, popped the clip, and tossed it all on the bed.

Connie said, "Say her name."

I said, "Joan."

She said, "Well, then."

I said, "I intend to see you again."

She said, "Yes, of course."

I made for the door and brushed by her. I touched her back and nuzzled her hair. She leaned into me one mad moment.

INFERNAL INTERMEZZO:

3/23–4/4/54

It started like that. We were joined in Joan and forged in forgiveness. Sex saturated us. I've decided to dim the details by dint of decorum. "Freddy & Connie." Initials cutely carved on a tree. I'm thirty-two, she's fifty-two. You know what I am. Connie Woodard defies cloying classification. Commie, lezbo, sweltering switch-hitter. Take your punk pick. She's all of it, some of it, none of it.

I'm being dizzy disingenuous. Connie's a righteous Red. She's a treasonous true believer with her hooks hitched into me. I'm foiled and fucked five thousand ways. Perdition, catch my soul. And she won't let me all-the-way SEE her.

I needed names to know her and to know who killed Joan. Known associates, rancid Reds, fractured front-group front men. Fellow travelers, pusillanimous pinks, lily-livered leftists. Give me names/no, I won't/Connie takes the farshtinkener Fifth Amendment. Tell me the names of your Commie cell mates. I've already memorized their initials. Who's SA? Who's RJC? Who's EPD? I've scurvily skimmed your diaries—and I'm tweaked. I told you I killed the Red Devil Bandit in cold blood. You must reciprocate in kind.

No, Freddy. I'm your recidivistic refusenik. Besides, there's one name that you've withheld from me.

Yes, that's true. I refused to name Claire Klein. I equivocated here. I told Connie that a dangerous woman was orbiting her orbit. She wants to kill a man—but she won't tell me why. She won't name the man. She's my other ripe refusenik. I'm not naming her. She's one of the other two women that I love.

"Freddy & Claire." "Freddy & Stretch." More names cutely carved on a tree. Unconsummated communions. That's fine for now. I'm beat-to-shit busy. I've got to find a man and kill him, myself.

Connie won't name names. I vow to kill Joan's killer. Connie won't name names. I vow to jerk Joe McCarthy's chain so that he won't expose her. Connie still won't name names. Why's Jack Kennedy's name in your address book? Oh, pshaw—Jack's just an old pal. Why's Steve Cochran's name in your address book? Here, Connie withers and wilts me: he was my last tortured and torturing male lover—before you.

I'm thirteen days in with Constance Linscott Woodard. It's tender and tortured. I'm beat-to-shit busy. I'm rolling lucky and unlucky thirteens.

Lucky 13: Harry Fremont frosted out my assault on Big Steve. He greased the Sheriff's bulls investigating the caper. They put it off to a B and E man out to clout Big Steve's Nazi gear. *Un*lucky 13: Thirteen Women and Only One Man in Town debuted a week later.

In Harry Cohn's rec room. Popcorn and cut-rate booze. I'm there. Big Steve's there. He's beat-to-shit bandaged and mummified like Pharaoh's granddaddy. Jack the K.'s there. Bill Knowland's there. They yuk-yuk and wolf-whistle. Joe McCarthy's there, his own self.

The flick made me squirrelshit squeamish. I've got no beef with the A-bomb. We should have mushroomed Moscow after we juked the Japs. Joi Lansing was my ex, and I had a wolfish wingding with Babs Payton. It was the *sex*ploitation aspect. That's what gored my goat.

Bondage Bob bagged me outside the rec room. He said he was killing the Cochran exposé. Big Steve was tight with some powerful pols. He pimped for Jack K. He juiced Jack's pill habit. Freddy, let this one go.

I did. It rudely rankled me. I compensated, commensurate. I bore down big on the who-killed-Joan and the spare-Connie-from-Joe McCarthy fronts.

I gave Harry Fremont a gooooood gig. The rogue Feds had to have a long-range listening post. Find it for me, Dads. Lucky 13: Harry hit it, hard. *Un*lucky 13: I found bugs and taps in Connie's living room and bedroom. Lucky 13: they were mismounted and mismatched and malfunctioned. The broadcast beams barely made it next door.

Lucky 13: Stretch worked my Sweetzer listening post. *Un*lucky 13: she picked up Lez Line #2 chat. Claire Klein tricked with V. J. Jerome. She pressed him on "Robin Redbreast"—but venal V.J. purported to know zilch. Claire pressured him on Connie Woodard. V.J. said, "Don't sound me—she's just a dilettante." Stretch told me his tone was deadly demeaning. V.J., you speak with forked tongue.

Thirteen days. I want names. Claire wants names. V.J. won't name names. Connie won’t name names, most of all.

I vow to find Joan’s killer. Connie won’t name names. I vow to save her from Joe McCarthy. Connie won’t name names. We make love. We pillow-talk around the whirlwind woman who brought us together. Connie won’t name names. She won’t say whether she and Joan did or didn’t do the deed and were or were not rapture-rapt lovers.

I read Connie’s diaries. The sex sent me. It remained kiss and swerve, breath and scent. I read through years of Commie collusion. Delusion deluged me. Pathos pounded me. Connie and her cell siblings suck up Soviet yak-yak and proudly proclaim it as truth. They dialecticize purulent purges, cold conquest, mass murder. Connie says she’s Sovietizing me. I roll my eyes. It makes her laugh. She covers her mouth then. Some Central Committee of Kremlin kreeps might be listening.

Connie won’t name names. She won’t reveal Robin Redbreast’s real moniker. She won’t name names. I’m on her side as much as she’ll let me be—and more. She won’t name names in Joan’s memory. She memorializes Joan and tells me how much she loved her. She loves me with her body and won’t say the worshipful words. I explore the world’s secret shit. I excoriate it and explode it in Confidential. I live to do this. I’ve peeped windows since 1936. Connie joined the Party that same year. She joined the Party to run rogue in the squarejohn world and live baaaad bourgeois while she did it. We bit the same cancerous coin and spit it back at the world. Shared blood blooms in our veins. We both know this. She still won’t name names.

THE SWEETZER LISTENING POST

The noxious nite shift. Torrid two-line tilts. Pizza pie and beer and Pink's hot dogs. Stretch worked Lez Line #1. I worked Lez Line #2. We held hands and swapped nifty nuggets.

Gamal Abdel Nasser's in town. He's scrounging funds to overthrow Egypt. He's a fellow camel jockey. He's banging butch girls, three at a throw. Go, Gamal, go!!!

Biff Stanwyck's ensconced at a hot-sheet hut on Highland. She likes it fresh and heavenly wholesome. There's a dyke slave den near Hollywood High. The den doyenne's an old studio scrape nurse. She "reeducates" nymphets and feeds them dope and the lewd lore of Lesbos. Currently embroiled: ex–kiddie star Natalie Wood. Jimmy Dean told me she's hot to trot, across the sex spectrum. Biff's got first dibs.

Art Pepper's at it again. He's gone foto fiend. He's now the King of the Sapphic Snapshot. He's snapping pix at a fuck pad on Fountain. Go, Art, go!!!

I was big-time bored. My headphones itched. Lance went home to Liberace. Stretch and I boo-hoo'd his departure. The lez line pickings were thin—but tasty. Then Harry Fremont called, two hours back. Go, Harry, go!!! Once again, Harry delivers.

That Fed car. The rear plate I saw. Outside the Horvath crime scene. It's on loan to a Fed fuck named Charles Fullerton. He's in Joe McCarthy's posse. He's a rogue Red basher from Jump Street. And, Freddy, dig: I've located the longrange listening post. It's a shit shack in Silver Lake. They're running bug-taps up the yammering ying-yang. I hit my PC Bell contact. Dig: the phone bills run three grand a month.

Woooo!!!—that's one nifty nugget!!!

I yawned. I scratched my balls. I ogled Stretch in basketball silks. I got insistently itchy. I wanted to slooooooow-cruise the Fed pad and lay some late-nite love on Connie.

I yawned. I scratched my balls. I ogled Stretch in basketball silks. She went Wowie-zowie and scribbled up her scratch pad. She hurled off her headset and went You, too.

I hurled my headset. Stretch glooooowed and dished this:

"Claire and Babs just tricked with V. J. Jerome. I got forty minutes of grunts and groans, and then Claire starts pumping V.J. on Robin Redbreast again. V.J.'s vexed and bored, but he finally cops that Robin Redbreast was a crackpot scientist and a CP flunky named 'Sammy.' But that's as far as it went, because they all started up with the woof-woof again."

We lounged in the red bedroom. Connie wore a half-slip and her tartan skirt. I was stripped down to my skivvies. We ran the radio. Some Russki piano putz rippled Rachmaninoff.

I was tooooooo tense and caught-up constricted. I went by the Fed pad and reconnoitered. I got a Big Dumb Idea. It was cold-calculated and meant to make Connie name names.

Connie lay languorous. We stretched and struck poses and draped off the bed. I kissed Connie's knock knees. She ran her hands through my hair.

"Don't start hounding me again, dear. My lips are sealed, and I won't let you ruin this lovely moment."

I parted her legs and tossed her skirt and kissed my way up a bit. Connie made this soft sound that she makes.

"I'll name some names that you might recognize. You don't have to respond, but I'd be happy if you would."

Connie laffed. "It's our ongoing game, isn't it? Freddy interrogates Connie. Connie takes the Fifth. Freddy and Connie. Has it ever occurred to you that our names lack dignity?"

I smiled. Connie said, "I'll indulge you, if you promise that you won't press me too hard. I'm out to sustain this mood that I'm in."

I pulled her skirt down and patted it back into place. I looked up at her and fixed on her eyes. I'd know if she dissembled or flat-lied to me. I'd know if she knew the names and went refusenik.

"Robin Redbreast. He's allegedly a 'crackpot scientist' and a Party flunky named Sammy. There's also an FBI man named Charles Fullerton. He was at Joan's house with all the other cops, and I saw him there myself. You should know that he's in Joe McCarthy's posse—which is, quite frankly, out to get you, given the bugs and taps that I've pulled here."

Bingo/Eureka/Three-Cherry Jackpot. The refusenik reacts. Tears fill her eyes. Her hands fly to her face.

I know you, Constance. You'll wipe your face on a pillowcase. You'll light a cigarette and blow smoke at the ceiling. You'll say, "No comment" or "I'm not telling you."

I nailed the first part. I blew the second part. Connie said, "You're never going to quit, are you? You will always insist on this, and in the end, I'll either lose you or never have a moment's peace."

I pulled myself up close to her. I got our eyes close.

"Sammy. Charles Fullerton. The 'SA,' 'RJC,' and 'EPD' in your cell. I want full names and confirmations. It's all for Joan. You know that's true, and since you're a dialectical materialist who's always looking for a payoff, I'll offer you a doozy if you'll do this for me."

Connie kissed me. I wiped some tears off with my thumbs. She kissed me again. I pulled her slip up and kissed her bare back.

"'A doozy,' you said?"

"Yes. If you tell me what I need to know, I'll burn down the McCarthy gig. You'll never set foot on a witness stand. It'll spare some other people a good deal of grief, whether they're for-real traitors, or just bleeding-heart fools like you."

Connie said, "It's not nice to betray your friends, you know. People you've lived History with."

I said, "Joan."

Connie said, "We'll always come back to her. She's our deus ex machina."

I said, "Joan." Connie stubbed out her cigarette and turned back to me.

"Yes, we were briefly lovers, and that's as far as I'll go to sate your curiosity there. Charles Fullerton turned Joan out as an FBI informant, and served as her handler for years. He also introduced Joan to Ralph Horvath. Sammy is a physicist named Samuel Ahlendorf—and, yes, he was Robin Redbreast in our cell. 'RJC' was a Negro man named Robert Jones Crawshaw. He wrote for the Daily Worker, and now he writes cheap paperbacks about Negro pimps. I know that he's friends with your friend Billy Eckstine, for what that's worth. 'EDP' is Eleanor Price Donnell. She was one of Joan's professors at UCLA."

She snitched. It hit me six ways from Sunday. I rolled away from her. I stared at the red walls and faux-Goya garlands of women. Connie clung claustrophobe close.

“ ‘The citadel of my integrity has been irrevocably lost.’ That’s from T. E. Lawrence, in case you were wondering.”

I wasn’t. “Don’t shit a shitter, and don’t playact with me. It was the right thing to do.”

Connie stage-sighed. “I’m twenty years, one month, and nine days older than you. I was born in 1902, and you’re in love with two other women. Why did I do what I just did? Am I really that desperate to keep you?”

I stage-sighed. “You’re just self-absorbed. Are all Communists as self-involved as you?”

Connie laffed. “Frankly, yes.”

“Including Joan?”

“Yes, and Joan more than most.”

I said, “She made the rounds, didn’t she? Men, women—she had the appetite.”

Connie said, “She was faithless, yes.”

I said, “I’m sorry about that.”

“Don’t be, dear. You’re like that yourself.”

I pulled down her skirt. I caught her scent and kissed her breasts.

“I’ve fulfilled my part of the bargain, dear. How will you derail the evil senator and save me?”

“I’ll do something brave and stupid, and it will damn well cost me a great deal.”

THE DOWNTOWN L.A. PUBLIC LIBRARY

4/6/54

Research. Reading-room rigor. Know your foe. They might have YOU made, going in. You're the Tattle Tyrant Who Holds Hollywood Hostage. You're the Freewheeling Freddy O.

I felt gooooooood. Connie fed me a big breakfast. I chased it with three dexies and four jolts of Old Crow. I hit the library early. I collated a cavalcade of goooooood dish. I tapped solid sources.

The L.A. Herald and the L.A. Sentinel—L.A.'s colored rag. Who's Who In America/1953. Who's Who In American Academia/1953. Plus Downbeat magazine, the Daily Worker, and a call to LAPD R & I.

Dig:

Comrade Sammy Ahlendorf. Age sixty-three. That's "Robin Redbreast" to you. He's a physicist. He got doctorates in his native Russia and the U. of Chicago here. He's also a kultural kommissar. He partied with bibulous bohemians in wicked Weimar Berlin and malignant Moscow. He knew Eisenstein/Nijinsky/Stanislavsky/Meyerhold/Okhlopkov. Sicko cinema, dipshit dance, stilted stage productions for the maimed millions enslaved by the Red Beast. Sambo emigrates to the U.S., circa '36. He's dumped off the Manhattan Project, circa '44. He was pro-A-bomb then. He's anti-A-bomb now. This guy gored my goat. I was hopped-up and out for Commo blood—baaaaaad. I might phone-book Sambo in the studly style of the Hat Squad.

Comrade Robert Jones Crawshaw/aka "KKKomrade X." Age forty-one. Labor agitator and scurvy scribe for the Daily Worker. Would-be "Racial Reconciler." Dig this: He tried to integrate the L.A. Klan, circa '40. Close pal of my pal Billy Eckstine. The august author of Black Pimp, Black Bossman, Black Savior, Black Dictator, Black Kingpin, Black Bwana, and the *KKK*ontroversial Black Führer. Comrade Bob renounces Communism, circa '51. Comrade Bob heads hard right. He's pals with nativist nudnik Gerald L. K. Smith. He's got a righteous rap sheet.

There's three pops for receiving stolen goods. There's the cancerous capper, circa '48. Ralph Mitchell Horvath bails him out on a burglary beef.

Comrade Eleanor Price Donnell. Age thirty-eight. Tenured history professor at UCLA. She's a shrill shrike and shrieky Soviet suck-up. She's the author of Moscow Miasma—an apoplectic apologia for the show-trial sins of Uncle Joe Stalin. You think you've got this bilious babe pegged, don't you? Well, fuckers, here's the real reconstructionist riff:

She's an ex–call girl. She pandered poon to the Party, circa '44–'45. She sold sex to CPers with gelt. She was part of a poor-working-girls/Stalinist stable. She gets popped V-E Day. A cadre of Commie construction magnates celebrates Hitler's surrender. It's caviar and call girls for these cats. La Donnell and her sick sisters turn tricks for striking dock workers. LAPD Vice intervenes. They raid a fuck pad-cum-millionaire's mansion. La Donnell and eighteen other confessed Commie girls get busted. La Donnell writes a memoir about her salacious sojourn. It's called Party Girl. She wrote it under the pseudonym "Miss X." Robert Jones Crawshaw's publisher published it.

My Connie's Commie cell. Add on the late Joan Hubbard Horvath: Commo, turncoat, licentious lover. Here's the tattle-tabloid tilt of a lifetime:

I'm marching into the maximum maw of madness.

They all lived in L.A. I installed an itinerary—north/south/northwest. Comrade Sam lived in the Valley. Comrade Bob lived in Watts. Billy Eckstine set the meet at Club Zombie. Comrade Ellie lived on the Wilshire corridor. It was très close to UCLA.

Sambo and Party Girl were door knocks. Knock, Knock—trouble treads your way. I'd browbeat them. I'd bring them to tears. I'd dig for the dish on Comrade Joan Hubbard. I'd yank them through the war years. I'd push the Claire Klein angle. This dangerous dame is out to kill a man. She thinks Connie Woodard might know him. So, how about you?

I bopped out to bumfuck Van Nuys. The Valley Vista Villas—hotbox huts off Hastings and Harlequin Heights. I parked and popped up to the pad. Knock, knock—trouble treads your—

Sambo opened up. Ooohhh—he's threadbare thin and cancer cough–consumptive. I flashed my State Police badge. All the HUAC humps had them. Cringe, you Red rat fink.

"Yes. I've seen that badge before. It's not like you people haven't sought me out in the past."

I said, "This is a new wrinkle, boss. It pertains to the murder of a woman named Joan Horvath. You knew her as Joan Hubbard."

Sambo let me in. He rolled an oxygen tank to his chair. He sucked air. He cancer-coughed and said, "Yes?"

I perched on a footstool. "I'm not here to nail you for your CP membership, pops. You should know that going in."

Sambo said, "That's white of you—and uninformed. I left the CP in '44, before I got cleared for the Manhattan Project. I was the first one to abandon the cell I was in, although all of the others, except for our den mother, ultimately saw the light."

The statement stunned me. Connie's diaries ditzed me. I saw Sambo's initials on cell minutes for the postwar period.

"I have documents, sir. These documents plainly state that you attended cell wingdings up to the late '40s."

Sambo sighed and sucked air. "Then they're fabrications. Especially if the den mother proffered them to you. I'm an apostate, Mr. Detective. I renounced the Party, and I've been vetted by a great number of committees, both State and Federal. And if Mr. McCarthy should subpoena me for this latest pogrom of his, I'll testify to that at the outset. You look like McCarthy, I might add. You share his black-haired, beetle-browed look."

Fuck you, pops—I got your beetle brows swinging!!!

"Joan Horvath, sir. She was Hubbard when you knew her."

"Yes, and I had an affair with that very lively and brilliant young woman, and I think you're bright enough to have deduced that I'm in no condition to drive to Hollywood, break into a house, and commit murder."

Esta la verdad, Daddy-O—I sound you loud and clear.

"What did you think of Joan?"

"I thought she was the single most self-absorbed human being I've ever met, and that she was a hot piece of skirt. I also thought that she was no sort of Communist, back when the rest of us were convinced that the Party was the light of the world."

I snorted. "That's it for Joan, huh?"

Sambo sucked air. "Yes, it is. Ask me about nuclear physics. I can talk physics all day long, but it might prove to be over your head."

I snorted snide. "Okay. Why'd you get dumped off the Manhattan Project? That must have been an ace gig for a guy in your trade."

Sambo sucked air. He rattled and racked. His lifespan loomed as next week.

"I'd made friends in the film colony, here in L.A. Young people—one in particular. I was antibomb then, even though I helped build the bombs the fascist U.S. dropped on Japan. It's believed that I was fired for scientific ineptitude. That's hardly the case. I was a political casualty, pure and simple. I may be a physicist, but I'm an idealist and a patron of the arts, most of all."

Sambo, the idealist. Sambo, the ardent artist. I ran with that ball.

"I know you swung with all those swinging artists in Russia. Eisenstein, Stanislavsky, Meyerhold—those were some hotshot cats."

Sambo laffed and coughed viscous vapors. Pops, you contaminate me.

"I knew them, yes. Their visions formed me in ways that you will never know."

Sambo sickened me. The interview inflamed me. I bounced a new ball. Let's get this over with.

"There's a dangerous woman, circling your cell. I know she's aware of your 'den mother,' who I assume to be Constance Woodard. Her name is Claire Klein, and she's not to be trifled with."

Ooohhh—did Sambo just glitch, twitch, shudder, cower, and cringe?

"No. The name Claire Klein means nothing to me."

That's okay, Sambo—I've registered your response.

"Constance Woodard. Your 'den mother.' Why would she fabricate cell minutes, after all the members of the cell had renounced the Party?"

Sambo sighed. "Because she was the only one of us who truly believed, and her belief transcended quite an onslaught of reality. And she was the loneliest woman I've ever known, and her fabrications must have convinced her that she still had comrades and friends."

The Club Zombie. A double dose of darktown. A danger dive. Discordant bebop and the Baron Samedi Cocktail—"One Sip Leaves

You Zombified."

I knew the Zombie. I busted beboppers, mud sharks, and junkies here back in the '40s. The big buck bartender made me. Fractious Freddy's back. He still be baaaaaaaaaad muthafuckin' juju. I'll make him a Baron Samedi Cocktail. He gots to be Zombified.

He cooked up the cocktail. It glowed radioactive. I slipped him a Bondage Bob C-note. He went You the man. I guzzled the cocktail. It bebopified the dexies dosing my bloodstream. I went ZOMBIFIED.

Robert Jones Crawshaw walked in. He's aka Comrade Bob and *KKK*omrade X. He bypassed the bandstand and bopped to a booth by the bar. I made him off old mug shots. He looked bad to the bone. I dug his purple porkpie hat.

I joined him. He snapped his fingers. Two Baron Samedi Cocktails appeared. He bolted his. I sipped mine.

He belched, he burped, he bypassed all amenities. He gave me the Big This Is It.

"The Party is a crock of motherfucking shit. Ask Richard Wright or Zora Neale Hurston. Money and fame is the name of the game. I'm raking it in off Black Bossman, Black Dictator, and Black Führer. Billy told me you're investigating the murder of Comrade Joanie, and let me state at the outset that I liked her okay, but I never poured her the pork—not no way. Ralphie and me were tight—and I know you killed him, and it was a humbug deal, and now you got the guilts. I didn't kill Joanie, because the fuzz know it was a white man, because Joanie scratched his face good. I also know you know that Ralphie bailed me out on a 459 charge, back in '48. Are we all caught up, now? You think Bob Harrison would shoot me a gig, writing for Confidential? I'm hot shit in intellectual circles. Black Führer just went into its twelfth printing. Alfred Kazin and all them motherfucking intellectuals go for my shit."

I was zombified. I was beatified and transmogrified. The booze. The bebop. The dope. Comrade Sammy's sad take on my Connie. The mad musings of *KKK*omrade X.

"Known associates. Joan, Ralphie, or both of them. Can you come up with some names?"

*KKK*omrade X went haw-haw. "Some Fed mofo named 'Charlie.' He shot Ralphie the word on burglary scores. He knew Joanie, too, and he might have been her handler when she got hip and turned rat. Plus, I think Charlie might have introduced Joanie to Ralphie. That's the only name that I can think of, off the top of my head."

Charlie. Agent Charles Fullerton. It had to be.

"There's a woman named Claire Klein. She's got a very bad beef against a man in your cell, or in your general circle of the Party. Does her name ring any bells?"

*KK*Komrade X said, "Nein, Daddy. But there was only two men in the cell—me and old Sammy Ahlendorf. That said, there was this cast of thousands that the den mother knew, because she was always taking in strays. That also said, there was no man who jumped out of the crowd and said, 'Hey, remember me?' "

I stood up. I was Zombified, Commified, *RAT*ified.

"Go home and sleep it off, baby. And remember to chat me up to Bob H."

—

K*K*Komrade X called it. I took his advice and car-napped in my Packard pimpmobile. I woke up, unzombified. I remained Commified and *RAT*ified. My first thought was:

Lonesome Connie.

I pulled those taps and bugs at her pad. The McCarthy/rogue-Fed listening post was northeast in Silver Lake. Connie's place stood within long-range broadcast beams. Comrade Sam lived in Van Nuys. His place was out of range. *KK*Komrade X lived in Watts. His place was out of range. Comrade Ellie lived in Westwood. Party Girl's pad was out of range.

And:

Die Kameraden had ditched the Party and renounced Communism. Only my Connie carried the torch.

Ergo:

The Feds had targeted my Connie, solamente. Plus other Commos in cells unknown.

I whipped west to the Wilshire corridor. Party Girl had demon digs in a high-ticket high-rise. A valet parked my pimpmobile. I big-tipped him. He said Miss Donnell was in and walked me to the penthouse lift.

A glass rocket rocked me up twenty-four stories. It vibrated me, vertiginous. The door opened into Party Girl's parlor. Party Girl welcomed me.

She was tall. She was blond and waif willowy. She looked like Lizabeth Scott in Pitfall. Dick Powell leaves his wife for her. Now I know why.

I flashed my Statie badge. Party Girl said, "I already testified, and I thought I blew all the State HUAC guys, back when I was in the game."

She gored my gonads. She had Liz Scott's lisp and low purr down pat. She wore tennis whites to stay home and talk blow jobs to strange men. She defined noblesse oblige.

"Ten minutes, Miss Donnell. That's all I need."

"Who do you want me to fink on? I thought I was done there."

"I'm investigating Joan Horvath's murder. We're looking at the CP cell she was in. I've talked to Samuel Ahlendorf and Bob Crawshaw already. Quite obviously, you were on my list."

Party Girl went After you. I entered her demented demimonde. Glass walls winged wide on Wilshire. Dig the deep-pile rugs and lounge-lizard furnishings—all violet velour.

She walked me to a wet bar. She poured two Tom Collins, light on the lime. We sat on black leather stools and nudged knees.

"I didn't know Joanie that well. I wouldn't sleep with her, and I outgrew the Party before she did. I tried to recruit her for my stable, but she wouldn't hear of it. We ratted each other out to you State HUAC guys, but I forget who finked first. The den mother knew her better than any of us, that's for sure."

The Liz Scott lisp and low growl. The lioness-level gaze. She's leading you. *KKK*omrade X called and warned her. Freddy O.'s en route. He ain't no HUAC cop. Milk him, baby. He's money, once removed. He's susceptible. Spin him into your spell.

She wants to slander-slam den mother Connie. That's her intention. Field this changeup, bitch:

"Let me issue a warning about a woman that I consider to be quite dangerous—one that I've passed on to Mr. Ahlendorf and Mr. Crawshaw already. She has plainly stated that she intends to kill a man in your cell, or the general orbit of Party members you might have knowledge of. Her name is Claire Klein. She's quite persistent, and she has a way of getting up in your face that I would describe as unforgettable."

Party Girl lit a cigarette. "Well, there's one woman and one instance that I can think of, but the name Claire Klein sounds no gongs for me. It was back during the war. '43, I think."

I said, "Please continue."

"Well, it was some sort of Scottsboro Boys revival, and it was supposed to be all-Party—I thought one hundred percent. Then in walks a Wave officer, in her full-dress blues. She sizes me up as a girl who likes to gab, and then she applies the full press."

The war/the Waves/Lieutenant j.g. Claire Klein. Perdition, catch my soul—

"The funny thing was, it all pertained to Commie arcana in Russia, during the show-trial era. She was hipped on Vsevolod Meyerhold, his importance in radical-theater circles, and how Stalin liquidated his theater, made him attend a self-criticism session, denounced him for abandoning socialist realism, and had him tortured and killed. This is in '39 and '40, I think. Here's the worst part. The NKVD stabbed his wife's eyes out and stabbed her to death a few months earlier."

Meyerhold. Sambo Ahlendorf knew that cat.

"That's the extent of it? This Wave woman pressed you and moved on?"

"Right with Eversharp."

"Samuel Ahlendorf mentioned Meyerhold to me, earlier today."

"Sammy's old, and he's Russian. He's dined out on radical-socialist theater, all the time I've known him. I dare you to sit through one of Meyerhold's plays. Crassly put, they ain't Guys and Dolls."

I gulped. "Let's discuss the den mother. I assume you're referring to Constance Woodard?"

Party Girl crushed her cigarette. "That's right. Connie was our resident drag and expert on Joanie Hubbard. She was also Joanie's lover for an indeterminate period of time, during the war and after it, which means that she was awarded the Jealous Lover of All-Time Award for who knows how many years running, because you have never seen jealousy like that, and you have never seen anyone chafe under the yoke of it like Joanie did."

I said, "Keep going. There's something you've been dying to tell me."

Party Girl laffed. "I never liked Connie, but I grokked her existential anguish. Because Joanie was a Venus fly trap, and she had men, women, and who knows what else standing in line to get in her bed. Connie pulled a gun on two of Joanie's would-be suitors, and one man—a lefty lawyer in Marin County—vanished from sight altogether."

Now, I'm Commified, reconstructivized, social-dialecticized—

"Get it—Mr. State Cop who's not a state cop? The den mother killed that man, and that's what tore our dumb Communist cell asunder."

That man." Claire's Meyerhold fix. Dead men and dead Joanie. I was dungeon-deep with dead men and castrated by Communist women. Here I am in the den mother's bedroom. I'm crapped out on the bed. The red walls clooooose in on me.

I thumbed a library book. I'd bipped by the West L.A. Library, post–Party Girl. I did microfilm research. The San Francisco Chronicle, '48–'49. An emphasis on local murders.

The book. It's a big and boring Baedeker on Russian radical theater. There's big ink on Vsevolod Meyerhold and his actress wife, Zinaida Raikh. Party Girl told it true. Stalin's goons tortured and shot Meyerhold dead. They stabbed Zinaida's eyes out and stabbed her dead. They were one comely couple. The pix told it true. He's hero handsome as he waves a Red flag. She's beautiful in her babushka. The Red Wheel crushes them flat.

Meyerhold was a Stalin-era stud and swinging swordsman. He brought the brisket to women in Russia and abroad and left bawling babies behind. Those facts fanned me. Ditto this fact. Somebody ratted Meyerhold to the NKVD.

Murder in Moscow. Murder in Marin County. It's September '49. "Lefty lawyer" Will Hartshorn vanishes. Will's a wicked womanizer. Scads of scurrilous Commo women are questioned, to no avail. Wicked Will dips off and disappears. There's no corpus delecti—case closed.

The den mother's downstairs. She's cooking our dinner. She'll call up to me.

I left the library and sidled up to Silver Lake. There's the rogue-Fed listening post. It's a shit shack on Ewing off of Duane Street. Harry told me they run three monitor shifts and lock up at midnite. I drove to Higgins' Hardware and bought what I'd need. Charles Fullerton lived in the Miracle Mile. The mid-Wilshire fone book said so.

The den mother dipped upstairs. I heard her heels hit. She stood in the doorway. She smiled at me and read me. She went What's wrong, love?

I said, "I talked to some people who knew you pretty well. You know who I mean, because you gave me their names."

She said, "Yes?"

I said, "They hold you in the highest contempt, because you stayed the course after they walked, and that made you a dupe and marked you as naïve. You wrote hundreds of pages of cell minutes and spun fantasies. You loved them. They didn't love you. You carried the torch. You created a pretend world in this very room. That fact alone has convinced me to protect you."

Connie said, "I 'stayed the course.' It's quite the male concept, but it's not something I can accept in you, if it means that you consider me pathetic."

I laffed. "How could I? You killed a man with no compunction, in the Freddy Otash mode. 'Pathetic' hardly describes it."

"He brutalized Joan. He hit her and demeaned her, and I couldn't stand it. I shot him and dumped his body in a lime pit in Point Reyes. The police questioned me once and believed my denials. They never troubled me again, and my ex-comrades never informed on me."

"How did you feel, after you killed him?"

"I felt aghast and relieved."

Perdition, catch my soul—for I do KNOW her.

Charlie Fullerton, FBI. Harry Fremont tagged him a booze-hound bachelor and a cloistered closet queen. He juiced at the Raincheck Room, Rick's Riptide, and Roscoe's Reef. He had an above-garage crib off 6th and Dunsmuir. Harry advised a midnite snatch-and-grab. Dump him in his doorway and go in strong.

Sound advice. The lock snapped easy. The crib was cloistered-closet claustrophobic. Small kitchen/small bathroom/small front room. Whew—it's Suffocation City. It's suffused with stale cigarette smoke and spilled booze.

I kept the lights off. I lurked and listened, doorway-close. 12:19 a.m. Fumbling footsteps. Charlie's key in the lock.

The door opened. I sandbagged Charlie, coming in. I kicked his legs out from under him. He moaned and mewed. I banged his head on the floor and hankie-gagged him. I dragged him into the kitchen and hit the lights. Heh, heh—there's this hot plate.

I handcuffed Charlie. I plugged the plate in. The coils glowed hot, hot. I hauled Charlie to his feet and shoved him up to the counter.

Charlie bug-eye beseeched me—don't scorch me, boss.

I curled his right-hand fingers into the coils. I scorched and scalded him. My hankie-gag muffled his screams. I caught the french-fried fragrance of burned skin.

Charlie bawled and buckled and tore free of me. I kicked him in the balls and jackknifed him. A frigid Frigidaire was right there. I opened the door. I pulled Charlie upright and jammed his scorched hand in the freezer compartment. Yeah!!!—it's a skin-fry frappé!!!

Charlie tried to scream. The gag mumble-muted him. The cold ice cauterized his scalded skin and made streams of steam rise. I pulled his hand free and shoved him into a chair. I stood over him and laid out my Bill of No Redress.

"Joan Hubbard and Ralphie Horvath. Connie Woodard and her CP cell. This latest jive crusade of Joe McCarthy's, and how Connie fits in. Who you've got wired out of that long-range post in Silver Lake. Nod once if you want to live, and twice if you want to die."

Charlie nodded once. I yanked his gag. His muffled scream screeched out, sissy soprano. I pulled my pocket flask and fed him bonded bourbon. He gargle-gurgled it down and glowed booze-hound red.

I waited. Charlie went Gimme. I ran a refill down his throat. I tapped my wristwatch. Charlie went More. I ran Refill #2 down his gullet. That got him. His booze glow glissandoed into plain old pink-red.

I said, "Give."

Charlie coughed and cleared his throat. Phlegm flew into his hankie. He went from refusenik to running dog in one second flat.

"Joanie was never a Commie or a Comsymp. She was an FBI plant at the gate. We financed her radio show and gave her a stipend she could live on. She was always ours, and we planted her in Connie Woodard's UCLA class, because Connie was lez and loved young-idealist cooze, and because Connie was the den mother of the L.A. Left. Joanie was bait from 1939 on. She was nothing but a promiscuous gang girl with hotshot college degrees, and she was on the Federal payroll up to the time of her death. I set Joanie up with Ralphie Horvath, and they got a 459 thing going. So fucking what? Burglary isn't treason, the last time I checked."

I sucked bonded bourbon. I passed the flask. Charlie sucked bonded bourbon. He was booze-bombed and hurtin' for certain. He took on this weird white witch doctor look.

"So, the cell. There's a joke for you. Sammy A., that hump Crawshaw, and Ellie Donnell. They were smart, though. They recanted before they got named, which left the den mother all by her lonesome. And she was a joke, but she knew everybody, and everybody confided in her. She's the linchpin of this new thing Joe M.'s running, and we wired her place, but the bugs and taps went on the fritz. Joanie was set to testify, as a friendly witness. She was going to lay out the criminal misdeeds of Ahlendorf, Crawshaw, and Donnell, as sidebars to their recantings, to tell the whole world that onetime Commies never change. But, Joanie gets snuffed. So, there's a hot-prowl hump on the loose. So, the LAPD keys on him as a suspect, and blows him up. You were there, you should know."

I ran through the rat-out. One riff rang false.

"I can see Crawshaw and Donnell as criminals—sure. But Ahlendorf didn't hit me as the criminal type."

"Yeah, but Sammy's bent. We knew that, at the start. He emigrated in '36, but he kept going back to Russia, under false passports that the Party fixed him up with. He was embroiled in some shifty stuff over there, but we never figured out what."

I said, "That long-range post you're running. You didn't set that whole deal up just to nail the den mother."

Charlie said, "That's correct. We've got nine other cells wired up, lockstep. The members are all Hollywood types, including some very large names, and most of them are linked to the den mother. Joe M. wants to squeeze her and get her to roll on them. She's never rolled before, but we've got her for Murder One, up in Marin County. A lawyer went missing, and we know why. You know how we know? Because Joanie told us. This guy was putting the boots to her, and the den mother got jealous and snuffed him. We can get her full immunity, if she rolls. If she doesn't roll, she's got a hot date with the green room."

I sighed. "Constance Linscott Woodard will never roll."

Charlie said, "Freddy, you're blushing."

The post was spiffed, spangled, and space age. Joe McCarthy scrounged the latest and greatest new stuff.

Long-range broadband transceivers. All-weather bug mounts, suited for outdoor use. Camouflaged microphones. Long-play tape recorders. Automatic voice activators. Static-eliminating headsets.

Plus work desks. Plus twelve file cabinets. All of them unlocked. All stuffed with bug-and-tap transcripts. Nine Commie cells headed for Hell.

I stuffed 12-gauge shotgun shells in the file drawers and spread gunpowder on top. I placed paper bags full of fertilizer and ammonium nitrate under the desks. I splashed two-gallon gas cans full of Mobile Supreme on the floor. I left the front door open and blasted seven ACP rounds inside.

The post blew up mauve and pink. It harked me back to Hiroshima and that blistering blast at Jack K.'s bomb bash. There's this magnificent mushroom cloud, all aglow.

THE GOOGIE'S PARKING LOT

4/7/54

Googie's. Early-bird peeps from my Packard pimpmobile. A peremptory peep for Claire Klein, specific.

I popped dexies and chain-smoked. The a.m. Herald was due. Fullerton wouldn't rat me. He was in deep with a putrid pol soon to implode. I had him for all his Joanie-Ralphie 459 shit. The listening-post blast would blare headlines. The Feds would stagnantly stonewall it. The words McCarthy/black-bag job/rogue action would not pry their way into print.

I peeped the back window. Four shadows whipped by my windshield. Sergeant Max Herman. Sergeant Red Stromwall. Sergeant Harry Crowder. Officer Eddie Benson.

The Hats. Pearl gray suits and white Panamas. Trouble treads my way.

I waved faux wolfsbane. They deadpanned it. Max and Red yanked me out of the car. Harry and Eddie cuffed me. They tossed me in the backseat of their K-car and sandwiched me in tight.

Max drove. Red whistled "Funeral March of a Marionette." We ran Code 3 downtown. We hit City Hall and took the freight lift up to the DB. They dumped me in sweatbox #3 and cuffed me to a chair. Note the fat fone book on the table.

Max said, "You're fucked, Freddy. Metro's been spot-tailing you since February."

Red said, "We know everyone that you've seen and everything that you've done."

Harry said, "The moment of truth approaches, Freddy."

Eddie said, "Your camel-fucking ass is grass."

I said, "Maybe we can pin my grief on some random lowlifes. The Herald's always willing to go that route for you guys."

Max phone-booked me. He threw a top-of-the-head/leave-no-marks shot. He cracked my cranium gooood.

“We know every sleazy thing that you and your goons have pulled for Confidential. We saw you and Bernie Spindel hot-wire Steve Cochran’s place, and we saw you pull that red devil stunt with him the night of the film shoot. We know all about your wingding with the den mother, who seems a little long in the tooth for a young stud like you. We tailed you to your interviews with Samuel Ahlendorf, that geek Crawshaw, and Ellie Donnell. We boom-miked your assault on Agent Fullerton, and we saw you blow up the Fed post.”

Red phone-booked me. He threw a cause-great-pain/leave-no-marks shot.

“You’re fucked, Freddy. We know all of your shit, inside out.”

Harry phone-booked me. “You’re not our pal anymore, Freddy. You’re just some jamoke that’s outlived his usefulness.”

Eddie phone-booked me. “We’ve got you for Treason, Sedition, and boocoo Smith Act violations. You’ll burn, just like the Rosenbergs.”

Max phone-booked me. He employed his love-tap/this-ain’t-so-bad swing. “We’d appreciate it if you’d recount your interviews with Ahlendorf, Crawshaw, and Donnell. That would go a long way toward earning our favor.”

Red phone-booked me. He tossed a love-tap uppercut.

“We’ll let you think about it. We’ll put you up in a tidy cell, away from the riffraff. I know the Chief is looking forward to speaking with you.”

Harry phone-booked me. “Freddy O.’s wild ride has just ended.”

Eddie phone-booked me. “R.I.P., Freddy.”

They tossed me in a holding cell. My bunk was bare-bones. My hurt head hit a hard pillow. It caromed me into a coma.

I wasted Ralph Mitchell Horvath. Joi gobbled Steve the Stud’s schvantz. I beat up Johnnie Ray. I peeped ten thousand houses. I popped penance payments in Joanie Horvath’s mailbox.

I must have cried. I soaked my pillow down to the mattress. My head felt homogenized. My cerebellum sang sad songs. My cranium creaked.

William H. Parker racked the door and sat on my bunk. He wore his full four-star blues.

“The Los Angeles Police Department now owns you. As of this moment, Confidential has ceded its claim. We will let you skate for everything that you have done. You will skate for your assault on Agent Fullerton, and for blowing up the listening post. You will skate for your rogue actions on the Joan Horvath snuff. You will skate for any and all of your illegal actions while in the employ of Confidential. We will allow you to avenge Joan Horvath, however you deem fit. In recompense for the above stated mercies, you will enter my direct employ."

Parker paused. His Bible gaze burned my soul. The Book of Revelation 3:17–18: And you don't realize that you are wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked. So, I advise you to buy gold from me—gold that has been purified by fire.

I said, "Yes."

Parker said, "You will sign a detailed confession regarding your work for Confidential. You will serve as my personal informant and agent provocateur, and assist me in my efforts to destroy the magazine. We are going to bankrupt it, expose the breadth of its evil, and slay it dead in Federal court. As of now, you are my personal snitch, rat, stool pigeon, and squealer. Say 'Yes' or 'No' immediately. Your answer will dictate the course of the rest of your life."

I said, "Yes."

—

Tough tasks. Deep duties. My vows to first fulfill. WOMEN said it all.

Joan, Claire, Connie. Linked in cause and effect. Calamitous causation. Let's extract the truth thereof.

I bopped to Beverly Hills and beat feet to my bungalow. I stood by my wall graph and linked lines in black ink. I linked Joan to Connie, straight up.

Connie knew every Commie in captivity. Joan's killer lurked there. The '30s and '40s CP in L.A. Comintern cads coursing through. Fractious front groups established and unions usurped. How many dark-haired/heavy-bristled white men lurked and looted within?

On to Claire. Let's craft a chronology. Let's link lines. Let's answer this quivering question: who's the man that Claire wants to kill?

A nihilist notion nudged me. It was all circumstantial and based on thirdhand dish. Claire's out to get Sammy Ahlendorf. Here's my line links:

Lez Line #2. Stretch monitors it. Babs Payton dishes per her three-ways with Claire. Claire tricks with Russian consulate humps. She speaks Russian. Ahlendorf is Russian—but emigrated here in ’36. Claire pumps out the code name “Robin Redbreast.” V. J. Jerome says it’s a former Red named “Sammy.” Samuel Ahlendorf belonged to Connie Woodard’s cell. Claire carries a Makarov pistol. Claire hates Reds and has finked them to HUAC. Babs dishes this: Robin Redbreast was a crazy Commo in the ’30s and ’40s. He’s stale stuff in the ’50s. His expulsion from the Manhattan Project underlines this.

Then, there’s this:

Sammy digs Russian revolutionary art. He rankly revealed it to me. Ellie Donnell told me the tale of Meyerhold’s maiming and murder. Meyerhold was a fitful formalist. He renounced socialist realism and pissed off the punk Politburo. Meyerhold is snuffed, circa ’39–’40. His wife Zinaida Raikh is torture-stabbed and slain. A Wave officer braces Party Girl at an all-Party bash in L.A. It has to be Claire. She presses Party Girl per the whole Meyerhold deal. Claire’s armed with supple suppositions now. She’s got Sammy gun-sighted. That’s a probable certainty.

Harry Fremont was tight with a U.S. Customs cop. I called and asked him to run passport checks on Claire and Sammy A. Check for Russian excursions. Post-’36 for Sammy. He might be using forged Party passports. Look for variants on the Robin Redbreast code name. Do this per Claire: check birth certificates per her surname and DOB. Check her parents’ surnames. Check Claire’s passport travel: ’39 and ’40. She was of legal age then. Did she connect to Robin Redbreast in Russia? Meyerhold was a sweltering swordsman. Did he siphon his seed in ’20 and ’21 in New York? Did he somehow spawn spectacular Claire? I pledged Harry a grand and told him to get back to me faaaaast. He told me it was all far-fetched. Yeah, but you never know.

I ink-linked lives. Claire, Joan, Connie—shakedown shills, rabid Reds, knock-kneed succubi. I ran them all through the Book of Revelation and found that they fit right there.

The fone rang. I picked up. Harry said, “I’ll never doubt you again.”

“Tell me why.”

“Claire and Robin Redfield—that’s the name on Ahlendorf’s passport—crossed paths in Moscow in late ’39 and ’40, but they traveled separately.”

I said, “Don’t stop now.”

Harry said, "Who's stopping? Customs ran the Klein skirt's DOB in New York. The guy was smart, because he cross-checked 'Claire Klein' with birth-parent names, and got Meyerhold and Zinaida Raikh. The Meyerholds granted custody to Mendel Klein and his wife, Clara, who were both big Party and radical-theater people. They gave the baby their name, and it all fits, just like you said it would."

The Book of Revelation 2:9–10: I know about your suffering and your poverty….I know the blasphemy of those opposing you.

I owed Sambo a warning. I sensed his malevolent move, back in Russia. He finked Meyerhold and his missus to the Politburo and the NKVD. He cited reconstructionism, recidivism, formalism. He kissed Commie ass as only Commies can. His motive was most likely envy. He didn't want to be a bomb big shot. He wanted to be a radical-theater rajah. He wanted to mesmerize the masses, à la Meyerhold in his hoodwinked heyday.

Dusk hit. I looped Coldwater Canyon northbound and hit the Valley. The Valley Vista Villas loomed. I surveillance-circled the block and came back behind the buildings. I noticed a series of second-floor terraces with connecting walkways.

Let's surprise Comrade Sambo. Pick the sliding-glass-door lock and enter his crib. Hey, Sambo—it's dues time. Run while you can. Claire Klein is radical theater beyond your corrupt ken.

I parked and schlepped it up to the terrace walkway. Sambo's pad was three glass doors down. I heard shuddering Shostakovich bursting from within. The muted message was Fuck the Soviet Beast. The doors were heavy glass and locked from inside. I thought I heard one single screech.

I was too late. Sambo ran toward the terrace—and me. He was naked. His pubic hair had been shaved. His eyes had been stabbed out. His chest and legs had been stabbed. Claire chased after him. She wore a wooden Kabuki mask. Kabuki masks were a Meyerhold trademark. Claire's mask bore the face of Zinaida Raikh.

Comrade Sam couldn't see me. Zinaida-Claire didn't see me. Comrade Sam tripped and fell. Claire ran her shiv between his legs and eviscerated him.

Rush-hour traffic. It slowed my trek back. I stopped at a pay phone to kill time. I called Bill Parker and gave him a loose lowdown. He said, "Thanks, Freddy." He said, "Better dead than Red," and hung up.

I hung up and snail-trailed back to 6th and Dunsmuir. Charlie Fullerton lived above his garage. His garage enticed me.

Old police detectives and Feds. They saved their most fecund files and stored them in marked boxes. They piled said boxes in their garages—more often than not.

Charlie would be off at the Raincheck Room or Rick's Riptide. It was 7:45. I had lock picks and a penlight. I had Whiskey Bill Parker's home number if I fell in the shit.

It went as predicted. I picked the lock and picked through stuffed boxes. They were code-named and listed code-numbered rat-outs. I found the "Redbird" boxes and counted numbered snitches. Who killed you, baby? There's just numbers—no names.

Fullerton inked occasional comments. Rat-out #114 stood out. This guy was Hard Red and Deep Red. Sammy Ahlendorf mentored him. He talked up the need to snuff Federal snitches. He did this incessantly. Joan ratted him in May '49. He never joined the cell. Fullerton called him a fellow traveler. He was a closeted Party member. He drifted off for parts unknown, fall '49.

I wrote "114" and Fullerton's comments on my scratch pad. I wrote down numbers and comments for a dozen other snitches. I planned to pop the den mother with Pentothal. I believe in coerced confessions. How could I not? Bill Parker just made me his snitch.

I beat retreat feet to Googie's. The Tattle Tyrant turns tail. He slinks in defeat.

Rock Hudson sat in my booth. He was anchored in anguish and locked in loss. He's all worrisome and woe is me.

I sat down. Rock said, "Ask me why I look like warmed-over shit. I'm a movie star. I can't afford days like this."

"Tell me—but it's not like I can't guess."

Rock said, "Claire robbed me. She cracked the safe in my den, and stole twelve grand in cash and forty grand in gold Krugerrands. She'll be long gone by now, and I know I'll never see her again. I called Lew Wasserman, and, man, is he pissed."

“You got off easy, brother. Some day I’ll tell you why.”

Rock slid me a slip of paper. “She left this in the safe. It’s for you. You get a good-bye, but I don’t.”

I read the note. It was bravura brief:

> Freddy, love:
>
> Rain check, okay? I’ll be thinking of you.
>
> All best,
> C.K.

THE DEN MOTHER'S RED BEDROOM

4/8/54

I said, "It's for Joan."

She said, "You know exactly what to say to get exactly what you want from me. Truth serum, really."

Connie sat in the red chair. I sat on the red footstool. She held out her left arm. I swipe-swabbed it with alcohol and measured a mainline. I spike-speared her and jammed her the juice.

She sighed and went loosey-goosey. I said, "Count backward from one hundred and feel free to shut your eyes."

She moved her lips. I barely heard it: 100, 99, 98, gonesville. I took a brief breather and consulted my control notes.

Joan rat-out #84. Code name: Lazy Maizie. She's a San Marino socialite. She makes big donations to the Strikebusters' International. It's a known Commo front. Joan rat-out #204. Code name: John Henry. He's a male Negro. He's right tackle for the Detroit Lions. Charlie Fullerton's comment: "All the mud-shark girls go nuts for him."

I said, "How do you feel, Connie?"

Connie said, "Loose. But what if I don't feel inclined to…"

"Name names? That's okay. I'd be satisfied with simple, candid responses."

Connie, très loose: "Love, I'm sure that's all you'll ever get from…"

I said, "Lazy Maizie."

Connie, très, très loose. "She smoked hashish. She…put…her…hand on Joan's leg…and Joan slapped her."

That was gooooood. It was Joan-centric and Joan-phobic. I laid John Henry on her.

Connie, yet more loose: "He was…a steel-driving man in a Negro spiritual. We…sang that song at all the Scottsboro Boys rallies…we knew that something like half of them were guilty, though."

It was half good. Connie voiced un-Commie-esque candor. I gave her a brief breather.

Rat-out #114 was un-code-named. I'd have to mention Sammy Ahlendorf to rouse recollection. The papers toed Bill Parker's line, per dead Sammy. It's suicide, case closed. Connie believed that horseshit.

I said, "Joan informed on this man. She must have felt very strongly about him. He said he wanted to murder all FBI snitches, but I don't know his name. He never joined your cell, although he was very much in the thrall of Sammy Ahlendorf, and I think it's safe to say that he shared Sammy's anti-A-bomb mentality, which is to say he was pissed off when we A-bombed the Japs, even though they were fascists, and even though they dropped those eggs on Pearl Harbor."

Connie sighed. Her hands twitched. Her eyelids fluttered. She's digging deep here.

"I…remember him….He said, 'We've got to expose the bomb before it wipes out the human race, and I'm going to build my career on it.' "

She snapped awake then. She didn't name names or say his name. She didn't need to. She'd already said this to me:

"He was my last tortured and torturing male lover—before you."

Fullerton's file facts fit. They surged circumstantial. Joan's rat-out rang true. It did not mean that Steve Cochran killed her.

Connie snapped très awake. She blinked, blank-faced. She didn't recall what she'd said.

"Did you learn anything provocative? I'd hate to think that I let Joan down."

I said, "You did swell."

A-Bomb party. The U.S. Army's set to launch at 9:00 p.m. It's a tête-à-tête this time. It's my bungalow roof. Stretch, me, frozen daiquiris and corn chips. My transistor radio for the countdown. Two cozy deck chairs.

We held hands. Stretch lounged low and leveled out our height disparity. The radio murmured musings on mach 10 and beyond. Supersonic rockets are now passé.

I said, "You're not a Communist or a psycho killer, are you? My friendship's not sending you over the bend?"

Stretch said, "Uncle Freddy's having conscience pangs. He's sleeping with this nutty old lady in Hancock Park, when he could be here with me."

I laffed and lapped my daiquiri. The nite was cool. Stretch wore her USC letter coat. I wore a Beethoven sweatshirt that Claire left at Googie's for me.

"She'll break it off soon. It was a situational sort of deal. You and I are eternal."

Stretch laffed. "Older man, younger woman. That's a news flash. It's on a par with 'dog bites man.' "

I laffed. We swung our hands. The radio reporter cut to a commercial. Bucky Beaver hawked Ipana toothpaste.

"I saw that note you tacked to the board. Really, how blithe. 'Rain check, okay?' And don't tell me C.K. isn't the dread Claire Klein."

I said, "She's ephemeral. Forget all the bad things I told you about her. Don't listen for her on the tap lines. She got out, right on cue."

Stretch squeezed my hand. "You're being disingenuous, but I'll let it slide, because we're about to witness history."

The radioman rang out the countdown. "Ten, nine, eight, seven, six, five, four, three, two, one—blastoff."

I missed the mushroom cloud and the mauve-and-pink sky. Stretch strong-armed me into a kiss.

THE MALINOW-SILVERMAN CEMETERY

4/9/54

Ashes to ashes, baby. Ask the rental rabbi. Sammy Ahlendorf eats the dust.

LAPD quick-processed the stiff and released it. The graveside service was bilingo and brief. The rabbi ululated in Hebrew and extolled Sambo in English. He was a bomb builder, a macher, a mensch.

I stood graveside. The den mother stood with me. Grave diggers grappled the casket into the ground. The rabbi lit a cigarette and split the gig. It was a rush job. Who's this Ahlendorf schmendrick?

Connie and I came in two cars. She insisted on it. We walked toward the street and the Big Splitsville. Connie lifted her veil and dropped my hand.

"You brought a whirlwind into my life. We were united in common cause for a moment—and one that I'll never forget. But the walls between us stand too high to breach, darling. It's best that we end this thing now."

I said, "Stay strong, Red. It was a gas knowing you. You're History's child. Someone has to carry the torch, and I'm glad that it's you."

Connie touched my cheek. "Oh, Freddy—I knew you'd understand."

I winked. "Rain check, okay?"

Connie winked back. Her eyelash stuck. She pulled out a hankie and wiped it free.

"Always, love. For you, the world."

I walked away. She walked away. I felt ghastly and relieved.

The Ranch Market. My eye in the sky. It felt feckless and familiar and gooooood.

It's where I plot and plan and scrounge and scheme. It's a shakedown shack. It's a divorce-work dive. It's a scandal screen that sifts gold. The hard heart and sick soul of Confidential thrive here. I'm a police informant now. It's where I'll plot and plan and scrounge and scheme to take Confidential down.

It's ghastly. I'm relieved. It's an opportunity.

I popped three dexies and gargled Old Crow. I put my feet up on my desk and scratched my balls. Bernie Spindel walked in. He carried earmuffs and a tape spool.

I said, "Qué pasa, baby? It's a good day to be alive, n'est-ce pas?"

Bernie went Oy. He spooled the tape through my desk rig and earmuffed my head. He said, "It's our standing mount at the Miramar Hotel. I'll destroy the tape after you hear it."

I molded the muffs down and got comfy. Bernie flipped switches. I heard mattress moans and fucky-fucky exertions. I matched moans to my megamillions of women. Oh yeah—it's Joi Lansing in the sack. Oh shit—that's Steve Cochran with her.

Steve Cochran. Joan Hubbard rats his ass. He's Commie #114.

Steve and Joi light cigarettes. I hear match flare and exhale. There's fucky-fucky/goo-goo sounds. Oh shit—there's two full minutes' worth.

Joi says, "Your scars are healing, baby. That plastics guy knows his stuff."

Steve says, "I hate to say it, but so does your ex. I never bought that bill of goods the Sheriff's fed me. Some World War Two buff in a red devil mask? That dog don't hunt. It had to be Freddy."

Joi said, "Let it go, baby. He's just a stooge and a gofer. What's that you always call him? The 'running dog of capitalism.' "

Steve dog-bayed. Steve said, "Guys like Freddy are the fuckboys of the American Oligarchy. They've spawned this whole atomic nightmare we're enduring. Freddy's the ne plus ultra of the fascist gestalt. He's Camus' l'étranger. He's the guy who goes to his death knowing exactly jack shit."

Joi laffed. Joi giggled. Steve tickled her—I knew those squeals.

Steve said, "Credit where credit is due. It's Freddy who got me started on this big roll of mine. He blew up Joanie Horvath's husband, and got me thinking that maybe Joanie herself should go. For one, she was an FBI snitch, which mandates death in my book. That's why I bugged her pad. Two, she'd snitched me once already, and with Joe McCarthy in town, I figured she'd mount the revival."

Joi said, "You 'revivaled' her, baby."

Steve said, "You mean I *de*rivaled her."

They laffed. Steve was swarthy and dark-haired. I recalled that bandage he wore two months back. Joan scratched him. In that exact spot. I read the autopsy protocol.

Joi: "Don't tell me too much, baby."

Steve: "You're right. Mum's the word."

Joi: "And you be careful. Freddy's pussy-whipped, and he's got this thing for dead chicks. He might come after you."

Steve hooted. He coursed contempt. He pilloried my pathos. He decreed my damned destiny.

"I've got Freddy fail-safed. Charlie Fullerton told me that he torched that Fed post. I lifted some of his prints off his office at the Ranch Market, and placed them on a booze-bottle accelerant at the crime scene. If Freddy acts up, I can hang Treason on him. And that bottle is now in a Fed evidence vault."

Joi laffed. Steve said, "Ralphie to Joanie to now. The big karmic circle. When the revolution comes, your ex will be the first one to go."

I hit the off-switch. Bernie went Oy and walked out.

I felt reckless and feckless. I felt striated and stretched bare. Phantasmagoric '54 had me morally massacred and fearfully fucked-up.

Rain check, okay?

I made the rounds that night. Rock Hudson was having people over. Jimmy and Liz were there. Johnnie Ray saw me—and scrammed out the back door. Claire left some undies behind. Jimmy told me and showed me. I took a few farewell sniffs.

Jimmy dished Rock's new wife candidate. She was one Phyllis Gates. She worked for Rock's agent and came recommended. Jimmy said Phyllis was squaresville. She wanted to wait for her wedding nite. Phyllis was clueless. She swooned for Rock and did not know that Rock swooned for boys.

I got half gassed and bopped back to Beverly Hills and my bungalow. I went inside and watched Stretch sleep. I tucked her too-long legs back under the sheets.

Rain check, okay?

Pervdogs are scent dogs. We often loop by locations that recently roused us to lust. I drove east to Hancock Park and pulled up to the den mother's digs. I cut my lights and peeped her windows in the dark.

I whistled "Willow Weep for Me" and "My Funny Valentine." I saw Connie walk across the red bedroom and turn off the lights. I drove by Camerford and Vine then. A family had moved into the Horvath house. Their kids romped out on the porch.

I drove southeast for no good reason. I stopped at Ollie Hammond's Steakhouse and juiced in the bar. I peeped a tall redhead and watched her walk out of my life.

Opportunity is love. Hey, there—you with the stars in your eyes.

GONESVILLE

Freddy Otash Confesses, Part III

CELL 2607

Penance Penitentiary
Reckless-Wrecker-of-Lives Block
Pervert Purgatory
9/4/2020

I'm beastfully back. This concluding confession covers spring '55 to spring '60. The freewheeling Freddy O. is now a sniveling snitch. I'm Chief Bill Parker's back-room bitch and punk pawn in his crusade to take down Confidential. It's a fucked-up fin de siècle. The madcap magazine is doomed, Daddy-O. And I'm the ardent architect of its dipshit demise.

I've lost that lush life. I'm bopping the byways of big boo-hoo. Joi Lansing's gone. Connie Woodard's gone. Claire Klein's gone. Stretch Perkins went licentiously lez and snagged herself a barmaid at Linda's Little Log Cabin. Jimmy Dean's pulling away. He's a movie star now. He toplines Giant and East of Eden. He's been shooting a teen turkey called Rebel Without a Cause. It's filming on some loopy L.A. locations. I'm his main mentor no more. Director Nicholas Ray has replaced me. Nick Ray's a sweaty switch-hitter and a carcinogenic Commie. I'm Jimmy's real faux dad.

Boo-hoo, boo-hoo. I'm surfing a sicko surge of self-pity. But—this thunderous thought keeps me poised to pounce.

I know people. I'm now the pills-and-cocaine conduit for Senator Jack Kennedy. I broker scrapes for the contract cooze at Columbia and Metro. I've got L.A. bugged, tapped, and hot-wired here to Hell. I'm all repugnant resource and the withering will to survive.

Opportunity is love. Confluence is opportunity. I move in a mélange of machers, grifters, and graft-grabbers, and the sex-soiled sycophants so indigenous to L.A. Something has to pop my way. Something's coming. Something's telling me that IT is a SHE.

SHELL GAS STATION

Beverly and Hayworth,
L.A.
5/11/55

The wheelman lot. It's the baaaaaad bane of wicked wives and horndog hubbies, hot to trot. Divorce begins here. Lowlife lawyers call the pay phone by the lube rack. Punk PIs hustle off to hot-sheet huts and kick doors down. There's flashbulb flare and eeeek and shreeek and fuckee-suckee singed on celluloid.

The wheelman lot. It's my lurid launching pad today. Confidential's cornholing Art Pepper. Artful Art's an alto sax hopping high on the Downbeat poll. He's a junkie with a jacked-up jones for high school honeys. He's nailed Miss Belmont High and Miss Lincoln High already. He's meeting Miss Franklin High at the Leechee Nut Lodge in Chinatown, one hour hence. I'll be there to instigate fuckus interruptus.

I'm serving two masters here. Confidential's calling the piece "Sax Potentate Pepper: Junk and Jailbait Call the Tune Now!!!!!" LAPD Vice laid on the lead to the meet and laid down the law: We'll be there to slam this slime for Stat Rape/1st Degree.

Bill Parker hates hopheads and jailbait jumpers. Bill Parker's out to keester Confidential. He wants to catalogue Confidential's coercive methods and march the mag to Indictment City. He's implementing a looooooooooong-range strategy.

I lounged in my Packard pimpmobile. Ward Wardell and Race Rockwell reclined in their surveillance van. Donkey Don Eversall worked the outside spot. Miss Franklin High had her own sled. She handed out hand jobs, at five bucks per, and glommed a beat-to-shit '48 Merc. Donkey Don would call the pay phone. He'd say It's on and tail the twist to the Leechee Nut Lodge. The desk clerk was an LAPD lapdog. He told Don that putzo Pepper was smack-back in Room #9. Two Vice Squad goons were mainlining mai tais in the Lily Pad Lounge. They were set to grind Pepper while my camera crew rolled film.

I’m a snitch. I’m a rat fink. I’m a doofus double agent. I’m LAPD Lapdog #1.

I eyeballed the lot. Six wheelmen reposed in their rides. They drove hellacious hot rods and blew their gelt on booze, kustom kar kits, and cooze. They lived at the lot. They slept in their sleds. They poked B-girls from the Kibitz Room at Canter’s Delicatessen and bounced their backseats, six at a pop.

Ward Wardell walked to the phone. Race Rockwell schmoozed a wigged-out wheelman with pizza-pus zits. The cat was a cop buff. He said the Hat Squad was chasing two 211/rape-o’s. They stormed steak houses at closing time. They tapped the tills and took wallets. They purloined purses and made the women strip and dispense snout jobs. The Hats were out to take scalps on this one.

I tuned it out. The Hats and I had shared some shimmering shit. Fuck them—more current shit shivered through me.

Bondage Bob called me this morning. He beefed a southside radio station and a late-nite show called Nasty Nat’s Soul Patrol. It was all pimp patois, cool-cat consciousness, and jive jazz. A woman called in three nights running. She came off winsome and waaaay white. She called herself “Miss Blind Item.” She jawed with Nasty Nat and aped Confidential’s alliterative prose style. Bob had no gripe there. But—she crossed some craaaaazy line and madly mauled the magazine. She baaaaad-beefed the August ’52 piece on “Red Light Bandit” Caryl Chessman.

The piece bawled boo-hoo per Chessman’s tripartite conviction. It’s baaaad: Kidnap/Armed Robbery/Forced Oral Cop. Dig: the tone was apoplectic apostasy. The tone disregarded the magazine’s perpetual fry-the-fucker stance. Chessman was convicted in spring ’48. The Little Lindbergh Law applied. Hanging judge Charles Fricke righteously mandated DEATH. Chessman professed his innocence. Chessman excoriated capital punishment. Lunar-looped liberals took up his hue and cry. ’48 to ’55. He’d held off his trek to the green room for seven full years. He filed appeals. He wrote screechy screeds and peddled them to pinko publishers. Now, this wiggy witch was mocking my magazine, and lambasting its one lamentable lapse in moral tone.

Bondage Bob told me to tune in Nasty Nat tonite. He said the witch called in at 1:00 a.m. and motormouthed till 3:00. I said I’d jump on it and take boocoo notes.

The pay phone rang. Ward grabbed it and grinned. He said, "Arriba, boss."

I banged Beverly, straight downtown. My Packard pimpmobile performed. A supercharged V-12 va-va-voomed me due east. My sled featured lake pipes, cheater slicks, and a Nazi death's-head shift knob. It was two-way-radio-rigged and synced to the surveillance van and Donkey Don's '53 Chevy. Our frequency number? What else? It's 69.

I ran the lead slot. The surveillance van dogged me. Donkey Don tailed Miss Franklin High southbound on the Arroyo Seco. She's crazoid Chrissy Molette. She's a hot-hormoned hellion out to bang all the bopsters on the '54 Downbeat and Metronome polls. She plays mean skin flute and hides hatpins in her big beehive. Her high school homeroom teacher was hotsville with Donkey Don. She tattled Chrissy's crazed yen for men.

Confluence. It's who you know and who you blow. Thus, this shimmering shakedown—

My radio cricked, crackled, and spit sputters. Donkey Don said, "69-Baker to 69-Alpha. Come in, Freddy."

"Alpha to Baker. I hear you, Don."

Don gargled garble talk. Sputters, stutters, static—his real voice shimmied and shot through.

"Chrissy picked up a tail at the York Avenue on-ramp. It's a '49 Ford ragtop, tan over blue. I got the plate number and buzzed the DMV. It's her brother Robbie's ride. Robbie's got a green sheet. One fall for pandering, one for 459."

I said, "Shit, this is grief." I brain-broiled a cool countermeasure.

"The Vice guys at the Lodge have a walkie. They're tapped in at 69, D-for-Dog. Buzz them and tell them to grab Robbie, plant some dope on him, and hold him. He's out to mess the gig up, and we need Chrissy and Pepper in the sack and at it for this deal to work for the magazine and Bill Parker."

Don tittered and tee-heed. He giggled, guffawed, and laffed lewd.

"Yeah, plus full bush, insertion, Pepper's sax and groovy dope paraphernalia in view."

Wire warp froze the frequency and cut the call off. I knew Don would field a follow-thru and buzz 69-Charlie. He'd rig the rendezvous. We'd converge and collide at the Lodge. Chrissy knocks on Door #9. Pepper opens up. He might be noxiously nude. We'll airbrush in a two-foot schlong and redact it, down to his knees. Our randy readers will get the gestalt. Ward and Race will roll film from high cover. I get the kick-the-door-in shot. The Vice cops pile in behind me.

Oooooooh—it's Stat Rape/1st Degree for Bill Parker. Ooooooooh—it stacks my status as LAPD Rat #1 and brings me brownie points with the pervy puritan I hocked my soul to!!!!

I hit the hill by Belmont High. Beverly bywayed to 1st Street. I goosed the gas eastbound. I cut north on Broadway and east on Alpine. There's the Leechee Nut Lodge, up ah—

There's a car cavalcade, curbside. Chrissy's '48 Merc. Robbie's '49 Ford ragger. Donkey Don's '53 Chev. The Lodge is horseshoe-shaped, one floor only. Chrissy's cutting through the courtyard. She's anxiously angling toward Door #9. Robbie's skulking by the door of the Lily Pad Lounge. He's peeping the courtyard. He's insidiously intent. There's Donkey Don and the Vice cops. They're crapped out in deck chairs outside the office. They're sharing a short dog of Old Crow.

I parked behind Don's Chevy. The surveillance van parked behind me. I grabbed my righteous Rolleiflex. Ward and Race wrangled out their movie-camera shit. The whoooole scene sizzled in SIN-emascope and slid into a slithery sloooooow motion.

I signaled Don and the Vice cops and pointed to Robbie. They booze-barged over and braced him. He went Who, me? Don went Yeah, you—cocksucker. Robbie resisted and refuseniked. He put up his paws in a punk fighter's pose and bop-de-bop danced on his toes. Vice Cop #1 nabbed his neck and whacked his head against the wall. Vice Cop #2 kicked him in the balls and cuffed his hands behind his back.

Robbie baby-bawled and bitch-squealed. Don grabbed his greasy hair and pulled him inside the Lily Pad Lounge. I scoped Door #9. I saw craaaazy Chrissy crash in and crotch-dive Art Pepper. Man—it's a deep-focus door shot, delicioso!!!!!

The door slammed shut. I signaled Ward and Race and pointed to my wristwatch. The second hand tick-tocked toward fuckus interruptus. Tick, tick, tick—it tapped the two-minute mark. Donkey Don said, "Banzai."

We ran to Door #9. Ward and Race rolled film. Donkey Don worked the sound gizmo. The Vice cops ran up and stood behind us.

They put on palm-weighted sap gloves and got het up to hurl some hurt.

Ward counted down. “Ten, nine, eight, seven, six, five, four, three, two, one—zero.”

I flat-foot kicked the door-doorjamb juncture. It juked the door hard off its hinges. The door flew back and in. It dumped a nightstand and pulped Pepper’s sax.

Man—it’s *suck*us interruptus.

Chrissy gobbled Ardent Art. Ardent Art geezed Big “H” in caustic concurrence. I got my shot. My boys rolled fuckee film. Chrissy went eeeek. Art Pepper said, “Oh shit.” The Vice cops charged the bed.

The Hats hard-nosed Robbie Molette. I observed. The City Hall DB/ sweatbox row/two-way-mirrored walls and outside-corridor speakers.

I perv-peeped the action. Sweatbox #3 snap, crackled, popped. I goosed the wall volume dial and caught every nasty nuance.

Robbie sat in a bolted-down chair. Note the bolted-down table and fat phone book. The Hats hovered. Max Herman waved Robbie’s green sheet. Red Stromwall riffled Robbie’s wallet. Harry Crowder crowded Robbie and caused a case of the sweltering sweats. Eddie Benson tapped the table and looked meeeaaan.

Max said, “Pandering. Pleaded down at arraignment, March ’52. You’re the most raggedy-ass-looking pimp I’ve ever seen, Robbie. Successful pimps take considerable care with their appearance.”

Es la verdad. Robbie dressed pure pachuco. He wore a see-thru Sir Guy shirt and slit-bottom khakis. Pointy-toe fruit boots cinched the enchanting ensemble. Robbie evinced bad hygiene. Dandruff debris dusted the table. Robbie picked his nose and noshed the nuggets.

Red said, “459 PC. Three counts. Tossed at prelim, January ’53.”

Robbie said, “I quit pimping, and I quit burglarizizing. Actually, I don’t know what the beef here is. You boys and those magazine shitheels kicked my ass, when all I was doing was lounging in the vicinity of a room where my underage sister was about to get devirginizized by a notorious junkie and degenerate.”

Harry laffed. “Your sister’s three weeks and one day under the age of consent. The DA will never file Stat Rape on Pepper.”

Eddie laffed. “He’ll file for possession of narcotics, and leave it at that. And your sister lost her virginity back in the Coolidge administration."

Robbie laffed. "Yeah—just like your mama."

Eddie phone-booked him. Whap—a real noggin-knocker. It scoured his scalp and raised blood blisters. His dentures dipped to the floor.

Robbie reached down and replaced them. Bill Parker walked up to me. He weaved a tad. I knew the signs. El Jefe was half in the bag.

I said, "Hola, Chief."

Parker passed me his flask. I gargled Old Overholt and popped two Dexedrine on the sly.

"The kid's dirty. I've got a theory. I think he wanted to catch Pepper in the kip with his sister, and extort him with it."

Parker yukked. "Never let it be said that Freddy Otash doesn't know from shakedowns."

I passed the flask back. Parker yodeled Old Overholt. I rescoped the sweatbox hullabaloo.

Max said, "There's a few items we'd like to discuss with you, Robbie."

Robbie shrugged. Robbie said, "Okay."

Red said, "Here's the first item. There's a note from the Boys Vice Principal at Hollywood High attached to your green sheet. He states that you were seen at last year's Hollywood-Fairfax football game, attempting to pass yourself off as a 'talent scout' and recruit high school girls for your stable of underage prosties."

Robbie stut-stuttered. He blanched and blew spit bubbles. They pop-pop-popped.

"That's a humbug accusation. I've gone straight. I'm gigging as a busboy at the Beverly Hills Hotel. Talk to the desk manager. He'll tell you I'm revered by both my fellow employees and all the guests."

Max said, "Here's the second item. An hour ago, we sent two plainclothesmen from the Highland Park Station to the house where you live with your mom and dad, and your sister. They tossed your room and found a stack of forty-two beaver photos of Chrissy, all of which were marked '$1.00' on the back. Robbie, you would spare yourself a lot of grief, in this room and beyond, if you admitted that you were peddling those photographs, and that you and Chrissy were engaged in an attempt to extort Art Pepper, based on his somewhat specious relationship with Chrissy herself."

Robbie sputtered and stuttered. His dentures popped out. He crammed them back in.

“That is a no-good, goddamn lie. The cops planted those pix, and —”

Harry phone-booked him. Whap—a real cranium-crunch. Robbie’s head bounced on the table. Ashtrays hopped, cigarette butts flew.

Parker said, “You called it on the extortion.”

I said, “The Hat Squad. Accept no substitutes.”

Robbie quivered and quaked. He shook, shimmied, and mewed for his mama. Max pulled his pocket flask and whipped it on him. Robbie suckled and siphoned it. His Adam’s apple bob-bobbed.

He drained the flask dry. Max tossed him a pack of cigarettes and a matchbook. Robbie lit up and surged with a sudden savoir faire.

“I’ll concede that I’m quite the racketeer, and that you’d do well to utilizize me as your personal secret informant. I’ve been known to provide young stuff to the guests at the hotel, so they might utilizize this young gash for what you might call ‘casting-couch sessions,’ which ain’t illegal the last time my high-priced Jew lawyer checked. Also, ‘Rapid Robbie,’ as I’m known in the trade, has been known to supply maryjane to the geeks working at film locations, throughout the southland. I’ll be candid here. I utilizize the inside scoop on the locations off of tips the guests feed me.”

Max said, “You’re a criminal mastermind.”

Red said, “I’ve never doubted it.”

Harry said, “People dismiss you as a dipshit kid, in over his head. They fail to see the real, dynamic you that lurks beneath the façade.”

Eddie said, “Keep going, hotshot. You’ve got us utilizized.”

Robbie blew smoke rings. “Right now, I’m moving maryjane to the gang on Rebel Without a Cause. That’s this juvenile delinquency lox being shot all over L.A. This jamoke Nick Ray’s directing it. He’s got the hots for all these rough-trade boys he’s hired to stand around and look tough in crowd scenes. I’m doing high-volume biz here. Nick the Dick’s signed up an all-hophead cast, and—”

Parker hit the speaker switch. Rapid Robbie ran his mouth and made mute-mime gestures. Nick the Dick. That shitbird. He holds swishy sway over Jimmy. I should look into—

“I’m working up a brainstorm, Freddy.”

“I’m listening, boss.”

“I want you to build a derogatory profile on the filming of Rebel Without a Cause. Deploy your pal James Dean and your usual gang of thugs, and sell Bob Harrison on the notion of a big spread in the magazine. You see where this is going? The piece is written. You improperly vet it. That leaves your shit rag that much more open to slander and libel charges, and in the meantime, you'll be passing whatever hard criminal dirt accrues on to me through the Hats."

I orbed the two-way mirror. Rapid Robbie mute-motormouthed. The Hats har-har'd and haw-hawed. Max Herman mugged at the mirror. He rolled his eyes and made the jack-off sign.

Parker passed the flask. I doused my dexie dose. Yeah!—a blistering blast of straight rye.

I said, "This gig packs potential. Cut dipshit loose, and I'll see what I can do."

Max made the meet. 6:00 p.m. at Ollie Hammond's. He'll be there, Freddy. It's an ass kicking, otherwise.

I arrived early. I worked the pay phones for two hours flat. I called Bondage Bob Harrison first.

Bondage Bob bemoaned the Art Pepper fiasco. All that shakedown shit for one dope bounce? Bob bitched: The demonizing–dope fiends craze has crapped out. It's muerto, you dig? I said, Au contraire, Daddy. It's seditiously segued into the jejune juvenile delinquency craze. To withering wit: the filming of teen turkey Rebel Without a Cause.

I laid it aaalll out. Jimmy Dean's my "in" on the shoot. Nick Ray's a carcinogenic Comsymp. There's sure to be horny hijinx with all the hot hunks and honeys on the set. Dig, Daddy: I'll dive for the dirt, you'll deliver the dish. Ten thousand words in the nuke-bomb November '55 issue.

Bob bought it, big. We seamlessly segued to the Rock Hudson–Phyllis Gates mock-marriage mishegas. Universal instigated it. Rock was one gallivanting gay caballero, and Lew Wasserman wanted all ripe rumors quashed. He hired me to find Rock a wife. My first candidate ran rogue and ransacked Rock's pad for cash and Krugerrands. Phyllis Gates seemed like a safe and sedate second bet. She was Rock's agent's secretary. She seemed to catch a secret scent of Rock's man-lust modus operandi—but would most likely keep her mouth shut. Confidential planned to publish a dizzy-disingenuous piece. How's this fly? "Rock's Trippy Triangle—With Two Women!!!!!" How's that for yuks and fucks/lies and sighs?

Bob said, You've got to find the other woman first. I said, Yeah—and I'm meeting Phyllis and Jimmy Dean at Googie's tonite to discuss it. Bob signed off, per usual: L'chaim, boychik.

I called Jimmy's pad and got no answer. I called his answering service and left a message: Nine tonite/Googie's. I called Phyllis and told her to make the meet. She gassed on the tricky triad scenario. She said it should culminate in a catfight at the Mocambo.

I hung up and scoped the barside crowd. Shit—there's Robbie Molette. He's hard-hustling a high-toned blonde and causing an undulating upscut.

Shit—

I fast-walked over and grabbed him. Rodent Robbie squirmed and squeaked. I frog-marched him to a back booth and shoved him in. I said, "Behave." Robbie sulked submissive. The barside babe blew me a kiss.

A waiter waltzed up. I ordered two double Old Crows, quicksville. Robbie smirked smug. The waiter dropped our drinks off and vamoosed.

Robbie said, "I know about you. My dad's a grip at Metro. He called you 'Mr. Fear.' He said you're the king of the shakedown."

I lit a cigarette. "What are you trying to tell me?"

"That we're two peas in a pod. That you should consider taking me on as a protégé. You could teach me the tricks of the trade and make me the new you. You could retire and ride off into the sunset then, knowing that you've got a vital young stud to fulfill your legacy."

I cringed. "Let's change the subject."

"How about boxing? Ray Robinson versus Bobo Olson. I think Ray's stale bread. Bobo's a vital young stud, and it won't go four rounds."

"How about Rebel Without a Cause? Lay the full dish on me. If I like what I hear, I'll let you run loose for a while. If I don't, I'll send you back to the Hats. You can play the role of the vital young stud in the queens' tank at Mira Loma."

Robbie cringed. "What's to tell? Nick Ray's a switcheroo man. He likes it young and hung, and ripe and saucy. The word is he stakes out one quiff of each gender on all his flicks. On Rebel, he's got Jimmy Dean for the brown eye, and Natalie Wood on the distaff side. Natalie's sixteen, in case you were curious. She's also a nympho with lezbo tendencies, for what that's worth."

Rodent Robbie. Reptile Robbie. He delivers the dish. He's cruel-credible so far.

“Keep going.”

Robbie chugalugged his drink. “So, I drop off the maryjane and toke with the actors. I observe the gestalt, and to my way of thinking, this actor Nick Adams is Nick Ray’s head honcho on the set. He’s the court jester and the instigator, the boss pimp and the guy who drops the hammer and fulfills Nick Ray’s skeevy hopes and dreams.”

I killed my drink. “What hopes and dreams?”

Robbie went tee-hee. “Getting all these punk, fruitcake, hophead actor kids to ‘fly without a parachute,’ ‘work without a net,’ and all that other movie horseshit, when all he really wants is limitless young woof-woof, and to manipulate people in the guise of his jive, so-called art.”

I clapped. I went Ole!!! I wolf-whistled and went Woo-woo!!!

“You’re not stupid, Robbie. That’s the only attaboy you’re ever likely to get from me, so enjoy it while you can.”

Robbie beamed biiiiiiiiig. “Nick Ray’s got all these hood-type extras under his thumb. He says he’s testing their ‘motivation.’ He’s sending them out on ‘chickie runs,’ like in the flick. Nick Adams is straw-bossing these deals, and Jimmy Dean’s along for the ride. I don’t know what’s actually happening, but Jimmy calls them ‘panty raids.’ ”

I chained cigarettes. “Where do you drop the dope off?”

“The set, the location, or Nick Ray’s bungalow at the Chateau Marmont.”

I peeled off five C-notes and slid them across the table. Reptile Robbie rolled his eyes and went Oooh-la-la.

“I’m in the White Pages. Call me at home or page me at Googie’s the next time you’ve got a delivery.”

Robbie scooped up the cash. “Two for the road? A couple of aperitifs to keep your whistle wet?”

I sighed. “All right.”

“Hey, he’s acting bored and vexed already.”

“Robbie…”

“Okay, okay. Here’s aperitif number one, straight from Nick Ray’s mouth. Jimmy goes to leather bars and has guys put out their cigarettes on him. He is therefore known as the ‘Human Ashtray.’ Aperitif number two’s more predictable. Jimmy’s putting the moves on this kid actor, Sal Mineo. Pretty good, huh? Especially from a guy you only met a few hours ago.”

I flashed back. Jimmy at Googie’s. Little Band-Aids on his arms and neck. A solvent scent wafting my way.

Robbie stood up. I grabbed his waistband and slammed him back down to the table. He yelped and flailed. I held the table candle up to his face. Flame flutters scorched his pachuco pompadour and fried it to frazzled split ends.

“Jimmy and I go back. I’ll concede my soft spot. Watch what you say about him.”

GOOGIE'S ALL-NITE COFFEE SHOP

West Holly*weird*

5/11/55

The 8:00 p.m. rush. Prosaic-predictable. Folks tumbled tables, noshed and shot the shit. Niteclub action accelerated around 9:30. Ditto, late-show movies. The Strip/the Boulevard. Ciro's, the Mocambo, the Crescendo. Grauman's Chink and the Egyptian. Googie's bopped close to all.

I took my table. Tipsters tagged the Tattle Tyrant as fair game. They salaamed and sucked up. They delivered the dubious dish.

Orson Welles sliced the Black Dahlia. That choice chestnut. Here's five scoots—please go away.

Here's a ripe wrinkle. Orson Welles sliced the Black Dahlia. Yeah—I know, it's day-old bagels at half price. Yeah, but dig this: Rita Hayworth held the Dahlia's legs while Orson sawed her in half.

Okay, here's ten scoots—now go away.

Van Johnson's at it again. The old semen demon's always up for a taste. He siphoned Tab Hunter's python in a back row at the Admiral Theatre.

No, I can't prove it. Yeah, I need gelt. There's a sneak peek at the Iris, and I'm short on the freight.

Here's twenty scoots. Uncle Freddy's a soft touch. The popcorn's on me.

A guy peddled Carole Landis morgue shots. Yawn. A guy peddled pix of Marlon Brando with a dick in his mouth. Shit—I thought I cornered that market, back in '53. A call girl tossed me a tip on the steakhouse rape-o/robbers. They were holed up in a hot-sheet flop on 54th and Vermont. They were geezing Nazi-made morphine and meth speedballs. I slid her forty scoots. She slipped me her phone number. I told her to tattle the tip to the Hat Squad. She told me she banged Red Stromwall at an Elks Club smoker, back in '46.

Juan the fry cook passed me a message. Jimmy was 86'ing the Phyllis Gates meet. Nick Ray culled the cast and called for a script read. Nick Ray ran regular “Motivational Missions,” as in tonite. Sorry, babe—give Phyl my love.

Neuter Nick Ray. “Motivational Missions.” Robbie Molette’s mad monologue. My pal Jimmy. The “Human Ashtray.” I felt god-awful gut-punched.

It was 8:55. A late nite loomed. I had a batch of bilious back issues to study for Big Bill Parker. Nasty Nat’s Soul Patrol popped the airwaves at 1:00. Miss Blind Item might call in. She’d castigate and condemn Confidential. She’d evince righteous rage per Red Light Bandit Caryl Chessman. The deal instantly intrigued me. Chessman was sure as shit guilty. I wanted him to burn, baby, burn.

My dexie dose fizzled, drizzled, and withered to wisps and gnashed nerves. I popped two more and awaited the aaaaahhhh. Phyllis walked in. I stood up and bowed. She walked up and curtsied cute. She wore twill slacks and a cashmere cardigan. She radiated rectitude and a reserved ring-a-ding.

A waitress brought menus. Phyllis sat across from me. She went Where’s Jimmy?

I said, “He couldn’t make it. Something about a script rehearsal.”

The waitress whipped back. Phyllis ordered a dry martini. I held up two fingers. The waitress scrammed. Phyllis said, “Drat.”

I laffed. “Drat?”

“Well, yes.”

“Should I decode that?”

“Well…Jimmy and Rock were pals on Giant. I was hoping that he might provide…”

“A perspective on Rock’s bent, and your conundrum? Maybe buffer you and me getting down to brass tacks?”

The martinis materialized. Phyllis mainlined half of hers. She said, “Drat. What have I gotten myself into?”

I lit a cigarette. “You love him, right?”

“What’s not to love? He’s every Minnesota farm girl’s dream. But this girl has lived in Hollywood for a while, and I’ve heard the rumors, and I know how to read signs.”

“How discouraged are you?”

Phyllis laffed. “Not that much. Part of me knows that it’s more than a little bit of a lark.”

I mainlined my martini. It payload-packed the dexies. I rippled resurgent and revitalized.

"I'm on your side, and Rock's side. 'Love conquers all,' and all that happy horseshit. The magazine's on your side, and Rock's side, but the magazine is Confidential, with all the skank that implies. We've got to dispel one set of rumors, and create a contradictory, second set to eclipse it. Bob Harrison's committed to an eternal triangle scenario. That means we need to find a bait girl, and L.A.'s the bait girl capital of the world. And, for what it's worth, I like your idea of a catfight at the Mocambo."

Phyllis popped the olive out of her drink and snarfed it. I tossed my olive on her place mat. She snarfed it, quick-quick.

"Rock's a sweetie pie. Who am I to demand perfection in a man?"

"You've got every right to demand more than you damn well might have to settle for."

Phyllis said, "Ouch."

I said, "I'm sorry. That was harsh."

Phyllis went Pshaw. "It's not like I'm a hundred percent discouraged."

"Give me the good news, then."

"Rock took an inkblot test once, in the Navy. He saw butterflies and snakes, which symbolize a feminine nature and the penis. He took a second test, after the war—and this time he scored much more butch."

I sighed, sad-ass. "Shit, don't break my heart."

Phyllis snatched my martini and drained it dry. Her eyeballs boinged. Now, she's all rectitude—ripped to the gills.

"It's a lark, right?"

"Right."

"And there's no guarantee it'll remain a lark, right?"

"Right."

"So I should be prepared for any and all outcomes, right?"

"Right."

"Didn't you say something about us getting down to brass tacks?"

I leaned close. Phyllis leaned close. We deep-dialed our eyes and cleaved close. She wore Chanel No. 5. I wore Lucky Tiger. Our separate scents sizzled and merged, molto bene.

"You'll want out sooner or later. You won't want him hurt in the press, but you'll want your fair share of the pie. I'll handle the entrapment and all the other shitwork for ten percent of the initial property and revenue split, and ten percent of your alimony, in perpetuity."

Phyllis kissed me. She found the fit and held my head and leg-clamped me under the table. The kiss lingered loooooong. We wrapped ourselves into it. Our scents merged that much more. Some geeks at adjoining tables whistled and clapped.

11:00 p.m. Googie's is late-nite lulled. The dinner crowd's thinned threadbare. Phyllis split. I brooded and brain-broiled my Rebel Without a Cause caper.

My dexie decibel helped. Vodka shots sheared the rough edges. I worked the pay phone. I called Harry Fremont and my contact at Sheriff's R & I. Dig: Get me homo-hive roust sheets on Jimmy Dean, Sal Mineo, Nick Ray. Check for juvie sheets on Natalie Wood. Solicit hometown paper per Nick Adams.

The counter man divvied dish. Nick Ray placed take-out orders nitely. Juan the fry cook schlepped the shit up to Nick's boss bungalow at the Marmont. The orders came in late. There was bupkes tonite. I told Juan to burn a batch of burgers and send them up now.

The Marmont was four blocks west on Sunset. I shagged my Packard pimpmobile and crawl-cruised on over. I saw three hunky hot rods stashed just off the Strip. Craaaaazy chrome creations. Kool kandy-koat kolors.

One '40 Ford coupé. One '46 Merc. One cholo-chopped Chevy van, replete with flame paint job. All three flew flags for the "Nick's Knights Kar Klub, Limited."

The flags wiggled on whip antennas and flat-out flew in the wind. I fantasized shivering shit.

Nick Ray in tight toga and a simpering Caesar haircut. He's holding a movie megaphone and sporting a spiked collar. He's Mr. Fasco Fantastico at the all-boy bacchanal. As real-life proof—there's Nick's Knights, poised and posed by their sleds.

Three hunky monkeys. Ruff trade tricksters and buff B-boys. Black leather jackets, pomade pompadours, and pegged pants. Rodent Robbie ratted these punks. They were Nabob Nick's crowd-scene extras. They went out on "chickie runs" and "panty raids." Nudnik Nick held swishy sway over them.

I pulled up and parked on the bungalow access road. Juan the fry cook's junk jalopy was parked just ahead. I walked up to bungalow row. I peeped whipped-wide windows. I saw sapphic soixante-neuf and Marilyn Monroe blowing Joe DiMaggio. I saw a dusky dominatrix whip producer Sam Spiegel. I saw Funky Führer Nick Ray blaspheme, bloviate, and bluster to his actor acolytes.

He's the Father Führer, the Daddy Despot, the Doofus Duce who's exhumed mad Mussolini. He's brewing up bracing bromides. It's populist pap across all specious spectra. He's stamping it Stalinist. He's looping in Lenin and marginal Marx. It's the actors' art to subsume the rule of law and the ordered society. It's ART to sack sacred synagogues, chain church doors, and retorch Joan of Arc at the stake. It's sicknik sexual liberation, by way of the maladroit Marquis de Sade. He's pitching Sex/Sex/Sex/ and Love Me/Love Me/Love Me—and I will beatifically bestow upon you the gilded gift of MOTIVATION—which will unlock all the doors of your life.

His kiddie korps is digging it. They're bopped back in beanbag chairs. They're biting the burgers I bought them. They're big-eyed behind Big Nick's bullshit. There's Jimmy Dean and Natalie Wood. There's sloe-eyed Sal Mineo. That blond cat's Nick Adams. I've seen that Dennis Hopper hump on TV. They're Nihilist Nick's hip Hitler Jugend, ten years post–V-E Day.

I unpeeped the window and broomed back down to my sled. Memo to Chief Bill Parker: I got your derogatory profile, hanging a hard fucking yard.

Something was brew-brew-brewing. It had to break up and boil over, soon. I hunched low and peeped the hot rod punks. They popped hoods and adjusted fan belts. They poured quik-start in quad carburetors and goosed the gas loud. They made big noise. They torqued and toxified the air outside the Chateau Marmont. Then the moment of Achtung!!!!! arrived.

The punks froze. Eyes right, all Kameraden. There's Nick Ray in a cool khaki jumpsuit. He's Rommel, reborn. He's got an Iron Cross pinned to one pocket. He's wearing a Desert Korps hat. He's got a movie camera strapped to one shoulder. Jimmy Dean and Nick Adams stand behind him. They're his suck-up subalterns.

The punks salaamed and saluted. Nick Ray ran to the Chevy van. Raus mit uns!!!!! Mach schnell!!!!! All subalterns and B-boys to the Chevy van now!!!!!

The crew cringed and complied, toot-fucking-sweet. The van U-turned and booked west on Sunset. I U-turned and tailed it.

We struck off down the Strip and bombed through Beverly Hills.

My Packard pimpmobile hovered three car lengths back. Beverly Hills to Holmby Hills to the East Bel-Air gate. Up to Westwood and the UCLA campus.

The van cut south on Hilgard. It decelerated down to a crawl. I crawled and kept perfect pace. We were on Sorority Row now. Note the big Tudor and sparkle-Spanish houses. Note the Greek symbols embossed by the doors.

It was midnite. It was quiet and moon-muzzled dark. The driver rolled down his window and pointed across the street. Somebody said, “Establishing shot.” A back window slid down. Nick Ray held his camera out and rolled film. I decelerated and pulled to the curb. The Führer van U-turned and parked in front of a faux-château sorority house.

The Desert Korps decamped. That’s the B-Boys, Nick Ray, Jimmy, and Nick Adams. A B-boy held Ray’s camera cord and a spotlight gizmo. Ray gave the high sign. They walked six abreast. They crossed the sidewalk and trampled the front lawn. They hit the porch. Nick Adams pulled a set of picks and unlocked the door. It’s soooooo sinister—the six sickos slide and slither inside.

I heard nothing. I saw nothing. No light went on. I got out and jogged up to the door. It stood ajar. I heard wicked whispers and sssshhh, sssshhh upstairs.

The camera light snapped on. A beam bounced across upstairs walls and closed doors. I heard a door open. A girl said, “What’s that?” A girl said, “Who’s there?”

Then door kicks/shrill shrieks/light beams on dorm doors and double sets of bunk beds—

Then college girls in nightgowns and pajamas. They’re kicking off their covers and tumbling out of bed. They’re running straight into bright light and the Desert Korps with their hands out to GRAB.

Nick Ray yelled, “Chickie run!!!”

Jimmy yelled, “Panty raid!!!!!”

Spotlight beams bounced. I saw short shots of grabs at pajama tops and nightgowns. I saw panties pulled down to the knees. I heard screams overlap.

I ran upstairs. Half-nude girls dodged grabbing hands and bouncing light and ran from der Desert Korps demons. I pile-pounded into them. I dumped the fucko Führer’s camera and smashed the bouncing-light machine. I got a fade-out shot. It’s Jimmy Dean with pink panties pulled over his face.

I saw a fire-alarm switch wired to a wall mount. I swatted the switch and instigated deep darkness. A siren shrieked shrill. The girls screamed into it. They ran left and hit the back stairs. The Desert Korps ran to the main stairway. They couldn't see me. I couldn't see them. I pulled my belt sap and sapped black leather and coarse khaki. They made with the motivation and bitch-bleated. I might have sapped my pal Jimmy. So what if I did?

MY BOSS BACHELOR PAD

West Holly*weird*

5/12/55

I ran the radio. KKXZ—le jazz hot levied with listless bop ballads that blew blue and nodded off to nothingness. A low-watt/storefront station. Above Sultan Sam's Sandbox and Rae's Rugburn Room.

I was laid low, bent bare, and stripped to striation on the Isle of Deep Despair. The Westwood caper cornholed me. I humped Hilgard to Sunset. I ripped rubber just as the fuzz and fire engines arrived. The Afrika Korps beat it southbound. Their goofy getaway masked their insidious intent. A moment to maul my memory: Jimmy Dean, with pink panties stretched eyeballs to neck.

Nasty Nat's Soul Patrol popped the airwaves. Nat read local news spots before he samba'd back to his soporific sounds of the nite. He kicked off with his "Cutie."

UCLA. Sorority row. Panty raid at Chi Beta Gamma. The fuzz arrive. There's a garland of girls, wrapped in robes and issuing indignation. Four girls put it off on the SAE boys or USC football studs. One girl called it "more evil than that. These guys were older. One guy carried a camera. They ripped our robes, and tried to shoot a nudie film right there."

Nasty Nat put down some pooh-pooh patter. "UCLA ain't the ghetto, sisters. And I'm sure those young buck cops will be back to ask you to stage in-the-buff reenactments."

Ouch.

Nasty Nat said, "It's crime on the dime, tonite. The some might say infamous LAPD Hat Squad shot it out with those two steakhouse rapist-robbers. It went down at Tommy Tucker's Playroom on Washington and La Brea. One man escaped in the mad melee. Muerto at the scene: Richie 'The Dutchman' Van Duesen/white male American/age thirty-eight. Still at large: George 'Fat Boy' Mazmanian/white male American/age forty-two. The Fat Boy is purportedly armed and dangerous, so watch out."

Nasty Nat mimicked the Confidential style. It gored my goat. He cut from crime on the dime to bleak blues from the Synagogue Sid Trio. Dig: Sid on bass sax, Bobby Horvitz on flügelhorn, Aaron Adelman on drums. The piece: "Premature Funeral March for Gamal Abdel Nasser and King Farouk." Nat laid down the intro. He closed with "These cats run long." One, two, three—shalom, cats.

Synagogue Sid blatted his sax. Bobby Horvitz flaunted his flügelhorn. Aaron Adelman drilled his drums. I doused the volume. I got imperiously impatient. Where's Miss Blind Item? Where's her cruel critique of Confidential's Caryl Chessman piece??? Where's her fry-the-cocksucker rebuttal???

I was itchy/antsy/fraught/fragged and dexie-ditzed out of my gourd. I got out my notepad and skimmed '52 to '55 Confidentials. I'm a snitch, a rat fink, a stool pigeon, a squealer, a quisling, a rogue dog who bites the hand that feeds him. Let's do legal prep work for Chief William H. Parker.

Bill Parker and me. We're like that now. Let's take down Confidential.

Back issues. Clipped-on legal files. Lawyers' notes and field reports. Look for loopholes. Dippy depositions to dice and deep-six. The mag hired ace legal beagles. The mag had Freddy O. for strongarm vetting and verification. All our slurs and slander slams are true. We stand by our shit. Yeah, but if anybody's prone to fuck it all up, it's yammeringly yours truly.

I skimmed back issues. I read legal briefs and my own notes. I muddled through mellifluous memories.

December '52: "Showgirl Sells Shares in Self!!!"

Bland, by and large. A stock-market spoof. Vetted by a kid clerk. No slander slams or libel loops here.

December '52: "Exposed: Love in the UN!!!!"

Tattle text. The Multinational March of Miscegenation. Minor minions j'accused. I'm bored already. No vetting notes. Doofus diplomats never sue.

November '53: "Marked for Death: Walter Winchell, Bishop Fulton Sheen!!!"

Anti-Commie pap. Lawyers cite unnamed sources. Snoresville, U.S.A.

March '54: "Why Orson Welles Bit the Lip of Eartha Kitt."

Miscegenation—Confidential's merry mainstay. Orson was boning irksome Eartha. A Vegas stringer fed us the bit. Eartha said goons broke down her door. She was right. I hired the goons. Eartha demanded cold compensation. I slid her ten thou. Orson said, "You're a shit, Freddy." I bitch-slapped him.

This piece was bad juju and a potential Parker payoff. It exposed the mag's strong-arm methods and exposed ME. I put it in my secret Parker dirt file.

November '54: "Christine Jorgensen's Romance with a Vanderbilt Stepson."

He-she hijinx. Ex-man Christine set Vanderbilt up and had me shoot sneak pix. She wanted the publicity—to goose her dead-stalled film career. I shook down Vanderbilt for twenty thou. Christine and I split the gelt. Confidential published a pablum-packed piece that went pffft. Christine was pissed. She wanted to see some wild and wet woof-woof. This piece could mulch the magazine, baaaaaad. Ditto, Fred Otash. It was goooood Parker file fodder.

January '55: "Eartha Kitt and her 'Santa Baby' Arthur Loew, Jr."

Miscegenation marches on. The old colored canary/white sugar daddy bit. It's Irksome Eartha again. Eartha threatens to sue. I'm the bagman. Confidential coughs up cold cash.

Synagogue Sid blatted on. I yawned. Where's Miss Blind Item? It's almost 2:00 a.m.

March '55: "The Wife Clark Gable Forgot." Yawn. "The Girl in Gregory Peck's Bathtub." Man, it's sacked-out soporific.

Synagogue Sid bleated bleak and deep diminuendoed. I heard the mike-magnified cough of coins dropped in a pay phone. I kicked the volume. Nasty Nat said, "Miss Blind Item's back—so I know we're going to be talking Confidential magazine and the infamous Caryl Chessman case."

Miss Blind Item said, "Hey, Nat. What's shaking?"

I dug her voice. It was cool contralto and mucho Midwest.

"Nothing but the leaves on the tree, baby."

"Locate me, Nat. Where did we leave off last time?"

"Well, we did the long-range overview of Confidential, and we both commented on how atypically liberal their coverage of the Chessman case was, given that Confidential's been a Red-baiting and race-baiting rag from jump street."

Nasty Nat told it true. August '52. The cheesy Chessman piece. The mag was naïvely new then. I didn't sign on till fall '53.

Miss Blind Item laffed. "Confidential's got style, baby. You're starting to alliterate already."

Nasty Nat wolf-whistled. "And you've got cojones, as our Mex cousins say, calling a Negro man 'baby.' "

Miss Blind Item relaffed. Phone-booth sounds went mike-magnified. There's a match strike and exhale. She's smoking a cigarette.

"I'm an actress, Nat. You can always count on me to go for a provocative effect."

"Disc jockeys go the same route. Our sponsors here encourage it. Come on, Sultan Sam's Sandbox and Rae's Rugburn Room? They ain't paying me for bland."

"Talk about alliteration, baby."

Nasty Nat said, "You ain't Miss Blind Item, you the sexy succubus. Now, moving along, before you get me in trouble with the Klan, the Catholic Legion of Decency, and Chief Parker his own self, why don't you drop the basic lowdown on the Chessman case on all the folks out in Radioland."

Miss Blind Item refed the pay phone. Dimes dipped, nickels notched down the slot.

"It's early '48. Chessman's fresh out of Folsom. He's stealing cars and committing armed robberies. He's utilizing a hot '46 Ford as his rape vehicle, and he's affixed a phony red light to it, so he can pass himself off as a policeman. Now, he's prowling lovers' lanes in Pasadena and up above Hollywood. He's robbing young couples making out. On two legally affirmed occasions, he forcibly removes young women from their cars, and places them in his car. That legally constitutes kidnapping. Once they're in his car, he sexually assaults them, which constitutes a second, specific set of felony charges. His two certified victims conclusively identified him. He was convicted at trial and sentenced to death. Much has been made of the fact that Chessman did not kill anyone. C'est la guerre, sweetie. The Little Lindbergh Law applies. Now, that evil no-goodnik has become an ace jailhouse lawyer, and he's beaten back a slew of attempts to send him to the green room, where he most devoutly belongs. He wrote a book, which was published last year, called Cell 2455, San Quentin. In it, he fatuously asserts his innocence of the Red Light Bandit crimes and demands a redress of the entire American legal system."

Nasty Nat went whew! "I'm renaming you, and it ain't 'baby' or 'sweetie.' And you ain't really Miss Blind Item, you more the 'Vindictive Vixen,' which prompts me to ask you why you so het up on this case, when just about everybody I know thinks Chessman got railroaded, and these justice-minded folks I know are all doing their darnedest to make sure he don't go to that green room."

Go, Nasty Nat. You snagged it on the snout. Baby, sweetie, Miss Item—why you calling in to my radio show?

"It's dawning on me, sugar. You got a personal stake in this whole Chessman hullabaloo. That means there's something you haven't told us."

Miss Blind Item lit a cigarette. I heard the match flare and exhale.

"There was a third victim. She came forth and identified Chessman, but the DA chose not to have her testify at trial. The sexual assault that Chessman perpetrated against her was especially vile and vicious. Bluntly put, she went insane, and has spent the past seven years in Camarillo. The young woman was a friend of mine. We studied at a prestigious acting school in New York together, back in late '47. That's the long and short of it, Nat. I'm on leave from a gig in New York now, so I thought I'd make a little ruckus in my friend's hometown, and maybe take a little drive up to Camarillo."

Es la verdad. I was at Hollywood Station that night. I saw Miss Third Victim walk in and collapse on the squadroom floor.

GRIFFITH PARK

Ouch!!!!!

Outdoor surveillance. The withering worst. Dirt on my duds and briar bristles brushing my ass. I'm up some hellhole hiking trail. There's a noxious noonday sun singeing me. I've got binoculars trenchantly trained on the Observatory lot.

It's lunchtime. The lot's cordoned off for cast and crew, exclusive. It's loaded with hot rod heaps and kool kat kids couched within. Robbie Molette's hopping, heap to heap. He's pushing pills and reefers. I'm peeping the transactions. It's a rippling replay of last nite's panty raid/chickie run.

There's Nick Ray, Nick Adams, my putz pal Jimmy Dean. The gang's got up in street threads. There's no Afrika Korps kouture and Sieg Heil today. There's the three B-boys. They're still dressed in blasphemous black. I memorized the Chevy van plate stats last nite. They came back to one Chester Alan Voldrich/white male American/age twenty-six. Dig: he bossed the nabobically noted Hollywood High Rat Pack, circa '49. They rolled elderly fruits and Mickey Finn'd Marymount girls and got in their pants.

That was goooooood derogatory dish. Bill Parker would crap-his-pants cream. And—per Nick Adams/real name Adamshock/DOB 7-10-31/Nanticote, Pennsylvania:

No arrests/eight rousts on suspicion: GTA, flimflam, malicious mischief, Stat Rape, Peeping Tom, pushing pornographic snapshots. Plus: gay-bar roust sheets on Jimmy Dean and Nick Ray. Confirmed per Jimmy: Robbie Molette's "Human Ashtray" shtick. Confirmed per Nick Ray: rousted at the Saints and Sinners Drag Ball. Whoa, Nellie—Nick was a knockout in his Red Guard empire gown. Plus: Natalie Wood and Sal Mineo, popped at the "Jailbait Jamboree" at Linda's Little Log Cabin.

It's all Kids Run Wild/Kids Led Astray. It summoned me to serve Bill Parker and my meshugenah magazine. It summoned me to save Jimmy D. from himself.

I binocularized the big parking lot. Robbie pushed pills. Jimmy and Nick Adams shot craps on a Nazi-flag blanket. Jimmy called my service and left a message: "See you at Googie's tonite." That meant this: he didn't make me at the panty raid/chickie run.

I binocularized. Chester Voldrich and his B-boy buddies sniffed a glue-soaked rag. Natalie Wood basked in a bikini. She reclined on the roof of a '52 Eldo. Nick Ray walked by and kissed her thighs on the sly.

I walked into Hollywood Station. The desk sergeant moaned. Oh shit—it's Freddy O.

I walked up to the squadroom. A meter maid tagging tickets sighed. Oh shit—it's Freddy O. The squad lieutenant saw me. He rolled his eyes and slammed his door. Oh shit—it's Freddy O.

I looked for Colin Forbes and Al Goossen. They bossed the Chessman case, back in '48. There they are. They're Hollywood Squad lifers—they've still got the same two desks. They're workhorses worn weary. They're working. The squadroom was otherwise dead.

They saw me. They shared a look. Oh shit—it's Freddy—

I pulled a chair over. Forbes said, "Hi, Freddy." Goossen said, "Freddy's slumming. That means he wants something."

I said, "Chessman. The magazine wants to atone for that boo-hoo piece they published three years ago. There's some rumors percolating on the third victim. I was here when she came in, if you recall."

Forbes lit a cigarette. "That's right. You called Queen of Angels when she fainted."

Goossen lit a cigarette. "Chessman bit her forty-three times. You'd faint, too. She went straight from Queen of Angels to Camarillo, and the last I heard, she was still in shock. Don't put her in the magazine, Freddy. Show some class for once in your life."

I let it go. "Do you recall her name?"

Forbes shook his head nein. Goossen shook his head nyet. They revealed zilch. My reptile rep rubbed them raw.

"What's the story on her? Can you give me that, without naming names?”

Goossen kicked his chair back. “She was an L.A. girl, home for a visit. She was studying at the Actors Studio in New York, which is some sort of hotshot deal. So, she’s home, and she’s staying with her folks. She’s also a lezzie, which her folks know nothing about. On the night in question, she picks up a girl at Rhonda’s Rendezvous, and they parked on the shoulder at Mulholland and Beverly Glen. Chessman pulls his red light number, sees the girls making out and flips his lid. He throws the pickup girl out of the car, escorts the victim girl to his car, does what he does to her, and she makes her way here, under her own power. She never testified in court, and she didn’t need to. Judge Fricke heard the story, and that’s what convinced him that Chessman should burn. And he will burn, sooner or later, despite all his books and legal appeals, and Marlon Brando and all the other Hollywood geeks waving placards.”

Forbes said, “Shove your ‘rumors percolating’ up your ass, Freddy. You’ve got your own perv-o agenda going on this deal, so take it with you when you walk out the door, sometime in the next five seconds.”

Perv-o agenda.” Oh shit—it’s Freddy O. My old cop colleagues lay on the love. Freddy O’s the Shakedown King. He’s the Shaman of Shame. He’s the Pervdog of the Nite. Where’s the payoff here, Freddy? There’s got to be a payoff with you.

Why mince words? Cherchez la femme. It’s Miss Blind Item. She’s scorched herself under my skin.

I drove by the Ranch Market. I checked my phone slips. Jack the K. called. “I’m at the hotel. Come by at six. I’m having people up for drinks.”

I’ll be there, Jack. Fetch, Pervdog, fetch. I’ll go by your favorite pharmacy first. I know what you like. Why mince words? I like it, too.

Miss Blind Item. She studied with Miss Third Victim. They were New York friends. A “prestigious acting school.” Late ’47.

Al Goossen. The Actors Studio. “Some sort of hotshot deal.”

So—

Quo vadis, Freddy? Where to now?

I know. Let’s slam Mr. Blacklist. He always gives up the goods.

Jack Lawson. John Howard Lawson. Anglicized from Levy or some such. One studly Stalinist. He tramples Trotskyites and hexes HUAC to hell. Folks hate Jack. It's that perennial politics and personality parlay. Jack's determinedly dyspeptic. He's a schmuck, a schlemiel, a schmendrick, and a schlimazel. The PD and DA Ernie Roll own him covertly. Let's bop back to '40. Jack's the Party's Kultural Kommissar and hard-hearted hatchet man.

Enter Budd Schulberg. He's a ripsnorting writer and a marvelous mensch. He's writing What Makes Sammy Run? The Party demands rafts of revisions. Budd's a Party man maimed by mucho misgivings. Like Studly Stalin's purges that mowed millions dead. Jack mediates a meet and sets the spot. It's some comrade's casa off Hollywood and Fairfax. Budd is suddenly summoned. Jumpy Jack's there. Likewise the viperish V. J. Jerome. V.J.'s Jack's Ko-Kultural Kommissar. V.J. and Jack pack the Party's one-two punch.

V.J. and Jack. They berate Budd for two days, stridently straight. You will rewrite your bourgeois book. It must be proudly proletarian. You're a revisionist, a refusenik, a deviationist delinquent. You're a passive pawn of the fascist elite.

Here's the punch line. The comrade's casa is bugged, rugs to rafters. The comrade called in the cops. The Hitler-Stalin pact did it. The comrade ain't no Commie no more.

Jack berates Budd. Jack reads him the ripe riot act. Jack motormouths on many topics. Jack pounds popular front groups and takes them to task. Jack jacks off à la idiot ideologues worldwide. The PD shoots the bug tapes to State HUAC. Fourteen Smith Act indictments result.

The bug's still in place. Jack's sublet the comrade's casa since '48. Ex-Commies visit Jack. They juke him with jungle juice and get him to jaw. Jack jaws on overdrive. He's every Red Squad cop and dirt digger's dream. '48 to '55. That's seven years. The bugs remain in place. Jack don't know shit.

I drove over and parked outside Casa Comrade. I brought Jack a jug of Jim Beam. Jack sat on his front steps. I saw him. He saw me. It was Oh shit—Freddy Otash, redux.

I got out and walked up. Jack went Sieg Heil and hummed "Das Horst Wessel Lied." I yukked and tossed Jack his jug. He yanked the cap and yodeled a big blast.

"Freddy the O. Gauleiter for the occupation forces of Chief William H. Parker."

"You know who I work for, Jack. I'm a free-speech man, just like you."

Jack grabbed his crotch. "Free speech is a shuck. It's a smoke screen to cosmeticize the fascist agenda. Confidential riles up the schvarzers and faygeles. In that sense, it's an organ of revolutionary intent."

I laffed. "I'll tell Bob Harrison that."

"Tell Bob I saw his first wife at a Scottsboro Boys rally, back in '30-something. She was holding hands with a shvoogie and Pete Seeger's Filipina girlfriend. They were singing 'Swing Low, Sweet Chariot'—off-key, no less."

I stuffed a fifty in Jack's shirt pocket. Jack reyodeled Jim Beam. He hummed "Lili Marlene" and the love-death bit from Tristan und Isolde.

"Freddy the O. wants something. He never comes just to schmooze."

I said, "The Actors Studio. The late '40s. I know you go back to the Group Theatre, so I thought you might be able to help me."

"The Actors Studio. Oy. Not a revolutionary organ, susceptible to takeover by Comrade John Howard Lawson and the hundreds of young Red Guard majorettes eager to suck his big dialectical cock."

I said, "Come on, Jack. I was thinking you could give me some names."

Jack went mucho outraged. "Me? Name names? You think the apparatchik to end all apparatchiks would name names and betray the Fourth Apparatus of the Central Soviet?"

I said, "Jack, you're a pisser."

Jack stumbled into Casa Comrade. He left the door open. I saw him banging bookshelves and tossing tomes on the floor.

I lit a cigarette. Jack barged back outside. He passed me a school-type yearbook. It was buckram-bound and gilt-embossed. The cover read: The Actors Studio/1946–47.

"Thanks, Jack."

Jack hummed "The Internationale." "I know about the bug, Freddy. My schvartze cleaning lady discovered it when I first moved in."

I was floored and flat-flabbergasted. I grabbed Jack's jug and jammed down the juice. The world rippled and revised itself right before my eyes.

"You could have pulled it. You'd have saved some comrades of yours a whole lot of grief."

"Maybe I didn't want to. Maybe they deserved what they got. Maybe I thought I'd fuck with History and roll the dice for a while."

I traveled Trans-Jack Airways. The Lawson-Kennedy loop. It flew Casa Comrade to Beverly Hills. I buzzed by the Beverly Wilshire Pharmacy and filled Jack the K.'s order. Spaceman Jack would orbit tonite.

I hit the Beverly Hills Hotel. It was a back-bungalow bash. I lit through the lobby and landed right on cue. Women outnumbered men six to one. It was all stacked starlets and porko politicians. DA Ernie Roll and AG Pat Brown. Both quash-Confidential conspirators. Governor Goodie Knight. Colored congressman Adam Clayton Powell. Note his "Kiss Me, I'm Irish" campaign button.

I crashed the crowd. I popped out to a poolside porch and straddled a deck chair. A brisk breeze induced aaahhhs. I studied the Actors Studio book.

I poured through picture-packed pages. No-name kids built sets. Lee Strasberg made like Moses and laid down the law. I noted name actors and nudniks I'd seen on TV. I hit a section marked "1946–47 class." Kids congregated on bleachers and smiled, heartbreak hopeful. Page twenty-two popped out at me. I thought I saw—

Some names and no-names mingled. Kim Hunter, Ralph Meeker. Two no-name males. I recognized Reed Hadley of Racket Squad. There's Julie Harris and boss Barbara Bel Geddes. There's the wounded waif I saw at Hollywood Station during the Red Light Bandit's rampage.

She's hopeful here. She's heartfelt. She's wearing a paint-smeared smock and saddle shoes. She's standing beside a lissome light-haired woman I'd never seen before.

A name list laid out the players. Miss Third Victim was Shirley Tutler. The light-haired woman was Lois Nettleton.

Jack the K. walked up. I tossed him the pharmacy bag. Pill vials vibrated and did the shimmy-shimmy shake.

"Dare I ask what it cost?"

I said, "Zilch. The pharmacist's a defrocked physician. He owes me numerous favors."

Jack relit his cigar. "I'll be a defrocked U.S. senator, if I can't raise a whole lot of money tonight."

"There's not a lot of money in the next room. The girls don't have it, and the political guys never give it away."

Jack chortled. "Give me a good one, Freddy. My sisters like dish on handsome young actors and their secret lives. And don't give me Rock Hudson, because that's yesterday's news."

I said, "James Dean is known as the 'Human Ashtray.' "

"That's fairly unsavory."

"Barbara Payton's on the skids. She's car-hopping at Stan's Drive-In, across from Hollywood High."

Jack said, "Old news. You set me up with Babs when you were a cop and I was a congressman."

I said, "Katharine Hepburn is really a man. Whisper's running the story next month. She underwent hormone therapy in the Soviet Union."

"I'll live with it. As long as she's not a Commie or a Republican."

My time was up. Jack's eyes wiggled and wandered. He's Two-Minute Jack with his minions. He's Ten-Minute Jack in the sack.

"It was good seeing you, Freddy."

"Always a pleasure, Jack."

The sun salved me. The breeze went warm and bid me to bask. I dipped and dozed. The bungalow behind me went muffled and mute. I saw Shirley Tutler's picture and heard Miss Blind Item's voice. Soft sounds soothed me. Reverie. I'm rapt and reverential. I'm a kid back in church.

Wheels popped over pavement. Dishes rattled. Somebody said, "I didn't know you knew Jack."

I opened my eyes. Oh shit—it's Rodent Robbie Molette. A hairnet hid his fried hair. He's Busboy Robbie today. He's rolling a room-service cart.

"Everybody knows Jack. He exemplifies our new egalitarian society. It's why he talks to guys like you and me."

Robbie scratched his balls. "Be that as it may, I should take advantage of running into you, and tell you the latest scuttlebutt from the shoot."

I said, "I'm listening."

"You should listen, given the gist of what I'm about to tell you."

"Robbie, don't draw this—"

"Okay, here's the latest and greatest, which ain't so great in my view. A, Nick Ray's talking 'escalation.' He wants 'the kids' to 'plumb their motivation' and 'escalate their mischief.' B, he's talking hot-prowl 459's, liquor-store robberies, and making some sort of 'radical alternative movie,' that will 'complement and enlarge the meaning of,' this lox Rebel Without a Cause, which in my view is headed for the drive-in circuit in Dogdick, Arkansas."

I pondered the poop. Robbie futzed with his hairnet.

"You burned me, fucker. You messed with my good looks, because you're jealous of me."

Stood up, stiffed, dropped dry, and jilted. Dumped for some psycho Film Führer. Bereft like some left-behind belle at the ball.

Jimmy no-showed. I waited at Googie's. No Jimmy. I called my answering service. No messages. I called Jimmy's pad. No answer. I went by Jimmy's pad. No lights lit, no Jimmy. I cruised by the Chateau Marmont and bopped back to bungalow row. I peeped Nick Ray's bungalow. I saw Nazi Nick pour the pork to Natalie Wood while Sal Mineo snapped snapshots.

I bolted back to my sled and slipped southbound. I was whip-wigged and wound up waaaaaaay tight. A new notion nudged me. It pertained to Miss Blind Item. I stopped at a pay phone and called crime lab rajah Ray Pinker.

I outlined my plan. I pledged five yards. Rajah Ray said, "Sure—I'll do it." I ran back to my Packard pimpmobile and pointed it southbound. I dove into darktown. Vermont to Slauson, eastbound and dooooooooown.

I passed Mumar's Mosque, Mama Mattie's Massage Paradise, and the Mad Monk Klub. I hustled by Happytime Liquor, Happy Hal's Liquor, Hillhaven Liquor, and liquor lockers lit by signs that said LIQUOR and no more. I saw the signs for Sultan Sam's Sandbox and Rae's Rugburn Room. There's my dizzy destination: KKXZ Radio.

A wino weaved by. I curb-parked my pimpmobile right by the Rugburn Room door. The wino whistled and gassed on the tritone paint job. I tossed him a ten-spot and told him to watchdog my baby.

Back stairs ran me past the Rugburn Room and up to Radioland. It was beat-to-shit bohemian and cultivatedly cut-rate.

A wastified waiting room. Album covers stud-stapled to bare walls. They were all Bird. Bird bought the farm and bid us bye-bye in March. Bird beamed beatific now—I'm muerto, muchachos. A myriad of mourners scrawled up the white walls. It was all adios, Big Daddy and Hail to the King.

"Write something, Mr. Otash. He won't mind."

I swift-swiveled. Nasty Nat stood there. I recognized his radio voice. He was tall and a fit forty. He dressed cool-cat insurrectionist. I dug his fez/combat fatigues/fruit-boot ensemble.

I pulled my pen and scrawled on the wall. Nasty Nat said, "You're pissed, right? I mean, the magazine's pissed."

"I'm not pissed. I'm intrigued more than anything else. I was thinking you could record a message for me, and make sure that Miss Blind Item hears it the next time she calls in."

"How about a message for Bird? 'Sorry I popped your ass for junk outside the Club Alabam in March of '49.' "

I said, "How do you know I didn't write that on the wall just now?"

Nasty Nat pointed to the sound booth. I followed him over and in. We took the two chairs. The booth boxed us up. We were nudged knee-to-knee.

The Synagogue Sid Trio trickled and trilled. Nasty Nat killed the sound and moved his microphone my way. I excavated my bold bass-baritone.

"Miss Item, my name is Fred Otash. I work for Confidential, and I'm a former Los Angeles policeman. I was there at Hollywood Station the night your friend Shirley came in. I agree with your assessment of Caryl Chessman's guilt, and I'd like to discuss with you a second Chessman piece that might serve to set the record straight."

Voilà. That was goooooooood. I was cool-cat commanding and concise. Nasty Nat smiled and hit the kill switch.

"I'm pretty sure she'll call in tonight, and I'll make sure she hears your message. And, before you ask, I don't know her righteous name, or anything more about her than you do."

I scoped the bare-bones booth. It's got that rat resort/proud poor folks gestalt.

“You get by on donations, right? Making the rent’s a stretch, and you’re always running on fumes.”

Nasty Nat said, “That’s right.”

I said, “Confidential’s a sucker for good jazz, and we’re in business to make friends, regardless of what you might have heard about me, or the magazine itself. I need a favor that only you can perform, and if you do perform it, the magazine will drop five hundred clams a month on KKXZ, indefinitely.”

Nasty Nat lit a cigarette. “She’s calling from a pay phone. I can hear her feed the coins in. Does this favor pertain to that?”

I smiled. “That’s right. I need a trace. I need you to call a cop pal of mine within two minutes from the time she gets on the horn with you. It might not work the first time, but it should work sooner or later.”

“She might leave town. This whole deal could go poof.”

“You still get the bread.”

“Well then, okay.”

I winked. “I’m going home, to sit by my radio.”

“Tell me something before you go?”

“Sure.”

“What did you write on the wall?”

“I wrote ‘Dear Bird: Thanx for the sounds. Best wishes, Fred Otash.’ ”

Nasty Nat said, “You’re caustic, but you’ll never be hip.”

—

Synagogue Sid serenaded me. I ran my radio low and laid low on my couch. Nasty Nat cut to commercials for Sultan Sam’s Sandbox, Kool Kings, and the Cannonball Adderley Quintet. Then dimes dipped and nickels nudged and slid down a slot. I knew that noise now. I knew it was microphone-magnified.

Silence socked me. I knew why. Nasty Nat put Miss Blind Item on hold and buzzed Ray Pinker.

It’s Tap Try #1. It’s logged in at 1:16 a.m.

I heard fuzz, buzz, radio rasp, and dissonant dial tones. I knew why. Nasty Nat’s playing my plea. I held my breath. Now, she’s back in ripping rejoinder.

“I don’t know, Nat. Is our Mr. Otash looking for a date, or justice for my friend Shirley?"

"It could be both, you know. One don't exclude the other."

I heard tap-taps. Tension taps. Miss Blind Item's crammed in a phone booth. She's drumming the wall. It's stagecraft. She's buying time to rig a response. That means she's tweaked, that means she cares.

"Mr. Otash has a reputation, Nat. It precedes him, you might say. I read a piece in the L.A. Mirror—last year, I think it was. It described his illegal surveillance methods and alleged that he resorted to physical force in order to quash lawsuits levied against Confidential."

"Well, you know that old saw, right? 'If you want to make an omelet, you've got to break a few eggs.' "

Miss Blind Item laffed. "Not that Confidential magazine is much of an omelet, right?"

"You sure got me there, baby."

Silence settled in. Silken, sullen, sickened—who knows? Ardent or artificial—who knows that? She's amply ambiguous. It's cold-calculated. She's leading me, she's playing me, there's something she wants.

"A casting director I know told me he beat up Johnnie Ray. Really, Nat—Johnnie Ray? I met him once, after his gig at the Copa in New York. He was certainly one of the nicest, and certainly the least offensive young man that I've ever met. Nothing that I can think of could ever justify that sort of behavior."

Baby, I know just how you feel.

Nasty Nat said, "Yeah, I dig on Johnnie Ray. I spin his discs on the show, every so often."

"Handsome is as handsome does, Nat. I saw Mr. Otash on Paul Coates' show, the last time I passed through L.A. I remember thinking, My, that surely is a most presentable man, which made me doubly sad to have heard the Johnnie Ray story."

Miss Blind Item. I've got you under my skin.

SECURITY OFFICE

The Sleazoid Hollywood Ranch Market
5/14/55

A.M. shitwork. Phone work and field reports. Two per Rebel Without a Cause. Mendacious memos to Bondage Bob Harrison and Bill Parker.

I called Nasty Nat at KKXZ. Pathos pounded me. He lived at the station. His noxious news: last nite's trace went blooey. Nat said he'd try again tonite. I bid the big bopster bon voyage.

Miss Blind Item. You've got me torched and scorched.

I wrote my report to Bondage Bob. I delivered the dish on Nick Ray's Afrika Korps and described the pustulant panty raid in delirious detail. I omitted Jimmy Dean's presence. I owed Jimmy that. I exorbitantly expanded my memo to Bill Parker. I reported Robbie Molette's dish per Führer Nick's "escalation" escapades. Dig, Chief: He's planning hot-prowl 459's and liquor-store 211's. He's the maladroit mastermind of the "motivation" crime. Addled actors bow to his bidding. Nazi Nick's applied the Stanislavskiesque stamp.

I called Confidential's messenger service. A car schlepped down from Sunset and Vine and picked up the pouches. Chop, chop, fucker—deliver them now.

My desk phone rang. I picked up. Bondage Bob bored straight in.

"Lew Wasserman just called me. Rock's at the West Hollywood Sheriff's Station. He was booked under his kosher name of Roy Fitzgerald, and it looks like he was drunk or maybe Mickey Finn'd, he might have been blowing some guy in a parked car, and what's for sure is he swung on a deputy, so now he's in custody. All this means I need you and your boys to get him out and clean him up before the press gets wind of it."

I said, "Jawohl, boss. I'll jump on it."

Bob bored back in. "We've got to safeguard our exclusive on the 'Rock marries a woman' front. Lew's a hundred percent behind us on this. He wants to call the piece 'Rock's Rocky Road to Marital Bliss,' and he's a hog for the eternal-triangle bit that you and Phyllis have cooked up. That means you've got to find us a bait girl to play the other woman. You dig, bubi? I want a fresh face, which means nobody we've used before. If Rock falls in the shit on this Sheriff's deal, we can lay the bait girl off as the 'sexy succubus who led the righteously religious Rockster to tasty temptation,' or some such happy horseshit."

I said, "I'll have Rock out inside of an hour."

Bob said, "Lay off the kraut jive. I'm one twenty-fourth Jewish, and I'm touchy about it."

Ward Wardell and Race Rockwell rendezvoused with me. We surged up surreptitious. We slid in slick and parked by the jail-exit door. Bondage Bob called ahead and bought the bail bond. Rock stood ready to roll.

Race remained with my sled and sluiced the engine. I'd called ahead and pledged the jail deputies a yard per. Ward and I juked through the jail door. We caught a corridor and sidled up to cellblock row. There's Rock. He's signing autographs for a filthy phalanx of his fellow jailbirds. Wheww!!!—they're malodorous Menschen—winos, weedheads, K-Y cowboys caught in the act.

Race wrangled Rock. I ran interference. Rock hurled hand kisses back to the boys and ran with us. He was sweaty and swack-back on some kind of hop. His feet flip-flopped on the floor.

We made the door. I barged us out. We ran right into a riotous raft of reporters.

Banzai!!!! Sneak attack!!!! It's Pearl Harbor perpetrated by the putzoid Fourth Estate!!!!

Flashbulb flare. Hurled questions. I heard Rock, Rock, Rock and ARE THOSE RUMORS TR—

A cordon constricted around us. I pulled my belt sap. Ward pulled his belt sap. We sap-slapped cameras. Flashbulbs shattered and sheared into shards. We sap-bashed heads and scoured scalps and hurled Rock ahead of us. We slid into my sled three across. Race Rockwell goosed the gas. We surfed out to San Vicente and nailed it north to the Strip.

Dig it. Escape from Stalag 69. Rock could top-line the flick. He yukked, I yukked. Ward and Race yukked. There's blood in my soul and torn-out teeth stuck to my sap.

Race wound west on Sunset and dipsy-doodled south and north on Crescent Heights. Rock and I hopped out at Googie's. The coffee cave was midmorning lulled. We took my table. Debrief me, Daddy. Escape from Stalag 69. What's the priapic prelude here?

I fed Rock my flask and two dexies. I fed myself, likewise. Rock said, "Don't tell me. You want me to lay out the whole sordid tale."

I said, "That's right."

Rock lit a cigarette. "Here's what I recall. I was visiting this kid actor, Nick Adams. Why? Because I sensed susceptibility. He's got a little rental house, up north of the Marmont. Okay, I'm there. Nothing much is happening, except I go to the bathroom, and I notice this spare bedroom piled up with hi-fis, TV sets, movie cameras, and all kinds of radio consoles and electrical gear. It's like Nick's running a Sears, Roebuck out of this one room. Then Nick makes me a drink, and there had to be something in it, because I go gaga. And…well…there might have been another guy there, but I'm not sure…and…well…the next thing I remember is waking up in jail."

Nick Adams. "Motivation, escalation." Robbie Molette's 459 dish. Rock's Sears, Roebuck shit. It radiated Burglary Swag.

"I'll take you home. We've got that fake-wife caper coming up, you'll have two good-looking women fighting over you, and you should get some rest."

Rock went Why me, Lord?

I pulled into Stan's Drive-In. Babs Payton knew from bait girls. She had a history with Nick Ray. She cadged courses at the Actors Studio West. She knew all within her limited *perv*view. She tattled all for cash and cocaine.

I'd dropped off Rock and rolled by the Ranch Market. I read my two message slips. Bondage Bob and Bill Parker called. I returned the calls. I bagged big bravos for my Rebel Without a Cause report. Bob said the Escape from Stalag 69 cost him six g's. It covered cameras smashed and busted bones set at Central Receiving. He laffed it off.

The Rebel report and Rock's tricky triangle made the money minuscule. Parker parsed attaboys. He told me Ernie Roll rhapsodized per the Rebel revelations. Meet us at Ernie's office, 4:00 tomorrow.

Babs skated up. She did her signature sideways dip and passed me a pineapple malt. The malt metastasized. A mushroom cloud toxified me. Babs laced my malts. Bonded bourbon and Benzedrine bits brought the brew to a head.

I slid our seats back. We got cozy. Babs tucked her legs up and skimmed her skate wheels on the dashboard.

"I need a hundred, Freddy. Regardless of how many topics we cover."

"Okay. Let's start with the Actors Studio. I'm looking for something very specific here. Do they keep a radio and TV tape library on the premises? I'm looking to identify a specific actress by her voice."

Babs lit a cigarette. "Yeah, they do. Their members put on these earmuff thingamajigs and watch the TV and movie stuff on some monitor-type gizmos."

I sipped my malt. The depth charge detonated. Oooooohhh, Daddy —

"Second topic. I'm looking for a bait girl. It's a long-range deal, and I'm looking for a new-kid-in-town, who-are-you? type."

Babs blew smoke rings. "Let's come back to that one. I've got to put my thinking cap on."

"Okay, here's topic three. Nick Ray. I know you worked as an extra on They Live by Night, so that's got to ring some bells."

Babs whooped. "That's the three-cherry jackpot and two chapters in my book, Hollywood Creeps I Have Known. To begin with, he's a perv of the fake-daddy ilk. He likes it young, and he likes sending young actors out on 'motivational missions,' which he films, and I assume that that would be for kicks in the moment and blackmail purposes somewhere down the line. Do you like it so far?"

I said, "Tell me something I don't know. This juvenile delinquency turkey interests me."

Babs tossed her cigarette. "Nick's got his head goon on all his pictures. On this one, it's this mean little shit, Nick Adams. He's also got his 'Love Boy' and 'Love Girl' on all his pictures, and this time it's your chum Jimmy Dean and Natalie Wood. He's always trying to push these kids into all kinds of scary stuff, and he's got it all justified and sugarcoated to the nth degree. There's an actor on the shoot named Dennis Hopper. He's a customer here, and he's got common sense enough to give Nick a wide berth. Now, Dennis told me that Nick's got Jimmy all hopped-up to play Caryl Chessman, and Jimmy's drooling for the part."

Click, click, click. That's a three-cherry jackpot. Yeah, but it's turgidly topical, it's new news, Chessman's a headline humper, but still —

"Freddy, are you even listening to me?"

I said, "Keep going. What else have you got on Chessman?"

"Nothing. Except who wants to see a vital young stud like Jimmy Dean play Caryl—"

"Whoa, Babs. Hold on. Where'd you get that 'vital young stud' line? It's something I've heard before."

Babs scoffed. "I got it from a would-be criminal mastermind named Robbie Molette. He's a regular here, and he's always referring to himself as a 'vital young stud.' I used to shtup his daddy when I was a contract kid at Metro. He also works as a busboy, at the Beverly Hills Hotel, and—"

I cut in. "Babs, what? What's with that lightning-bolt look?"

"Nothing. Except you're looking for a bait girl, and Robbie was in last night, and damned if he hasn't put together a stable, and damned if he didn't show me a merchandise book with some very fresh faces."

OUTSIDE NICK ADAMS' RUSTIC RENTAL PAD

West Holly*weird*

5/15/55

Stakeout. Eine kleine Nachtwerk. The mad march to 1:00 a.m. and Miss Blind Item. I'd run my radio loooooooooow. I'd hear coins slip-slide down that slot. Nasty Nat would try for a trace. I'd hear Her voice.

Nutty Nick Adams. There's his chump-change chalet. I'm parked across the street and two doors down. It's a murky moon-mist nite. I'm cunningly camouflaged. Shade-tree shadows shield the shape of my sled.

It's peeper peekaboo. I see Nick's pad. Nick can't see shit. There's window lights. Big beams bounce my way. I possess Peepervision. No one else does.

There's a scurrilous script read. Nick Ray pontificates. Nick A. and Jimmy Dean declaim dialogue.

I hexed the house. I made mental mincemeat of the punks and mocked their motivation. Leave now, feckless fools. I've got work to do inside.

I brought my evidence kit. It contained print gear and Ray Pinker's stop-frame camera. I dunned the DMV. They fed me photostats of three drivers-license applications. I had right thumbprints for Jimmy Dean, Nick Ray, Nick Adams. Pinker's camera light lit latent prints and magnified tents, whorls, and arches. My game was confirmation and/or elimination. If they touched the B and E swag that Rock described, I'd know.

I turned on the radio. Synagogue Sid serenaded me. Sid's bass sax sallied forth. The flügelhorn flew with it. The drums drilled a cool counterpoint. Then that cacophonous coin cough cut in.

Adios, Sid. Nasty Nat's nudged you aside for Miss Blind Item. I ran the radio looooooooow. I listened for tone above text. Talk to me, love. Say something, say anything. Give me your voice.

Miss Blind Item riffed and rang rapport with Nasty Nat. I listened for tone above text. I nite-dreamed as she talked.

Caryl Chessman would be in L.A. As in soonsville. He had a court appeal downtown. Nick Ray wants Jimmy Dean to play the Red Light Bandit. It surged as subtext and nudged me nonplussed. It couldn't compete with Her Voice. Her vowels suggest the urban Midwest. It's a seen-it-all city voice.

A door slammed. I orbed the chalet. Mark it: 1:23 a.m. The punks pop from the pad. They bag Nick Adams' rental ragtop and roll northbound.

I rolled. It's late, time is tight, you need an hour inside. I ran to the door and laid into the lock.

Lock picks and penlight. It's up-close, in-tight work. I jammed a #4 pick in the keyhole and massaged the main spring. Two tumblers tipped. I pulled out the #4 and jammed in a #2. The door jerked from the jamb. I shoulder-shoved it and inched inside.

I locked myself in. I penlight-flashed the main room and dug on the details. Bullfight posters, bongo drums, a TV tuned to a test pattern. Natalie Wood nudie pix tacked to one wall.

It's cheesecake chiaroscuro. Natalie's backlit by flickering flames and feral faces peering out. It's the Afrika Korps, the B-boys, the Nick's Knights Kar Klub. The Führer's face peers out above them. Nick Ray's wearing devil horns and torquing a ten-inch forked tongue.

I cut down the hall. I flashed a bare-mattressed bedroom and a bathroom in bad disarray. My light speared the spare bedroom. My beam swung over the swag.

The hip hi-fis. The cumbersome consoles. The fetchingly fenceable TV sets and camera cascade. They were hurled haphazard and carelessly covered the floor.

I left the room lights off. I got out my gear. I made for the mountain of merchandise and went to work.

My penlight put me in close. I went contraband item to item. I marked manufacturers' ID numbers on my scratch pad. It was all B and E stash. I knew that. It might be traceable to specific burglary lots.

Prints next. That's the tuff part. Dust touch-and-grab surfaces. Daub contrasting-color powder. Put the stop-frame camera up to liftable latents. Expand the images and look for thumbprint configurations. Count tents, whorls, and arches. Compare them to the DMV photostats.

I went at it. I had at it, wholesale. I kept the lights off. I penlight-parsed and brushed purple powder over every touch-and-grab surface in sure sight. Finger oil brought up smudges, smears, paltry partial and full fingerprints. I went item to item. I dusted hi-fis/consoles/cameras/TV sets. Smudges, smears, and partials popped up. No glaring glove prints stood out. That was gooooood.

I caught two full finger spreads. They popped off a pinewood console. That meant bupkes/zero/zilch. I needed right thumbprints X-clusive.

I worked myself weary. I wound my way down to two portable TV sets.

They had hard-to-hold planes and no handles. They were cumbersome and unwieldy. They were hoist every which way items.

I dusted Set #1. I hit hard surfaces, crevices, cracks. I brought up a right thumbprint. I raised my camera. I zoomed close. I let fly.

The camera magnified. The camera impaled images and brought them up, white-on-black. I counted comparison points. I'd memorized the photostat points. I'd broiled them into my brain. I knew every tent, whorl, and arch.

I counted One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten—

Nick Adams, it's you. You're fucked for 459 PC.

I dusted Set #2. It's hard to hold and pry off the premises. There's that hard-to-hold tube housing.

I dusted it. I pulled Right Thumbprint #2.

I put the camera up to the print. I magnified it. I counted common points. Six points saddened and sickened me. Nine points nullified me. Ten points pounded James Dean, courtroom conclusive.

Bait girls. Babs Payton shtups Robbie Molette's dad, circa '47. Rodent Robbie. He's running call girls now. No shit, Sherlock. Robbie's got a merchandise book. Babs reveals fresh faces. It's a nutty non sequitur. It indicates the brute breadth of my craaaaaaazy crowded life.

I broomed to the Beverly Hills Hotel. Robbie worked the noon-to-nine swing shift. I parked in the employees' lot and lingered by the locker room door. Robbie rolled up at 11:40. His '49 Ford fed fucked-up fumes to Beverly Hills and beyond. It laid out L.A. as a lung ward.

I coughed up to the car. Robbie popped the door. I scooched in.

Robbie called in some cool.

“Hey, Freddy. What’s shakin’ today?”

I lit a cigarette. Robbie said, “Hey, watch it. Asthma runs in my family.”

“Let’s talk about your family. Like in your dad, who’s a grip at Metro. I see nepotism at work here. Babs Payton and your dad were some kind of an item. And Babs is impressed with your new stable. ‘Fresh faces’ was how she put it.”

Robbie reached under his seat. He pulled out a pink padded notebook. It was embarrassingly embossed “The Young Stud’s Stable.”

I riffled and ran through the pages. “Fresh faces”—yeah. Nepotism—yeah plus. They were Metro contract cooze. The innocent ingénue type. The Hollywood Heartache Class of ’55.

Dad strung strings around Robbie. He passed on his pimp patrimony. I knew the Metro method. The casting cads culled and curried a type. Bryn Mawr, Vassar, Mount Holyoke. This was Ivy League woof-woof deluxe.

“Your dad wants you to keep it localized. The hotel, and nowhere beyond. You suck up to the guests and take it from there. Your dad palms the desk guys and gets the rooms. You do a little matchmaking, and take home your cut.”

Robbie huff-huffed. His dentures dipped out. He’s twenty-two. He’s got dentures. He needs a dad.

I reriffled the girl book. A look lassoed me. She’s tall and lioness lithe. She’s chestnut-haired. She’s heaven-sent in heathered tweeds. She’s Bryn Mawr brought to life.

Robbie said, “That’s Janey Blaine. She went to Smith. She’s gigging with Jack tonight.”

‘Jack’? You mean Senator John F. Kennedy?”

“Well, I call him Jack, and I’m the one who set him up with Janey. He’s meeting her at a Democratic fund-raiser here tonight. It’s my patented ‘Some Enchanted Evening’ scenario, you dig? Janey’s an out-of-town Party functionary, you dig? She sees Jack at the wingding, their eyes meet across a crowded room, and she goes back to his bungalow with him, and stays all night. There’ll be movie big shots at the wingding, and they’ll scope Janey and check out her pedigree at Metro. She’ll get legitimate work out of this gig, you dig?”

I chained cigarettes. “I dig. And I’ll be crashing the gig, by the way. And if I like the way Janey carries herself, I’ll have a long-term gig she won’t be able to resist.”

Robbie sniff-sniffled. His eyes went wet. He trembled. His dentures clack-clacked.

"She resisted me, that's for damn sure."

I resisted the riposte. You'll always have your sister, kid. Chrissy's a hot sketch. She's yours as you live and breathe.

Ernie Roll sipped scotch. "Your Rebel Without a Cause summary is boffo. Don't you think so, Bill?"

Parker sipped scotch. The DA's sanctum sanctorum featured fishing trophies tricked up on wood-paneled walls. Monster marlin and ossified octopi.

Ernie crapped out at his desk. Parker and I sat in soft leather chairs. The seasick green leather went with the walls.

"It is. We'll get some indictments out of it, and we'll get Freddy to improperly vet the magazine's story, which will give us the double whammy when we put Confidential in the shit."

"Get us some good dirt on this James Dean kid, Freddy. He's a big movie star now."

"Freddy's tight with the kid, Ernie. We have to assume he's a source for a lot of this information."

I sipped scotch. "The Chief's right about that, Ernie. That said, I should add that I tossed Nick Adams' pad and took his prints off some hot TV sets. Harry Fremont's got the ID numbers off the merchandise. If the burglaries were reported, he'll nail that punk for a whole flotilla of 459's."

One more misdirection. One more mercy missive for Jimmy the D.

Parker said, "Freddy Otash. Accept no substitutes."

Ernie said, "Lay out some story vettings you were remiss or criminally culpable on, Freddy. And, remember, I'm voluntarily offering up that no-file sheet on you when all this goes to court, so you'll be in the clear on any and all criminal charges."

I cracked my knuckles. "The two Eartha Kitt jobs were dirty. I slapped Orson Welles around. We paid off Eartha on both of them, all off-the-books cash. The pieces were all lies. Race mixing was a hot topic, so we went nuts with it."

Ernie went Hubba-hubba. Parker said, "Freddy's prebriefed me. It gets better than that."

I scoured my scotch rocks. “Christine Jorgensen and I shook down the Vanderbilt kid for twenty grand. The piece we published was expurgated during the editorial process. I kicked the door down and took pictures. They’ll make good courtroom exhibits or place mats at your next Elks Club smoker.”

Ernie slapped his knees. “Like your stellar photos of Marlon Brando with a dick in his mouth.”

Parker rolled his eyes. “A legendary item.”

Ernie said, “Your legendary tiff with Johnnie Ray. That’s a good courtroom vignette.”

I cringed. “As tiffs go, it wasn’t much. And it’s not like I’m proud of it.”

Parker held one finger up. Ernie ticked that topic off.

“We’re working a two-way street here, Freddy. That means you’ve got a fat credit slip in Banker Roll’s vault.”

I said, “Caryl Chessman’s got an appeal in superior court. He’ll be here soon. I’d like a jail visit with him.”

Parker said, “That evil cocksucker.”

Ernie crossed himself. “Those poor girls. That girl in Camarillo.”

Parker crossed himself. “Consider the request, Ernie.”

I crossed myself. “I promise I’ll behave, and I promise that anything Confidential puts up will atone for that boo-hoo piece we published in ’52.”

Parker beady-eyed me. “Here’s a reminder to go with that request. The next time you witness Nick’s Knights, or the Afrika Korps, or whatever you’re calling them, committing first-degree felonies, you are to intercede with all due and vigilant force.”

Match the voice. Make a voice print. KKXZ to the 1946–47 yearbook. She’s not the noted Kim Hunter or Barbara Bel Geddes. She’s not Shirley Tutler/aka Miss Third Victim. She’s probably Unknown Actress #1 or #2. She might be the lissome Lois Nettleton. Her picture might not have popped on that page.

Babs bought me in. She called ahead and relayed my request. She artfully audited Actors Studio West classes and muff-munched member Mercedes McCambridge on occasion. She explained my kooky conundrum. A clearheaded clerk caught it quick. She snagged her yearbook copy. She found the faces. She rigged a TV clip/film clip/scroll-the-screen machine.

Unknown Actress #1 was Marjorie McConville. Unknown Actress #2 was Lana Linscott. Shirley was Shirley. Lois was Lois. The machine socked sound out of side vents.

The clerk cozied me up in a cubicle and cut the lights. I scrolled the screen. Miss McConville mangled Major Barbara. She stormed a stage in Belfast or Ballymora. She shoved Shaw at me in a brutal brogue. I rescrolled the screen.

Lana Linscott laid it on light. She played some doofus Doris in a dithering Dinner at Eight. Her voice wasn't The Voice. She was a salt-lick soprano. She came off as a comedienne.

I knew what was next. I scrolled the screen and got to it. There's Shirley Tutler, pre-Chessman.

She looked L.A. She talked L.A. She had the flat vowels and the vibrato drawl. She essayed Stella in Streetcar. She simpered and saw how it played. She started over and notched up her native dignity.

I replayed the nite we met. Her blood-soaked blouse dripped. I brought her a blanket. She said, "You're very kind." I brought her a cup of water. Colin Forbes and Al Goossen took over from there.

I touched the screen. I scrolled the screen. Lois Nettleton mainlined Maggie in Cat on a Hot Tin Roof.

It was Her Voice. She had The Voice. She jumped geography and subsumed a southern belle's timbre here. She withered her weak willy/bottle baby/homo-haunted hubby and begged him to sire her child. She pinnacled the pathos and wrapped back to the rage. Her Deep South diction dipped north to Chitown shaded with Sheboygan. I was glad. It was Her Voice, The Voice.

Lois, it's you.

Janey, it's you.*

For Jack, it is. Tonite, at least. You look goooooood. You move magnetic. You roil the room and mug the men moving at you. You've got droves of dreary Democrats drip-dried. You might bag the bait-girl gig. I'll call you Rambunctious Rock's Squeeze, then.

I circulated. It was a big-room bash. It was committedly corny and panderingly partisan. Note the crepe-paper bunting. Note the coarse cardboard cutouts—Democrat donkeys at graze.

I'm crawl-crammed in with two hundred people. The women wear god-awful gowns and show too much shoulder. The men sport springweight suits and sweat them straight through. I'm sweating. I'm a Lebanese camel fucker and prone to the sweats.

Jack's immune to sweat. Janey's immune. Jack's got cucumber-cool chromosomes. Janey's loose-limbed in lavender linen. I'm tall, Jack's tall, Janey's tall. I'm a periscope. I'm peering over the heads of the heaving hoi polloi. Come on, kids. It's Some Enchanted Evening. This bum bash is one hour in. Orb those eyes. Orbit the room. Let's see you cull contact.

Some nudnik nudged me. Oh shit—it's Robbie Molette. He's passing out puffed cheese and seared tuna on toast. He slipped me a note. I brusque-brushed him off. The rodent rambled away.

Ooooga-booooga. There it is. Jack's moving her way. Janey's moving his way. It's a slow slog and a deep detour through dowdy folks. He's laughing. She's laughing. They move their hands in sexy sync. It's fate—what can you do?

There, they've met. They shake hands. They're speaking. Here's my speech balloons. She's calling him "Senator Kennedy." He's calling up his killer comeback: "Come on, call me Jack."

I watched them. The Pervdog of the Nite's a peeper from waaaaaaaay back. What's going on here? What's with this jungled-up juju? What is it that you two have got?

It's this:

You're decorous. It's a deft deception. You project a state of groovy grace as you sally forth in sin. There's a halo around you now. It hides your cold hearts and your constant calls to conquest.

Janey, it's you.

You were born to play bait gigs. I'm enchanted and appalled.

I barged out of the bash. I bopped over to the porte cochere and read Robbie's note.

"Nick's Knights are mobilizing. Tomorrow night, 9:00 p.m. at the Marmont."

I remade myself as Stage Door Freddy. I'm a sweaty swain swooning for my phone to ring. I know her name, she knows my name. Nasty Nat's our conduit and cupid. The Actors Studio clerk laid out the lowdown on Lois.

Born Oak Park, Illinois/'27. Miss Chicago, '48. The Art Institute of Chicago. East to the Apple. The Actors Studio. Lois meets Shirley Tutler. Her connection to the Caryl Chessman case is calamitously forged.

TV work. Film work. Stage work. Her zenith's right now. She's understudying Barbara Bel Geddes in Cat on a Hot Tin Roof. Here's a punchy parenthetical:

The play's all Broadway bravos right now. If Barbara bails behind a bad bug or lays up with laryngitis, Lois plays Maggie the Cat.

But she's in L.A. She knew her cruel critique of Confidential would somehow summon me. She knows things about me. She wants something from me. My pay-phone trace will work at some point. Yeah, but I'm right here, right now.

I caved on my couch. I'm Stage Door Freddy. I'm a cuckold, a cornuto, a juvie jerkoff, a chump. I hexed the phone. I brain-brewed an APB on Lois June Nettleton/white female American/DOB 8-16-27, Oak Park, Ill—

The phone rang. I picked up and risked ridicule. I said, "Hello, Lois."

She said, "Hi, Freddy. I figured you'd find me before too long. So I jumped the gun a bit."

"I'm glad you did. And I'm not going to ask you what you want, because I know you'll tell me pretty damn quick."

Lois said, "That's true, but what I want is evolving, and I'm not quite sure what it is."

I said, "I saw a clip of you today. It was in black and white. I couldn't tell what color your hair is."

"It's strawberry blond. And I saw you on Paul Coates' show, and you tried to tell the truth, but you faltered at it."

I said, "Meet me. Right now. It's not that late."

Lois said, "Not tonight. Before too long, though."

I said, "You've got this haunted tomboy thing going. Like Julie Harris, but earthier and more pronounced."

"I like men who notice things like that, and make accurate comparisons like the one you just did."

"How long have you been pulling this anonymous telephone stuff?"

“Since the war, when I was in high school. The telephone has always been my métier.”

“I wish we could talk in person.”

“We will, in time.”

“Shall we talk about Chessman?”

“Not yet.”

“You’re right. It’s more of an in-person conversation.”

Lois said, “Shirley speaks of you, when she’s capable of speaking. She’s never forgotten those few moments you spent together.”

OUTSIDE THE CHATEAU MARMONT

West Holly*weird*

Rolling stakeout.

It's 8:55 p.m. I'm parked perpendicular, down from bungalow row. I borrowed Donkey Don's '53 Chevy. It's innocuous compared to my Packard pimpmobile. I'm snout-out in a flat flower bed. I'm ready to roll.

I'm still stage door–stuck and looped on Lois standard time. We talked until 2:00 last nite. We tippled at topics and nodded off into non sequiturs. We laffed, we flirted, we surged toward and circumnavigated a path past Shirley Tutler and Caryl Chessman. Lois refused to divulge her L.A. hideaway. I called Nasty Nat and Ray Pinker two hours back. They'd trace-tracked three Lois calls. They got cloyingly close. Ray tracked transformer stations and logiced out a loose location. He made it mid-Wilshire east.

It's a booth call. Here's his best shot at a border-to-border bid. It's Western to the west/Vermont to the east/Beverly to the north/Olympic to the south.

I got it. I saw it. My mind churned and channeled straight to Chapman Park.

The Ambassador Hotel's there. Ditto, the Chapman Park Hotel and the Gaylord Apartments. The Brown Derby's there. Dale's Secret Harbor's there. It's a lively locale. Lois would light there—I knew it.

The fone fungooed my whole day. Rodent Robbie called and ran me raw. He said, Jack loved Janey. I said, No shit, Shadrack—what's not to love? Robbie goosed me: You giving her the bait gig? I said, Yeah—tell her to meet me tomorrow nite/Frascati/ten p.m. It's a pithy party of four. She'll meet the players then. Robbie hung up. Harry Fremont called. Caramba!!!—Sheriff's Burglary called him.

It's a make. The Nick Adams swag matched the manifests for six 459's. Six B and E's—all within one mile of Nabob Nick's rent-a-pad.

That's gooooooood. If Nick keeps the cache, he's cooked. Here's what's baaaaad. The Sheriff's lab dutifully dusted the B and E locations. They turned up no viable latents.

I called Bill Parker and tattled the tidings. He said, Sit on it for now. I called Bondage Bob and told him. He said, This Rebel Without a Cause caper is a cause célèbre.

I'm a snitch. I'm a rat fink. I'm an infernal informer. I beat both ends against some malignant middle. And the wide world knows.

I checked my mailbox, midafternoon. I found one piece of paper. Dig this vivid valentine:

> Freddy,
>
> Quit bugging me, okay? It's annoying. I've moved on to greener pastures. I'm a movie star now. I'm not the scuffling kid who used to jack around with you and your stupid band of thugs. Over's over. Quit persisting. It's undignified. Confidential*'s a shitrag, and you're a shitheel for working for it. Over's over. You're passé, bubi. You're not a name I want on my résumé.*

Jimmy, you shitbird cocksucker. I knew you when.*

I bug-eyed bungalow row. I watched my watch. 9:00 p.m. nudged by. Bungalow row remained snoresville. The action accelerated at 9:14.

There's the filthy phalanx. Farshtinkener Führer Nick Ray stridently strides ahead. His Untermenschen unfurl behind him. Jimmy Dean, Nick Adams, Chester Alan Voldrich. The two black-jacket Kameraden from the sorority soiree.

Die Fahne hoch. Die Reihen fest geschlossen—

They're all Afrika Korps tonite. The jumpsuits, the big-billed caps, the Rommelesque regalia. Nick R.'s got his movie camera. We're back at El Alamein, '42. Rommel's resolute. He's readying his raid on the brave British forces.

It's a quivering quick-march. The Kiddie Korps follows their festering father—they goof some goose steps and hop in the Chevy van. Voldrich whips behind the wheel and peels out.

They looped left on Sunset. I looped left and lagged back. I caught cover behind a big bus booming eastbound. I rode the back bumper and kept their back bumper surveilled.

We headed into Hollywood. The bus barged due east. The van vizzed south on Wilton Place. A taco wagon wiggled between us. It was chopped and channeled. It surged, submarineesque. The sassy side panels read LOS INTRUSOS.

The van vipped ahead. I surfed behind the submarine. We're headed southbound and down. Wilton arced into Arlington. We passed Mount Vernon Junior High/aka Mount Vermin. The van angled east at the Jefferson juncture. The tacomobile tooled on south.

I lost my car cover. I dawdled three car lengths back and dug darktown by nite. Something Rodent Robbie Molette said sacked me.

Escalation. Liquor-store 211's. We're at Jefferson and Normandie. It's liquorland lit large—right here, right now.

Telepathy ticked—me to them. Don't read my mind, Menschen—don't cross this line.

The van wriggled to the right lane and crept curbside. I saw the lit-up liquor store window, jarringly just ahead. I whipped wide and nudged up to the north-side curb. The van stopped in front of the store.

Achtung!!!! Raus!!!! Mach schnell!!!!

The six sickos pile out. Nazi Nick's got the camera. Nabob Nick's got a pump shotgun. Jimmy Dean's got a bottle of T-Bird topped with a cotton-wick fuse. It's a sure-as-shit Molotov cocktail.

I froze, I watched, I peeped. I'm a peeper first and forever. Bill Parker told me to intercede and fuck up all felony actions. I didn't. I disobeyed. I sought succor in savagery. I was coldly complicit. I'm all vile volition, and—

They walked into the store. The counter clerk saw them and guuuuulped. Nick Ray rolled film. Chester Voldrich reached behind the counter and tapped the till. The clerk yelped. His mouth moved. I imagined a plaintive please. The two no-name Kameraden hopped the counter and taped his mouth shut.

Voldrich shagged a shelf bottle. He uncorked it and passed it to his putrid pals. Some reflex ripped me. I kept going for a gun I didn't have.

Nick Ray rolled film. No-name Nazi #2 pulled out a Minox minicamera and snapped stills. Jimmy flicked his lighter and lit the Molotov. Nabob Nick pumped his shotgun and blasted the booze shelves.

Glass shattered and sheared. Wino wine and rotgut rye and skunk scotch blew wide. Jimmy tossed the Molotov. It caught the cold cuts case and exploded. Fumes flared and flattened out at the ceiling. Electrical cords caught fire and sparked blue and white.

Smoke smothered my Peepvision view. The clerk ran outside and ran straight out of my frame. Nick's Knights walked out, en masse. They stood studly, six across. They rebel-yelled. They whipped out their whangs and pissed in the street.

MY BOSS BACHELOR PAD

I confessed. I crawled my crib, cruciform. I drank myself draconian and drip-dried my dearly soul. What soul? They could have clipped the clerk and popped some pedestrians. I had to peep it and imprint the images. I'm the Pervdog of the Nite—past all rancid rationale and jacked-up justification.

I confessed to God and Chief William H. Parker. I wrote him a self-defaming memo and had it messengered, posthaste. I read my Bible and ripped right to Revelation:

Anyone with ears to hear should listen and understand….Anyone destined to live by the sword will die by the sword.

That's Nick's Knights, that's me. That's God's conflagration called down on Confidential.

I sat by the phone. I willed Lois to call. She didn't call. I laid the phone in my lap. It rang. I picked up. It wasn't Lois. It was Reptile Robbie Molette.

He blathered. I listened, listless. I was shot to shit and half in the bag.

"…and, Freddy, I figured I should tell you. Nick Ray's over at Googie's right now. He's got a group of his kids in tow, and they're all ragging on you pretty bad."

I hung up. I willed Lois to call. I voodooized the airwaves and tried to make the phone ring. It rang. It wasn't Lois. It was Chief William H. Parker.

He said, "You're absolved, Freddy. We've got those humps on Arson, Assault 1, 211, and six related firearms charges. They're sunk if Ernie Roll and I decide to sink them, and you've proved to me you won't sell me out to Confidential. Get it? You're not a coward or a quisling. You're a shitbird who played it smart for the first time in his life."

I blathered. Parker said, “Shut up, and enjoy your absolution and the rather astonishing fact that I’m starting to like you. And, while I have you, here’s a suggestion. It might be nice if you let Nick Ray and his gang know that they should mind their p’s and q’s.”

Absolution. Parker’s sassy sanction. Dexedrine and strong coffee. I hurtled out of my haze and fumbled out of my funk.

Googie’s was jam-packed. I tamped on my tunnel vision and bebopped in the back door. I saw them, they saw me.

Them:

That giant-ant flick, last year. Giant ants attack L.A. They raise a ruckus and eat good-looking women. I giggled and goofed on it. Freddy O.’s a giant ant.

Them:

Nick Ray, Jimmy Dean, Chester Voldrich. Natalie Wood and Sal Mineo. They’re ensconced in a big booth. They’re slurping massive martinis. Natalie and Sal are underage. It’s a Beverage Control bust.

I adjusted my antennae and ant-ambled over. Don’t fuck with Freddy O., the Giant Ant. The gang ignored me. I popped the olive out of Nick’s drink and noshed it. I went Yum-yum.

Jimmy said, “Get lost. Can’t you read? My days as your sidekick are finito.”

Nick started to stand up. I nabbed his necktie and yanked. It put him face-first in his antipasto. He glug-glugged and heaved. I twisted his tie and held his head there. He flap-flapped his arms.

Natalie giggled. Sal swooned, swishlike. Jimmy played it kool-kat quiescent. The Giant Ant bored him. The shimmy-shimmy shakes gave him away.

I dropped Nick’s necktie. He glug-glugged and blew his bloody nose on his napkin. Chester Voldrich pulled a push-button shiv and popped the blade my way.

He was close. I ratched his wrist and sheared the shiv free. Voldrich yelped. I pinned his hand to the table and stabbed straight through it. Bones broke, blood blew, the blade cracked wood and tore through the tabletop. I put my weight behind it. Voldrich screamed. I pinioned and pyloned him. I crafted a cruciform seal.

Voldrich screamed. I said, “Natalie, pour your drink on his hand.”

Natalie said, "What's my motivation?"

I said, "You're a juvenile delinquent."

Natalie said, "Okay." Natalie poured her drink on his hand.

Chester screamed. His purloined paw got freon-fried and scorchified. He screamed anew. He buckled the table and banged his back against the booth.

Sal said, "I'm a juvenile delinquent." Sal tossed his drink. It rescorchified Chester's hand.

Chester screamed. I shoved a napkin in his mouth and muzzled him. Jimmy's still kool-kat quiescent. Now Nick's putting on his pose.

I'm Freddy O., the Giant Ant. Don't fuck with me.

Maiming mission to mortification. Giant Ant to peeper pariah.

I walked into Frascati. The maître d' moaned. He took me to my table. Dippy diners at adjoining tables moaned and moved away. Waiters whipped up. They plied plates and place settings and rescued the geeks. It's Exodus—let my people go!!!

There's Rock and the girls. Helllllloooo, Janey Blaine.

She's bravura. She's mucho magnifica in a madras shirtdress.

She held out her hand. I bowed and took it. Rock winked. Phyllis rolled her eyes and registered resentment. Come on—it's just a showbiz shuck and another mock marriage. It's Hollywood. Rock's Trippy Triangle!!! Let's lay in for some laffs.

I sat down. Rock motioned for more martinis. I smelled tossed gin on my coat cuffs. It made me moan.

Janey kicked it off. She went for the whammo, straight in.

"Forgive me for being precipitous, but exactly what do I do?"

I lit a cigarette. "You act. You're a Smith girl on the loose in L.A. You meet Rock at a dinner party. It's the Some Enchanted Evening scenario that I know you're acquainted with. Phyllis is with Rock. She's his fiancée, and she doesn't like what she's seeing with you two. I'll script a dinner-table dialogue for you and Phyllis. You'll debate politics and some other things, but it's all a smoke screen to cover the simmering feeling building between you and Rock. That's how it starts. We'll see how the kickoff goes, and we'll take it from there."

Phyllis said, "It's demeaning. It can only go downhill from there, at least in my case."

Rock said, “No heavy petting, Janey. I don’t roll in that direction.”

Janey laffed. Phyllis said, “Not yet you don’t—but we’re working on it.”

The martinis materialized. We took a brief breather and boozed. I scoped Janey, sidelong. I came to cold conclusions.

She’s peremptory. She’s petulant and short-tempered. She gored Phyllis’s goat at the get-go. Let’s define the Tricky Triad. Rock’s the passive putz—but now he’s strictly straight. Phyllis brings the brains and the royal rectitude. Janey is what she is—bait. She’s the torrid temptress who diverts Rock’s idling walk down the aisle.

Janey sipped her martini. “What are you prepared to pay me, and how long will the gig last?”

I said, “Ten thousand. Be prepared for a series of staged encounters, to transpire over a series of months. There’ll be a series of interviews with the celebrity press. Lew Wasserman has pledged a second-tier speaking part in Rock’s next picture. You’ll play the female lead’s bitchy kid sister.”

Janey lit a cigarette. “I’ll upstage her, too. Won’t I, Rock? Or should I start calling you ‘sweetie’?”

Rock said, “Janey’s a pisser. Isn’t she, Freddy?”

I said, “She sure is.”

Phyllis glowered and glared. Hell hath no fury like—

“Just remember who gets him in the long run, dear. Only one of us has the ability to facilitate his conversion, and that’s me. So, in that sense, this tawdry charade of ours does reflect reality.”

Rock said, “Keep referring to me in the third person. It sends me.”

Janey crushed her cigarette. “I can tell you’re quite accomplished when it comes to losing men, Phyllis.”

“Let’s just say I’m more practiced than you in general, dear. For instance, Freddy and I made out in a crowded coffee shop, not that long ago—and I would have slept with him, if he’d asked.”

Janey said, “Freddy, you’re a dog.”

I said, “Woof, woof.”

Rock high-signed me. I moved Janey’s purse out of the way and pulled my chair close. Rock chaired in close.

“I’m coming out of that haze I was in when you got me out of jail. I’m remembering some things that happened at Nick Adams’ place.”

“Such as?”

“Such as arc lights. And, you remember that guy who I said was there with Nick?”

"Yeah, I do."

"Well, now I remember him touching me—if you catch my drift. And he was babbling something about Jimmy Dean playing Caryl Chessman."

It vibed blackmail/smut smear/cold-cocked Rock and some Nick's Knights perv. Some filthy-film fandango. That equals Extortion 1. Bill Parker would dig it. Rebel Without a Cause. The derogatory profile expands. Plus—Caryl Chessman, again.

A waiter passed me a message slip. I unfolded it.

Freddy,

We traced the calls. She's calling from a booth at Wilshire and Mariposa. It's behind Dale's Secret Harbor.

All best,
Nasty Nat

I stood up. I grabbed the flowers out of the centerpiece and wrapped my napkin around the stems.

Rock said, "Freddy's leaving. I'll bet he's got a hot date."

The girls ignored us. They chitchatted and heaped on the hate.

—

Lois Nettleton at twenty-seven. Here she is, the first time I saw her.

I parked in the lot behind Dale's Secret Harbor. The booth stood by the back door. She talked to the phone. A booth bulb shined down and shimmered her. She's boldly backlit by nite.

She's lithe. Lissome, yeah—I figured that from her foto and film clip. She runs rangy but not tall. Her hair's red running to blond. She's unadorned. She goes to gaunt. It's that timeless tomboy gestalt. She's got bleached-blue eyes. They connote kulture-kooky and crazy. They confirm our fone-call contact. She works for effect, she shears short of contrived.

I walked up to the booth. Lois saw me. She cracked the door and smiled. She saw the flowers and stage-swooned. She said, "Nat, I have to go," and hung up.

I handed her the flowers. She said, "Freddy, you shouldn't have." Her bleached-blue eyes bounced. They were set too close together. They marred her good looks and served up her soul.

She'd leased a cool casita at the Chapman Park Hotel. It was a white stucco job with a tiled terrace. A green-brown walkway wound down to Wilshire. Stray headlights strafed skyscrapers and smart storefronts.

We sat on a serape-print swing. Room service sent lobster salads and white wine by. Lois wore a shift dress and a sheer cardigan. We laid our feet on a long ottoman. Lois had knobby knees. I dug that.

I said, "What if Miss Bel Geddes gets pneumonia? You'll be out here with me, brooding on you know who, and you'll blow your big break."

Lois twirled her ashtray. "Barbara will never let herself get sick. It's one reason why I scheduled the trip when I did. And you shouldn't be shy about saying his name. It's Caryl Whittier Chessman."

I twirled my ashtray. "What's another reason?"

"He has a court appearance coming up. I thought I might stand outside the Hall of Justice and hex the son of a bitch."

I stretched and plopped my feet close to Lois. She scooched close and bumped her feet up against mine. She wore ungainly lace oxfords. I dug that.

"There's a weird confluence going on, with that hump Chessman in the middle. First, you show up and start tweaking the magazine, and yours truly. Second, I get embroiled with some cop pals of mine and the magazine, as they pertain to this movie that my ex–boon companion, James Dean, is filming right now. I've been informed that Nick Ray has been urging Jimmy to play Chessman in some sort of biopic that he's got his hat set on making."

Lois lit a cigarette. "Jimmy's a shit. I knew him in New York, and I didn't like him. If he plays Chessman and portrays him as anything other than the evil bastard he is, I'll hex him with Aunt Lois' you-will-die-young hex, and he'll go tits up in some sort of embarrassing leather-bar altercation."

I laffed loud and lewd. Lois laffed loud and lewd and laced up our fingers.

"I might have a shot at interviewing Chessman, while he's in L.A. My pals the DA and police chief have okayed it, provisionally. Would you like to be there?"

Lois crossed herself. "As God is my witness."

I crossed myself. "Then you shall be."

Music meandered and wafted over Wilshire. The Ambassador Hotel and the Coconut Grove were close by. I heard “How High the Moon” and looked up. Moonbeams stirred stars, all across the sky.

“Freddy, the mystic. Penny for your thoughts.”

“I’m wondering how you’d summarize this whole Chessman deal of yours.”

“I’d call it the central moment of my life, even though I wasn’t there for the outrage.”

I looked at Lois. “I’ll buy that. I’m also wondering if you’ll let me kiss you good night.”

Lois said, “I haven’t decided yet.”

MY BOSS BACHELOR PAD

West Holly*weird*

5/18/55

Fone rings raked me and drilled through a dream. I was the Giant Ant, once again. I wrangled the receiver and scoped the nitestand clock. It read 8:12 a.m.

I said, "This is Otash."

A man said, "It's Jack, Freddy. Don't ask questions, just get out here, immediately."

It was Jack. He came off panic-pounced and scream-screechy. I said, "I'll roll now."

I rolled, rapidamente. I hit the Beverly Hills Hotel in one hard heartbeat. I ran through the lobby and out to Jack's bungalow. I banged the door. Jack opened up.

And stood stunned-o. In his tattered tartan skivvies. Note his dumb-dunce demeanor. Dig his dilated eyes. He's on some pillhead pilgrimage. He's Mongo Lloyd, late of the loony bin. He's broiled off brain cells by the billions. He's holding a wet washcloth.

"What are you doing, Jack?"

"I'm wiping fingerprints off the walls. That way, they'll think she hasn't been here. I sprinkled cornflakes all over the bedroom floor, so if they come in the back way, I'll hear them."

I stepped inside and shut the door. I double-bolted it. A table radio rumbled. I switched it off.

"Who's 'she' and who's 'they,' Jack? Lay it out slow."

Jack said, "I stripped the bed and sent the sheets to the laundry. I pulled two of her hairs off my hairbrush and flushed the butts she smoked down the toilet. Nobody saw her enter or leave. She hid in the bedroom when room service came. I'm a pro at this kind of thing, so

—”

I slapped him, hard. Once, twice, three times. I raised red welts and blood dots. I grabbed his pencil neck and pinned him to the wall.

“Tell me what this is. Tell me who ‘she’ and ‘they’ are.”

Jack trembled and trickled tears. I hankie-wiped his face and put my hand over his heart. His pulse popped to two hundred plus. His skivvies drooped, sweat-wet.

“This call girl. Janey something. She spent the night before last here. They found her body this morning. It was on the early news. She was dumped, off of Mulholland and Beverly Glen.”

Shattering shit fuck. Jack the K., off to Shaft City. Robbie Molette’s cold-complicit. He pimped Janey to Jack. Adieu, Janey. No bait-girl gig for you.

I pulled pills from my pockets. Jack gob-gobbled them. He’d pass out, pacified. He’d wake up goosed out of his gourd.

“Clean up the cornflakes, and stop wiping the walls. Call Jerry Geisler and tell him the truth. Tell Jerry to call Ernie Roll, and I’ll call Bill Parker. We’ll hang a shroud on this deal and make sure you don’t get hurt.”

Jack said, “You’re a pal, Freddy. I knew you’d come through.”

Nothing’s free, rich boy. The ticket’s fifty g’s at the get. The PD’s payoff goes up from there. Parker’s got his eye on the FBI. It’s common drift. Gay Edgar Hoover hates you. This could be gooooooooood.

Jack weaved to the bedroom. Cornflakes crunched underfoot. He collapsed on the bed and burrowed under the covers. Muffled snores drifted up.

Fifty g’s. Lois and me. A madcap month in Montego Bay, Jamaica. Last nite’s kiss multiplied mucho million times. I’ll slip some bad bacillus in Barb Bel Geddes’ coffee. Lois will revise and reprise her role and bring Broadway to its knees. We’ll jump to Jamaica on Cat’s closing nite. And, in the meantime, we’ve got Manhattan.

I popped to the porte cochere. I’d conked Jack comatose. I should call Parker and Ernie Roll and jump-start this. The valet saw me. I saw my Packard pimpmobile. Four big men lounged upside it.

Ever yours—the Hat Squad.

I walked up, slooooooow. The Giant Ant ankles, acquiescent.

Max Herman said, “Hi, Freddy.”

Red Stromwall said, “How’s Senator Jack, Freddy?”

Harry Crowder said, “Too bad about Miss Blaine, Freddy.”

Eddie Benson said, “We found your prints on Miss Blaine’s purse, Freddy. The Chief would like to discuss that with you.”

—

City Hall. The Demon DB. Sweatbox #3. The Hats held me hostage in the hot seat. We’ve been here before.

The bolted-down table. The bolted-down chair. The ashtray. The fat phone book. It’s the you-will-confess confessional.

The Hats straddled chairs. I kicked my chair back. Max passed out cigarettes. Red revealed his flask. It made the rounds. We took two pops each.

Red went aaahhh. “Breakfast of champions.”

Max said, “Explain your prints on Miss Blaine’s purse.”

“I had drinks with her last night, but I left early. I moved her purse out of the way.”

Harry said, “Where, when, and who else was there?”

I said, “Frascati, in Beverly Hills. It was a ten p.m. wingding. The other guests were Rock Hudson and his fiancée, Phyllis Gates.”

Eddie said, “Rock’s a fag. Don’t tell me—you were cooking up some ruse for the magazine.”

“That’s right. I brought the Blaine girl in as the bait.”

Max said, “Why’d you leave early?”

“I had a date.”

Harry said, “Where, when, and who with?”

“About eleven-thirty. The Chapman Park Hotel. A woman named Lois Nettleton.”

“How long were you with Miss Nettleton?”

“Until two a.m.”

Harry sighed. “If the alibi is kosher, it clears you.”

Max sighed. “We should bring Freddy up to date.”

Red sighed. “Freddy deserves to be updated.”

Harry lit a cigarette. “We’ve had you spot-tailed from the moment the Chief signed you up for his Confidential caper.”

Eddie twirled the flask. “For example, I saw your outburst at Googie's last night. Voldrich lost two pints of blood and went into shock. I stiffed the call to Queen of Angels. Voldrich is a noted sack of shit, so I told the dispatcher to dawdle."

I laffed. "Give me the particulars on Janey."

Red checked his notebook. "It's rape and manual strangulation. The TOD is one a.m. She was dumped on Lindell Street, at the foot of the Mulholland embankment, right off Beverly Glen. It looks like she was killed in the bushes and dumped from there. A dog walker found her at four-fifteen. It made the a.m. Herald by a rat's snatch-hair margin. Doc Curphey's doing the autopsy now."

I point-by-point parsed it. She might have stayed late with Rock and Phyllis. She cabbed to Frascati or took her own car. She knew the guy. She tricked with the guy. It all went bitching baaaad.

"Vehicle at the scene? Did she have a car? Tracks in the dirt up on Mulholland or down at the dump site?"

Harry checked his notebook. "No vehicle at the scene, that we know of. We'll be running the canvass in an hour or so. She owned a '50 Buick Super, which is parked in the driveway of this little house she rented in Culver City. We've run the cab logs already. There were no drop-offs or pickups at Frascati from eight p.m. on."

I pondered it. Harry said, "You were spot-tailed the night of the fund-raiser. In case you didn't know, the public places at the hotel are riddled with surveillance ports, so I was able to observe you, Senator Kennedy, and Miss Blaine—which, in retrospect, looks like a staged-date sort of deal. BHPD, by the way, has a roust sheet on Miss Blaine. She was soliciting at the bar at the Beverly Wilshire."

Max sighed. "You see what we've got, Freddy. The big question is, who hipped you to the Blaine girl and got this whole thing going?"

Eddie slid the flask over. I glug-glugged, deep-deep.

"You won't believe it, but I'll tell you anyway. It was that little dipshit, Robbie Molette, that you rousted on my Art Pepper gig. He's a busboy at the hotel, and his old man's a wage slave at Metro. He's recruited some contract girls at the studio, and Robbie's peddling them to the guests at the hotel, along with his other jive criminal enterprises."

Max said, "Holy shit. That jerkoff."

Red said, "Nice family. Daddy and junior peddle poon, and Robbie sells nudie pix of his own sister."

Harry said, "And, he sells maryjane to all the hophead kids working on film shoots. Remember? He revealed that when we were squeezing him, last week."

Eddie said, "Including Rebel Without a Cause, which Freddy knows all about, because the Chief's got him working up a derogatory profile on that lox, and I myself saw him bird-dogging the parking lot by the observatory, while they were shooting there."

Spot tails. Enterprising entrapment. I'm keestered every which way. Chief William H. Parker. Accept no substitutes.

I said, "Here's a word to the wise. Anything pertaining to that movie should go from the Chief, to me, and me to you. Robbie's dirty, sure—and dirty as far as that flick goes. I'm just making sure that this work I'm doing for the Chief doesn't get trampled on."

Max sneered. "And I'm sure the same goes for Senator Kennedy, when and if we clear him on the Blaine job."

Harry scoffed. "The Molette kid is pushing ass to a U.S. senator. I still find it hard to believe."

Red moaned. "We're buried on Fat Boy Mazmanian, and now we get reburied on this Blaine deal. Give us a ray of hope, Freddy. Tell us she confided in you, and you know all about her private life."

I sucked the flask. "Nix. Robbie set the senator up with her, and I just met her last night. It's a big canvass and known-associates job, when you'd rather be putting that Mazmanian shit in the ground."

Red laffed. "Es la verdad, junior."

I buzzed Harry. "Okay, you spot-tailed me at the fund-raiser. You were on the premises at the hotel. You observed the senator and Janey, so you kept your eyes open. I'm wondering if you noted anything inconsistent while you were there."

Harry shrugged. "Some unruly news photographers, outside the main lobby. At least one guy got loose and started shooting pictures through that big window that looks out on the porte cochere. A BHPD guy told me there were a couple of dozen dumped flashbulbs on the ground where he was standing."

Somebody knock-knocked the door. The Hats stood up, rapidamente. Bill Parker walked in. The Hats walked out. It took point-one-two fucking seconds.

Parker straddled a chair. "The senator brought in Jerry Geisler. Jerry called Ernie Roll. Ernie sent Miller Leavy over to take the senator's deposition. It appears as if the senator was indisposed with a second call girl while the first call girl was being raped and murdered, which clears him for Doc Curphey's presumed time of death. The second call girl has confirmed the senator's assertion that they were together at the senator's bungalow from eleven p.m. to four a.m., which handily covers all possible estimated times of death. Inexplicably, the senator wants you on this job. I don't know why, and I don't care. I am acceding to the senator's request, and I forbid you to utilize your dubious influence with the senator to in any way derail my incursion against Confidential. You will also deploy your goon squad and have them make every effort to dissuade newspaper, TV, and radio reporters from publicizing the murder of Miss Janey Blaine. Per that purported homicide, Doc Curphey has revised his first estimate of Miss Blaine's cause of death. He has officially announced that Miss Blaine died of injuries sustained by a fall from the Mulholland Drive embankment. Are you following me so far?"

I cracked my knuckles. "I am, sir."

Parker lit a cigarette. "Ernie Roll wants you to work with the Hats. He's issuing you DA's Bureau credentials and swearing you in as a special deputy. This will pave the way for you to legally contact municipal, state, and Federal agencies and request records checks on each and every member of the cast and crew of Rebel Without a Cause. I am, of course, aware that the disreputable Robbie Molette sells drugs to them, and I am painfully aware that young Robbie pimped Miss Blaine to Senator Kennedy. I want you to compile dossiers on any and all members of the Rebel gang. This will assist you in preparing Confidential's smear job on the movie, and assist me in assessing the derogatory profile that you are preparing for my eyes only. It will also, dare I say, assist you and the Hats in your sub rosa efforts to seek justice in the matter of your dear lost bait girl, Miss Blaine. Are you following me so far?"

I follow, boss. Find the guy. Kill him. Buttress Doc Curphey's bullshit. Janey fell off a high hill.

"I follow, sir."

Parker dry-popped digitalis. He chained Chesterfields and chased it. He smoke-smacked Sweatbox #3, wall to wall.

"Concludingly, I want you to compile a derogatory profile on Senator Kennedy himself. I may direct you to publish your findings in Confidential. There's been talk that the senator may be tapped as Governor Stevenson's running mate next year. It might be just the right time for an in-depth smear."

William H. Parker. Accept no substitutes.

I parked my Packard pimpmobile in the City Hall basement. Back stairs bopped me down there. I saw Jack the K.'s Lincoln limo by the cop-car slots. The back doors were whipped wide. Roof lights lit the ripe rendezvous.

Jack, Ernie Roll, Bill Parker. There's a backseat bar and Baccarat decanters. Jack served drinks.

Fluorescent tubes ghoul-glared and lit the whole basement. I slid behind my sled and peeped the confab.

Jack sucked up to Bill and Ernie. Bill and Ernie sucked up to Jack. They all sucked scotch and nailed that noon glow. Jack said he'd cadge a case of Cointreau and send it to Coroner Curphey. His postmortem postulations pulled them out of the shit.

Parker said, "Especially you, Senator."

Jack said, "Call me Jack."

Ernie said, "We're white men, Jack. Don't expect us to start calling chits in the second you land in Washington."

Jack said, "Ouch."

Parker said, "You feel bad about the girl, don't you?"

Jack lit a cigar. "I do. And, frankly, I'd like to see each and every conceivable loose end tied up, as well as see her avenged in some sort of clandestine and never-to-be-revealed manner."

Ernie said, "You won't be disappointed, Jack."

Parker said, "The Hats are good at that sort of thing. Freddy Otash isn't bad, either."

Jack said, "I rue the day I met Freddy. I don't think a case of booze will express the proper thank-yous for the Dutch uncle talk he had with me, as well as kick that cocksucker out of my life forever."

Parker lit a cigar. He blew smoke rings. The aroma dispersed and sweet-swacked me. Aaahhh, Cuba. It's a puppet regime. We've got our mob mascots making mad money. They grease Democrats and Republicans, fifty-fifty. Jack and half the House heels take tastes.

Jack said, "Batista's got a pet shark named Himmler. He lives in a big swimming pool, behind the presidential palace. Himmler eats Commie dissidents. Batista's goons toss them in the pool, and Himmler goes to town. Lyndon Johnson told me it's a show you don't want to miss."

Ernie said, "Forget about this whole damn boondoggle, Jack. We'll take care of it."

Parker said, "We've got resources, and we're not afraid to break a few rules."

Jack said, "Bury it. I don't want to know the whos, whats, and whys. She was just another girl, right? Maybe I'll run into her again someday."

Dusk. A meandering moon cleared away clouds and starlit chez Lois. We swung on the swing and held hands. Lois wore a cord skirt and a blouse like Shirley wore that night.

"I know what you're thinking. You're thinking how deep it goes with me, and that I'm a nutty actress who works out her motivation by assuming persona, because her persona is a drag, and that's what convinced her to become an actress in the first place."

I went nix. Lois laid a hand on my leg.

"You were kid roommates. You shared a cheap pad down in the West Twenties. It was just after the war, and things were exciting. Kid friendships are powerful. You can't let go of Shirley, and there's no reason why you should."

Lois burrowed into me. "You're right about that. And you know just what to say to defuse me. I hardly know you, but I know you've been looking wan, because Chessman's appeal has been postponed, and you know I'll be going back to New York soon, so what happens next?"

I tilted her chin up. I kissed her hair and caught almond shampoo.

"I'm not letting this go."

"Yes, but what will you do about it?"

I prickled. "Is this the part where you reveal that you contrived to meet me, because you knew Chessman would be out here, and I spent five minutes with Shirley, and you like to create drama, and you sure like to chase men while you're at it."

Lois slapped me. I let her. She slapped me again. I caught her hand and kissed her fingers as the slap hit. She cried a little. I kissed her neck and brushed tears back.

She said, "I need you to do things that I can't do. I don't know exactly what they are, but I need you to do something."

I said, "I'm putting together a smear piece on Nick Ray, Jimmy Dean, and Rebel. I've got special deputy status on a cop job that ties in, and I stiffed a call to the mail-room boss up at Quentin. Nicholas

Ray and James Dean are approved correspondents of Chessman's, so I think the rumor that Jimmy and Nick want to make the movie about him are probably true."

Lois tugged my hair. We bumped foreheads. Our eyes locked too close in. We pulled back and found the fit.

"Let me explain something to you. I suck up to certain men and lean on certain men, and it's how I cull favors. I'll put the two of us in a room with Chessman, if I can keep culling favors with the guys who can make it happen, which will sure as shit serve to make it happen."

Lois said, "If James Dean plays Caryl Chessman, it will result in a publicity blitz that will serve to guarantee his exoneration. I don't want that to happen, and I want you to do something bold and brave and more than a little bit stupid, because that's the type of man I throw myself at."

A light rain kicked on. Lois pulled the serape spread around us. I ran my hand under her blouse and touched her bare back.

"Don't leave me, because you can't see beyond this Chessman deal. It's a drama, so it's half-assed unreal at the gate. Don't leave me, period, because I don't want to lose you."

Lois threw herself at me. I convinced her I was bold, brave, and stupid. We stretched out and gassed on the storm.

—

Rain.

Torrents tidal-waved the terrace. Puddles popped and soaked the serape. We swung off the swing and collided inside to bed.

We shivered and shucked our duds. We didn't do it. We got nuke-bomb nude and dove under the duvet. Wide windows gave us Wilshire by nite. Buses stirred and streaked water high-high. Rain racked the roof. We posed on pillows and whispered under the racket. We kissed and touched each other top to bottom and went back to words.

I spilled. I savagely self-defamed. I confessed. I laid out Bill Parker's crusade to crush Confidential. Lois called me a crazed crusader. It impelled me to impolitic discourse. I laid myself out as one servile serf. I dodged overseas duty. Men I pounded to perfection at Parris Island got Jap-juked on Saipan. I described the Johnnie Ray debacle as the nightmare nadir of my life. I ran through my Rebel wrangles and deliriously delivered everything that they did and I did. I ran down the Janey Blaine/Robbie Molette/Jack the K. conundrum and the official hoax to obfuscate Janey's cause of death. We played to Jack's vile vanity. He wanted the killer killed. Who killed Janey Blaine? Five of us were determined to traffic the truth, even as we assailed it as the penance pose of a hotshot politician too hot to touch. Say we catch the killer? It's devil take the hindmost, then.

And, per Caryl Chessman? What will I do about it? I'll think of something. What will it cost me? I don't know—but the price will be high.

Lois told me stories. Bond drives and beauty pageants in Chicago. New York and acting gigs. This scurvy schizophrenia, the Too Many Bedrooms Blues. Too many weak men with shaky psyches. All of them actors. All too-too temperamental and so-so sadistic, all of it aimed straight at You.

Freddy, I could tell you stories. Darling, you already have. I knew you'd have stories like the ones you told me. I think it's why I set out to find you. You're a dear heart, Lois. No, I'm just your midnight caller. Lucky for me you picked up the phone.

We fell asleep about then. The last thing I recall is the rain.

SUB ROSA INVESTIGATION (187 PC)

Jane Margaret Blaine (White Female American)
DOB: 4-19-29/Visalia, California
Personnel assigned: Sgt. M. Herman, Sgt. R. Stromwall, Sgt. H. Crowder, Det. E. Benson, Spec. Dep. F. Otash
5/18–5/21/55

The Hats and me. Full-fledged partners. One rich run at the roses. We reckoned we could race three full days. Max had a cousin in Bremerhaven, Germany. He worked at a pharmaceutical facility. They manufactured Pervitrol. It was a loopy lozenge that *max*imized merriment and once drove the Wehrmacht Tank Korps to pound Poland to pulp in record time. Anschluss!!! Blitzkreig!!! We rendezvoused at Stan's Drive-In. Comely carhops hopped us pineapple malts laced with 151 rum. We popped Pervitrol and particularized our *werk*load.

We ran through our records checks to date. Dig: Janey Blaine dropped out of Visalia J.C. Her Smith–Bryn Mawr credentials were shucksville. She looked it, she didn't earn it. Dig: her phone records came through threadbare. She buzzed mom and dad in Visalia and Robbie Molette. That's it—sadly solamente.

We ran Robbie's records. He had his own line listed at mom and dad's Highland Park hutch. Dig: Robbie called Janey and the fourteen other call girls listed in his merchandise book. Harry braced the security boss at Metro. The boss vouched the names. He roundly ratted out Rodent Robert J. Molette, Sr. He'd been instigating ingénues into the call girl arts since '49. He told Harry he'd have a damning dossier for them soon. We returned to Robbie's records. Re-dig: Robbie called Nick Ray, Nick Adams, Jimmy Dean, Chester Voldrich, and Nick Knight Arvo Jandine. Arvo was the so-called unit fotog at the liquor-store job.

We discussed the Robbie senior and junior jihad. We agreed: senior would seize a lizardesque lawyer, faaaast. We agreed: we'll hardnose

Robbie and get him to give daddy up. I reported on my records checks. I lamentedly left Lois for a 3:00 a.m. to 8:00 a.m. fone stint. I ran the Rebel rascals and supply supplanted my existing records checks. Now, hear this:

Nick Ray's under subpoena from State and Fed HUAC. He ran Comintern-financed front groups, '42–'43. Among them: the Hollywood Committee for Artistic Freedom, the People's Party to Resist Censorship, and the Hands-Off Comrade Stalin Committee. Max interjected: he talked to a Sheriff's Burglary bull this a.m. Bingo, baby: the noxious numbers on Nick Adams' swag matched two recent 459 lots. We agreed: we'll haul him in and bat him around till he bitch-squeals.

I returned to my Rebel checks. It was all junk juvie shit—Arvo Jandine's excepted.

He was a whipout man. He tossed his tool during daring girls' locker room gambols. He hit Pasteur Jr. High, Nightingale Jr. High, Le Conte Jr. High, Foshay Jr. High, and Audubon Jr. High. We all agreed: this cocksucker mandates consideration.

Eddie reported per the crime-lab crucible. Dig: the rape-o/presumed killer was a savage secretor. Ray Pinker typed his blood, off his putrid payload. It's AB negative. Jammed upside Janey's body: plasticene and foam fabrics. Car seat-cover shit. Bad news here: said shit was indigenous to Mercs, Buicks, and Pontiacs, produced between '51 and '54. We all groooaned. That meant mucho millions of cars. It came down to this: we had to check all indigenous makes and models per our suspect pool.

Cars. This banged our bells per a big issue. How did Janey get up to Mulholland and Beverly Glen? She had no car. She called no cab. Rock and Phyllis didn't drop her. She didn't wait outside Frascati. Ergo: somebody picked her up near the restaurant.

It's in Beverly Hills. It's a short hill hop up Beverly Glen to Mulholland. It all came down to Janey's tricks, past and present. It all came down to Robbie Molette and whether or not Janey worked freelance.

Eddie riffed on the crime-scene canvass. It boded bupkes—nobody saw shit. Ray Pinker noted drag marks at the foot of Beverly Glen and the embankment. This indicated one suspect, pulling upward. A West L.A. squadroom dick disagreed. He studied a bunch of crushed leaves. They indicated two suspects, dragging Janey down that embankment. Per toxicology: Janey had a big booze load in her system. No shit: she sheared down martinis and most likely wine at Frascati. Yeah, and she gobbled or was force-fed four Seconol. Ray called her comatose at her TOD.

Max said, “I’m bored. Let’s go get Robbie. Freddy and Eddie, you come with me.”

Harry said, “We’ve got leads on Fat Boy I’d like to check out.”

Red said, “Nix. You and I will go pick up Adams. The Sheriff’s bull said we could have first dibs.”

I guuuullped. Jimmy was Nick A.’s 459 accomplice. I failed to mention that—

We strode in strong. Max, Eddie, and me. We’re overzealous. It’s overkill. We’re raiding the Beverly Hills Hotel kitchen.

We went in the employees’ entrance. We staged a stir. We eyeball-orbed for Reptile Robbie. It’s no sale, papacito.

Max braced the crew chief. El Jefe said Robbie was up by the bungalows. He had four breakfasts to clear.

We bopped back there. We saw Robbie’s pushcart. Max and Eddie snarfed left-behind bacon and home fries. Robbie bopped out of a bungalow. He lugged leftovers off lox plates and dirty dishes. He saw us and went Oh shit.

He dumped his dish debris and went all punk passive. He shuddered and moved meek and mild. We tossed him in our K-car and drove him straight downtown.

Max and Eddie sat up front. Robbie and I hogged the backseat.

Robbie said, “It’s about Janey, right?”

Max said, “Robbie’s wising up.”

Robbie said, “I’m just letting you know in advance that I plan to cooperate. I’m looking to avoid a thumping like the one you put on me last time.”

Eddie said, “Tell him, Freddy.”

I said, “You’ve got two choices here, junior. You give up your dad’s girl biz, or I put the hurt on you myself.”

Robbie’s dentures dipped out. I dipped them back in. Max said, “He gets the picture. His family life as he knows it has just gone pffft.”

We drove downtown. We hauled him up to the DB and sweatbox row. Red radioed in. He said he and Harry just nabbed Nick Adams.

Nick got bad-boy belligerent. They kicked his ass and sapped some sense into him.

We ensconced Robbie in Sweatbox #2. Max bought him a candy bar and a Coke. Box 3 was reserved for Nick Adams.

Eddie said, “I turned the hall speakers on. The Chief wants to observe.”

Robbie noshed his Nougat Deelite and chugged his Coke. Max, Eddie, and I straddled chairs. Robbie sat sidesaddle. He’s a passive putz. He’s here to help. He’s a fellow rat. Who do I have to betray to leave here unthumped?

Max said, “You’ve got your girl biz and your dope biz. Your dad runs the girl biz. He recruits, and you peddle the tail, exclusively at the hotel. You run the dope biz on your own, and you sell maryjane and pills to dickheads on film shoots. You suck up to film-biz guests at the hotel, and develop leads on the shoots in that manner.”

Robbie said, “Right with Eversharp.”

Eddie said, “For the record, did you kill Janey Blaine, or know who did?”

Robbie said, “No.”

I said, “What’s your best guess?”

Robbie glugged Coca-Cola. “I read the Herald. They said Janey left the restaurant alone. That means she’s on the hoof, alone, in deserted Beverly Hills at midnight. She left her car at home. Maybe she was meeting someone, maybe she got picked up. Here’s an insight. Janey was avaricious. Maybe a guy picked her up, and she sensed his interest. She offered him some snout for fifty clams, and it got all tangled up, and poor Janey got 86’d.”

Eddie said, “Give up your dad. For the record. Let’s get it out of the way.”

Robbie scratched his balls. “For the record, my dad has been exploiting his job as a grip at Metro for the purpose of recruiting wholesome, Ivy League–looking ingénue snatch, for the purpose of turning them as call girls, for a fifty-fifty split. He’s been pulling this shit since ’49. Before you ask, I’ll tell you he doesn’t keep a trick book or a girl book. He keeps it all in his head.”

Eddie said, “Describe his relationship with Janey Blaine.”

Robbie picked his nose. “He recruited her. That means he made her strip, and he poked her, one time only. He didn’t kill her. That’s ridiculous. He never leaves the house at night. He’s got home cooking, anytime he wants it—and he always wants it. My mom and my sister keep him well supplied."

Max said, "Tricks harassing Janey. What have you heard about that?"

Robbie said, "Zilch. And that goes for all my girls. They work a high-class clientele, strictly at the hotel."

I said, "Your dad doesn't keep a trick book or a girl book. But you keep a picture book—because I've seen it. Here's the question. Did Janey keep a trick book?"

Robbie licked his fingers. Yum, yum—Nougat Deelite.

"I don't know, but here's something you should know. I keep a trick list in my room at the house. Specifically, all the big-name guys who put the boots to my girls, and here's the rub. My room got burgled a few days ago. Shit was subtly out of place when I got home, and the trick list was gone. Lucky for you, I had the list memorized."

Max yukked. Robbie Molette. Accept no substitutes.

"Give us a preview. You can reconstruct the list on paper, later on."

Robbie rescratched his balls. "Besides our pal Senator Kennedy, we've got Senators Johnson, Knowland, Smathers, Humphrey, and Governor Stevenson, who likes boys, but my biz don't fly that route. We've also got Ike's chief of staff, Sherman Adams, DA Ernie Roll, Louis B. Mayer, Lew Wasserman, Jack L. Warner, and Darryl F. Zanuck. Not to mention Clark Gable, Gary Cooper, Van Heflin, and that froggy guy, Yves Montand."

Eddie went Oooh-la-la. Max whistled. My first thought: BLACKMAIL. Big-name men/call girls/some clumsy first approach. A list on paper? Prememorized names? It read AMATEUR NITE.

I tossed a tight changeup. "The Rebel shoot. Has anyone on it expressed interest in Janey or your other girls? The cast and crew are nothing but pervs and shitbirds. It's a suspect pool we should explore."

Robbie made the jack-off sign. "Nobody on the shoot knows about Janey or my other girls. I keep my two business worlds separate and compartmentalized. And, as far as Rebel Without a Cause goes, the shoot's wrapping on the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth. I'll keep my ear down for you, but I've got to make one final haul off those weirdos, because once they go into postproduction, I'll never see any of them again."

Max said, "The Democratic fund-raiser. You were bussing tables there, so you saw your 'Some Enchanted Evening' scene play out. Here's what interests me. Were there any unusual occurrences outside of that that you can think of?"

Robbie dry-drained his Coke. "Not really. Some stray paparazzi guy got loose and started shooting pix through an uncurtained window, and me and Manuel, this other busboy, got tapped to pick up all these used flashbulbs where he was shooting."

I said, "We know that Nick Ray and Jimmy Dean have been talking up a Caryl Chessman flick. What else have you heard about that? The whole deal sounds unsavory to me."

Robbie shrugged. "Nick Ray and Jimmy Dean are unsavory. The whole biz is unsavory. Chessman's headed for the green room. If movie folks are gabbing up Chessman, it's just that he's a hot topic these days."

The wall speaker sparked. Bill Parker said, "Otash, get out here."

I walked out. Parker passed me his flask. I gargled Old Overholt and lit a cigarette.

Parker said, "The shoot's closing down. I'm thinking we should recruit Robbie and do a big dope raid. It would do the magazine good in the short term, and we should net a variety of leads on a variety of criminal matters out of it."

I said, "I agree."

Parker went scoot. We popped down to Sweatbox #3 and peeped the wall window. There's Nick Adams. He looks phone-booked and fit to be tied. Note the blossoming bloody nose and torn earlobe.

Parker said, "He confessed to the burglaries, and he gave up your friend Jimmy Dean as his accomplice. Red and Harry are out shagging him now. It may take a while. They're chasing a hot lead on Fat Boy Mazmanian, too."

I made the gimme sign. Parker passed his flask. I glug-glugged and got that glow.

"We've got the confession on Adams, Chief. That will stand up in court, and who knows what you'll get from Jimmy. But we need to cut them loose, so they'll be there if we run that dope raid."

Parker popped digitalis. Straight, no chaser. Gas on his glow.

"You've been saying 'we,' Freddy. I find that encouraging."

"I'm starting to think like a cop again, sir."

"Anything else before you go?"

"Yes, sir. Tell Red and Harry to give Jimmy a good thumping."

I soloed out to Culver City. My peeper penchant popped me out there. Pervdog, peeper, priapic pad prowler. You're a clue clown on a biiiiiiig case. Let's toss Janey Blaine's pad. Let's lay it low and look for leads. Let's sniff her panties while we're at it.

It was 1:00 p.m. I stopped at a pay phone and called my service. I had one message: "Call Mr. Kennedy at his hotel."

I did it. A stooge picked up. He asked me to drop by at 3:00 today. I said I'd be there.

To extort your boss, fucker. Ring-a-ding-ding!!!!

I found chez Janey. It was a peach stucco cube job off of Motor Avenue. Her '50 Buick was gone. The West L.A. dicks impounded it, posthomicide. A first-rate forensic revealed zero and zilch. West L.A. left the case then. The Otash-Hats combine caught the duty. The pad was pristine to prowl.

I pinned my badge to my suit coat. It added official ooomph. I walked up and keestered the keyhole. Pick #6 worked. The door popped. I locked myself in.

The living room was squaresville meets hipsville. Persnickety Persian carpets and nifty Naugahyde chairs. The kitchen featured a gas range/Frigidaire combo. The fridge featured TV dinners and Tovarich vodka. Tovarich was high-test and cut-rate. Janey was jacked on the juice. She was a secret sauce hound. That's Clue #1.

I hit the bathroom. It was tidy, turquoise-tiled, and crawl-in cramped. I checked the medicine cabinet. Aaahhh—here's some good shit.

A diaphragm. A big box of cornstarch. Vivid vials of biphetamine and Nembutal. I popped two of Janey's biphetamine. Let's bond, baby doll.

I hit the bedroom. It was squaresville squared. The de rigueur ratty carpets. The small slipcovered bed. A small four-drawer desk. A matching four-door dresser. Cheap Picasso prints on the walls.

The desk blotter. It's a clue clown/pad-toss classic. Check it out. Catch some light and look low.

Jawohl. It's crisscross indented. There's cursive marks all over it. Janey wrote loose-leaf letters and pressed her pen hard. Shit—no legible words leaped out.

I rifled the desk drawers. An inconsistency inflamed me. They were all bare-bones empty. No pens, no paper, no envelopes. The wood had been washcloth-wiped. That meant print eradication. The gradations of grain gave it away. The light grain was dry, the dark grain was damp.

The desk had been tossed. The contents were picked clean. The thief carried off correspondence and/or personal pen-to-paper musings. He stole some called-up calculus of Janey Blaine's life.

I checked the one window. I saw tool marks sawed into the sash. He leaped off the lawn and let himself in, presto chango.

That left the dresser. Women's dressers always draw me. I'm a peeper and a sniffer. I've been one since puberty pulsed. Women's dressers drew me in 1936. Women's dressers draw me NOW.

I opened the top drawer. I saw the panties I sought. I pulled away, cold concurrent.

They were white. They were decorous-demure. There was one row, fetchingly folded. It was everything I liked.

BUT—

They were jizz-juiced, semenized, spurt-spattered, and sicko soiled. The B and E bastard laid his load on lace and cool cotton. It enraged me.

And it was evidence. I ran out to the car and grabbed my evidence kit.

The Jack-Freddy Summit. It's been set for 3:00 p.m. It gave me time to run the panties downtown to the crime lab. Ray Pinker promised results by 6:00. I whipped back west and made the meet on time.

I buzzed the buzzer. Jack opened up. He wore seersucker shorts and a Harvard Crew T-shirt. He was drawn dry. He was too thin. He had stick legs. His raw rib bones showed. He was still strikingly Jack the K.

He pointed to a chair. He said, "Sit."

I sat. He sat facing me. He lit a cigar. It was Cuban. I recalled Jefe Batista. His pet shark noshed dissidents.

"I need a promise, Freddy."

"I'm listening."

"It's no publicity of any kind on the girl. No sandbag job in your magazine. No shakedown attempts by any bent cops who might know the story—which, of course, includes you."

I said, "I have some questions about 'the girl,' as you describe her.

I'm wondering what she told you about herself, during that brief amount of time you spent talking."

Jack flushed. "No. We're not discussing it. I'm not telling you, and this is the last time this matter will ever come up between us."

I called up some cool. "I set you up with Ernie Roll and Bill Parker. You own them now. I overheard you guardedly state that you would like to see the girl's killer put down. There are five of us who intend to find him and kill him, which will surely save you grave embarrassment somewhere down the line. I expect to be compensated for this, and the price is fifty thousand dollars."

Jack flinched. "The price is way high, and your manner is entirely too brusque. You're not saying, 'Jack, I'm stretched,' or 'Jack, I need a touch,' or 'Jack, we go back a long time.' You're too brusque, Freddy—and you're rather out of touch with reality, given who I already am and where I'm going. So let's end this conversation and remain friends while we still can."

I said, "No. I expect to be compensated for what I've done already and what I'm going to do, and the price is nonnegotiable, and a bargain."

Jack fondled his cigar. "It's a shakedown. You're shaking me down."

"No, it's not. I've levied no threat of exposure. I'm presenting you with a bill for services rendered and services to come. Read whatever you like into it. I'll expect a call from one of your inbred Irish flunkies, sometime within the near future. We'll discuss the mode of payment and the time and place, and this is the last time you and I will ever discuss it."

Jack said, "I'll pay, Freddy. And this is the last time we'll ever discuss anything. You've just made an impetuous and small-time move—but then, you've always been that kind of guy."

It was fifty paces to the Polo Lounge. My legs quake-quivered and held. I ducked by some dowagers and dumped one on her ass. I helped her up and sent drinks to her table. She waved and went Yoo-hoo!

I boozed. I watched a wall clock. Ray Pinker promised semen-stain results by 6:00 p.m. I conjured Montego Bay, Manhattan, the mountains on the moon. I spent the fifty grand fifty million ways. I saw Lois naked by a wild waterfall and Lois naked at the Chapman Park Hotel. Belfast-born hoods killed me all the standard ways. I died by garrote, gun, brass-knuckle blows to the brain. Flags flew. Jack took the oath of office. I saw Caryl Chessman in Hell. He said, “Hey, baby doll.”

6:00 p.m. boded and bopped close. A radio riffed near my booth. The Hat Squad closed in on fiendish Fat Boy Mazmanian. The cocksucker was doomed. I knew it. Nobody said it.

I found a phone and stiffed the call. Ray Pinker got the goods. The jizz-juiced panties matched the Janey Blaine autopsy discharge. Ray said shit like “identical cellular componentry” and “exudate cell formation.” Ray said the sample was six to eight days old. That meant this: the killer left his load before he killed Janey.

I bolted. I drove straight to the Chapman Park Hotel and Lois. We got naked and tumbled into bed. We didn’t do it. We held each other tight-tight and talked.

We made sense and no sense. My monologue on money/Montego Bay/Manhattan. My rude riffs on the Janey Blaine job as really MURDER. Lois on Nick Ray and Jimmy Dean and We Can’t Let Them Make That Movie. I heard what I heard and knew she heard me back the same way. I said We’ve Got Some Money twelve million times. She said Chessman and What Will You Do About It? twelve million times back. We talked at each other. We wrapped ourselves up together and tried to find some fit we never found.

I went out or passed out and went someplace Lois wasn’t. It was booze and dope and Jack and Janey and Jimmy leaving me. I tumbled. I saw things that weren’t there and went somewhere Lois wasn’t. I woke up for real at 4:00 a.m. Lois was gone, her suitcase was gone, she left no note on the pillow. All I had was her scent.

The Hats were off hunting Fat Boy Mazmanian. I drove home and changed clothes. I checked my answering service. Nobody called me. I heard Chessman and What Will You Do About It?—but she wasn’t there.

I called Jimmy’s pad and service and got no answers. What Will You Do?/What Will You Do? She ventriloquized me. I heard her say it—but she wasn’t there.

Jimmy had a crawl-in crib off of Wilshire and La Brea. He slid in there to sleep and be alone. It was an above-garage abode and a cool caterpillar's cocoon. I drove over and brazenly broke in.

It was easy. One lock poke, one shoulder shove. It's a room-with-bath/eat-off-a-hot-plate deal. I scoped the one room. Here's what I saw:

A Chessman shrine. The Chessman Taj Mahal and Sistine Chapel. The Chessman Mount Rushmore and National Cathedral. Newspaper headlines taped wall-to-wall. Chessman foto glossies shellacked to the ceiling. Movie-type test fotos stacked on the bed. Jimmy Dean made up as Caryl Chessman.

He's got darker hair here. It's been cut and kinked à la Chessman. A makeup man puttied his nose. That prominent prow is Chessman's choice feature.

Jimmy always looks peeved and pissed off. It's always there and always offset by his native pride and prettification. He embodies hip hurt and magnified maladjustment. It's his studly stock in trade. Here, he moves into MEAN. He looks older. He's usurped and channeled Chessman. It's a trenchant transubstantiation. He's made himself vicious and vile. It's a metamorphosis, man to monster.

Harrowing headlines hemmed me in. They were existentially Chessman/No Exit. They jumped from January '48 and jammed up to now. Red Light Bandit Sought. Red Light Bandit Captured! Chessman Convicted—Gas Chamber Looms. Victims Describe Degradation. Third Victim Hinted At.

The walls whipped around me. They coldly constricted me and cut off my air. Pictures popped out. Regina Johnson and Mary Alice Meza. Victims 1 and 2, weeping. Apoplectic appeals. High Court Rules No Stay Of Execution. Worldwide Protests: Free Caryl Chessman!!!

I gasped for air. I stumbled and fell on the bed. I looked up at Jimmy's Michelangelo art. He'd pasted Chessman pix to the bodies of Greek cherubs. They flew, flitted, and flung the face of the Beast down at the whimpering world.

Maladjustment. He's memorializing it. It's his movie motivation. He's a tortured teenager tempting teens to toss themselves at the abyss. He's a mad marionette of modernist depravity. And Nihilist Nick Ray is pulling the strings.

I shut my eyes and conjured Lois. I counted to fifty thousand dollars, one dollar bill at a time. I magically misplaced myself: Montego Bay, Manhattan, the mountains on the moon. I opened my eyes and saw the file cabinet by the bed.

Flimsy green metal. One file drawer. File-tabbed C.C./San Quentin Correspondence.

I opened the drawer. I saw dozens of envelopes dumped in. They were addressed to Nicholas Ray and James Dean and postmarked San Rafael, California. I recognized Chessman's handwriting. The Herald had run two of his prison letters in full cursive. He moved these missives past censors and guards and got them into the mail.

I plucked the first envelope and pulled the first page. The sassy salutation said, "Hey there, Jimmy and Nick." It was dated 12/18/54. The first line read, "Before we start, let me state that I want Elizabeth Taylor to play the Meza bitch. She's got bigger jugs, that's the main thing."

Chessman scrawled a script title here. If I Really Did It—(heh, heh).

I read my way through the whole file. I popped sweat and sweltered out toxins from my delirious last days. Some tears must have merged there. My eyes burned bad and felt funny. I kept wiping them.

Chessman admitted all of it. He copped to the most minute evidentiary details. It was a savagely sustained depiction of sexual horror. It was demonically descriptive. Chessman recalled sights, scents, and sounds. He reveled in the mess he'd made of lives for years to come. He described the Shirley Tutler assault and designated Shirley by name. He spent forty-three pages extolling each and every time he bit her. He said he sucked the blood off her blouse front. He wrote, "Maybe we can get Natalie Wood to play Shirley."

I read all of it. I read Jimmy's margin notes. He wrote, "Wow!" "Dig it!" and "This Caryl cat is cold," repeatedly.

I got my evidence kit out of the car. I walked back inside and prepped my shooting stage. I turned on all the room lights and photographed all the pages. I ran through twelve rolls of film and dumped the envelopes back in the drawer in approximate order.

My legs quake-quivered and almost caved. I walked into the bathroom and doused my face. I looked different. What Will You Do About It? I looked older. I wondered if Lois would notice.

Evidence. "This Caryl cat" was cooked. His rights of redress had run out. I just punched his ticket to the green room.

Dizzy spells. Discontent and discombobulation. Don’t go for exultant. There’s No Exit, Baby. Don’t pop to your pad or rack out at the Ranch Market. Roll somewhere nobody can find you.

I’d lost a full day and a half at Jimmy’s crawl crib. It was the next nite of the next day at least. I drove downtown and parked in the cop lot at City Hall. My car cocooned me and sent me soporific. I tried to count from one to fifty thousand. I fell asleep at two thousand-something.

Bill Parker rapped on my windshield and woke me up. I popped the passenger door. He stepped in and dropped the early a.m. Herald on my lap.

I saw the Call Girl Homicide headline. Plus Coroner Curphey’s Accident Ruling “Hogwash,” Anonymous Source Sez.

Janey Blaine, hot off the press. There’s one fab foto. She’s fetching fine in ’49. She’s Miss Visalia JC.

There’s zero per Jack the K. Ouch—Prominent politicos among her many patrons. LAPD with egg on face. Chief Parker pledges revived investigation.

I said, “Who’s the source?”

Parker said, “As if you didn’t know.”

“Are you saying you won’t buy the pillow-talk defense?”

“No, and I would think you’d have figured out that you’re being spot-tailed a goodly portion of the time, and would have learned to conduct your liaisons accordingly.”

I lit a cigarette. Parker passed me his flask. I dunked deep and passed it back. Parker dunked deep. A barter bid’s boding. He’d have bitch-slapped me otherwise.

I said, “Let’s trade favors. Binding, as of now.”

He said, “You ask first.”

I said, “No reprisals on Lois Nettleton.”

He said, “Granted. On my end, I want you to assist in the dope raid on the Rebel gang. We’re going in at eight p.m. tomorrow. We’re hitting the Marmont, instead of the set. The head shitheels are camped out there, and they’re the ones we want to shake.”

I laffed. “Is that it? I’m getting the better end of the deal here.”

“No, not quite. I’ve decided that that Fat Boy Mazmanian is good for the murder of Janey Blaine, and I would like you to assist the Hats in wiping the egg off my face that Miss Nettleton put there."

Why not? Montego Bay and Manhattan moved into sight. Lois rabbited, ratted me, and ran. To forgive is divine. I had that hot hole card. The Chessman/Dean letters would light Lois up. I'm locking them up as of now.

Stage Door Freddy. He's back. He's finessing fuckups and finalizing favors at full speed. Rat, fink, sovereign suck-up. The man who shook down John F. Kennedy. Call me bold, brave, and stupid. Lois Nettleton could do worse.

Parker said, "Fat Boy. Are you in?"

I said, "Yes, sir, I am."

OUTSIDE THE CHATEAU MARMONT

West Holly*weird*

5/22/55

Dope raid. Preselected bungalows. Nick Ray's hip hutch. The cast and crew crawl pad. The B-level bedrooms of the Nick's Knights Kar Klub.

It was 7:50 p.m. Rodent Robbie ran the dope by at 7:20. Nazi Nick had assembled the Juvie Jugend at his place. He'll pitch one more motivation message. The flick wraps three days hence.

We perched on the access road. Four Sheriff's plainclothes cars, eight Narco cops, plus me. The Hats were off elsewhere. They had Fat Boy Mazmanian 94.6 percent pinned. That quashed our Janey Blaine job. Fat Boy punched the ticket for Rape/Murder One. He'd go down soonsville.

We were looping up loose ends. The shoot would wrap. Ernie Roll would run the evidence and finalize filings. The panty raid. The liquor store 211/Arson. The four burglary counts to keester Nick Adams and Jimmy Dean. The Hats thumped Nick and Jimmy and cut them loose. We were playing and plying a looooooooong game here. Call it collusive convergence—cops and Fourth Estate.

The Confidential smear job and the issued indictments must hit concurrent. The big bonanza lay there. I ran rapaciously rogue through all this Rebel rigamarole. I would confess all at the Confidential v. State of California trial.

"Two years, Freddy. We'll be in court then. What you and I hath wrought."

Parker said it. I believed it. It vouched my visions of Lois and fifty grand. It stamped Caryl Chessman's insisted innocence Null and Void. I believed it. I had to believe it. So why hasn't she called?

The radio rumbled. The squawk box squawked. That meant go, goon squad—

We got out and barged up to bungalow row. We're heat on the hoof—eight cops up against hip hopheads and dizzy dilettantes. We hit the Führer Bungalow at a sprint. We prepeeped the door kick. Here's the big window view:

Nick Ray in white robe and sandals. He's serving up the Sermon on the Mount. His addlepated acolytes are attired likewise. That's Nick Adams, Jimmy, Natalie Wood, and Sal Mineo.

Reefer smoke smogged the air. The acolytes noshed home fries and Googie's burger bits. It's the Last Supper. Jimmy beat his bongo drums. Natalie and Sal made like Muslims and ululated to Allah. Nihilist Nick held up a cheesy chalice of cheap wine. He said, "Art is self-sacrifice in the fight against Squaresville America. Come, drink from my blood."

He's serving Commie Communion. T-Bird wine and burger bits for wafers. Natalie whipped off her white muumuu and stood starkers. No shit—she's the altar!!!

We kicked the door in. I went straight for Nick Ray. I elbow-popped his face and gnashed his nose in. His cheesy chalice flew. I kicked him in the balls and jackknifed him to the floor. I double-cuffed his hands to his ankles. I bow-bent him back ninety degrees. The fucker scree-screeched.

The acolytes made like Mahatma Gandhi. They went supine and sang Sufi songs to unnerve the fuzz. The cops shackle-chained Jimmy, Nick A., and Sal. They fondle–felt up Natalie and let her linger nude. They grabbed pill vials and reefer wrappers off the floor.

I ran down the row. I hit the crawl crib and crashed in the door. Four grimy grips groused and ground themselves deep in their bedrolls. I noticed no dope evidence extant. I ran down the row to the B-level bedrooms. I beat down the door to room #29.

It's a two-bed flop. There's nobody home. My roust sheet listed the occupants: Chester Alan Voldrich and fotog Arvo Jandine.

I eyeballed the room. A glossy glint gleamed on the dresser. I checked it out.

It was a black-and-white snapshot. Dig the built babe in a bikini. I'd seen her before. I knew where. Robbie Molette's girl book. This studette starred in his stable.

OUTSIDE FAT BOY MAZMANIAN'S HIDEOUT

2892 South Budlong

5/23/55

He's back there. It's a back garage setup. He's paying furtive fugitive rates for three hots and a cot. The front house is a sweltering sweatshop. A kiddie korps sews Sir Guy shirts and sicknik silks for L.A. gang goofballs. Ten cents an hour, muchachos. You're overpaid at that.

He's George "Fat Boy" Mazmanian. He's survived his pustulant pal, Richie "the Dutchman" Van Deusen. We've got him for the steakhouse/211-sex assaults. That mandates death by cop, all in itself. We've got him for the Janey Blaine homicide. He didn't kill Janey Blaine. Nobody's perfect—least of all him, or US.

We evacuated the sweatshop. The Hats bought los muchachos Eskimo Pies off a Good Humor truck. The kids gassed on the LAPD's largesse. We weren't LAPD or the Hat Squad plus Fred Otash today. We were the Men from Mars.

Dig it. We're spiffily space age. We're wearing spangle-sparkly bulletproof vests. The PD purchased a big batch of Chicom surplus supplies. They're hiiiiigh-density and heat-resistant. They'll deflect H-bombs and silver bullets. They glow candy apple green in the dark.

We reconnoitered behind the sweatshop. We adjusted our vests. We loaded our Ithaca pump shotguns with rat poison–laced buckshot. We slipped on our headgear. Dig: L.A. Rams football helmets rigged with antiradiation rays and Plexiglas face shields. Wobbly whip antennae for that space-monster look.

We were ready. We were armed and attired. Uno, dos, tres—vamanos, muchachos—

We blasted the door off its hinges. Double-aught buck punctured pinewood to pulp. Fat Boy fired. I caught two shots. Max and Red caught two shots. They singed synthetic fabric and fell off our vests. Fat Boy popped four more shots. Harry and Eddie took them. Ricochets riddled my football helmet and zinged off of me.

We advanced. We were the Men from Mars. We feared no man or beast. We stood in point-blank range and let fly. I pumped my five rounds straight at his head. He was my voodoo-doll substitute. I saw Caryl Chessman's face as I killed him.

GOOGIE'S ALL-NITE COFFEE SHOP

West Holly*weird*

5/24/55

I tallied table tips. I autographed a.m. *Herald*s. Here's the headline: MEN FROM MARS BATTLE CALL GIRL KILLER!!!!!

Not quite—but I'll take it.

I logged lowdown. It was all bullshit. I didn't care. Let's celebrate and gloat.

The Rebel wrap party was here tonite. The dope-raid arrestees had bailed out. Parker wanted it that way. Let's postpone the parade of criminal indictments. We'll sync them to the film's release.

I tallied tips. I rippled with resurgence. The money. Fat Boy dead and scapegoated for Janey Blaine. It buttressed Jack the K.'s peace of mind. That was gooooood. That meant it buttressed me.

Yeah—but why hasn't Lois called? I called her New York service fourteen times and got zilch back. I'd null-and-voided Caryl Chessman. Nobody knew but me. I was resurgent. That meant WE should be.

A tipster bopped up. He tattled the Secret Snatch Hair Auction at the Charlie Chaplin estate. Certified Jean Harlow locks went for thirty grand each. Certified Carole Lombard locks went for twenty grand, plus. L.A. County Morgue doctors certified the snips and attested to their authenticity.

Here, kid. Here's forty clams. Uncle Freddy can afford to laff. He's got Lois Nettleton and fifty g's.

The *Rebel*ites wandered in. Nick Ray, Nick Adams, Natalie Wood, and Jimmy the D. Jimmy had that bruised-and contused, I've-been-phone-booked look. His hacked hairline gave it away.

He saw me. He kissed his middle finger and flipped me off. He wheeled and walked back out the door.

You get the picture. I never saw him again.

INFERNAL INTERMEZZO:

My Furtively Fucked-up Life
5/25/55–10/14/57

Confidential fell. The mistrial mandated a move to excessive expurgation and bum bowdlerization. Jimmy Dean went tits-up in a car wreck. Tuff shit. His mopey martyrdom moves millions and redefines Confidential's concept of epic boo-hoo. I felt next to nothing. Nada, nix, nein, nullification. Jimmy betrayed me. Jimmy dumped me. Jimmy left me for Demon Daddy Nick Ray.

Bondage Bob killed the Rebel Without a Cause smear job. Bill Parker dumped his derogatory profile on the teen turkey turned big hit. Ernie Roll rolled over and declined to file criminal charges on Nick's Knights et al. Parker and Roll succumbed to sentiment and success. Canonized kid actor, boffo box-office take. They capitulated to cultural consensus. Movie money made them meek. That big boo-hoo made them back off, bitch-like. That's the bilious bi-fecta. They're satedly satisfied. I'm not.

'55 to '57. It was all one speciously spectacular sprint. I served my two mad masters. I vetted vile stories for Bondage Bob as I bamboozled him. I tanked the verification process and trafficked the truth to Bill Parker. We built a defamous dossier. It topped two thousand pages. It was mucho more than any prize-prick prosecutor could ask for. It comprised one wicked workload. It detailed my libelous life as a smear merchant and thug and made for a massive missive of my misconduct. Why mince words? I'm a rat, a fink, a snarky snitch, and an insidious informant. And I revere Bill Parker for giving me the chance to become one.

'55 faded out. Rock Hudson married Phyllis Gates in November. Best of luck, kids. I give it two years. I'll work Mrs. Hudson's divorce gig then. Phyllis is a fine filly. We collapse in the kip once in a while. Phyllis pretends that I'm Rock. I pretend that she's Lois.

Barbara Bel Geddes never caught cold or laid up with laryngitis.

Lois never netted the ripe role of Maggie the Cat. The show shut down in November ’56. I remain Stage Door Freddy. I tune in my TV and watch the only woman I’ve ever loved. There’s Lois on Decoy. She’s dizzy and dykey in two prison-drama shows. Lois stuns on Studio One and mangles the motions on Captain Video and His Video Rangers. She’s bravura on The Brighter Day. She called out to me on Camera Three, and told me we’re still on.

Lois played Emily Dickinson. She was all Art and Loneliness. Her poet’s passion pounded me. I know why. Lois lives longing the same way I do. She said, “What will you do about it?” I haven’t told her I’ve done one big thing already. I haven’t said, “I’ll tell you all in time.” I want to rig our reunion in Shirley Tutler’s name and the name of Vindictive Justice. We’ve got time here. Three jolting jurists have told me that.

J. Miller Leavy prosecuted Chessman. He told me the hump should burn some time in ’59. Ernie Roll’s best guess is early ’60. Judge Charles Fricke calls it ’60–’61.

We’ve got time. Hotshot men owe me favors. We’ll get our jailhouse visit. I promise you that. In the meantime, I’ve done this:

I stored the pix from Jimmy D.’s crawl crib in a bank vault. I B and E’d the crib the day Jimmy died. I stole his Chessman letters and stored them in Vault #2. I ripped his Chessman wallpaper to shreds and burned it. I contacted two high-ups at Quentin and begged for all the names of Chessman’s approved correspondents. They’ve refused me so far.

We’ll reunite. I know it. We won’t ride as rich as I’d hoped. Jack the K.’s fifty grand sallied south.

The cocksucker stiffed me. A minion called and made the meet. The parcel weighed in weighty. I took it home and counted the cash. The bills boded wrong. I showed some to a Treasury man. He said the cash was counterfeit. Freddy, you’re fucked.

I hexed Jack the K. It worked at first. He lost the veep bid in ’56. ’56 is not presumptive ’60. Jack was right. My shakedown was short-range thinking and a small-time move. That made me a small-time man.

Yeah—but I took down Confidential.

Es not la verdad. I just helped. The gig was Bill Parker’s bristling brainstorm from the get. We compiled the damaging data. Parker fed it to AG Pat Brown. He launched the official investigation and empaneled the grand jury then. The grand jury issued indictments on 5/15/57. Conspiracy to Publish Criminal Libel. Conspiracy to Publish Obscene Material. Conspiracy to Disseminate Information in Violation of the California Business Code.

Call it a clamorous cluster fuck. Bondage Bob hired Arthur Crowley to defend the magazine. Art was a divorce lawyer. He was not a libel-defense lawyer. Assistant AG Clarence Linn repped California State. I owed Bob a big beau geste. I was not indicted. Parker and Roll kept their word. I made a ham-handed play to pollute the jury pool. It cost Bondage Bob forty g's. I flew the fuckers to Acapulco. They lived large for one week. So what? Nobody noticed or seemed to care.

A load of lawsuits surfaced, postindictments. Maureen O'Hara sued. Confidential cornholed her in the March '57 issue. It alleged that she made out with a Mexican at Grauman's Chinese. Oops. Somebody futzed the fact check. It had to be me.

Robert Mitchum sued. Errol Flynn sued. Dorothy Dandridge sued. We miscegenation-mauled her on no evidence. The trial opened on 8/7/57. Prosecutor Linn called Bondage Bob "Mr. Big." He said Mr. Big had prosties lure celebs into compromising contexts. No shit. He said we paid known homosexuals to rat out those of their ilk. No shit. He said we employed strongarm methods routinely. No shit. Art Crowley preached the letter of the libel laws and freewheeling freedom of speech. It bopped back and forth. The courtroom socked in summer heat. Maureen O'Hara testified. She said she never made out with that Mex. The trial traipsed and trucked along until late September. The jury was deep-six deadlocked. They stood at seven to five for conviction on two counts. The judge closed the cluster fuck off and declared a mistrial.

Doofus Double Agent Freddy. He's the dippy deus ex machina of the whole mess. His secret depositions shaped the prosecutor's trial brief. He gave up his guilt. It cost him big gelt. It freed him to dream and scheme anew.

Confidential survived. It cooled down its content. It now publishes pap for a reduced readership. Our circulation circled downward. Bondage Bob pledged to publish "only wholesome stories." He went on a cost-cutting binge. Listening posts were abandoned. I'm on my way out. My goon squad squared up tall and went back in the Marine Corps. I'm a full-time private eye now. I work divorce gigs out of the wheelman lot and snitch to Bill Parker. A snitch fund pays me five yards per month. I make out okay. Robbie Molette and Nasty Nat Denkins work the wheelman lot with me. I'm their faux daddy who used to be hot shit.

I'm alone most nights. I talk to women who aren't in the room with me. I think about Janey Blaine and Shirley Tutler. Rumination to revelation. A click clicked in my broiled-to-burnout brain, much belatedly.

January '48. Shirley Tutler is abducted and assaulted. Near Mulholland and Beverly Glen. May '55. Janey Blaine is raped and murdered. Near Mulholland and Beverly Glen.

Rumination to revelation. I now see replication at work here. Movie madness. The Rebel shoot. Craaaazy crisscrosses at play. Robbie Molette and Janey. Robbie and the Rebel crew.

The Rebel remnants remain in L.A. Nick Ray's prepping a preachy lox at Fox. Nick Adams shows up on TV. The Nick's Knights Kar Klub is surely making mischief. It poses a What-Will-You-Do-About-It? dilemma.

I'm bored. I'm underemployed. I may be ramping up to do something bold, brave, and stupid.

BONDAGE BOB HARRISON'S SUITE

The Downtown Statler
10/14/57

The useless eulogy. The dippy de-brief. The rip-snorting ride is over, Sahib.

We took chairs. Bondage Bob poured mid-morning martinis. He wore a pink-puce toga. Note the lash marks on his legs.

"It's the end of an era, Freddy. And you're savvy enough to know why I've called you in."

I lit a cigarette. "You're 'Mr. Wholesome' now. I'm redundant. You've got no need for a strongarm corps, so you're cutting me loose."

Bob sipped bum Beefeaters. The suite was bargain basement. The booze was bottom shelf. His toga resembled a reclaimed Klan sheet.

"That's the long and short of it, son. There's a few clean-up jobs you can take care of—but that's it, over and out."

I went nix. "You've got qualms about the trial. The prosecutors came in, armed to the teeth. Somebody fed them a shitload of inside dirt. It was either me, or one of my guys. You're getting up the juice to ask me. You're sitting there in your toga, and you look like Julius Caesar at a drag ball. You're getting ready to lay some sort of 'et tu, Freddy' number on me."

Bob went te salud. I went so ask. Bob scratched the whip scars on his ankles.

"I see Bill Parker behind the whole magillah. He ran the show and fed the dope to the AG's boys. He recruited informants, took depositions, the whole schmear."

I said, "Ask me, Bob. Accuse me and ask me, and I'll say yes or no."

Bob shook his head. "This is not the Freddy Otash of yore I'm seeing here today. This is some new kamikaze version, that I find disconcerting."

I drained my drink. "You're asking me to feed you cues. Okay, here's the first one. The shit I pulled for you and the magazine was wrong. You take it from there."

Bob made the jackoff sign. "You're jerking my chain, son. You don't get to take my money for as long as you did, and make me the bad guy."

I said, "I'm the bad guy. I knew it when I put the hurt on Johnnie Ray."

Bob shrugged. "I'm not going to ask you, and you're not going to volunteer. I'll tell you what gets me, though."

I went so?

"Here's what gets me, son. Whoever it was was some sort of insider, and that fucker sided with that pious son-of-a-bitch Parker, against me."

I stood up. "Here's a cue, dad. I'd rather be him than be you."

SHELL GAS STATION

Beverly and Hayworth
10/15/57

The wheelman lot. Legions of the lost light and live here. We scrounge for scraps. We dive for divorce dough. I'm El Daddy-O by default and decree. I'm a licensed PI. I'm a DA's Bureau special deputy. My ex-Confidential status still stamps me a stud. Bondage Bob fired me. I've still got my Ranch Market gig. Bob's got me doing clean-up jobs on a per diem basis. I'm closing out listening posts, tomorrow. Taps, bugs—they've got to go. Bob's divesting and dumping his properties. His profits have dipped looooooow.

He's Mr. Wholesome now. He told the judge and prosecutors that. Call him Messrs. Bland and Blasé.

I slid low in my sled. I yawned and yodeled Old Crow. I popped two biphetamine and lashed the late-morning blahs. I shared my shit with Robbie Molette. He's my new sidekick, thus my new Jimmy D. Nasty Nat Denkins dozed in the backseat. He crossed the wheelman color line. He's now Mr. Darktown Divorce. He's still got his gig at KKXZ. Confidential still subsidizes the station.

Robbie said, "What's the deal today?"

I lit a cigarette. "France's Parisian Room, over on Washington and La Brea. The mark's an ofay stiff. The girl's colored. She hops cars at the Parisian and peddles it part-time. The mark's terrified of exposure. He's a preacher at a drive-in church in Van Nuys. The wife wants a divorce. Nat's playing a kitchen cook and bringing lunch over. The pad's right behind the Parisian. We'll take down the door and take the pictures. The girl's in on it. There's three of us and one of him. We'll kick his ass and take him to Wilshire Station. The wife and her lawyer want criminal charges filed."

Robbie yaaawned. He cricked and uncricked his neck. He slept on the lot. He slept in his '49 Ford. He left his mom and dad's house. He's now Mr. Apostasy. He quit boning his kid sister and peddling her beaver pix. The Janey Blaine job tested and torqued him. He cleaned house and wound up here.

I said, “I’ve been teething on Janey. Who she knew, who she tricked with, who she might have met in Beverly Hills that nite.”

Robbie picked his nose. “We’ve been through all that. I’ve been through it with you and the Hats, and Max and Red braced my dad at Metro and polygraphed him. He came up kosher, and you and the Hats made Fat Boy for the snuff. I don’t want to keep on plowing up this old dirt.”

Nasty Nat stirred. “Fat Boy was framed. He’s Emmet Till and the Scottsboro Boys, reborn. I’m referencing him on my ‘Cutie’ tonight.”

I said, “Tell me why.”

“Those Chicom space suits the PD bought spontaneously combusted, in this Police Academy storeroom. Whoosh, they go up in flames. They were defective from the jump. No bad deed goes unpunished.”

Robbie said, “I never thought Fat Boy did it. He always worked with a partner, and he robbed the women first.”

I laffed. The pay phone rang. Nat reached out his window and wrapped the receiver.

He said, “Yeah, we’re here.” He listened. He hung up.

The Parisian Room. A mock-moderne job with Frenchy accoutrements. The standard counter hut and outside park-and-eat slots.

We pulled in and parked. The girl walked out. She wore a white blouse and pink pedal pushers. She was gawky good-looking, in her own wild way. She wore a black lace hairnet. Her name tag read Babette.

She pointed up to a back-rear apartment. It was second floor/ stairway access/ three pads in a row.

She said, “Don’t be too long. He’s on his lunch hour, and he always moves these things along. And he damn sure always jumps on me first thing.”

Robbie winked at her. She rolled her eyes and skipped off. Nat doffed his street duds and slipped on his cook-waiter's whites. I checked the camera and fitted in a flashbulb strip. Robbie eyeballed the second-floor stairway. He said, "Okay, she's in."

A real cook-waiter waltzed up. He handed Nat a big bag of burgers and fries. Nat paid him off.

I watched my watch. I gave the loser lovebirds five full minutes to find that funky fit. The girl screamed, three minutes and eight seconds in.

It rang real. I gunned my sled and peeled through the rear-exit alley. I came up by the stairway and double-parked, snout-out. Robbie moved, Nat moved. I went No and waved them back. I went Sit and This Is Mine.

I got out and ran up the stairs. Scream #2 rang real. The pad was three doors down. I did a spring-and-pivot move and flat-kicked the jamb juncture.

The door caved. I saw them. He had her flat-pinned to the couch. He was naked. She was naked. A foot-long rubber dick extender condom-covered his schlong. He blew on a lit cigarette. He lowered it and burned her back.

She writhed and screamed. He lowered the cigarette and reburned her back. I jumped him and pulled him off. He flailed and sissy-swatted me. His fake dick poked me. I pulled my belt sap and backhanded him in the face. I got his nose and his teeth and broke bridgework. I ripped one nostril loose. His fake dick dipped and wilted. I kneed him in the balls. He puked on my Sy Devore coat.

Somebody Jap-jumped me. A dogpile ensued. It was Robbie and Nat, neighbors and cops. A fat cop applied a headlock. I got loosey-goosey ecstatic. I saw Lois as I went out.

B*lackout.*

I've had them before. I know the messed-up MO. You booze and abuse for weeks running. An altercation ensues. Somebody cuts off your carotid artery. You see shit that is and shit that ain't there.

Like Lois. Like the backseat of a beat-to-hell prowl car. Like the Wilshire Station drunk tank. Like Jimmy Dean at Ten-Inch Tommy's—and these bad boys butting Kool Kings on his neck.

Like Max and Red. Holy shit, Freddy—don't you ever quit?

I came to at Ollie Hammond's. Max and Red sat facing me. My neck hurt. Somebody snatched my Sy Devore coat. Where's Robbie and Nat? What's the dispo on the sicknik sadist and that colored carhop?

Drinks appeared. We imbibed. Max said, "We squared you up. Your boys took your car back to the lot. We got the girl settled in at Queen of Angels, and we booked shithead for Rape 1 and Mayhem. He'll do a doomsday dime somewhere."

Curb-to-curb service. Freddy O.'s our boy. Bill Parker wants something. They're here to ask.

I said, "I appreciate all this. Thanks. Now, let's go out and kill some 211 guys and blow off some steam. Maybe clear some pending homicides on the books."

Max said, "Freddy's miffed."

Red said, "It's a delayed reaction to Fat Boy."

Max said, "We did a favor for Freddy's pal, Jack. It's called 'snipping loose ends while you punch a shithead's ticket that deserved to be punched in the first place.' "

Red said, "Freddy knows the rules. He's got scalps on his belt. He's just momentarily aflutter with Senator Jack and his vision of 'an America that provides for all her people.' "

I laffed. I raised my drink. I went Touché.

Max said, "What did Jack pay you, Freddy? Don't disappoint us and tell us you didn't shake him down."

I said, "The bite was fifty g's. I got the package. Too bad it was all counterfeit."

Max and Red roared. I re-roared. Montego Bay, Manhattan, the mountains on the moon. O bird thou never—

Red lit a cigarette. "The Chief has a job for you. It pays three grand, cash, no counterfeit. It piggybacks a job you're embarking on for Bob Harrison."

I drained my drink. I faked a cough and dipped two dexies.

"He's got me packing up listening posts, and disarming the bug-and-tap feeds. Let me hazard a guess. The Chief wants me to play the recordings extant and compile intel files."

Max said, "Freddy was never dumb. He's always known up from down."

Red said, "I like Freddy, but I wouldn't go that far."

I blew smoke their way. "Sure, I'll do it. I'm starting the gig for Bob tomorrow."

Max twirled his glass. “You know what the Chief likes. You can’t go wrong with sex, politics, and California Penal Code violations.”

I noshed a bread stick. It was stagecraft. It covered my mean megrims and trembling tremens.

“I need a favor. I don’t think it’s a big one to ask.”

Max went tsk-tsk. “Snow job alert. I sense one coming.”

Red went tsk-tsk. “The shaky hands are always the tell.”

“I need a look at the Caryl Chessman master file, and the PD file on Janey Blaine.”

Max said, “No. Whatever you’re thinking of, whatever you may be planning, no good can come of it. The Chief looks askance at your fixation with dead and brutalized women.”

Red said, “No more dead-woman crusades, Freddy. That’s over and out. Chessman’s a dead issue, and Janey Blaine’s been avenged. You should know—we killed the man who killed her.”

LISTENING POST

Argyle North of Franklin
10/16/57

Shitwork. Divestment duty. I'm a wage slave. Lift that barge, tote that bale.

There's six posts. Pack the furniture/box the bug-and-tap mounts. Take last listens. List damning dish Bill Parker would drool for. Look through bug-and-tap logs. Bootjack hot bug-and-tap tapes for Big Bill.

I started here. The Argyle post ran a loooooong-range transceiver. We bugged and tapped mid-Hollywood and the hip Hollywood Hills. Our bug-and-tap targets totaled twenty-four houses and apartments.

Film folk. Sullen subversives. Furtive fuck pads and nifty nests of stewardess call girls. Fly me—I'm Pam, Lizzie, Sally, Nancy, Kathy et al.

I scanned the logs. The indices listed bug-and-tap targets and their addresses. Tap callers were listed. Their call dates and times were marked. Two names nabbed me, straight off.

Ingrid Ellmore. Pan Am stew and poon panderess supreme. Ingrid invented the all-nite pajama party. She owned a six-bedroom A-frame on Bronson Hill. You got six girls/180-proof absinthe/all the poppable pills in the PDR. Ingrid had a heated pool. Ingrid had sauna and steam rooms. Two yards bought you the Debauch of the Damned. Ingrid rocked round the clock.

Ingrid's call-in list. Note some names. AG Pat Brown, Mayor Norris Poulson. Baseball boss Leo Durocher. Sheriff Gene Biscailuz. TV titan Sid Caesar. Bumptious Buddy Hackett and lounge lizard Louis Prima.

I boosted three bug-and-tap boxes. I'd listen in and cherry-pick some choice shit for the Chief. This was a listen-at-your-leisure deal. The second name shrieked Listen Now!!!

Dalton Trumbo. Commie Caporegime. Bugged and tapped at his worker's wigwam off Whitley Drive. Hollywood Ten hard-on. Gallivanting gadfly. Dig this name on his call-in list:

The Caryl Chessman Defense Committee. Dig Bernie Spindel's margin notes:

"CP-financed. Popular front-group remnant. Evolved from the Free the Rosenbergs Committee. Frequent celebrity call-ups to target's home phone. Names noted on specific call sheets."

I culled the call sheets. They coughed up baaaaaad Burt Lancaster and cheesy Chuck Heston. There's Calypso King Preston Epps. He's hard on the heels of his hit "Bongo in the Congo." There's Liz Taylor. There's Hugh Hefner. There's Mr. Mumbles himself—Marlon Brando.

Marlon mauled my main mujer, Joi Lansing, at a party. It was fall '53. I've ground that grudge for four years now.

I went straight for the call-in tapes. I was hopped up on hate now. I'd rereprised my role of the cornholed cornuto. I got a hot hit off the call-tap list: Marlon Brando at the Caryl Chessman Defense Committee.

I found the tape and wrapped it into a tape rig. Dig the date: 10/9/57. That's just last week.

I got cozy. I lit a cigarette and sucked my flask. I punched PLAY. Red rake Trumbo schmoozed Mumbles Brando.

Static cut through the call. I amputated the amenities and sundered some chitchat. Voices vibrated two minutes in.

Brando: "…and they've got that burglar-killer guy, slated to burn on the eleventh. What's his name, again?"

Trumbo: "Donald Keith Bashor. The Party was thinking of sending some pickets up, but this guy was just too vicious. He killed two women, and messed around with the good-looking one, postmortem. We want him to burn, because it explicates the callous nature of fascist injustice. In fact, we want everyone to burn, including Caryl. The more the merrier. They're martyrs to the cause. We can really play that angle up in the press."

Brando: "You're right about that. And, you know, there's these rumors floating around that Caryl will be coming down soon for a hearing. I'm laying some groundwork on that. Can the Party bounce for two hundred protestors, at ten clams a pop? That's two grand, all in all. I'm leading a protest outside the Hall of Justice, downtown. Me, Preston Epps, maybe Liz Taylor. That's on the seventeenth, and I'm not floating this gig out of my pocket."

Trumbo: "I'll get you the bread, don't worry. That's what front groups do—they front their comrades money."

Brando: "Rumors…yeah, I dig that concept. Hey, have you heard the one about the third victim? That Caryl bit her nipples off, and she's been in the funny farm ever since? That she couldn't testify at Caryl's trial, because she was far-gone catatonic?"

Trumbo: "The fascist lie machine dreamed that one up. Of course, they made her a real baby doll, with tits out to here. Too bad she didn't really exist."

The call staticked up and stuttered out. Mumbles mumbled. Dial tones ditzed and dimmed Trumbo out.

I went back to work. Caryl Chessman click-clicked in my head. It felt like a fever. It's mutating and metastasizing. It'll maim me unless I do something soon.

I boxed up the Ingrid and Trumbo tapes. I called Confidential's messenger service and told them to roll up here now. I added notes to Bill Parker:

"The Ellmore woman's a mother lode for Headquarters Vice. Duplicate and forward the Trumbo tapes to your Intel Division, plus State and Fed HUAC. More to come/F.O."

That fever. Festering, mutating, metastasizing. I could feel it. I could feel him—this malignant microbe inside me.

I called my answering service. I had one message:

Mr. Nat Denkins called. He said Miss Blind Item called him and will call the show tonight.

—

Festering. Mutating. Metastasizing. The malignant microbe inside both of us.

I messengered the bug-and-tap boxes to Bill Parker. I blew off my other work gigs. I popped home and perched by the phone. I'm Stage Door Freddy, resurrected.

She didn't call. The wait wilted, withered, and wiped me out. I boozed, I chain-smoked, I popped pills to push the clock forward. A paradoxical effect popped me. They slowed the clock down.

I made midnight. The clock climbed to 1:00 a.m. I ran my radio. The Synagogue Sid Trio blatted and blasted their intro. They went topical tonite. The microbe moved within them. Dig their composition: "I Got Dem Caryl Chessman Blues Again, Mama."

Bass sax, flügelhorn, drums. A crash-out crescendo. Then the silken sound of coins slid down a slot. Then her voice: "Hey, Nat—what's shakin', baby?"

Nasty Nat said, "Miss Blind Item, her own self. Man, it has been way too long!"

My heart thudded and thumped and threatened to blow on the spot. Lois said, "Over two years, sweetie."

"Sooooo, are you back to finalize your beef against Confidential? Is that what brings you to town?"

"What's to finalize, Nat? That trial last summer pretty much emasculated it."

Nasty Nat said, "Yeah, Confidential's been declawed and devenomed, that's for sure. Hhhmmmmm. Let's see now. Could the purpose of your visit be the fact that Caryl Chessman will be coming here for a court appearance later this month, and because there's a big protest rally scheduled at the Hall of Justice tomorrow, with Marlon Brando and numerous other celebs slated to appear?"

Lois laffed. "You've lost me there, Nat."

"Hey, baby. You're an actress, I hear tell, and I know you've done some things in New York. You ever cross paths with the Mumble Man?"

Lois said "Weeelll, I'd be remiss if I didn't say we shared a history."

My heart shook, sheared, and shuddered—and almost shut down on the spot.

Nasty Nat said, "Here's a question, Miss Item. Chessman's court appearance hasn't been announced in the press, but it certainly has been a persistent rumor. How did you hear about it?"

Lois laffed. I saw her bleached-blue eyes bounce and almost cross craaaazy.

"Well, Nat. I flew out for a fund-raiser for your attorney general, Pat Brown—who's running for governor next year. Mr. Brown mentioned the appeal, and also the fact that Vice President Nixon will be touring South America next spring, where Communist-backed protests against Chessman's death sentence and American foreign policy in general have already been announced, which poses the question, 'How can one evil man command such attention, and what can we do about it?' "

Well now, baby. Here's where it gets really gooooooooood.

OUTSIDE THE HALL OF JUSTICE

Downtown L.A.
10/17/57

Oooga-booooga. There's the protest. That's two hundred college kids. Note the Party putzes passing out ten-spots. They're buying a Commie cacophony. The kids are chugging out chants: "Chess-Man is Inn-O-Cent!!! Stop the Death Machine!!!"

There's Brando. He's in with the kids. He's signing autographs and popping a placard high in the sky. He's the solo celebrity. He's top-lining this gig. He's wrapped in a fulsome phalanx of fans. He's a hog for their loooooooove.

The Spring Street sidewalk shook with their shouts. I curb-crawled and slid my sled inch-by-inch slow. I looked for Lois. I saw her not. I circled Spring to Temple and drove around the block. I saw counterpickets congregate. Their signs said BURN CHESSMAN NOW!!! They were weary working stiffs. The college kids packed more panache.

I full-circled the shit show and shot back to Spring. I saw a solo college boy by the bus stop. He looked bored.

Heh, heh. I had the antidote for that.

I pulled up. He saw me. I waved him up to the car. He ambled on over. Man—this kid's entrenched in ennui.

I said, "Hey, junior. How'd you like to make a C-note for a half hour's work?"

He said, "Doing what?"

I held up a stack of my Marlon Brando fotos. They're a cool cultural touchstone and define our time and place. It's Mr. Mumbles, gobbling schvantz.

Junior perused the pix. Junior's jaw jerked and dropped to his drawers. He filched the fotos. I laid out the loot.

He said, "Gee, thanks."

I said, "Distribute these to your pals. What's a protest without some smut? Maybe he'll autograph them."

—

I went back to work. I had four more listening posts to dismantle and disencumber. The microbe moved within me. Lois lived within me. Janey Blaine bloomed off by herself. Justice for Caryl Chessman? Fuck that shit. Justice for Janey and Shirley Tutler.

Left brain/right brain. My paid work boded boring. That protest prodded me proactive. I felt radicalized and detectivized. My brain quadrants melded and merged. I realized this:

The Sweetzer listening post. It's Bug-and-Tap Central. We kept the master bug-and-tap logs for all the posts there. That meant all the typed transcripts. Going aaaaalll the way back to Confidential's first issue. It's got aaaalll the callers' and callees' names and fone numbers. It's nothing but names, names, and names. It's the ripe repository of L.A. vice.

It's still a long long shot. But confluence causes coincidence. It's who you know and who you blow. L.A. vice. That wicked world. Everybody knows everybody. Everybody talks. And Confidential had that wicked world wired.

I drove over and let myself in. It was midday musty. I kicked on the air-conditioning and cooled the place off. The master logs ran to eighty-eight volumes. Twelve for '52/seventeen for '53/eleven for '54/eighteen for '55/twenty-one for '56/nine for '57. My confluence was Chessman/Blaine/the Rebel Without a Cause connection.

The convergence culminated in '55. The Rebel shoot ran from March to May. Nick's Knights escalated in May. The loose Chessman chatter escalated in May. Janey was murdered in May. I knew of no bug-and-tap mounts at the Marmont. That might or might not mean they weren't there. Bernie Spindel installed independent of me. The Marmont was a mother lode of L.A. vice. Certain units had to have been bugged and tapped.

I didn't need to hear voices. I needed typed transcripts and named names. I pulled Log #9/May–June '55. I noted a Marmont bug-and-tap listed. I finger-walked to page 483.

I noticed the names first. "Voices ID'd as actors Nick Adams and Dennis Hopper." I noted the listed location: "Bungalow 21 D/Chateau Marmont." I knew who lived there in May '55. It was Nabob Nick Ray.

I'm a bug-and-tap pro. I know the work. This talk reads like a living room conversation.

I get it. Nick and Dennis Hopper. They're alone in Big Nick's boss bungalow suite. It's 5/14/55. Something Robbie Molette said tweaked me.

Nick Ray's "alternative movie." It refracts Rebel and then some.

The bug's laid in a lamp or wired to a wall. The transcriber typed out bursts of static, dead air, and this:

Adams: "The boss has got some more escalation shit he's concocting. He's calling it the 'final filmic thrust.' "

Hopper: "I think he's a fucking psycho. That's why I've kept my distance with him."

Adams: "All geniuses are psycho. Look at Bird and Lucretia Borgia. You don't get one without the other."

Hopper: "Nick's out of his gourd. He keeps hopping around the set, asking everyone from the camera guys to the grips, 'Can you spell the word rape?' "

That was it. The conversation coughed to static and dead air. I found the work order and the transcriber's signature at the bottom. Bernie Spindel ran the gig.

We met at Googie's. I'd read the rest of the May transcripts. Nothing else slammed me. "Final filmic thrust." "Can you spell the word rape*?"* The conversation occurred 5/14/55. Janey Blaine was raped and killed 5/18. Confluence abets consequence. I grokked a cause and effect.

We sipped coffee. Bernie said, "I remember the job, but it wasn't for the magazine. Whatever you're looking at, this conversation plays sideways to."

I lit a cigarette. "Who put in the work order?"

"The security chief at Warner's. He didn't trust Nick Ray not to go over budget, and he didn't trust him with all that young pulchritude around. He was just keeping tabs for the studio execs. It was a nothing kind of Hollywood job. I did all the transcriptions, and nothing I ever heard was worth a shit."

I said, "Shit."

Bernie said, "Yeah, 'Shit.' Just what I said. One thing you should check, though. One of my guys misfiled a bunch of the May transcripts in the July log. Since the gig never came to anything, I just let it lie."

Lois Nettleton at thirty. The second time I saw her for the first time.

Gaunt subsumes goooood-looking. She's winsome and wary, all wound up. She's much more of whatever made her. She's a runner stirred in the starting blocks. She'll run from you but not herself.

Once again. Lois the Lithe. My midnight caller. We're outside Dale's Secret Harbor. She's boxed in a booth. She's haloed in a heathered crewneck sweater and cord slacks.

I walked up. She saw me. She closed her eyes and probably prayed. It was a whew!!! prayer. We worked through conduits and cupids. Her sudden summons worked.

She talked to the phone. I pulled out the Chessman/Jimmy D. letter and placed it flat on the booth glass. Chessman rags Shirley Tutler. He adamantly admits the assault.

I gripped the door hinge. Lois laid her hand there and laced up our fingers. I heard the phone drop.

We got naked and tumbled to bed. We didn't do it. We conjured a rainstorm, like last time. It time-machined two years away. It rained hard and hurled hailstones. We sealed our circuit of time lost. '55 to '57—our window view's a wonderland by nite.

It was now. We did what we did then. We kicked the sheets off and burrowed deep-deep. I told her how I found the letters. I forgave her Janey Blaine blurts to the press. She winced and wept at that. I put it off to pillow talk. I didn't tell her I killed a man to spare her exposure.

Lois talked. She said Chessman's L.A. court date had been moved up. We had forty-eight hours to make the meet and no more. I talked. I said Ernie Roll retired. Bill McKesson had his job now. He was a tough piece of goods. Bill Parker would have to persuade him. Lois said, The Chief should see the letters. I said, He should. She said, I want to read every one.

The bedroom spun. It arced on an axis in sync with the rain. It rendered me reluctant and muzzled me mute. I wanted to riff, ramble, and laff. I wanted to predict our prosaic future beyond this sacred cause. I stayed still. Our future ended at the green room. We both knew that.

Lois grabbed my briefcase and walked to the kitchen. She left the door open. She chain-smoked and drank coffee and read Chessman's letters. I watched her. She wept and kept her sobs as mute as me.

I hid in her heartbeats. Her silent sobs put me to sleep. Time hurtled haywire. She slid into bed and moved me to murmurs. I said, "Do you love me?"

She said, "I'll think about it."

THE SWEETZER LISTENING POST

West Holly*weird*
10/18/57

Escalation.”

“Final filmic thrust.”

“Can you spell the word rape?”

All synced to Janey Blaine’s date of death.

I popped into the post. Bernie’s boys misfiled some May ’55 transcripts. They were master-filed here. I felt moon-mad in broad daylight. Lois was back. I was raking in righteous results.

I’d messengered a missive to Bill Parker. It included photostats of four Caryl Chessman to Jimmy Dean letters. Ernie’s out, Chief. Bill McKesson’s in. Remember that favor I asked? Twenty minutes with the Fiend?

Parker called McKesson and messengered me back. We got ten minutes with the Fiend.

I blew out of my pad then. I hopped to Hollywood and blitzkrieged Hollywood Station. I blew into the records room and cruised crime-scene pix. I found Shirley Tutler and Janey Blaine. ’48 meets ’55. Mulholland meets Beverly Glen. The abduction spot for Shirley. The probable dump spot for Janey. Five fotos total. They were point-by-point duplicates.

Here’s what’s hair-raising. The ’55 foliage had been trimmed back to ’48 dimensions. I did not imagine this. I saw tree and leaf clippings on the ground.

Escalation meets replication.

I locked myself up in the listening post. I pulled the July ’55 book and skimmed for misfiles. I found the Nick Ray/Chateau Marmont work order. The room-bug transcripts preceded the fone taps. The room bugs revealed jack shit.

Neuter Nick blathers and bloviates. Jimmy D. and Nick A. blather back. Nick pokes Nifty Natalie and Sassy Sal on the couch. Bernie’s notes note “low and high-pitched grunts and sounds of sexual frenzy.” Fourteen pages of garbled-voice overlap follow that.

I hit the phone-tap transcripts. The section ran sixty-two pages. A separate column listed callers. It got boring, fast.

Nick Ray calls Googie’s forty-three times. Cal the counter man picks up. Nick calls Jimmy/Nick A./Natalie and Sal. They discuss movie motivation. Nick promotes underage woof-woof.

Nick calls his agent. Nick calls twenty-nine unknown men and women. Forty-one unknown men and women call Nick. Bad-boring to languorous and long-winded. No ripe revelation. No talk worth jack shit.

I hit twenty-six pages of fone static. Bernie marked it as such. I hit a noodle-nudging non sequitur: Nick calls NO-65832 nineteen times.

It’s a pay phone in Silver Lake. It’s by the Black Cat Bar at Sunset and Vendome. Bernie lists it as a “known bookie drop.”

Nick and Unknown Man #21 talk. It’s 99.9 percent voice voids and static crunch. Yeah—but there’s nuggets in with the dross.

Nick, 5/11/55. Bookie Call #8: “Setups,” “lights,” “the girl.” Interlaced static throughout. Eleven minutes of line static follow.

Unknown Man #21, 5/13/55. Bookie Call #9: “Props,” “the ’46 Ford,” “some sort of real-life location.” Interlaced static throughout. Sixteen minutes of line static follow.

Nick, 5/14/55. Bookie Call #16: “Of course, Jimmy wants to play the Bandit.” Interlaced static throughout. Four minutes of line static follow.

Three more pay-phone calls follow. There’s no transcribed talk. So what? Calls 8, 9, and 16 dumped the dirt.

The calls precede the Janey Blaine snuff. It’s movie talk. “Props,” “lights,” “setups.” Janey’s “the girl.” Caryl Chessman drove a “ ’46 Ford” on his rape jobs. Mulholland and Beverly Glen is the “real-life location.” Jimmy wants to play the (Red Light) Bandit? If the shitbird weren’t dead, he could do just that.

The booth calls belatedly bugged me. I considered them conclusive. They surged circumstantial. The “ ’46 Ford” cinched the whole deal. I wanted more. I wanted to place Janey Blaine’s killer in that phone booth.

I called Al Wilhite at Headquarters Vice. He knew that booth and the bookie-drop gestalt. He said, "Freddy, it's just a run-of-the-mill pay phone. Yeah, it sees a lot of bookie traffic—because bookies book a lot of action at the Black Cat. But what's to stop some neighborhood denizen with no phone from making calls there? Or your two callers arranging calls there, because the callee lives in the neighborhood, and he doesn't want his number listed on any calls-received list?"

It made sense. I drove by Sunset and Vendome and eyeballed the booth. I saw bookie types exit the Black Cat and enter the booth. I saw them take and make calls and fill out bet slips. I got half gassed at the Cat. I called up concepts and threaded theories through my head. One stuck stern and held.

Phone calls. Letters. Codes of communiqué. Caryl Chessman writes to Jimmy Dean. Jimmy probably writes back. It's Nick Ray's repugnant replication film. Wouldn't Neuter Nick want to talk to Caryl Chessman—at least once?

I whipped west. The concept coursed through me. I ran by the Ranch Market. I kept my Rebel cast and crew records check paper there. I ran through the address index. Nein and nyet. Nobody lived near Sunset and Vendome/the Black Cat.

Nick Ray called Chessman. I sensed it. Death row cons caught calls at the attorney room. The Quentin switchboard put them through. Nick Ray called Chessman in May '55. His hotel bungalow was bugged and tapped. He might have sensed it. I was hurling heat at him then. What would he do? He'd place a switchboard call.

I moseyed over to the Marmont. I badged a dippy desk clerk and played special deputy. I laid it out. Nicholas Ray/the Rebel shoot/May '55. Did Mr. Ray make any switchboard calls, here in the flesh?

The clerk said he seemed to recall it. He was on the desk that month. He checked his call records and went all aglow.

Here it is. Now, I remember. He called San Quentin Penitentiary. He spoke for fourteen minutes, and he used that phone right here at the desk.

I slid him a C-note. He palmed it, perfecto. I went all dippy disingenuous.

I would never accuse you of eavesdropping, but—

Well, I recall one thing that Mr. Ray said. He said, "Jimmy and I consider you our technical adviser."

I checked the call list. The call went through at 3:16 p.m., 5/17/55. Janey Blaine was murdered the next morning.

OUTSIDE CITY HALL

Downtown L.A.
10/19/57

Picket punks. Slogan slammers. College kids and movie morons moved to outrage. Their main martyr's up in the DB. He's hard-wired to a hot seat. We're heading that way.

"Chessman Is Inn-O-Cent!!!" "Stop The Death Machine!!!"

I ran interference. Lois lugged a prop steno machine. Picket punks posed and paraded. They were packed tight and pissed off. They bristled with bromides and placard-plumed the air.

I stiff-armed us through them. We maneuvered by Marlon Brando. Lois said, "Hi, Marlon!" Brando said, "Lois, what are you doing with that putz?" I flipped his necktie in his face.

There's the steps. We tumbled over, up, and inside. Max Herman and Red Stromwall played escort. They doffed their Hat Squad fedoras. Max ogled Lois. Red went Woo-woo!!!

We made the freight lift and the DB. We walked to sweatbox row. The Fiend's in #2. I looked at Lois. She looked at me. I winked. We held the Holy Shit moment close and linked hands. I pushed the door in.

There he is.

Beelzebub. 666. The Biblical Beast. The red-horned/trident-tailed/cloven-hoofed apparition. He emits dust and sparks. Serpents coil through his hair. He's assumed human form today. He's thirty-six and pale. He's got that bumpy nose. He's skinny, he's prissy, he wears jail denims. He vibes World's Smartest Convict.

He sat cross-legged. I pulled a chair up. Lois perched her steno machine on the table. I brought my briefcase.

Chessman said, "You were at Hollywood Station. I recall you at the squadroom there."

The Beast speaks. He's a brazen braggart. I know that about him. He's brought his so-soft voice today. He's surgically circumspect and silky self-effacing. He's the watchful world's Victim of This Time and Place. He's Sacco and Vanzetti, and Timothy Evans, framed for Reg Christie's grief.

I said, "Yes, I was there. I saw Colin Forbes and Al Goossen interview you, and I was there when Shirley Tutler came in."

Chessman said, "Who's Shirley Tutler?"

"She's the woman you assaulted between your assaults on Regina Johnson and Mary Alice Meza. I state that knowing full well that you've denied those crimes, and will certainly deny assaulting Miss Tutler."

I let the moment meander and metamorphose. He'll deny it. He'll say there's no proof. Lois futzed with her machine. Dear Lord, her eyes. Such righteous hate.

"I don't have to talk to you. The court will invalidate the stenographer's transcription, and I surely will not confess to yet another crime I did not commit."

I popped my briefcase. I pulled out the forty-three-page depiction of Shirley Tutler's bite wounds. I put the pages before the Beast's eyes.

He looked down. He saw, he recognized, he willed himself nonreactive. His hands palsied, his neck veins pulsed.

"It's not my handwriting. And even if it was, I've attributed those crimes to someone else."

I lit a cigarette. "You only looked at the top page. You don't know it's crimes plural you've described here. I didn't mention the attribution, and the only way you could have known that was if you'd written this document yourself."

Chessman pushed the pages back to me. He's Camus' l'étranger. He's beset by bourgeois burghers who just don't understand. He's implacably withstood their stupidity and indifference. He's read Gandhi and Sartre. He knows how to trenchantly transcend.

He said, "No." That one word. Existentialism 101. To refuse is your right of redress.

I passed him a pen. "You will write the following on that top page. 'These are my crimes, as told to the late actor James Dean, and attributed to an unnamed rapist. Thus, they are my crimes, and these documents in the aggregate stand as my confession.' "

Chessman said, "No." The Beast's beset by Bourgeois Burgher Freddy. It's his lot in life. Who's that red-haired wraith? She's rape bait, for sure.

Chessman said, "No." I backhanded him and banged him to the floor. He went sullen silent and nonreactive. Bourgeois Burgher Freddy kicked him in the balls.

"You have two choices here, Caryl. Sign the confession or get kicked to death. The latter option leaves you no option. The former option permits you to survive, cultivate yet more public acclaim, and further dissemble in court."

Chessman shape-shifted. He went maladroit Mahatma, coming off the railroad tracks. He couldn't call up a costume change. He couldn't shave his head and don his granny specs.

He stood up. He winced from my nut shot. He wrote out my confession text and signed his name below.

Lois said, "Jimmy Dean wanted to play you. That must have appealed to your vanity."

Chessman said, "Hi, Red. I knew you'd have a kicky voice."

I locked his confession in my briefcase. Chessman kicked back in his chair.

"I'm beyond vanity, Red. I've seen too much and had too much done to me. You're a woman, so I'm sure you'll understand."

I said, "Too bad Jimmy crapped out. I would've dug on the movie."

Chessman said, "There's always Nick Ray's alternative movie, not that it will ever surface. I was the technical adviser on it, so I'm sure it's got some verisimilitude."

Lois said, "Things went awry there, didn't they? It seems that always happens with you."

Chessman shrugged and grinned. Ring-a-ding. The Mahatma meets the Rat Pack.

"The game's rigged, Red. That's why I always take what I want, and take it where I can find it. And I always find it, because I'm not choosy. Johnson, Meza, and Tutler surely attest to that."

That's it, then. It took eight minutes and sixteen seconds.

I hustled Lois out to the hallway. The wall speaker spritzed and sparked static. Bill Parker and the Hats hooted, howled, and clapped.

I had no name/no at-the-scene proof/no certified murder suspect. I had the infernal inspiration for the crime itself and the cancerous contexts that had caused it. Lois and I laid siege to the Bacillus chessmanitis. At some point of prickly protraction, the strain would strangle by gas. That was the unforeseen then. Janey Blaine revenged ran me resolute now.

I dropped Lois at the hotel and nudged north-northwest. I hit Mulholland and Beverly Glen. The two crime-scenes crisscrossed and merged as one hellish whole.

’48 to ’55. The perfectly preserved historical location. Jimmy D. didn’t kill Janey. Ditto, Nick Ray. It was some suck-ass subaltern. He’d prowled Janey’s pad. He rifled her desk and jizzed up her undies. Somebody stole Robbie Molette’s list of Janey’s johns. That somebody was circling Janey in advance of the alternative film. Nick Ray called that man at the pay phone by the Black Cat. They discussed the details of the shoot. The Hats cleared Robbie Molette’s dad. The killer was a Rebel set flunky. He possessed technical and/or logistical skills. He 459’d Robbie’s pad. That meant he knew Robbie. That meant Robbie knew something about him.

I walked the merged crime scenes. I climbed hills and claimed clues. I found used flashbulbs off the Mulholland embankment. That meant photography. It linked the lead of the used flashbulbs at the Demo fund-raiser site. He was stalking Janey then. It was furtive foreplay. He knew Janey would be there to culminate with Jack K. Robbie set Janey up with Jack. That meant Mr. X knew Robbie.

I humped hillsides. I claimed clues. I found a roll of red cellophane by a tree trunk. Red cellophane. It covered the headlights on Chessman’s ’46 Ford. It covered the headlights of the ’46 Ford prop car Nick Ray discussed with Mr. X. The Red Light Bandit posed as a cop. Jimmy revived the role. This red cellophane was weathered and worn. It looked to be two-plus years old.

Robbie didn’t kill Janey Blaine. He showed me his foto ID once. He had O-positive blood. The killer had AB-negative blood. His jizz secreted his blood type. Robbie had a name for me. I sensed it, sure thing.

The wheelman lot. There’s Robbie. He’s listlessly lounged by the lube rack. The lot’s listless, today. There’s no trabajo, no divorce dinero.

I pulled in and hit my horn. Robbie rubbed his eyes and walked over.

I popped the passenger door. Robbie scooched in. I passed him my flask. We traded pops and glommed up a glow.

"I had a few questions about Janey."

Robbie said, "Boy, that's sure old news."

I smiled. "Well, something's come up."

Robbie heh-hehed. "You mean Fat Boy doesn't fit the bill anymore? Not that he ever did, to the cognoscenti."

I went nix. "I'm recalling something you said, and how you said it wistfully. You said, 'Well, she resisted me,' and I'd like you to elaborate on that."

Robbie choked up. "Aw, Freddy. Don't make me say it."

"Say what, Robbie? That you were in love with her?"

Robbie wiped his eyes on his sleeve. Robbie blew his nose on his shirttail.

"Okay, I'll say it. I was in love with her."

"And your dad set you up with her. And she joined your stable at the hotel."

Robbie said, "You're rubbing it in. I divested the stable, as you damn well know. I'm a wheelman now. I'm on the straight and narrow."

That made me laff. "Your dad introduced you to Janey, right?"

"No. Chrissy, my sister, did. She knew Janey, independent of my dad. Even before she got her contract at Metro."

"Are you saying they were pals? Running partners?"

Robbie snatched the flask and deep-dunked it. He got this kid wild-man glow.

"Chrissy and Janey were movie-mad. They costarred in these jive, skeevy-ass shorts. You know, so-called experimental films where nobody gets paid, you never see the flicks in theaters, but copies circulate. I'm not calling them smut, but I'd call them 'bodice rippers,' with a lot of skin and some pretty smutty scenes, if you get what I mean."

I said, "Keep going. Don't make me prompt you."

Robbie deep-dunked. "They were historical-type pastiches, and they were all based on famous crimes where women got raped and sliced. You know, The Last Days of the Black Dahlia, Fatty Arbuckle and Virginia Rappe, the girls that guy Otto Stephen Wilson shanked. Chrissy always played the sidekick, and Janey always played the victim. That's how they met, and how they got tight."

I said, "Who made the films? I mean photographed and directed them?"

Robbie said, “I don’t know. Just some fucko movie guys who wanted to push women around and see some skin.”

“Did any guys like that work on the Rebel shoot?”

“Not that I know of.”

“Did you know that a film like the ones you described was being shot, and that it pertained to Caryl Chessman?”

“No, but it don’t surprise me, because, like I told you back then, that sick twist Jimmy Dean was all hopped up to play Chessman, and that yet sicker twist Nick Ray was promoting the idea. I also passed you the tip on that so-called alternative film.”

I lit a cigarette. “Do you know a bar in Silver Lake called the Black Cat?”

“Yeah. It’s a bookie joint by day and a fag joint by night.”

“All right. Did you know anyone from the Rebel shoot who lived near there? Right off of Sunset and Vendome?”

Robbie shook his head. “Not exactly. Not back in ’55, I didn’t.”

“What do you mean?”

“Well, I knew a guy who lived up the hill from there, and who frequented the Cat, and who moved his studio to a couple of doors down from the Cat, maybe last year.”

I tensed up. Say the name, Robbie. We just tipped telepathic. I should have tapped the guy already. I nabbed the name a split second back.

“And?”

“And, what? It’s Arvo Jandine. He was the unit fotog on Rebel, and he’s another sick twist of the Jimmy and Nick Ray ilk. He don’t strike me as the killer type, so that’s why I didn’t mention him when you started in on the Rebel guys.”

I shut my eyes. I saw it. Jandine. The Rebel records checks. He’s a whipout man. He habituates junior high schools. He invades girls’ locker rooms. He’s a photographer. He snapped stills at the Liquor Store Inferno.

Plus, the dope raid. Jandine’s flop. The bikini pic from Robbie’s girl book.

Robbie said, “Freddy’s in a trance. It’s like he’s on some new species of hop that’s just been discovered.”

I opened my eyes. “You said ‘sick twist.’ ”

“Yeah. He’s the guy who took those beaver pix of Chrissy. That, and he whipped it out on my mom.”

I reshut my eyes. Robbie said, “Do you ever get ashamed of your life, Freddy?"

I said, "Only most of the time."

—

Escalation. Mine and his. I escalated my efforts to know him. I escalated my master plan and primed it for profit. I called LAPD Vice and filched a full fotostat of Arvo Jandine's green sheet. It revealed his rude escalation.

Arvo Jandine, one sizzling sick twist. Born 6/8/19, bumfuck Nebraska. Arvo's a shifty shutterbug. He's sneaking snaps in girls' locker rooms, eeeaaarly.

His first bust is back in Omaha, '37. He's peddling candid nudes at CCC camps and WPA wingdings. He's sent to a compassionate youth camp. It's committedly coed. He wires the girls' locker room and rigs an automatic shutter flap. He compiles and catalogues candid nudes by the thousands. He escapes and peddles the pix at truck stops and gin mills throughout the Midwest. He's Mr. Smut now. He makes his move and hotfoots it here.

He becomes a unit fotog. He pops pix at Paramount and calls Columbia home. He rigs automatic shutter flaps in female stars' dressing rooms. They snap sneak pix on overdrive. He's Mr. Beaver Bounty and Mr. Stark Naked Star. Word of mouth mainlines him to the L.A. Perv Elite. He manufactures nude actress trading cards. Myrna Loy, Carole Lombard, Norma Shearer. Rita Hayworth, Ella Raines. One Ann Sheridan trumps two Betty Grables. He spawns a craaaaazy craze. He makes a fat fortune. The fuzz fox him and entrap him. He sells shunt shots to an undercover cop and gets five to eight in quivering Quentin.

He's paroled in '49. He returns to L.A. He's Mr. Subtle till his fall '51 flameout. He gots to have it/see it/fotograph it young now. He's popped outside Le Conte Junior High, June '52. He does eighteen months at Chino and pops out on parole—January '54.

He's escalated. He's ready to collaborate. He seeks sick twists who twirl to his delirious delusions. He finds his way to Nick Ray and Rebel Without a Cause. He's cringingly crossed the path of Freon Freddy Otash. That's where Arvo erred.

Escalation. His and MINE.

I creeper-crawled Sunset and Vendome and stared at storefronts.

Jandine Art Photography was two doors down from the Black Cat.

Noxious nitefall fell. I wound my way west to the Fox lot. Nick Ray was shooting his latest lox there.

Party Girl. Robert Taylor and Cyd Charisse. Costarring studly John Ireland. Jungle John's Hollywood's reigning tape topper. He measures in at a mighty 171/2.

I knew all the gate guards on the Fox lot. I knew I could bluff my way in.

I did. I cited a pokerfest at Pandro Berman's office. The guard bought it. I slid him a C-note. I parked my Packard pimpmobile and noodled over to Nick Ray's bungalow.

I burgled my way inside and paved paths by penlight. I planted a mini-mike and a battery pack under Neuter Nick's desk. It was a flip-switch gizmo. I'd flip said switch on Judgment Day.

It was 11:14 p.m. I barged back to Silver Lake and orbed Jandine's studio. It was deep dark and devoid of all movement. I circled the block and saw a back door off the alley. I stashed my sled and slid on rubber gloves.

I carried a camera case and a Leica loaded with infrared film. I loped up like I owned the place. Two pick pokes popped the door. I locked myself in. My penlight paved paths once more.

I got the gestalt. Arvo lived for his work. I flash-flared three storerooms laid with lights and camera gear. I slid by a sleeping cubicle. Arvo conked on a couch-bed combo and cooked on a hot plate. He hung his threadbare threads in a freestanding wardrobe. The sink, shower, and toilet stall stank of rat turds and sprayed piss.

Arvo the obsessive. Arvo the unkempt. He'll keep malignant mementos. These sickniks save souvenirs.

The cubicle catty-cornered a corridor. My penlight lit a shut door. I nudged the knob. I got no give. I put picks in and pushed counterclockwise. The door gave and bent in.

It's one room. Ten by ten, tops. It's windowless and suction-sealed, tight. I tapped the walls and tipped a switch. Gooseneck floor lamps lit four walls of this:

The combined shoots. Rebel Without a Cause and Red Light Bandit. Glam glossies by Arvo Jandine.

Jimmy Dean in his red Rebel jacket. Nifty Natalie and Sassy Sal, costumed per the flick. Shots from the shoot. Shots from the Sorority Panty Raid. Shots from the Liquor Store Inferno. Natalie, nude. Sal, nude and nervously embarrassed. A nude Jimmy Dean, banging his bongos. Jimmy Dean, costumed as Caryl Chessman. The ’46 Ford rape car, replicated. Nite exteriors at Mulholland and Beverly Glen.

Janey Blaine done up as Shirley Tutler. Janey, with mock blood blotting her blouse. Janey and Jimmy, tussling in the Ford. Note Janey’s bare breasts.

Then we escalate. Note this wraparound wreath of shots:

See Janey, nude. See Janey and Jimmy, nude. See Janey and Jimmy coiled in coitus in the backseat of the Ford. See Janey in the clothes she wore to Frascati. See Janey body-dumped at the crime scene. She’s handspan-strangled and dead.

NABOB NICK RAY'S OFFICE

20th-Century Fox

10/20/57

I sat and tamped up some tension. I conjured Lois and moved money to new mountains on the moon. Nick notched his final take an hour back. His office slaves slid out early. I booby-trapped the doorway. I kept the lights off. I brought Exhibits A and B in my briefcase.

My pix of Jandine's pix. My pix of his diary pages per Red Light Bandit. He kept his diary cached under his couch-bed. He kept his Junior High Hall of Fame pix close by.

Jandine recounted his revelatory fix on Janey Blaine. He met her at Robbie Molette's place. Chrissy introduced them and called her a friend of her dad's. Janey got him unit fotog work on The Last Days of the Black Dahlia and the Fatty Arbuckle flick.

His obsession per-per-percolated. He 459'd Janey's pad and stole her diaries. He read them and got to the hard-hearted heart of her yen for men and money. He tried to seduce her with his own blackmail scheme. He enlisted Nick Adams. They Mickey Finn'd Rock Hudson and took nudie pix. He 459'd Robbie's room and stole his list of powerfully perved clients. Janey laffed his blackmail scheme off. He fotographed Janey and Jack K. at the Beverly Hills Hotel. He had the unit fotog gig on Rebel, already. He ran up a rapport with Nick Ray and Jimmy Dean. They concocted Red Light Bandit. The shoot went swell. Janey jumped Jimmy's bones for real, right out in the open. It made him mad. He said he'd drive her home after the wrap. It got out of hand. He didn't mean to rape her and kill her. Shit like that happens. Thank goodness nobody blabbed.

The door opened. Nabob Nick hummed "Lisbon Antigua" and walked this way. My trip wire tripped him and proned him out flat on his face. His head hit the floor. He snagged his snout. He's Nosebleed Nick now.

He groaned. I got up and stepped on his neck. It pinned him and muzzled his mouth. I penlight-flashed the pix and the diary pages. I ran them by his flattened face sidelong and slooooow. I gave him time to digest his dilemma and ponder Jandine's every word.

"You're going to pay me twenty-five percent of your net earnings, for the rest of your life. That means twenty-five percent of every dime you make. You're going to cut me in for twenty-five percent of all your current bank balances, and you're going to liquidate any stocks and bonds you might possess and pay me twenty-five percent of their value, now. You're going to pay me twenty-five percent of the assessed values of any properties you might own, now. You will pay me my salary cuts on the first of each month, beginning on November 1, 1957. I called your bank in Beverly Hills this afternoon. I impersonated a Federal bank examiner and learned that your current balance is forty-four grand. We're going to the bank together, tomorrow. I'll take the first eleven grand in cash."

Nick Ray squirmed and squinted back tears. Freon Freddy Otash. The Giant Ant ascends.

Low clouds unzipped and reigned rain. I broomed northeast to Sunset and Vendome. I parked on that same side street and sidled to the same back door.

The same two picks popped the lock. I stepped inside and eeeaaased the door shut. I heard his snores, straight off.

The sleep cubicle. Eight paces and flank sharp right.

I brought a .44 Magnum revolver. It blasted loud. The pro suppressor soaked up all attendant sound. I walked toward the snores and flashed my penlight. It haloed Arvo's face on the pillow. I aimed and fired six shots.

He vaporized. I smelled dissipation and desiccation in the bone-and-blood mist. I snatched his diary and his wall-to-wall fotos. I jacked the wall heat up to ninety. Let the demon decompose.

KKXZ RADIO

Southside L.A.
10/21/57

Jolting jam session. Walloping world premiere. Live in-studio: the Synagogue Sid Trio.

The piece:

"Trippy Triptych: Dirge for Shirley Tutler and Janey Blaine & Caryl Chessman's Gas Chamber Chaconne."

It's hastily composed. As in right now. Sid and his boys embody improvisation. There's four kool kats here for the bash. As in Lois, Robbie Molette, Nasty Nat, and yours truly.

We're celebrating. I bought KKXZ outright and dumped the deed on Nat. Nick Ray paid the freight. I pocketed two g's in chump change and paid Lois' air-fare back to the Apple. She's got an Armstrong Circle Theatre gig pending.

I'm bleak, blue, and shorn to shit. We defanged the Beast. We radically revised the sexy secret history of our nation. Lissome Lois leaves me for ten minutes on TV.

Sid and his boys cranked it. Bass sax/flügelhorn/drums. It only goes so far.

I got itchy and Giant Ant antsy. I kept thinking of fatal fuckups and the loony lore of decomposition. I walked to the waiting room and ran some deep breaths.

It helped. I de-antsified. I scoped the Charlie Parker tribute wall. I noticed a new screed scrawled below the Live on 52nd Street album.

"Pack up all your cares and woes / Here you go, swingin' low / Bye, bye, blackbird."

It was signed, "Much love, Lois N."

INFERNAL INTERMEZZO:

My Pensively Pent-up Life

10/22/57–5/1/60

It came and went. Confidential, the whole Rebel rigamarole. I waltzed on the Arvo Jandine snuff. Decomposition devastated all possible inquiries. Stagnant stomach gasses gasped out of the stiff and ignited. The studio blew up. Nobody made it a murder.

I burned all of the listening-post tapes and tape logs. Confidential and I went kaput. The mag moseys along without me. Bondage Bob's been raked by residual lawsuits. Savaged celebs now savage him. He's putting out ten and fifteen g's per pop. Nuisance suits are draining him dry. The mag's corrosive content has wizened to wispy white bread. There's no vindictive va-va-voom and scandal skank. There's no strongarm goons to dash dissent and fight that fierce First Amendment fight.

I'm shit out of luck there. I'm Ex-Officio Freddy. I'm a former PI and a dervish of divorce at the wheelman lot. I shook the shakedown tree and bled Nosebleed Nick Ray for a spell. Sustained extortion withered my wig. I blew my take on booze, dope, and women. I sold myself into sin and saw a certain sickness eat me alive. I divested to climb clear of the serpent sucking at my soul. I told Nosebleed Nick this. He genuflected and wept.

Opportunity is love. I've always known it. I doped a racehorse named Wonder Boy and tried to rig a run of races. I got popped for it. The L.A. DA issued indictments. Bill Parker interceded and rerouted my Quentin trek. I lost my PI's license. I'm still Big Bill's back-door bitch and informant. I'm still a rat, a fink, a snarky snitch. I've gone from tattle tyrant to tattletale. It's the work I'm best suited for.

I'm still the Pervdog of the Nite. I still trawl for trouble and peep potent windows in my path. I've cruised and crashed a load of lives on said path to date. I'm lonely in my loss of them. I peep them from afar and peruse the paths they've chosen.

Jack the K. was resoundingly reelected to the Senate. ’58 boded big for him. Pat Brown was elected governor of California. The Confidential trial trounced the notion that Pat was a putz. Rock and Phyllis are Splitsville. I negotiated the divorce. Nick Ray remains the awful auteur. He makes miasmic movies that slide folks to sleep. The Rebel rigamarole marked his slide into evil. Confluence is destiny. He had help there.

Jimmy D.’s dead. I killed Arvo Jandine. Natalie Wood and Sal Mineo are movie stars. Nick Adams has his own TV show. Chester Voldrich lost the hand I mangled to gangrene. I slide him five yards a month, anonymous.

I see them all as the specious spawn of Caryl Whittier Chessman. The cancerous conjunction of vicious thug/victim/hard-hearted hipster left them too weak to resist. Escalation. The Sorority Panty Raid, the Liquor Store Inferno, the film Red Light Bandit. Spring ’55 et al. Chessman hovers in ellipsis. I cannot and will not forfeit the thought of him. He’s insistently intertwined with Lois Nettleton. They collectively colluded and marked my one shot to become someone else.

Chessman continues. He files appeals and writes books and claims the ownership of a fatuous phalanx of folks given to dime-store notions of redemption. He’ll fry sooner or later. I trust that legal consensus. Here’s what my most heated hatred and powerful perceptions tell me.

He’s struck Lois with a strain of his virus. It lives within that part of her where the hard-hearted careerist and ardent artist coexist. Lois worships a tricky trinity. It’s Art/Chessman/Shirley Tutler’s Desecration. She found me because she needed me and sensed my susceptibility and rage for romance. She’s discarded me twice now. She sees me as a Chessman casualty, as I see her. She knows that I’m love-struck in a way that careerist-artists are not. I torch for her as she does not torch for me. She’s unfit to live a squarejohn life. So am I. I’d try it with her. She won’t try it with me. I must change my life. She will not abet this design. She considers the design pathetic and inimical to her Drama of the Artist Alone. I’ve got one last shot at Lois Nettleton’s love. I consider it a curtain call. We must stand together the day Chessman burns.

THE GREEN ROOM

San Quentin Penitentiary
5/2/60

There it is. This stark steel contraption. It's ghastly ghost green and riven with rivets and big bolts. It faces the spectator seats. It fits one condemned convict. The door's plied with a Plexiglas window staring straight at us. The hot seat features cinchable restraints. A vat socked with sulfuric acid sits beneath it. The cyanide pellets scoot through a chute and dissolve there. Thus begins the big adios.

I sat with Lois. Bill Parker booked our seats. Colin Forbes sat two seats down. Chessman drew a full house. Sixty seats. Sixty newsmen, politicos, and those with clear-cut clout.

We parked in a lower lot and pried through protesters to get here. A thousand people jostled, jeered, shoved, and shrieked. Marlon Brando mugged into a megaphone. He told the folks he was set to play Chessman in a forthcoming flick.

It's 10:01 a.m. There's the Beast. He's entered through a side hallway. Two guards hold his arms. A third guard pops the door. They strap Chessman hard in the hot seat. He's strapped legs, lap, and chest.

A doctor appears. He hangs a stethoscope around Chessman's neck. The death dudes pop back out. Chessman's alone in the green room. It's 10:02 a.m.

The Warden spoke. Wall speakers sent sound our way.

"Do you have any last words?"

Chessman said, "I am not the Red Light Bandit."

A green-room mike cranked out his credo. I winked at Colin Forbes. Colin went Freddy, you dog. Lois caught it and swatted my leg.

The pellets dropped. It was soundless. I saw Chessman feign nonchalance. Cyanide fumes filled the chamber. They were invisible. Chessman buckled and gasped and dripped drool.

His head lolled and sat sideways. His mouth stretched wide-wide. His lips curled over his teeth. His tongue torqued. His arms trembled and palsied palms-up. He looked sure-as-shit deadsville to me.

Time slipped slow and stood still. The fumes dissipated and died. The doctor reentered the green room. He held a handkerchief to his face. He donned his stethoscope and put it to Chessman's chest. He said, "I pronounce this man dead."

Guards got us through the throng. Protesters pressed against us. Lois looked at them and waved at kids in papoose-style pouches. We trudged and tripped down some stairs. The slogan chants and shouts sheared off to a low roar.

We made the lower lot and my Packard pimpmobile. We lounged upside it and lit cigarettes.

I said, "Let's head into the city. I'll get us a suite at the Fairmont, and we'll lay low for a while."

Lois blew smoke rings. "I'm getting married, Freddy. I thought you should know."

I slumped into my sled. "Well, shit. Who is he?"

"He's a playwright, and he has his own radio show. Before you ask, I'll admit it. I took to calling in, and one thing led to another."

I laffed. "Okay. L.A., then. We'll hit Trader Vic's or Ollie Hammond's. I'll drop you at the airport tomorrow."

Lois said, "Marlon's driving me back. Don't look so glum, and don't pretend you don't know. It was always about the three of us, and with What's His Name gone, we'd just be fishing for compliments, and making conversation."

An evil rape-o burns. I lose the girl. My confession ends right here, right now.

The bridge traffic was brutal. News trucks traipsed to and from Quentin. Outbound cars carted slogan slammers and protest pros out to hatch havoc. Placards plumed out their windows. STOP THE DEATH MACHINE and KENNEDY IN '60. Hey, kids—I used to pimp and cop dope for that guy!!!

I dipped downbeat and bopped with the blues. Dig my big boo-hoo. Lost Lois and a dizzy decade out to castigate and confound me.

I'm shivering under my shroud. I'm a rogue cop and strongarm goon with too much past and no future to lose.

The traffic thinned. I hit the bridge and goosed the gas. It propelled me past a caravan of Kennedy kids. Sheer movement gored my gonads. L.A. was four hundred miles south. Opportunity is love. I'm gonesville, Daddy-O.

(LOS ANGELES, 8:23 P.M., SATURDAY, 8/4/62)

The drop ran eighty feet. The cliff was loose dirt and no footholds. We hauled shitbird up to the edge and showed him the view.

The Pasadena Freeway, southbound. Due north of the Chavez Ravine exit and downtown L.A. Steady traffic clocking through at 65-plus.

Shitbird was Richard Douglas Danforth/white male American/approximate age 36. No green sheet, no wants, no warrants. He's a bleak cat with a pachuco haircut and Sir Guy shirt.

I held his right arm. Max Herman held his left arm. Red Stromwall jammed his head down and force-fed him the view.

Freddy O. and the Hat Squad. We're at it again. Bill Parker says, "Jump." We say, "How high?" It's a kidnap job tonight.

Harry Crowder and Eddie Benson watchdogged Suspect #2. They stood him up by their prowl sled. They fed him the threats, the car noise, the view. He's Morris Hershel "Buzzy" Stein/WMA/age 42. His perv sheet dates back to 1938. He's a stat rape-o and psycho snout diver. Danforth and Stein were bought and paid for. Kidnap was a gas-chamber bounce.

This gig was strictly rogue and ad lib. Here's the gist:

A B-film actress named Gwen Perloff got strongarm snatched. It was late a.m., today. She lived in a cheese-luxe building up from the Strip. Three men grabbed her on the sidewalk. They wore Fidel Castro masks. Multiple eyewits saw them. They shoved her into a double-parked vehicle and jammed south. Said vehicle might have been a '58 Dodge or a '56 Chevy Nomad. Miss Perloff plays second leads in horror and dance-craze flicks. She's a 20th Century–Fox contract slave. The Strip is county turf. The L.A. Sheriff's caught the squawk, but—

Fox kingpin Darryl Zanuck got tipped off. Some unknown woman called him. She finked Danforth and Stein and spilled one of their two girl-stash locations. Zanuck called his tight pal, Bill Parker. Chief Bill bootjacked the kidnap job. He dispatched Freddy and the Hats to a house off 6th and Dunsmuir. We grabbed Danforth and Stein. Perloff was stashed elsewhere. Danforth and Stein refused to divulge the spot. Stein said there were three more snatch men still out there. They pulled the job, not him and Richie. Stein zipped it then. Harry and Eddie whomped him with sap gloves. Stein still kept it zipped. Ditto Danforth. That mandated the Death Threat and Freeway Drop Show.

I held Danforth's right arm. Max held his left arm. Red jammed his head down and force-fed him look-sees.

Max went Where's the girl? Red went Give it up or you fly. Harry, Eddie, and Pervdog Stein stood ten feet back from the drop.

It was August-in-L.A. hot and humid. Max and Red sweated through their shirts and suit coats. Danforth wriggled and squirmed. He dug his feet in and thrashed. Dirt clods skittered off the cliff. The fucking drop loomed.

I scoped Max and Red. They looked impatient. I clamped Danforth's arm. He buckled against me. My hand went numb. My legs fluttered. Max and Red ran six-four and 240. Their legs fluttered.

Red said, "You're wearing us thin, Richie. We can't keep this up all night. Tell us where the girl is, so we can walk away from here."

Danforth giggled and spit on Red's shoes. He said, "I'm having fun."

I slid on my brass knucks and kidney-punched him. He stifled a screech and dug his feet in. I looked over the cliff. Cars zigged by—fast, with no letup.

Max sighed. Red sighed. Max said, "Sink him, Freddy."

They dropped their hands. I shoved Danforth off the cliff. He treaded air for one split second. "It's a put-up job" came out garbled. I heard him hit a car roof. I heard brakes squeal. I heard wheels thump over him. Crisscrossed headlights lit him up. A pimpmobile Caddy dragged him against a guardrail and sheared off his feet.

2

(LOS ANGELES, 10:09 P.M., SATURDAY, 8/4/62)

We ran Code 3 to the Valley. Sheriff's black-and-whites blew past us. We two-car caravanned. I rode with Max and Red. Harry and Eddie took the pole slot.

We dumped Buzzy Stein with the DB guys at Highland Park station. Buzzy saw the drop show and finked a hostage pad in Encino. Gwen Perloff was stashed in a vacant bachelor crib off Woodman. The Fidel Castro dimwits hid her in a broom closet. Max called the lead Sheriff's IO. He ran the command out of the West Hollywood substation.

"Motel Mike" Bayless. Gloryhound cop and all-around nosebleed. He blew up four cholos at the Don José Motel, back in '50. The scalps went to his head. His wife and kids called him "Motel Mike." He named his dog Motel Mike Junior.

Six Sheriff's cars blew past us. The Ventura Freeway was all siren blare and hot lights. It vibed interagency grief. Bill Parker usurps a county job from Sheriff Pete Pitchess. Parker and Pitchess were film-biz suck-ups. Parker went rogue for Darryl F. Zanuck. Pitchess overplays the rescue. Old man Zanuck's shtupping Gwen Perloff. That's the key to this grief.

Max passed me his flask. I took two pops. It blew my sixteen days off the juice.

The jolt hit me. My brain waves sparked. I replayed the drop show. Danforth screeched "It's a put-up job." The snatch played unkosher. The Marie "The Body" McDonald job nudged me.

It's early '57. Marie's on the skids. The studios blackball her. Her nightclub act tanks. She concocts a jive kidnap tale. She says rough-trade boys abducted her and dumped her out near Palm Springs. She glommed brief headlines and saw it go pffft.

I brain-waved Buzzy Stein. He divulged the stash-hole location. He did not rat the Castro guys. He said they grabbed Gwen Perloff. The eyewit vehicle IDs did not comport with—

Max squelched my brain waves. “Danforth tried to escape. He took a wrong turn and went off the cliff. I stiffed a call to the Chief after I talked to Mike Bayless. He sent some AID guys out to clean up the mess. The Chief knows what’s what, but he likes our revised version better.”

Red laughed. “Motel Mike’s a bullshitter. He planted throwdown guns on those beaners he blew up. You want the punch line? They weren’t really righteous 211 guys. They tapped the till and swiped some beaver mags from a dirty-book stall, and took off running.”

I lit a cigarette. “Here’s what I don’t get. Bayless works SHIT—the Sheriff’s so-called Handpicked Intelligence Team—and we all know that intel is a big bug up Pete Pitchess’ ass.”

Max said, “Yeah. So, what’s Bayless doing shagging kidnap calls out of the West Hollywood squad?”

I made the jack-off sign. Two more Sheriff’s cars blew past us. We followed Harry and Eddie’s taillight blinks and cut to the far right lane. We hit the Woodman exit and hauled due north.

Ventura Boulevard held us back. We ran a red light and hit residential Encino. Sirens overlapped somewhere northeast. We blew a string of stop signs and caught a string of Sheriff’s sleds. We tailed them down a northbound alley. Said alley was narrow and way tight. We bumper-smashed trash cans and sent household shit airborne.

The alley dead-ended at Saticoy Street. Déjà vu ditzed me. I knew I’d been here before. My brain wires fritzed. I couldn’t place the context. This summer was half booze-and-dope blur.

The Sheriff’s cars swung east. Our two PD cars bird-dogged them.

The turf went downscale. Ranch spreads devolved to apartment blocks. Swinger joints. Schmooze pits. Stewardess crash pads. Fag cribs and bachelorette dumps for kept women.

And, this:

Eight Sheriff’s cars clustered outside the Tiki-Torch Village.

We fishtailed on over and skid-braked. Six uniformed deputies blocked the streetside entrance. They packed pump shotguns. Jumbo tiki torches flanked wrought-iron gates. It was San Fernando Valley hot. The torches leaked propane. The air reeked. The sky pressed down, explosive.

The Hats plus Freddy O. We’re here to observe. We killed one guy and locked one guy up. LAPD came in early. The Sheriff’s came in late. Let’s watch them save the girl.

We piled out of our prowl sleds and mingled. Max and Harry passed their flasks. The Hats plus Freddy O. got a good glow on. Eddie chatted up a Pan Am stew and got her phone number. A Mexicali stew told me the Tiki-Torch Village swung hard. Her shit-faced copilot confirmed it. He said four Sheriff's dicks were inside the complex, right now. It was some kind of kidnapped-starlet caper.

Somebody yelled, “No suspects inside.”

Somebody yelled, “We've got her.”

I climbed the back bumper of a Sheriff's black-and-white. It gave me a high and wide view. The shotgun deputies slid the gates open and stepped back. Here they come, here they come.

There's Motel Mike Bayless. He's tall and stupid-handsome. He's got too-hip razor-cut hair. He's waltzing out Gwen Perloff.

She's no starlet, she wears glasses, she's at least thirty-five. She's big and rangy. She's a schoolmarm knockout in a summer shift dress.

CONFIDENTIAL MEMORANDUM

From: Lt. J. T. Meadows, Jr./#294883
Public Disorder & Intelligence Division
Los Angeles Police Department

To: Former Chief Daryl F. Gates
Dana Point, California
(by secure telefax)

Subject: Surveillance of memorial service for Fred
Otash & related observations on events of summer 1962 (as previously discussed)

10/10/92

Sir:

The ceremony took place yesterday morning at Forest Lawn, Glendale. Given your recent media notoriety (and coerced early retirement), I understand your reluctance to attend in person. Given my father's participation in the events of summer '62—along with your own—I was honored to be both your designated surveillor and your choice to author the following brief.

Forty-three people attended the graveside service. A Lebanese minister read a New Testament passage and cited the "colorful life of the freewheeling Freddy O." A mourner, former Mirror-News scribe Morty Bendish, told Channel 5 News anchor Tony Valdez that he "wrote the pastor's spiel, which Freddy himself dictated to him." It should be noted that Mr. Bendish was a suborned LAPD informant during the events of summer 1962.

The "spiel" was a sanitized biographical riff on the late Mr. Otash. It noted his 1945–1953 LAPD service and later "reign" as the "undisputed King of the Hollywood Private Eyes." The "spiel" failed to acknowledge Mr. Otash as a freelance extortionist, scandal-rag dirt digger, strongarm goon, perpetrator of divorce shakedowns, doper of racehorses, informant for Chief William H. Parker, procurer and dope conduit for President John F. Kennedy, and agent provocateur for Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, in the combined LAPD/Justice Department operation of summer ’62. The pastor concluded Mr. Bendish’s “spiel” by lauding Mr. Otash as both the “Hellhound Who Held Hollywood Captive” and “a role model for all those in the Lebanese American community.” Many mourners openly laughed at this concluding statement.

Per the mourners themselves:

Most were Mr. Otash’s neighbors from the Park Wellington Apartments, along with three former operatives of the long-defunct Otash Detective Bureau: Phil Irwin, “Rodent” Robbie Molette, and Nathaniel “Nasty Nat” Denkins, the longtime host of Nasty Nat’s Soul Patrol on Radio KBLK. Irwin, Molette, and Denkins were peripheral figures in the events of summer ’62, but several individuals who might be termed “major players” also attended the ceremony. They were:

The two surviving members of the LAPD “Hat Squad,” retired sergeants Harry Crowder and Clarence “Red” Stromwall;

Assistant U.S. Attorney Edgar Chacõn, a Justice Department investigator under Robert F. Kennedy in the summer of ’62;

Roddy McDowall, noted TV and film actor, as well as an “underground” director of homosexual porno films;

Recording artist/nightclub entertainer Eddie Fisher, who attended the service with former major league pitching ace Bo Belinsky. Mr. Fisher is the fourth husband of actress Elizabeth Taylor. It should be noted that Mr. Otash and Mr. Belinsky pulled a divorce shakedown on Miss Taylor in the summer of ’62;

TV and stage actress Lois Nettleton, who attended the service with the sister of John and Robert Kennedy and the ex-wife of the late actor Peter Lawford, Patricia Kennedy Lawford. The women appeared to be close friends of long standing. They left the service in a chauffeured limousine. I tailed the limo to St. Vibiana’s church in downtown L.A. They lit altar candles, presumably for Freddy Otash, and had the limo drive them to the nearby Pacific Dining Car restaurant. I surveilled them in the cocktail lounge. They became inebriated and offered up toasts to Freddy Otash. At one point, Miss Nettleton said, “We should have loved him more.”

In conclusion:

I consider it unlikely that the death of Freddy Otash will serve to reignite the rumors of LAPD/Justice Department collusion that flourished and spawned much speculation thirty years ago. That unique merging of movie stars, major politicians, a corrupt Hollywood element, and a vicious criminal demimonde has largely faded from public consciousness, and most of the more celebrated and notorious participants are now dead or have vested interests in retaining their silence. Freddy Otash was the only one who knew the entire story, and now he's dead. And I seriously doubt that he left any sort of incriminating evidence and/or narrative accounts behind. There's also this: You were there that summer, sir. You know full well that Freddy himself was the most guilty participant in the whole mess, and thus had the most to lose by hoarding defamatory documents.

Respectfully,
Lt. J. T. Meadows, Jr./#294883/PDID

The dump job. The bent schoolmarm. Saturday-night kicks gone wrong.

I prowled my pad-office and inventoried my shit. I was up-the-ass antsy. I Man Camera'd my four rooms and muzzled my thoughts.

Here's the inventory:

I've got bug-and-tap gear, piled in boxes. I've got an LAPD-issue Teletype. I've got an evidence kit. I've got a forensic-shot Polaroid camera. There's four file cabinets—packed with dirt sheets and filthy snapshots. Plus a box of throwdown guns and two pump shotguns. Plus belt saps, handcuffs, and come-along restraints.

I took a USC night course, back in '46. Criminalistics for Police Officers. A Nazi professor named Hans Maslick developed the Man Camera technique. You observe interior-crime scenes and imprint minute details. You stare and study and lodge details in specific brain vaults. Your vaults never leak or spill their contents. I'm a self-taught eideteker and never lose what I imprint. I stare and study and hone my application of the technique. It rewires my brain circuits and often serves to curb my lust for booze and dope.

Man Camera. My work gear, out in plain sight. Here's a late-breaking flashback. That pimp Caddy drags Richie Danforth off a guardrail and severs his feet.

I dumped the gear back in my hall closet. I inventoried my personal shit and went in Man Camera tight.

My projector, pull-down screen, and film-can trove. Lois Nettleton in Naked City and Alcoa Presents. TV to Broadway. Lois as Maggie in Cat on a Hot Tin Roof. It's 1956. She's the lead's understudy. I've imprinted every soaring moment and gaffe.

Lois to Pat. One framed photograph. V-J Day in Kodacolor. Pat's USO hostess gown droops. My Marine dress blues gleam.

She's gawky working on regal. She can't outrun her star surname. She tried to then. She's past it now. Hollywood Boulevard erupts behind us. I've imprinted every anonymous face and the glint off every windowpane.

My reverie unraveled. The dump job schizzed me. We'd waltz on it. I knew that. Some types have just got to GO. Rape-o's, hot-prowl guys. Hostage takers. Kidnap-for-profit and sex-motive fucks. Bill Parker would frost repercussions. Local press geeks would cosign El Jefe's PR line. Buzzy Stein would refuse to fink the snatch men. I cranked my lens in tight and framed two outtakes.

Richie Danforth flails and drops. "It's a put-up job." The crowd outside the Tiki-Torch Village. Cops and airline stews jazzed by the show. A Pan Am stew did samba steps with Harry Crowder. Eddie Benson scored fourteen phone numbers. I've got my high bumper perch.

Man Camera. Crane shot. Motel Mike Bayless and Gwen Perloff walk out. Gwen's unruffled and unmussed. It's ninety-three degrees at 10:00 p.m. She's been locked in a broom closet. There's no sweat pools on her mint green shift. There's no tape-gag residue. There's no wrist-restraint chafe marks. She's redoubtably composed.

She's an actress walking into a crowd. Some men whistle. Some hopped-up stews jump and wave. Motel Mike stands apart from Gwen. He's not consoling a distraught kidnap victim. He's establishing parameters. He's telling the crowd he's not poking the big, rangy dish.

I shut my eyes. It doused the room lights and reset my lens cap. It cut me loose to brood and think.

Gwen Perloff looked like a bait girl. She might play main squeeze in Darryl Zanuck's all-starlet stable. Zanuck was high up and bitched up at Fox. The big toga lox Cleopatra had Fox strung up and fucked-up and gouting money. It was Movie Debacle as Worldwide Sensation. Liz Taylor's shacked with Richard Burton. They swoon through Rome by night and screw in prop rooms at Cinecittà. Fox might sell their backlot to cover cost overruns. Darryl Zanuck's high up and bitched up and has shit stacked high on his plate. Then some woman calls him and rats out a sketchy kidnap deal.

I gnawed the Cleo rumors. Fox kingpin Zanuck, Fox starlet Gwen Perloff. I popped two Dexedrine for late-night pizzazz. I replayed the first Hats-plus-Freddy O. caper.

May '54. The Red Devil Bandit/aka George Collier Akin. He's a hot-prowl sadist/rape-o. He hits USC sorority pads. HE JUST HAS TO GO.

He wore a red rubber devil mask. He torqued his victims with monster film one-liners. We jumped him outside a coed rooming house. We had .45 Colts and Ithaca pumps with rat poison–dipped buckshot. The reverb blew out four downstairs windows.

My biz phone rang. I grabbed it two rings in. A Brit-voiced man babbled at me. I made the voice. It was Peter Lawford. He was half-gassed and far-gone panicked.

I heard "dinner party"/"no show"/"found the body." I said, "Calm down and make sense."

Lawford wheezed. My phone line staticked up. I heard "late for dinner party"/"oh my God"/"Marilyn Monroe." Gasps and garbles spelled it out. The line cleared. He went over/he saw the pill vials/there was no housekeeper extant—Freddy, she was cold.

I shrill-whistled. It fritzed up the line feed and made dipshit Lawford eeeeek. I heard coins drop. Dipshit fed dimes to a pay phone.

Lawford mewled and wheezed. I heard "My wife, Pat." That stopped me short. I said, "Go back to the house and sit in your car. I'll be right over."

Lawford pitched boo-hoo. Freddy, you're a mensch. She was such a talent and such—

I hung up and dialed Bill Parker's home phone. Spool clicks blurred to dialtones. The Chief recorded his calls. Local malcontents and dissidents dialed the boss for kicks and grins.

Parker said, "Who's calling?"

"It's Fred Otash, sir."

"Are you calling for reassurance? You shouldn't be. It's been settled. Mr. Danforth escaped and misjudged the drop off the embankment. Mr. Stein is in custody, and the Sheriff's will deal with the three suspects at large."

I lit a cigarette. "It's something else, sir."

"Let's not string this out. What 'something else' are we talking about?"

"Marilyn Monroe's dead. It looks like a pill OD or a suicide. Peter Lawford found her and called me. He's waiting for me at the house. I'm going out."

Tap-taps hit the line. I knew the ploy. Parker pencil-tapped the phone and bought response time. I clocked the taps at—

"Intel has extensive files on Miss Monroe and her movie-business and political chums and lovers, up to and including John and Robert Kennedy. Peter Lawford supplies his brother-in-law Jack with dope and girls, a reprise of your mid-'50s role as the young senator's pimp and supplier. You're a charter member of the L.A. cognoscenti, Freddy. How up-to-date are you on all of this?"

I gulped. "I'm up-to-the-moment, sir."

Parker said, “Really? As in?”

“As in a recent gig I had.”

“You’ll tell me about it? As in the next time we speak?”

“Yes, sir.”

More tap-taps hit. They extended. I timed them off my watch. They ran two minutes and sixteen seconds.

“Go back to the house. Calm Lawford down and coerce him into silence. Enter the house and perform a full forensic. I’ll post perimeter guards to keep civilians at bay. Meet the Hats at PC Bell in Santa Monica, tomorrow at 8:00. Pull Miss Monroe’s phone records for this calendar year, along with her up-to-date toll tickets. Let’s see what we can do about keeping this contained, and perhaps reaping benefit from it.”

Nightclub traffic bottlenecked the Strip. Cars crawled past Ciro’s and the Crescendo. I cut side streets south and Santa Monica to Wilshire westbound. Traffic thinned down to zero. I hit Barrington and San Vicente. Commercial Brentwood was shut down tight.

I hooked north on Carmelina. The swank level popped exponential. Grok the deep lawns and tall hedgerows. Dig the quaint Spanish cribs and outsize Spanish de-luxe.

There’s Fifth Helena Drive. There’s the Monroe crib. There’s Peter Lawford’s cherry Rolls parked in front.

Headlight blips hit me. I caught two blip sets, on and off. It was Parker’s point men in civilian cars. They were stashed across the street and down from the Rolls.

I blipped back and pulled up to the Rolls, snout-to-snout. I banged the front bumper and hit my brights to jolt the cocksucker. The windshield lit up glare white. Lawford blinked and fumbled a cigarette. I killed my lights and stepped out of the car.

Lawford cracked his passenger door. I slid in beside him. Green leather and burled wood cocooned us. Lawford had the shakes. I passed him my flask. It was brim-full of jungle juice—151 rum and powdered Benzedrine.

He sucked on the nozzle. Don’t light a cigarette—the shit might ignite.

I said, “Okay, she’s dead. The key thing now is protecting some very important friends of hers, and we don’t need to name names here.”

Lawford went electric. Jungle juice hits you fast.

"I know who you're talking about, because they're my family. I resent the fact that you know them, and that you deign to mention them so casually."

I bitch-slapped him. He yelped. I grabbed the flask and took two good pops.

"I like Jack. I can do without Bobby, but that's a topic for another time and place. When what's-her-name's body is discovered, they'll need friends, and as far as this town goes, that's the Los Angeles Police Department, and I've been delegated to tell you that Chief Parker's friendship comes with a price."

Lawford broke a sweat. Hot night, jungle juice, manhandling.

" 'What's-her-name' is the greatest female film star of her era, and the men you so blithely refer to as 'Jack' and 'Bobby' are the president and attorney general of the United States. And I happen to be married to—"

I bitch-slapped him. He yelped and blubbered. I tossed him my pocket square.

"Marilyn was nothing but a glorified bait girl. I know shit about her, Jack, and Bobby that you wouldn't believe. And don't start in on who you're married to, because that's when the hurt really starts."

He wiped his face and neck. He looked at me. Hot night, jungle juice, manhandling. Check his eyes. He can't decode my riff on Pat.

"Where's the AG? He was in the Herald this morning. Something about a speech in San Francisco."

Lawford wiped his nose. He trashed my pocket square in two seconds flat.

"Yes, he's up there. He's at the St. Francis."

I said, "Call him and get him down here. Bill Parker will want to talk to him."

Lawford wiped his eyes and kicked the ignition. I slid out of the car. The Rolls laid rubber, westbound. I whistled and signaled the point cops—I'm going in.

"Full forensic."

The Monroe pad, redux.

My evidence kit was suitcase-size and full-fitted. It held one Polaroid camera. It held thirty film rolls and eighty flashbulbs. Plus print gear and rubber gloves. Plus fiber-collection combs and sheaths and a crank-up fiber vacuum.

Spray cans. Ninhydrin to pull bloodstains and acid phosphatase to pull jizz. Stoppered vials to store liquid samples. Twelve rolls of Scotch tape. Good print-lift and dust-collection strips.

Lawford left the front gate and front door ajar. I knew the interior layout. I rolled on surgeon's gloves and flexed my hands. It was a work-in-the-dark job. I got out my penlight and bit down on the shaft. I was ripped to the gills. I clicked on the Man Camera inside my head.

The evidence kit was deadweight. I lugged it up the steps and inside. I kicked the door shut and threw the bolt. Man Camera plus penlight. Aim, point, discern, and imprint.

Fuck the slothful living room. It's standard Monroe disarray. Let's go case the stiff.

I walked to her bedroom. My light beam zigzagged a path. I clocked bare white walls, pulled window drapes, the dull-veneer wood floor.

There's the nightstand and pill vials. There's the bedside phone. There's Marilyn's left hand, hot to grab. She's curled prone beneath white sheets.

I ran a hand under them. She was nude/her skin was cold/the bedcovers trapped no heat.

I scoped the vials. Nembutal, Seconal, chloral hydrate. Instant dreamland. That shit promotes deep sleep.

Film scripts piled under the nightstand. Mouse turds close by. Here's an anomaly.

A clock radio. It's been upended and dumped on the floor. It's flush between the bed and the nightstand. The plug's still in the wall.

Say she's zorched and flailing. She's got options. More pills or the phone as a last-ditch yelp for help?

I knelt by the bed and penlight-flashed close-ups. Here's Anomaly #2:

Dried washcloth streaks. Print-wipe streaks. All along the top surface and the grab sides of the gizmo. Two pale blue fibers stuck to the top-surface streak.

I popped my evidence kit. I tweezer-pinched the fibers and bagged them. They looked like terry cloth. I powder-dusted the top and grab sides. The streaks stood out bold now. I picked up two rubber-glove prints. I diagnosed it:

Crime-scene obfuscation. Evidence of a professional print-wipe job.

The front and back of the gizmo were fabric/wire mesh. That meant non-print-sustaining. I sat on the bed and quadrant-scanned the whole radio. Note the print-wipe streaks on the dial. Note the dial needle stuck at All-News KLEZ. I goosed the dial and got sound. A newshound spieled through static skreek.

"…daring kidnap in the shadow of the hip Sunset Strip. Starlet Gwen Perloff—"

Static blur cut off the newsman. I jiggled the dial. I got "one suspect fell to his death" and line fuzz. I got "suspect now in custody" and blur, fuzz, hum, crackle, skreek.

I jiggled the plug wire. I got "This updates our 9:05 broadcast. The three men remain at large."

I hauled my evidence kit up on the bed and scooched the lid up against Monroe. I got out my Polaroid and spooled in a twelve-shot roll of film. I adjusted the flash attachment and screwed in a bulb. I hit the button.

The room blew up white. White glare lit the white sheets and white walls. I got the nightstand and dead white arm. I got the phone and the pill vials. I got white-blond hair on a white pillow.

I waited sixty seconds and pulled out the print. Pic #1: dead bait girl. I dropped the print in my kit and shot eleven more bedroom exposures. The clock radio, the nightstand, the pill vials. The whole room in wide-angle shots. Mid-shots of the bed. Peekaboos of the one exposed leg and disheveled white-blond hair.

Twelve bulb bursts. Twelve brain imprints. I must retain what I see.

I walked into the living room. I penlight-flashed the walls and floors and reloaded the Polaroid. I caught Anomaly #3:

Deep-pile carpets. Mashed-down foot impressions. Large male feet/heavy shoes/deep fiber displacement. Footprints to and from a quarter-cracked eastside window. Tall-man footprints. This guy walked big.

I got out my measuring tape and unfurled it. I penlight-flashed representative footpaths and laid my tape down between imprints. 26", 25.4", 30". Tall Man had to run six-one or six-two.

I fed bulbs to my bulb strip. I shot the measured and unmeasured paths. I shot loose paint chips by the cracked-window ledge.

He entered through that window. The fibers had been foot-mashed down. They bounced back and smoothed out as I watched. Tall Man prowled the room tonight. The LAPD lab could develop a walking portrait off my pix.

I strolled the pad. I quadrant-flashed the walls and floors. I caught Anomalies #4 and 5 fast.

Bug mounts. Camouflaged as outlet plugs. Flush on the wall wainscoting. One per the living room/one per the spare bedroom.

They weren't my bug mounts. I pulled my mounts two weeks back.

These mounts were now defunct. The connector wires had been snipped.

My mounts were oblong. These were square. I pulled my mounts. These mounts were not on the premises then.

I unscrewed the mounts and dropped them in my evidence kit. They looked like L.A. Sheriff's or FBI-issue. The Jap transistors gave them away.

Bug mounts meant potential tapped phone lines. The Monroe crib featured three extensions. Living room, spare bedroom, Marilyn's boudoir. I made the rounds and ran receiver checks.

I pulled the handsets off the phones and unscrewed the perforated tops and bottoms. I checked for stashed mini-mikes and got zilch. But —I saw left-behind circuit spacers. That meant the three phones had been tapped. The spacers were frayed and corroded. My spacers and mikes had been inset in the handgrips. Monroe bought the house in February and moved in March 10. My surveillance job began April 11.

I photographed the three spacer sets and replaced the receiver caps. I dropped the damp prints in my kit. I returned to Monroe's bedroom and worked up fibers and prints.

Hardwood flooring. Two throw rugs by the foot of the bed. One wood-veneer dresser. The flooring would not trap dry-constituent fibers. The rugs would. The dresser had good touch-and-grab planes that might sustain latent prints.

I blew off the floor and vacuumed the rugs. I filled half an evidence sheath with threads and unknown gack. I brush-dusted the touch-and-grab planes on the dresser and got useless partials, smudges, and smears.

Monroe was a hoarder. My prior B and E's taught me that. The dresser drawers deserved a toss. I might find all-new shit. It might be evidentially germane.

The bedroom was hot, hot. I was dexedrined and jungle-juiced. This prowl-and-seek gig eroticized me. I penlight-flashed the bed and saw that white-blond hair on the white pillow.

I opened the top drawer and viewed the contents. I inventoried nine pairs of nylon stockings and a red crocheted bikini. I photo-snapped said contents and counted off sixty seconds. I pulled the print and dropped it in my evidence kit.

The room heat spiked. I broke a sweat. A strong wind rattled the windows. I reached under the bedsheets and touched Marilyn's leg. It felt dead cold and hot-room warm all at once.

Drawer #2 contained assorted slips and Chanel No. 5 sachets. Hot-room air merged with perfume residue. I counted six sachets and slips. The slips were all pale pastel. The armholes were sweat-stained. It enticed me.

I picked up a pink brocade slip and held it close to my face. I crossed myself. It quashed an urge to touch the whole batch.

The drawer was jammed open. I jiggled it and shifted the contents. I saw an old black-and-white snapshot and a yellowed piece of paper beside it. The gist hit me, straight off.

It's an L.A. County morgue shot. That's Carole Landis, buck nude on a gurney. She's a bottle blonde, she's a pre-Monroe manqué, she quaffed barbs and booze in July '48 and left a woe-is-me note for her fans. She'd tried suicide before. As in four times. She was on Husband #4. She had a run of costar gigs at Fox and a sub-run of poverty-row quickies. Brit hearthrob Rex Harrison declined to dump his wife for her. She had a big spread in Pacific Palisades and a film career stuck in skidsville.

Skidsville to creepsville. The yellow paper displayed a note. It was fashioned in cutout/pasted-on magazine letters. The paper was old. The typeface was old. The note read:

I loved her before I loved you.
She was nicer. You're more desperate and pretentious.
I had to learn to love you. She made it easy.

I shot the note and the morgue pic. Flashbulb pop lit the bedroom some crazy new way. I counted off sixty seconds and pulled the print. I dropped it in my evidence kit.

I dusted the morgue pic. I brought up one partial and two smears. I photographed them. I dusted the paper backing and brought up bupkes.

The room heat re-spiked. The room went claustrophobic. I sheath-wrapped the morgue pic and note. I dropped the photos in my kit. I unjammed the undie drawer and rammed it shut. The jolt tripped a lever.

A wooden tray below the drawer slipped out and open. I crouched close. Ich bin ein eideteker. I saw and imprinted this:

Fuckee-suckee pix. Four in all. Black-and-white Polaroids. The nude Marilyn Monroe and a cruel stud with a big pompadour. There's whiteout strips over his eyes. It distorts his identity. He's beefy-muscular. Monroe's Monroe. They're fucking, sucking, going 69. It's Kama Sutraville, baby. Note the sleazy motel backdrop. Monroe looks younger. The pix connote ’58 or ’59.

Dried jizz crusts. Some perv spritzed all four pix. Clusters of dead cells and blood-type markers. The lab can run tests, we can ID this freak—

PART 2

BUG JOB

(APRIL 9–AUGUST 4, 1962)

4

(LOS ANGELES, 9:14 P.M., MONDAY, 4/9/62)

The Losers Club. Beverly and La Cienega. It's a strip joint. It veers topical. Large-draw comics slum here. Lenny Bruce, Don Rickles, Mort Sahl. They're sanctioned to work raw. It's the Losers gestalt.

There's a big sign out front. It denotes the "Loser of the Week." Eddie Fisher begins his reign tonight. He's the designated schmuck and all-star attraction. I'm bodyguarding Eddie. We're perched in the greenroom. There's a full bar and a deli-nosh spread. Note the goblets crammed with goofballs and bennies.

Eddie said, "Nixon's been Loser of the Week twice. Rock Hudson got the nod last month, but nobody knows why."

I lit a cigarette. "Sheriff's Vice caught him blowing a quiff in the john at the Hamburger Hamlet. The nod's to the cognoscenti. The Rock's got a secret-life scenario going. He's not a signature loser, like you and Nixon."

Eddie yukked. "I'll take it, because it's getting me work, but Liz should get Loser of the Millenium. Her makeup man's an old pal of mine. I get daily reports from the set. All indications point to catastrophe."

He meant the Cleopatra mess and Fox in the shitter. The shoot's a cash drain and pure chaos. The Rome-to-L.A. cable lines buzz twenty-four hours. Liz Taylor rates Shrew of the Year to Eddie's Passive Putz. She's zonked on booze and pills and beset by mystery ailments. She malingers in swank hotel suites and eats herself fat. She's bonking her costar, Richard Burton. Paparazzi bird-dog them down the Via Veneto.

Liz and Eddie are splitsville. She's dumping Husband #4 and warming up #5 in hot-sheet flops on the Appian Way. Eddie's Mr. Cornuto and a revived nightclub sensation. He's done turn-away biz in Vegas and L.A.'s Cocoanut Grove. Tonight's his Losers Club debut. He's embraced loserhood. There's six hundred Eddiephiles lined up outside.

I've got three operatives working the rope line. Horny women press envelopes and bribe cash on my guys. The envelopes contain mash notes, cheesecake pix, and snipped pubic hair.

Eddie sipped a scotch-rocks. "All the Liz tsuris and money tsuris aside, the picture is already a legendary dog in waiting. Zanuck is planning to reshoot it, with Lassie and Rin Tin Tin in the lead roles."

I yocked. Bo Belinsky walked in. He's the new pitching stud for the L.A. Angels. Women dig him. He's out of Trenton, Eddie's out of Philly. They're big new best friends. They party hearty and denigrate Liz nonstop.

Eddie and Bo embraced. Their "Love ya, bubi" schtick commenced on cue. I ditched the greenroom and ducked outside.

La Cienega was tight-packed. The rope line ran two blocks north. Nat Denkins, Phil Irwin, and Robbie Molette worked the crowd. They checked the prepay tickets for Eddie's ten, midnight, and 2:00 a.m. shows. They dispensed laughs and booted underaged kids out of line.

I counted heads and crossed myself. The Eddie gig was a moneymaker. It's 100% open-end. The gig would last as long as Eddie's victim status held and Liz notched headlines in Rome.

I needed the work. I'd been tanksville for months. I'd been repossessing cars for Felix the Cat Chevrolet. I'd been working divorce shakedowns and sandbagging tomcat hubbies. Bill Parker shot me strongarm jobs too dicey for regular cops. It kept Robbie, Phil, and Nat part-time employed. The Eddie gig was a sinecure and a life raft.

Eddie's intro music trickled outside. I ducked inside. The crowd was shoehorned in tight. Check the SRO bar. Check the six-set tables with ten fans crammed in tight. Check the wall-to-wall standees. Check the cocktail girls in beatnik black leotards and berets.

They wore cleavage-clip buttons. They read I'm Joyce, I'm June, I'm Jane—rip me!!!!! The tables featured lava lamps and plastic back scratchers. Dipshit guys grabbed the scratchers and raked the girls' leotards. The girls dodged gropes and served drinks in tatters.

Eddie's combo weaved onstage. Tenor sax, trumpet, bass, plug-in keyboard. All junkies on work furlough from Wayside Honor Rancho. All in tight black suits and fruit boots and half on the nod.

They set up and tuned up. The crowd sent up "EDDIE!" chants. And there he is—Now.

Eddie hopped onstage. He twirled a hand mike on a cord. The combo ran off-key riffs on the "Peppermint Twist." The crowd went nuts. Eddie twist-stepped to center stage. The crowd simmered down. Eddie jacked off the mike handle. The crowd went re-nuts. Eddie made like the Big White Bwana and went Hush, my children—for now I shall speak.

The crowd went hush. The Mahatma has spoken. Eddie said, "So? What's new with you?"

The crowd bayed. They stomped, hooted, whistled, shrieked. A cocktail waitress hopped onstage. Her leotard was sliced into slivers. The combo relaunched the "Peppermint Twist." Eddie grabbed the waitress. They did bump-and-grind twist steps in sync.

The "EDDIE!" chants reprised. The waitress hopped offstage and dodged gropes across the room. Mahatma Eddie went Hush. The crowd went hush. Eddie introduced his combo as the Four Muff Divers. The crowd yock-yocked.

Eddie said, "My label, RCA Victor, wants me to include 'Arrivederci, Roma' and 'After You've Gone' on my next album. But I told them, 'There's limits to my self-abasement.' "

The crowd re-yocked. Eddie said, "I've got a couple of tidbits, hot off the wire from Rome. My soon-to-be-ex, aka Liz, aka Cleopatra, was seen baring her soiled soul at a meeting of Nymphos Anonymous."

The crowd yocked on overdrive. Eddie jacked off the mike handle and pelvis-popped steps from the wah watusi. Boozed-out college kids and drink girls watusi'd down on the floor.

Eddie said, "More news from Rome. La Repubblica has reported that Richard Burton was seen poking an Italian greyhound near the Trevi Fountain—but it was a female greyhound, so I don't see anything wrong with it."

The crowd stomped and woof-woofed. The combo launched "Fly Me to the Moon." Eddie kicked the struts loose and crooned.

He's a nebbish and shaggy-haired twerp. Where'd he get that big baritone?

It's 3:00 a.m. now. It's the nightly debrief at Eddie's crib. It was Liz and Eddie's crib, up to Cleopatra.

It's some boss crib. As in sixteen rooms off Benedict Canyon. The pad bids Eddie to grieve and kvetch nonstop. He'll have to divest. Liz is okay on the cash and property split—as of now. She'll get wise and brown him up the dirt road—soon. They're jungled up with beaucoup kids from beaucoup gone-bust unions. They've got beaucoup land holdings. They've got studio deals and Cleo predecreed as dreck.

Oy, oy, oy. His rabbi calls him a "self-loathing Jew." He urges him to emigrate to Israel and join a kibbutz. The rabbi calls Liz "overprivileged traph" and the "poisonous fruit of the goyishe tree."

Oy, oy, oy. Eddie's gassed on all this turmoil. His nightclub career's re-thriving and the world's veering back his way.

The trophy den was debrief HQ. It featured green leather furniture and pix of Eddie with Cardinal Spellman and Congo strongman Patrice Lumumba. Two waitresses played backgammon and eyeballed hunky Bo Belinsky. They're June and Jane—RIP ME!!!! Losers Club losers obliged. They doffed their tattered leotards and donned low-cut bikinis. Eddie supplied them. He kept a big stash on hand.

Eddie and Bo read through tonight's mash notes and admired select snapshots. Bo tabulated phone numbers. I was bored. I sipped a scotch-rocks and futzed around with Eddie's pit bull, Roscoe. My guys worked crowd control, outside. Forty-some fans tailed us back here from the club. Eddie had his housekeeper bake up chocolate cookies. The fans were 99% women. My guys passed out cookies and racked up phone numbers, wholesale.

I was restless. I had Lois and Pat on the brain. Lois/Pat/Lois/Pat. I ping-ponged between the—

The phone rang. It startled me. Eddie picked up. He went Who's this? and listened. He muffled the receiver with a pillow.

He said, "For you, Freddy. It's Jimmy Hoffa. He sounds like a man with a bone to pick."

5

(LOS ANGELES, 9:40 A.M., TUESDAY, 4/10/62)

Jimmy Hoffa said, “The Kennedys. My sources tell me you go back with those shitheels.”

The downtown Statler. A tidy junior suite. Coffee and crullers. It’s a face-off. We’re in two chairs crammed knee-to-knee tight.

“With Jack, I do. I’m sure you know the story.”

Hoffa cracked his knuckles. “You pulled him out of some grief with a call girl. You had options. You chose the wrong one, and it queered your relationship with our future president.”

I sipped coffee. “I presented my bill. Jack’s people stiffed me with counterfeit money. It was a nice touch.”

Hoffa slapped his knees. “What about his dogshit brother, Bobby?”

I went Comme ci, comme ça. “I’ve met him a few times. I’d say you know him a tad better than I do.”

Hoffa goaded me. “Come on. Give me your interpretation.”

I said, “The McClellan Committee. Bobby and Jack, back when Jack was in the Senate. Televised hearings, lockstep surveillance, government audits, indictments, rubber-stamp grand juries, public humiliation as regards your ‘assumed’ mobbed-up status. And now the little cocksucker’s the attorney general of the United States, and crawling up your ass with renewed vigor.”

Hoffa cracked his thumbs. “Did you smirk when you said ‘assumed’? Like it’s all just so obvious that everybody knows?”

I stifled a stage yawn. “Tell me what you have in mind. Yeah, I know the brothers. Yeah, I know how you feel about them, and you know what I do for a living.”

Hoffa brushed crumbs off his lap. “Jack the K is ramming Marilyn Monroe, and now he’s passed her along to his kid brother. I have this on good authority, but I can’t reveal my source. I want you to build a derogatory profile on Monroe, Jack, Bobby, and any other extraneous cooze those whipdicks are slipping it to, not to mention whatever bedroom dirt you can get me on Miss Marilyn Monroe herself, who is well known to be the Whore of Babylon in Hollywood circles."

Tilt. Royal flush. Money tree. Three-cherry jackpot.

"You want full-time bugs and taps. Listening posts, monitor shifts, tape copies and transcriptions, summary reports, physical surveillance on Monroe and the other principals, and you want all this shit to rock around the clock, and you are keenly aware that it's going to cost you a great deal of money."

Hoffa went harumph. "You're a camel jockey, and you're out to bilk James Riddle Hoffa with no compunction."

I leaned close. Hoffa flinched. I ticked points, wham-bam.

"Me. My three guys for the day-to-day. Bernie Spindel for the installations. It's a hundred thousand for the job, and more if it extends past this summer. You cover salaries and all operating expenses. You pledge bail money and lawyers, if it comes to that. It's an audacious piece of work you want done, and you came to the only guy who can do it."

Hoffa shot his cuffs and scratched his balls. Hoffa cricked his neck and flicked lint off his suit coat.

"Okay. I'm sure it's a bargain by your Lebanese standards."

I said, "I'll send you up-to-the-minute bug-and-tap reels once a week, along with typed transcripts. I'll Teletype you summary reports every other week. I'll—"

Hoffa cut me off. "The Monroe bitch just bought a house in Brentwood. I want it hot-wired, de-luxe. Jack and Bobby tryst out of Peter Lawford's spread on the Coast Highway. I want it hot-wired. Lawford's married to one of the Kennedy sisters, I forget which one…."

I said, "Pat. Her name is Pat."

Hoffa blotted his necktie. Hoffa snapped his waistband and buffed his gold watch.

"I want it ugly, Freddy. I want lots of sordid behavior, with an emphasis on sex."

Shitwork prep first. Vibe the terrain. Learn the entry/exit points. Scout listening-post locations.

I drove out to the beach. The Lawford estate backed up to the sand. It was right at the L.A. City/Malibu line. A big landside bluff overlooked it. Boho cottages were clumped behind a paved access road. They supplied high-up/look-down access across PCH. That meant peeper range.

The access road took me up. Cars boomed north and south, below me. Street noise statics up bug-tap reception. The PCH boom was all-time bad.

I got out and perched on a guardrail. I screwed a zoom lens to my Rolleiflex and eyeballed the house. It was a big Spanish rancho. Add-on wings destroyed the lines and klutzed up the overall look.

It was one big spread. Seven thousand square feet. Two stories. Prime beachfront turf. I zoomed close and shot pix of doors, windows, roof ledges. I'm a seasoned peeper/burglar. All bug-tap jobs start with break-ins.

Flagstone walkways flanked the house, north and south. They led back to a beach-view swimming pool and lounge setup. I shot a north-side doorway. Pat walked straight into my lens.

She wore a madras plaid shirtdress and scuffed saddle shoes. Plus tortoiseshell glasses and a man's Rolex watch. Real camera meets Man Camera. It's almost seventeen years. I'm twenty-three, Pat's twenty-one. Hollywood Boulevard erupts.

The Japs pulled the plug. Strangers kiss in the street. I spot Pat, she spots me, our brain waves mesh. The kiss extends. A roving photographer takes our picture and seals history. I give him ten bucks and tell him what for. Send two copies to the LAPD Academy. I'll be there in three weeks.

Pat grabbed me and kissed me again. We went crazy telepathic. We walked to the Hollywood Plaza and checked in.

That night was it. We had that night and no more. We've sent each other Christmas cards, from '45 up to now. Pat married fuckhead Peter Lawford. I'm the "Hellhound Who Held Hollywood Captive" and her big brother's ex–bird dog and dope chute. Said big brother? He's the president of the United States. I've just been hired to put him down in the shit.

The Monroe house. 12305 Fifth Helena Drive, Brentwood. Clock it. It's 4.3 miles east of the Lawford beach digs. Call it. This is a West L.A. caper from the jump.

The Brentwood quasi-village was due east. It was upscale ginchy. Gas station, two markets, drugstore. Public library, espresso pit, French bistro. Major throughways boxed in Fifth Helena and the adjacent blocks.

Bundy to the east. San Vicente to the south. Sunset to the north. Extended greenbelt loomed west. Helena Drives two to five ran one long block and dead-ended. The immediate area was affluent and all residential.

That rendered park-and-sit-type surveillance untenable. I'd have to glom five service vehicles and paint-job them. PC Bell, Happytime Liquor, Luanne's Dial-A-Florist. Plus two beat-to-hell gardeners' trucks.

The house itself:

Whitewashed Spanish. One story. Modest for Brentwood. Big front yard, small backyard. Stucco retaining walls, all around. Tall hedgerows, front and back. An oak gate and tile steps to the front door.

I parked across the street and snapped photos. Note the front casement windows. They were all draped and unscreened. They were all cracked for ventilation. Peep me, B and E me—the pad screamed it.

I shot the back side of the house already. I got the screened kitchen door with the flimsy hook-and-eye latch. I got the unscreened service-porch window. Monroe had a part-time housekeeper. I read a Herald piece on the new house and her housekeeping regime. The housekeeper slept out most nights. Peep me, B and E me, hot-wire me for sound.

Nat Denkins knew a clerk at the Hollywood DMV. He slid the guy a yard and got Monroe's vehicle stats. She drove a '59 Buick Invicta. Phil Irwin braced a clerk at the Malibu DMV. The Lawfords owned five vehicles. Pat drove a '58 Bonneville ragtop.

Hearts and arrows. Freddy loves Pat, Freddy loves Lois. Carve up that palm tree by Marilyn's front door.

I popped two Dexedrine and chain-smoked. I perimeter-scanned the front of the house. The door popped open. There she is. I clocked it at 4:16 p.m.

She's huddled up in a white bathrobe. She's wearing This Look. Hey, that's my new front yard.

A car pulled up in front of me. It was a '60 Corvair, maroon over black. A big blond girl got out and looked around. She was sixteen or seventeen. Note the rear-bumper sticker: PALI HIGH, HOME OF THE DOLPHINS.

The girl walked across the street. She braced the hedgerow and stood on her tiptoes. She was tall. She cadged a damn good look.

Marilyn waved to her. The girl shrieked and waved back.

6

(LOS ANGELES, 8:20 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 4/11/62)

Derogatory Profile. Day #2. The real shitwork begins.

I traded up. Eddie Fisher to Jimmy Hoffa. Nightclub antics to a sex squeeze on the Worldwide Big Kahuna and his vindictive kid brother. The bait girl's The Blond of Our Era. It all bodes combustion. Something's got to give.

That's the title of Monroe's new flick. It's currently shooting at Fox. Scribe-for-hire Morry Zolotow fed me the gist. Monroe's zonked on pills. Monroe's chronically tardy. Monroe succumbs to mystery ailments. The shoot's behind schedule. Mogul D. F. Zanuck's pissed, director George Cukor's enraged.

I worked in my living room/office. Nat Denkins scored floor-plan drawings from the county structural outfit. I studied schematics of the Lawford and Monroe pads and brainstormed bug-and-tap mount installations. Robbie Molette's out at PC Bell. He's scanning phone-service records. It's crucial. Bell lists all phone extensions and notes their room-to-room locations.

Basic tap rules apply here. Individual taps assure vivid sound flow. That's interior shitwork. Add exterior grief. Car noise on Bundy and San Vicente could fuzz the Monroe feed lines. Surf hum and car noise on PCH could scotch the Lawford feeds. Listening-post locations were crucial here.

Rentable homes in residential Brentwood? It would backfire on us. Round-the-clock activity and goons on-site would arouse square-citizen suspicion. There were no available rentals on the Brentwood commercial strip. The Lawford feeds might necessitate two listening posts. A house on the east bluff, across PCH. A backup location on the Malibu Pier.

I brainstormed. I called Eddie Fisher and pink-slipped him. I told him I'm quits. I said something came up. Eddie said, "Yeah—as in Jimmy Hoffa." I pooh-poohed it and told Eddie I'd set him up with Art Aragon. Art was an ex–ranked welterweight and noted cad-about-town. He loved muscle work and oozed charm. Eddie swooned. I was relieved. I traded up. I dumped low-stakes Hollywood for high-stakes intrigue and six times the pay.

And there's Pat. She was twenty-one then. She's thirty-seven now. Her fuckhead husband pimps for Jack the K. He's usurped my old gig and the one-night love that still torches me.

Pervdog, voyeur, peeper.

That's me. I'll be across the coast road. I'll be up on that bluff. I'll be attached to a headset and crouched in the dark. Man Camera. Ongoing live sound. Who knows what I'll see and hear.

Monroe's garage opened out on Sixth Helena. I parked across the street. Big pepper trees shadowed my Chevy coupe. Nat Denkins was out shagging stakeout vehicles. Personal cars agitated local stiffs and magnetized fuzz. This was a meet-your-mark tail. The gig was on as of NOW.

The kickoff meet was last night, at Ollie Hammond's. I booked a private room. The crew showed up. Phil Irwin, Robbie Molette, Nat Denkins. Plus Bernie "Bug King" Spindel. We boozed and noshed T-bone steaks. I laid out the five-point plan.

> 1)
>
> Bernie and I will hot-wire the Lawford and Monroe locations.
>
> 2)
>
> Nat, Phil, and Robbie will dig up three listening-post rentals. One in Brentwood. Brentwood's a tough go. Be assiduous here. Plus two Lawford-house rentals. One on the east bluffside. One on the Malibu Pier.
>
> 3)
>
> I want active monitor shifts. That's one man per post and three shifts per day. I'll spell you, impromptu. Bernie and I will install voice-activated taps and room bugs. They'll transmit to low-frequency receivers. Room bugs are always problematic. You get dead air, ambient noise, and half-heard conversation. Make tape copies and hand-transcribe everything you hear, regardless. Verbatim log all bug-and-tap tapes. Make one copy for Jimmy H. and one for our master file.
>
> 4)
>
> Phone taps will make or break this operation. Keep current on your tape copies. Keep current on your log transcriptions. This > is a film-biz/political caper. These humps love to talk. I want every word taped and transcribed.

>
> 5)
>
> I want intermittent tail surveillance on Monroe and time-dated surveillance logs kept. I'll spell you there, impromptu. Jimmy's pledged bonus bread, upon wrap-up. As in, ten grand per man.

My guys salivated. I salivated. The caper was high-risk/high-compensation. We toasted Jack, Marilyn, and Camelot, aflame.

Sit-still surveillance. Time always slogs. 2:26, 2:42, 3:04. My ass itched. I smoked myself hoarse. The garage door cracked open at 3:09 p.m.

There's Marilyn. She's done up movie-star incognito. Dark slacks, tight jumper. Wraparound shades and an Hermès scarf.

She climbed in the Buick Invicta and nosed out. She punched the gas westbound and sideswiped three trash cans. Empty booze bottles and dog food cans flew. I tailed her and idled forty yards back. Marilyn cut left on Carmelina and right on San Vicente. That put her westbound. A median strip forced traffic one-way. It was grassed up and dotted with azalea shrubs.

Marilyn hit her left-turn signal and bumped her car up and over the abutment. The undercarriage dislodged loose cement and cracked her back bumper. She slid on wet grass and brodied through a line of azaleas. She bumped back off the cement and hauled eastbound.

I tailed her. I downshifted and eased over the abutment. I slid on grass and sluiced back onto eastbound San Vicente. I came up behind Marilyn. A male motorist drew up alongside her. He yelled something. She flipped him off. He cut south on Bundy. Dig his fuck-you-finger farewell.

Marilyn jammed to the curb and parked in a meter space. I parked behind her. She got out and jaywalked across San Vicente. She ignored traffic lights and passing cars and beelined to the Vicente Pharmacy. Clock it: 3:16 p.m.

She's back out at 3:21. She digs into a small paper bag and unscrews a pill vial. She smiles and pops two of something. She skips back across the street. She gloms her unsexy Buick and peels east.

I tailed her. She hooked south on Barrington and east on Wilshire. Big-boulevard traffic cloaked me. Marilyn drove hesitant-cum-dreamy. We passed through Westwood and the high-rise corridor. Beverly Hills traffic snared us. Marilyn parked in the cab rank upside the Beverly Wilshire.

She braced a doorman. She passed him her car keys and pulled off her shades. He went Holy shit, you're Marilyn Monroe! She laid a fat kiss on him. It looked like she shot him some tongue.

I pulled up and idled two car lengths back. I clocked Marilyn's hotel sojourn. It ran 6.4 minutes. She zipped back out clutching a pill vial and a cellophane-wrapped gown.

She snatched her keys from the doorman. He laughed and slapped his knees. She pulled on her shades, shagged her sled, and fishtailed out into traffic.

She drove east. She drove hesitant-cum-dreamy. She hopped lanes and tailgated. Horns blared. She kissed her fingertips and waved them out the window. She turned north on Doheny. I bird-dogged her in close.

She turned right on Elevado and parked, quicksville. I crawled up behind her. We're right at the West Hollywood/Beverly Hills border. I knew that space-age-mod building on the southeast corner. It was packed full of call-girl pads.

Marilyn breezed in the front gate. I got out and checked the mailbox bank. There's six units and six female occupants. In Unit #4: Hollywood denizen Jeanne Carmen.

Ex–call girl. Part-time carhop. Ex–Sheriff's informant. Noted pill pusher. Golf trick-shot artiste. Available for church picnics and bar mitzvahs. Close pal of ex-starlet Lila Leeds. Miss Leeds bait-girl'd Bob Mitchum's '48 reefer roust.

I dawdled by my car. Marilyn and Jeanne. The gabfest might extend. I'll trade you four yellow jackets for six black beauties. Marilyn and Jeanne. Two late '40s arrivistes. Phil Irwin worked Sheriff's Vice, '46–'53. He said Marilyn and Jeanne worked a hot-sheet hut behind Dave's Blue Room.

There's Marilyn now. She glides over to her beat-on Buick. She cranks a U-turn and hits Doheny northbound. I'm right behind her.

She tools west on Sunset. She's driving urgent now. We're right by the Beverly Hills Hotel. Marilyn blows a red light and peels south on Beverly Drive. She pulls up in front of a big Colonial job and parks at the curb.

She gets out. She dumps her scarf and shades and fluffs out her hair. She squares her shoulders and reapplies lipstick. She walks up a slate pathway and enters the manse.

942 North Beverly Drive. Double-deep, double-wide lot. Olympic pool, tennis court—

I snatched my reverse directories off the backseat. The Beverly Hills book ran light. Match the owner to the address. It's there on page 3.

Ralph R. Greenson, M.D. Practice in psychiatry.

I reclined my seat and set my Rolleiflex on the door ledge. I scanned the house, the grounds, the backyard. I circuited back and forth. I caught the payoff and zoomed in tight.

Marilyn and a burly man. Late forties, mustache, dark suit. They're sitting at a wrought-iron table. She's pitching a sob story. She's working The Method. Note her wringing hands and trembling lips. He's going There, there. Here's the kicker:

They're quaffing martinis. That pitcher's good for three each. Marilyn's one down already. She's orbing the pitcher. She's vibing Cut loose, daddy—I'm coming out of my wig.

I clocked the booze klatch. Fifty minutes, straight up. Psychiatric session. Mustache Man was Shrink Man Ralph Greenson.

He sipped his first drink. Marilyn siphoned the pitcher. She wept, she laughed, she posed. She stood up and did dance steps from some slave-girl-of-the-jungle flick. She motormouthed nonstop. Greenson went Umm-hmn.

He cut her off at fifty minutes, flat. He helped her up and weave-walked her out to her car. She hugged him good-bye and tumbled in behind the wheel. Shrink Man about-faced and checked his wristwatch. Whew—so much for that.

Marilyn's back in her car. She cranks the gas and peels rubber through a dicey four-way stop.

I laid tread. Zigzag traffic cut me off. Horns honked. Middle fingers shot out windows. Sit on it and twirl.

Marilyn vamoosed. It's Blown Tail #1. It won't be the last.

I went home. Phil Irwin was back at Fifth Helena. He called me and checked in. He said Nat and Robbie scored three surveillance trucks. His brother-in-law dolled them up. He quick-painted them. They were now predictable service vehicles: Acme Tree Men, Ajax TV Repair, Citadel Florists. The paint was quick-dry. Phil camouflaged the backseats and storage beds. He dumped in tree limbs, electrical parts, dead floral displays.

Per his Fifth Helena shift:

The housekeeper split for the day. Phil boom-miked a prior backyard chat. The housekeeper said she had plans tonight. Marilyn said she had party plans. She'd been popping black beauties and slurping Metrecal. She'll fit that Halston original with seams intact.

The wait dragged. I worked at my office-pad. I mounted corkboards on the living room walls and installed file cabinets below them. I went through stacks of old Life magazines and ripped out pictures. Monroe, John and Robert Kennedy. No-goodnik Peter Lawford, sans and un-sans Pat. Exterior pix of the Lawford house, exterior shots of Fifth Helena.

I pinned them to the corkboards. I pulled the Pat and Freddy photo out of the frame and pinned it beside a Monroe cheesecake shot. It's 1952. Marilyn wows our boys in Korea. Freddy and Pat storm Hollywood on V-J Day. It was some juxtaposition. I laughed my ass off.

Ajax TV Repair. It's a good ride for night stakeouts. TV's fritzed out twenty-four hours. Hollywood parties started late.

I pulled up behind Fifth Helena. I clocked in at 8:00 sharp.

The garage door was open. The Buick was parked snout out. I popped two Dexedrine and gargled 151. I inventoried my evidence kit and camera case and honed my lock picks on a pumice stone. I sizzled to break, enter, peep.

Time trek. I replayed my first brush with Monroe.

November '54. The infamous "Wrong-Door Raid." I was at the Villa Capri. Confidential owned me then. Every waiter, hooker, and car-park cat in L.A. fed me dirt. I schmoozed a bent plastic surgeon. He performed a dick-enlargement surgery on Montgomery Clift. I slid the doc a C-note and told him to scram. One table over: Sinatra and Joe DiMaggio. Joe was Monroe Husband #2.

The paisans quaffed dago red. DiMaggio sniveled. Marilyn was love-shacked with her hairdresser at a place in West Hollywood. He had a PI named Phil Irwin tailing her. He'd just reported in.

DiMaggio was outraged. Sinatra got outraged. Joe saw me at the next table and said join the lynch mob.

I smelled money. We three-car caravanned over to the love shack. Phil Irwin was already there. That's how we met. It's now 11:00 p.m. We're outside a four-flat apartment house. Phil points to the downstairs left door. There's Sinatra, DiMaggio, Phil, and me. We're the lynch mob. We kick the door down. An old lady named Florence Klotz sits there, sipping tea.

Mrs. Klotz screams. Monroe's really *up*stairs. She's not shtupping her hairdresser. She's shtupping a Fox film editor named Timmy Berlin. They slip out a back door and scramble. Hence the "Wrong-Door Raid."

The Hearst rags played it up. The California State Assembly probed sleazoid scandal rags and blackmail-perpetrating detectives. I testified in closed session. Ditto, Phil Irwin. Marilyn divorced Joe. Phil went to work for me. Sinatra was married to Wife #2, Ava Gardner. He caught her muff-diving Lana Turner and went on a booze binge with Jackie Gleason. They got the DT's and wound up in Queen of Angels.

Time crawled. I chain-smoked. The garage light blipped on. Clock it: 8:42 p.m.

There's the car-door creaks, the headlight blips, the Buick nosing out.

She swung right by me. She took Sixth Helena down to Carmelina and turned north. I U-turned and came up behind her. Her left taillight blinked white. I scoped in on it and creep-crawled two car lengths back.

She veered east on Sunset. I tailed her. She drove plain hesitant tonight. Darting traffic got between us. I stuck one lane over and fixed on that light.

Sunset was hilly and curvy and high-swank underlit. The bum taillight supplied a tail beacon. We went through Brentwood and Westwood. We passed Beverly Glen and the Bel Air gates. We're in Holmby Hills now. Marilyn swerved into the right-hand lane and scraped her hubcaps on the curb.

She fishtailed and brodied south on Mapleton. It was all jumbo mansions with moats and king-size lawns. I saw a valet-park stand up ahead. Red-coat car jocks shagged Jags, Vettes, and Caddies double-quick. The car queue covered a half block. Marilyn pulled her sad-ass Buick up to the end of the line.

I pulled over and orbed the scene. Frat boys golf-carted guests up the big lawn. On-loan Playboy bunnies escorted them inside. The entry line stood one-hundred-deep.

Clock it. She'll mingle and misbehave. She'll get bored and split. You've got three hours tops.

My evidence kit weighed forty pounds. My camera case and bulb strips weighed ten. I parked on Carmelina and hauled the bags a full block.

I brazened a front-gate/front-door approach. The gate was open. The front door was jammed up. I slipped my Diners Club card through the latch portal. The lock bolts slid free.

My light touch worked. I made it inside. I left no tool marks or telltale scratches. I lugged the bags inside and locked the door behind me. Darling, I'm home!

Cool air hit me. Half-cracked windows stirred a breeze. I'd memorized the structural diagrams. I knew the floor plan and the phone-extension spots. I pulled out my penlight and bit down on the shaft. My eyes were my camera. The small beam was my swivel lens.

I dropped my kit and case and quick-prowled the premises. I flashed the wall-to-floor junctures. I noted ornamental wainscoting in the five main rooms. Wainscot ledges concealed feed wires with minimum paint camouflage.

My eyes and penlight lens worked in sync. I imprinted the wainscot strips and their proximity to phone-installation spots. I imprinted ceiling lamps and standing lamps and carpet pads to conceal room bugs.

I focused down. I tallied installation points. I tantalized myself with B and E foreplay. The mark's Marilyn Monroe. I'm saving the intimate prowl work for last.

I walked room-to-room. I unscrewed the three telephone handsets. I imprinted the internal circuitry and memorized spots to stash receiver mikes. I supplanted my memory with Polaroid snapshots. I went in lens-close and bulb-bright. I shot extreme close-ups of receiver housings and bounced light off the walls.

I tossed the wet prints and used bulbs in my evidence kit. Bulb glare induced double vision. I Murine-dosed my eyes. I re-toured the house and restored my 20/20 sight lines. I tracked penlight impressions, ad hoc.

The housekeeper's room. It's a monk's cell. Sight to scent. That's a lavender sachet. The kitchen. Sloth and disarray. Stacked dishes and dumped food in the sink. Mold spots on a standing rib roast. Black sink sludge. Backed-up pipes emitting a stink.

The master bathroom adjoined the kitchen. I smelled wet towels and soapy grime walking in. Note the bathtub rings. Note the plastic shower caps dumped on the floor.

I opened the medicine chest. There's Marilyn's stash.

Seconal/Nembutal/Biphetamine/Dexedrine/zonk-your-ass Dilaudid. Note the half-pint of vodka on the sink ledge. Note the toothbrush handle poking out the top. News flash: Marilyn Monroe brushes her teeth with Smirnoff 100.

I retrieved my camera case and bulb strips. I shot the kitchen and bathroom sloth. I shot the medicine-chest pharmacopia. I close-up shot the vodka jug and toothbrush.

My eyes fuzzed out again. I stashed the wet prints and used bulbs in my kit and walked back to the living room. The rugs looked cheap. The tacked-up wall photos spooked me. Drag queens at the Hollywood Ranch Market. A butch junkie shooting up at Linda's Little Log Cabin. Brain-dead tykes wearing Mickey Mouse beanies.

A liquor sideboard. Crammed with half-pints of Smirnoff 100 and paper cups. A big bowl on a pedestal. Piled high with hashish chunks.

I shot the living room. Six quick exposures, in and out. I'd been inside fifty-two minutes. My technical walk-through was solid. I had what I'd need to string wires and mount bugs and taps.

I wanted scent and sensation more than sight now. I wanted to touch things that touched her. I wanted to be where she got lonely and cut loose.

I lugged my gear into Marilyn's bedroom. I quadrant-scanned it, up and down.

Bland white walls. Wood-plank shelves. A nightstand by the bed. A white phone on top. Plus twelve pill vials and two vodka short dogs.

A king-size bed. All-white bedsheets and an all-white duvet. Soiled white pillowcases. Step in close, now. See if you can track her scent.

I smelled stale and recent exertion. I smelled mingled fluids, visible as dried stains. I smelled expensive perfume and cheap aftershave. I saw lipstick-stained and punched-down pillows. It denoted violent efforts to sleep.

I looked under the bed. I saw a large metal lockbox jammed between the floor and box springs. I pulled it out and flipped the lid latch. The box was stuffed with hundred-dollar bills.

Neat stacks. Thick stacks. All rubber-band cinched. I dumped the box on the bed and photo-shot green cash on soiled sheets.

I counted the money. It totaled forty grand. My Man Camera fritzed. My eyes burned and refocused within my penlight beam. I clenched my jaws and cracked a tooth on the shaft.

My legs spasmed. I steadied myself on a bed rail. My first thought: Steal the money. My second thought: Don't steal the money. My third thought: You're a detective. What does this mean?

I repacked the lockbox and repositioned it under the bed. I quadrant-scanned the walls and caught a sliding-door closet. I slid it open. An overweighted hanger bar dislodged and fell to the floor. Too-garish and too-dowdy garments collapsed in a heap.

I knelt down and examined them. I scoped pink muumuus, tweed skirts, low-bodice gowns in tiger-stripe velour. Op Art summer shifts, size 16. Sweatshirts and sweatpants with Big & Beautiful Boutique labels. Ankle-length duffle coats, sized for men. Bull dyke jumpsuits by Large Marge of Huntington Beach. See-thru raincoats with drawstring hoods—a hot item from Plus Size De-Luxe.

Monroe was five-four and svelte. This dreck couture was fat-lady capacious. My first thought: It's some Actors Studio exercise. Subsume your thin self and become someone both more and less. My second thought: It's more perverse and sinister than that.

I smelled her then. The perfume scenting the bedsheets saturated the clothes on the floor. Marilyn Monroe had capered in each and every one of these getups.

I reattached the hanger bar and rehung the threads in approximate order. I smelled like HER now. I flashed the west-facing wall. My beam caught a plank bookshelf sans books.

The shelf ran half the length of the wall. I walked up to it. My breath stirred dust up through my light beam. I ran my hands down the shelf. A sheet of white notebook paper stuck to my fingers.

I close-up flashed it. Block print covered the page. The style was pure high school girl. Curlicues and drawn hearts to dot the i's.

Marilyn mixed numbers, dates, and abbreviations. I caught the gist fast. "Refs" meant refills. The "30s" and "60s" meant pill counts. "Biphet," "Dilau," "Nemb," "Sec" and "Chloral H" denoted fine shit. The dates ranged from 8/12/60 up to last week. Below the dates: "Nice Drs" circled by schoolgirl hearts.

"Internist/Engleberg"/four bursting hearts. "Gynecologist/Kaplan"/ one heart cracked in half. "Won't write Rxs & too handsy, but cute." "Cardiologist/Brammey/Rxs on occasion. Ick! Had my Playboy spread framed on his desk."

I hovered over the shelf and penlight-scanned the full surface. I saw this:

Notebook Page #2. A block-print pharmacy list. The Vincente, the Roxbury, the Beverly Wilshire, Schwab's, the Mickey Fine. Plus phone numbers and hours of operation. Below that—an obvious lover list, with kooky artwork.

"Al"/"stuntman"/three sketched dicks going Boing. "Biff"/"pizza delivery boy"/one wilted dick and peanut-size balls. "George"/"gas station jockey"/four giant dicks spurting jizz. "Lou"/"car-park valet"/ two normal-size dicks and “Go-down guy—not bad.” Below that: “Rick Dawes. Mean—maybe a fag.” Followed by four illegibly crossed-out block-print lines.

Here’s my guess:

Marilyn’s pissed at Rick D. She expunged his telephone-answering-service names and phone numbers. He’s a closet queen. Fuck him. He’s out of her life.

Below that:

“L.A. Sheriff’s” and the main switchboard number—MA-46682.

Non sequitur. Head scratcher. Big anomaly—Monroe and the county fuzz. I photo-snapped the notebook sheets. I counted off sixty seconds per and pulled the prints. I dropped them in my evidence kit.

My first thought: Where’s Marilyn’s address book? Where does she list her friends, colleagues, flunkies, ex-husbands, and lovers for real? My second thought: Where’s her received correspondence and fan mail? Where’s her hotsville missives from John F. and Robert F. Kennedy?

My first guess: Stashed on the premises. My second guess: She keeps her address book and all hotsville notes on her person. My third guess: She’s mercurial defined. She dumps boring correspondence and fan mail. She keeps the good stuff in a bank vault.

I’d been inside for two hours and nineteen minutes. I couldn’t dust for prints or vacuum fibers. I could quick-toss the premises and beat feet.

I allotted fifteen minutes. I checked drawers, pulled up rugs, quick-scanned the kitchen cabinets. I combed closets and looked for stash holes. I got late-breaking Non Sequiturs #2 and 3.

Under the bathroom rug. One Martindale’s Bookshop bookmark. Scrawled on the back: “Jack at White House” and “Bobby at Justice.” Plus two main-switchboard numbers.

Stashed in a hall closet. One triple-reinforced pillowcase filled with quarters, nickels, dimes.

I photographed the bookmark and coin stash. I was clocked down to three minutes. I checked a lo-boy bookshelf. Monroe dug the highbrow frogs.

Sartre, Camus, de Beauvoir. I flipped pages through five books. She’d bookmarked pithy passages and added margin notes. As in: “use at party,” “drop as casual bon mot.” As in: “pretend it’s my quote” and “Jack will luv this.”

Phony Marilyn. She’s desperate to impress.

I rescanned the bookshelf. It was all left-wing frog fare, save this:

The Sexual Criminal, by Paul de River, M.D. I knew de River, circa ’49. He was a batshit crazy headshrinker jungled up with LAPD. He ran the jive-progressive Sex Offense Bureau. Ex-Chief Worton brought him in. De River headshrunk rape-o’s, pud pullers, whipout men, transvestites, and lust killers. He geezed them up with his own dope concoctions and browbeat them in group therapy stints. Bill Parker replaced Worton in ’50. He disdained de River and his humbug sex theories. He canned his ass off the LAPD.

I skimmed pages. De River theorized, bloviated, and gasbagged at great length. The book featured photographs. Sex fiends lolled in hard-backed chairs and gaped, insensate. Whiteout strips covered their eyes.

I recognized Otto Stephen Wilson. He eviscerated two women in downtown hotels and fell for Murder One. He mouthed off to me at the Lincoln Heights Jail, late ’45. I beat the shit out of him. He sucked gas up at Quentin, fall ’46.

The book sickened me. I tossed it back on the shelf. A slip of notebook paper fell out. Marilyn Monroe block-printed this:

“When all other forms of applied therapy have failed, it may be possible to contravene absent, passive, or self-destructively reactive behavior with the imposition of direct criminal action.”

(LOS ANGELES, 4/12–5/18/62)

I worked it. My guys worked it. We disdained nomenclature. It was "the job," "the gig," "the deal." It wasn't "Operation Blond" or "L'affaire Jacques." It was a dirt probe. We excavated dirt for Jimmy Hoffa. We fed him bug-tap scraps, surveillance briefs, and unverified innuendo. We bombarded him with listless tape reels and transcriptions. He's charged to make data blips cohere and jell as evidence of moral turpitude and actionable criminal offense.

My 4/11 pad prowl served up Marilyn Monroe. Her sloth. Her dope addiction. Her all-star libido and urgent fix on the Kennedy brothers. She stashed forty grand under her bed. It played ambiguous. Film studios played money fast and loose. They dispensed cash to contravene IRS payouts. The forty grand might be innocuous. The forty grand might indict criminal malfeasance.

I corkboard-pinned my B and E snapshots and telefaxed duplicates to Jimmy. The job vibed slow burn and slow build toward ho-hum revelation. Deficient hygiene. Dope. Adultery. Financial misconduct. Camelot as sanctified shuck. I knew that shit going in. I'm an eyeball man. My need to see and sift dirt pushed me past easily foregone conclusions.

That first pad prowl torqued me. The forty grand. The coin stash. Monroe's zaftig threads. Paul de River's nutty book and Monroe's nutty critique of de River's nutty ethos. They were tangent leads to work solo. My immediate brief was to oversee the establishment of an electronic eavesdropping system and a compatible system of sit-still and mobile surveillance.

Jimmy H. shot me a twenty-grand bank draft. I paid my guys two weeks in advance and put them to work. They ran sound and frequency-reception checks near the Lawford and Monroe pads and rented two beachside listening posts within twenty-four hours. Post #1: a small house on the east bluffside above PCH. It's got good eyeball lines and direct-frequency bearings. High foliage obscures inand-out foot and car traffic. Post #2: a small storeroom at the Sip ’n’ Surf Lounge on Malibu Pier. It’s got surfer girls and a private back entrance. That makes two Lawford posts. Plus two radio frequencies. That’s two shots to blunt car noise/wave crash/bum-feed contingencies.

Phil Irwin scored a perfect Monroe post. It was a disused maintenance shack on a side street upside Brentwood Country Club. It featured three rooms, a crapper/shower combo, six wall outlets, and a roof antenna. It was one-half mile from Fifth Helena Drive and provided clear signal access. Plus a backyard and carport and a tree-cloaked rear entrance. The Brentwood CC groundskeeper and Sip ’n’ Surf boss were ex–L.A. Sheriff’s. Phil rated them A-OK.

Nat and Robbie ran the motor pool. We stashed our surveillance sleds in Robbie’s garage. Nat and Robbie humped it. Jimmy Hoffa decreed a full-court press. He was mobbed up and unioned up, nationwide. He connived two grip jobs on the Something’s Got to Give set. Nat and Robbie would work their listening-post assignments and full soundstage shifts at Fox.

They worked the prep for the shoot. They scrounged quick drift per Monroe’s upcoming travels.

4/17. She’ll fly to New York. She’s off to schmooze arts poseurs Lee and Paula Strasberg. Plus this:

Jack the K’s birthday bash. Mid-May, New York City. Scheduled for Madison Square Garden. Marilyn’s set to sing “Happy Birthday” to the Big Kahuna. The Strasbergs are primed to pep-talk our girl and ascribe motivation. She’ll be gone two full days. That’s my shot to hot-wire and re-prowl her crib.

The days dragged by. We set up our equipment at the listening posts. We ran endless sound checks. I creamed to get back inside Fifth Helena. We rolled out at midnight on 4/18.

Bernie Spindel and I picked locks and entered. Phil, Nat, and Robbie triangulated outside. They perched in our camouflage rides. They curb-patrolled Carmelina, Fifth and Sixth Helena. They sustained walkie-talkie contact and eyeball-strafed for nocturnal fuzz.

Bernie and I laid wire. We were inside four hours and nine minutes. I looked under Monroe’s bed. The cash box was gone. A Jackie Kennedy voodoo doll was propped up on a chair pillow. Marilyn pincushioned Jackie. She stuck a cocktail fork straight up the First Lady’s keester.

We got in, we got out. We hobknobbed at the Brentwood post and ran sound checks. We heard dead air and got audible dial clicks.

Monroe's calls went straight to her answering service. We left bogus messages. The operators' voices came through audible-plus.

4/19. Monroe returns to L.A. The soundstage was prepped and ready. The shoot begins 4/23. I prebribed gate guards and secured a three-month premises pass.

I roamed the lot. I bribed a crafts hut flunky and secured my own golf cart. I went unrecognized. My Confidential magazine/scourge-of-Hollywood days were long gone. I piled lumber scraps in the cart and played working stiff.

I tailed Monroe to Fox. I observed the soundstage setups. I observed HER.

She worked people. She used people. She possessed three modes of address. She was bossy, she was demure, she was effusive. I didn't like her. I didn't get her. Her acting chops and alleged va-va-voom hit me flat.

I peeped her trailer three days running. I observed the Marilyn Quadrafecta: pop pills/booze/barf/pass out. Robbie and Nat reported on-set consternation. Marilyn was "pulling a Liz." Something's Got to Give was dubbed Cleopatra West. Marilyn mimicked Liz Taylor's Euro antics, because she could.

Cleopatra put Fox on the Shitsville Express. Studio machers and wage slaves waxed apocalyptic. Got to Give was Cleo writ downscale. Marilyn was out to out-Liz Liz. Nat and Robbie pipelined the bad news and gloated. I pipelined it to Jimmy Hoffa.

Day #4 defined the Quadrafecta. Marilyn passed out for six hours straight. A gofer kicked her trailer door down. An ambulance hauled Marilyn back to Fifth Helena.

Her wilted waif act postponed the shoot indefinitely. Marilyn malingers at home. Nat and Robbie monitor her phone calls. Phil Irwin holds down eyeball surveillance. The golf course listening post gets crackling good reception.

Marilyn calls out. She whines to Shrink Man Greenson and chats up a pizza delivery boy she calls "Big Dick Dave." She eats anchovy pizza for breakfast, lunch, and dinner.

I habituated the Got to Give set and kept my snout down. The second-unit director shot scenes "around" Monroe. Cast and crew excoriated her jive film-goddess ways. I excoriated her. The Hoffa job was running on-course—but I was running a fever.

We had to hot-wire the Lawford spread. It was the hot-spot nexus of the Jack/Bobby/Marilyn cluster fuck. The house was crammed full of Lawfords, Lawford kids, and Lawford slaves at all times. My PC Bell contact kicked loose vital information. There were no secondary phone lines ascribed to the house. I thought Jack might have his own tête-à-tête and nuke-the-Kremlin line. Nix that. There's one phone number and six extensions.

Robbie and Phil played PC Bell repairmen and canvassed Lawford's neighbors. They tweaked them per celeb misconduct at the Lawford spread. An old biddy called the house a "hotbed of libertine behavior." Three neighbors confirmed the high volume of Lawfords and Lawford factotums. Said volume impeded the operation and drove me batshit crazy. I wanted to get inside and mike-up that house. I wanted to explore the cluster fuck. I wanted to invade Pat Kennedy Lawford's private habitat.

The Hoffa job is now all rotation. My guys rotate between Fox, Fifth Helena, and the golf course listening post. I rotate between Fox, Fifth Helena, the Sip 'n' Surf and east bluffside posts. There's no bugs and taps installed at the Lawford house. I've got sight lines and no audial access. I sit in the dark and look down at the house. Pat walks through lighted rooms sometimes.

Marilyn malingers at home. Shrink Man Greenson and Big Dick Dave visit her. The living room bug records shrink-session pap. Marilyn justifies her Got to Give misconduct. She calls her work-shirking ailments "manifestations of existential malaise." Greenson tut-tuts and upbraids her. He's a scold. Marilyn works to shock him. She blew the prez in the luggage hold on Air Force One. Greenson tut-tuts. Marilyn details her bitter rivalry with Liz Taylor. Cleopatra is pompous froth. Got to Give is froth that knows it's froth. We're movie-actress women. We rebel against the authority of the moguls and Nazi auteurs who represent the uncles and foster daddies who poked us you know where when we were eight. Liz and I are pulling deliberate work stoppages disguised as sicknesses to exact our subconscious revenge. Film studios are the mystified fascist oligarchies that Sartre critiques.

The bedroom bugs pick up mattress squeaks in sync with Big Dick Dave's visits. Plus moans and groans muzzled by pillows and thrashed sheets. Hallway bugs pick up the housekeeper's vacuum cleaner and staticked Marilyn/housekeeper chats. I boxed and marked those tape reels "Subject at home/bogus work absence/nonrevelatory." The golf course post piled up reels of Monroe in hibernation. She broke loose at 8:00 p.m. on 4/26.

I tailed her to an all-girl pillfest at Jeanne Carmen's apartment. Sheriff's Vice ran a green sheet on these wingdings. Phil Irwin laid out the gestalt. He was ex-Sheriff's and knew his shit.

"They gab, they pop pills, they watch TV and pass out. They may or may not indulge in some muff diving. Jeanne used to snitch to the guys on the West Hollywood squad, and she spared no details when it came to the girl action."

That was Pillfest #1. Pillfest #2 ran 4/30 to 5/2. Robbie Molette snapped sneak pix through a bedroom-window gap. He caught Marilyn, Lila Leeds, and a butch golf pro in a nude pillow fight. Robbie's a smut man. His sister Chrissy's a shadow figure in the fuck film underground. He's developing duplicate photos. He'll peddle them at the Bearded Clam and Linda's Little Log Cabin.

Pillfest #2 fizzled out. Marilyn returned to work. I spot-tailed her, on and off the set. Robbie and Nat worked their grip gigs and got up eyeball-tight. Marilyn blew take after take. Director Cukor rebuked her. Marilyn pitched woe-is-me and sulked in her trailer. She boozed, she napped, she split Fox in a huff and shut down the shoot. I tailed her back to Fifth Helena. She put me through operational drudge work. We replayed the routine, six days straight.

Bugs, taps, spot tails, sit-still and mobile surveillance. Full-time listening post with A-level reception. We've got Doc Greenson and Pizza Man Dave. We've got nude pillow fights. Jack and Bobby K don't call. What's with Marilyn's coin stash and zaftig threads? Where's that forty grand she stashed under her bed? It wasn't there the night we hot-wired her. Where's all the dishy phone chats with Hollywood insiders?

I worked my sit-still shifts in a tree trimmer's truck. That girl in the '60 Corvair kept bopping by to peek over the hedge. I wrote down her plate number and buzzed my DMV contact. He supplied full license stats.

The sled:

Registered to Willard D. Farr/WMA/age 44. Swank Pacific Palisades address. Husband of Dorothy Denton Lowell, thirty-nine. The blond girl: Georgia Lowell Farr/DOB 3/22/45/Palisades High School junior. Snap call: she's a rich-kid Marilyn obsessive.

Like Jimmy Hoffa. Like me. Like my guys—we're all fan-club fools run amok.

The job proceeded. The rotations rotated. I triangulated. The Fox lot, the post, Fifth Helena. My lot prowls felt intrusive now. I was onetime notorious. Film studios are gossip pits. People must have made me. Jimmy Hoffa pulled strings and got my guys in. Fox was mobbed up from way back. Ben Siegel, Willie Bioff, the Aadland brothers. Mobbed-up unions ran the rank-and-file workforce. Fox felt like a snitch hive. LAPD Intel infiltrated the studio craft unions. Ditto SHIT—the Sheriff's geeks. The lot exposed me. I sensed it. I was ex-LAPD and tenuously tight with Bill Parker.

El Jefe and I went back. I owed him. He extricated me from dire shit on numerous occasions. The Chief was treading shit now. His boys blew up two Black Muslims outside a southside mosque. Nat Denkins' kid brother got embroiled. Nat spritzed outrage on his radio show. I issued a gag order. It stopped just short of a muzzle. Nat said he'd tone it down.

Fox was a gossip pit. I sensed informational seepage. Phil and Robbie sensed it, likewise. I curtailed my golf-cart prowls and stuck to the posts and Fifth Helena. Monroe abetted me. She blew off the Got to Give shoot and moped home in early May. I sensed long-term hibernation.

Nasty Nat developed a source on the main Fox switchboard. She placed the long-distance calls for the Got to Give cast and crew. She was married. Nat, likewise. They got a thing going and trysted at no-tell motels. Nat called her his fox at Fox. She eavesdropped on Monroe's calls from her trailer. They ran to type. Monroe called pharmacies and issued dope directives. Monroe placed twenty-one calls to the White House and Justice Department switchboards. She asked to be put through to the prez and AG. Line garble cut the calls off then. I knew why. The interior lines were security-scrambled.

Seepage. Boring repetition. Outcompensated by this:

Indications. Disparate working on coherent. Marilyn's bonking Jack and possibly Bobby. It's occasional. It's casual to them. It's urgent to her. She's desperate. She's unhinged. She's delusional. She's DEROGATORY PROFILE–defined.

I work the Hoffa gig. I keep the Eddie Fisher gig back-burnered. Art Aragon's bodyguarding Eddie. I swoop by the Losers Club and gas on Mr. Cornuto. He's belting show tunes and spritzing raw.

He features Liz and Dick. They're fucking and sucking here. They're 69'ing there. He's got Roman geography down. Turn-away crowds wail and gorge on Eddie's self-abasement.

Art feeds me the up-close. Froufrou actor Roddy McDowall costars in Cleo. He calls Eddie from Roma and delivers the daily dish. Fox is now known as 20th Century–LOX. Rumors accumulate and mutate. It's biblical prophecy. Fox will implode by this, that, or this date. Fox execs and rank and filers are shit-your-pants shook. They're devising scams to build bankrolls for the Fox Apocalypse. Fake bearer bonds.

Unload them in Mexico—it’s a sure thing. Wife-swap clubs, pill-popper clubs, key parties. Dope smuggled in and out of T.J. And, now: Monroe’s sabotaging Got to Give in the Lizesque Cleo style.

Monroe malingered. I stuck close. My tap feeds picked up her calls. She yelped to Doc Greenson. Jack and Bobby use me and pass me around like men always have. She called Jeanne Carmen. They planned future pill trysts. She swung with Pizza Dave and snarfed pizza three times daily. She walked out in plus-size dresses and big slouchy hats. I foot-tailed her to Barrington and Beverly Glen parks.

She’s on a spy-mistress kick. She carries a drawstring purse stuffed with coins. She makes five and six phone booth calls and slinks back to Fifth Helena.

She employs enclosed phone booths. She hunkers down and crowds the coin boxes. I don’t know who she’s calling or what she’s saying. PC Bell does not tally individual pay-phone calls. I can’t track her callouts.

My phone taps remain undetected. I know that. She calls out on all three extensions. She’s got a closet stuffed with nickels, dimes, and quarters. I sense design here. It plays inimical to her whole vida loca.

Monday, 5/14. Marilyn returns to the Got to Give set. Cast and crew applaud. The lovefest lasts three hours. A big row with George Cukor flatlines it. Robbie observed the fracus. Marilyn sulked back to her trailer and got smashed.

Tuesday, 5/15. Nasty Nat’s switchboard plant reports two Marilyn calls. Call #1: to Doc Greenson. Shrink Man tells Marilyn he’s taking a month’s vacation. Marilyn moans. Greenson soothes her. The gist: he’s got a backup shrink she’ll love. Call Milt Wexler. We’re office mates. You’ll love Dr. Milt. He’s a mensch. Call #2: to Dr. Milt’s office. “Hi. This is Marilyn Monroe speaking.” The receptionist goes eeeek. Wednesday, 5/16. It’s payday and my summary-report-due day. Jimmy H. rigged a safe-deposit-box drop. There’s two B of A’s off of Wilshire and Western. I had two box keys. I snared the payroll at Box #1. I placed my report, tape reels, and transcription logs in Box #2. Jimmy left me a note:

“Breakfast. 8:00 Saturday. The Statler.”

Thursday, 5/17. I was kicked back in my golf cart. I was bored and scratching my balls. Soundstage #14 was straight across a breezeway. The Got to Give shoot droned on.

A helicopter hovered and touched down in the parking lot. Peter Lawford opened the hatch. Marilyn ran out and passed him a garment bag. He blew her a kiss and slammed the hatch. The chopper took off.

Marilyn waved bye-bye.

It hit me. Jack's birthday bash. Madison Square Garden. It's this Saturday night. Be there or be square.

I rolled to a pay phone and called L.A. International. I impersonated a Sheriff's lieutenant and demanded a passenger brief. A cowed clerk delivered.

L.A. to Idlewild. The Pan Am noon flight. Peter and Pat Lawford. Plus four kids and three servants. A Miss Monroe on a Saturday-noon charter flight.

There's Pat's private habitat. There's your big empty house.

(LOS ANGELES, 8:10 A.M., SATURDAY, 5/19/62)

Jimmy Hoffa said, “She won’t last much longer on that movie she’s in. Everybody’s losing patience.”

The same hotel suite. The same breakfast fare. The same chairs pulled up tight. Hoffa wore a tight gray suit and spit-shined shoes. A plastic seafood bib covered his chest.

“That’s right. The studio’s losing money on her, at a time when they can’t afford to.”

Hoffa sipped coffee. “The wall bugs don’t give up much, do they? Mostly it’s just boring conversation.”

I shrugged. “House bugs are always an iffy proposition. The sound disperses, and you only score when the principals sit close together and talk pertinent shit.”

“No calls or visits from Jack and Bobby, huh?”

I said, “She calls the White House and Justice from her trailer on the lot. It’s in my summary. The internal phone lines are scrambled, so there’s no chance to hear any actual conversations she might have.”

Hoffa cracked his knuckles. “Forty thou in a lockbox, under the bed. That’s interesting.”

I went Nix. “It was gone the night Bernie and I laid in the wires.”

Hoffa slurped coffee. His bib featured snarling lobsters and crabs.

“Greenson’s skeeved on her, right? He comes to her house, and she comes to his place for cocktails. He coddles her, she confides in him, and some night when the moon’s all full, he’ll get up his nerve to pounce.”

I laughed. “Greenson’s going out of town for a month. He set Marilyn up with his office mate, Milt Wexler. I doubt if he’ll accommodate her the way Greenson does.”

Hoffa harumphed and squared his bib. He was short. His throne chair dwarfed him. His feet grazed the carpet.

“I blame Jack for all this permissive shit poisoning our culture. He’s put the whole country in some fucked-up state of enchantment, with his Jew Frontier shit and civil rights and all this other high-minded shit, while he's meanwhile ramming this nutty nympho when he's supposed to be a good family man, like me."

I went Whoa, now. "You saw my evidence photos. Something's going on here. Why would Monroe have the main number for the L.A. Sheriff's Office listed on an odd sheet of paper?"

Hoffa cracked his thumbs. "I've been scrounging tips on that girl for years, ever since I learned she put out for Jack and Bobby and half the stray cock in this town. One, she hates the LAPD—going back to the late '40s, when she was supposedly a freelance call girl. Also, she hates them on political grounds, like that Black Muslim hoo-haw a few weeks ago. She loves the Sheriff's, because old Sheriff Biscailuz doted on her and always had her ride with him at the county rodeo, whereas the LAPD Intel Division has got surveillance film of her at about eight million pro-Commie rallies. The SHIT unit has more or less left her alone, probably because she's been known to blow Pete Pitchess on occasion. Confucius say, 'It not who you know but who you blow.' Pete's okay. He's a lawyer and an ex-FBI man, and he's Gay Edgar Hoover's choice to replace him if the Kennedys let him go."

I lit a cigarette. "I see where this is going. You've got no beef with old man Hoover. Bobby K's the thorn in your side, and the old man hates him. SHIT's tight with the Feds, because of the Hoover-Pitchess connection. The old poof loves Hollywood gossip—and SHIT feeds him the shit."

Hoffa twirled his coffee cup. "You're right on all that. That's why I'm a Pitchess guy, and that's why he's my choice to succeed the old man. He'll never take grief from Bobby K, and he'll leave labor and so-called organized crime alone."

I checked a wall clock. My Fifth Helena shift started now. Monroe's charter flight left at noon. The Lawford B and E job crunched me. Equipment checks would run—

Hoffa tossed his bib and jiggled his nuts. Hoffa stood up and stretched.

"Okay, so Greenson and this Wexler guy share an office. That simplifies things. I want you to break in, mimeograph any Monroe files you come across, and see if you can grab or make tape copies of any of those nutty little chats our girl and Greenson might have recorded. I'm kicking this thing into high gear."

The day turned hot. The tree-service truck trapped dead air. I zoom-lensed Monroe's front gate and cogitated.

Equipment checks. Tonight's the night.

Walkie-talkies. Police-band scanner. Power drills. Wire rolls and phone jacks. Flashlights, penlights, oscilloscope. Dust vacuums, Spackle paste and spreaders. Two inside men. That's Bernie and me. Phil stands lookout on PCH. He's ex-Sheriff's. The house straddles the city-county line. Phil's a Sheriff's reserve. He carries a badge. He could hold off nosy fuzz.

Robbie plays watchdog. He's couched in the bluffside post. He's got the down-slant overview. Nat lurks outside. He's our runner. He's in and out of the house. He pipelines Bernie and me. He shags emergency gear.

I cogitated. I popped two dexies and sipped Old Crow. I replayed breakfast with Jimmy H.

Jimmy played not quite askew. He's financing a sex-squeeze/cease-and-desist operation. He's eight-balling the prez and AG. Jimmy's a known prude and tightwad. Jimmy's funding a big party that may yield zilch. Jimmy's a money man. There's no fallback money angle should the plan go pfffft. There's cease and desist and no correlative payoff. That's very un-Jimmy.

That maroon Corvair pulled up in front of me. Georgia Lowell Farr got out. She wore a Pali High cheerleader sweater and khakis. She walked across the street and straight through the gate.

I lens-tracked her. Marilyn Monroe entered the frame.

I pulled back and recentered the shot. There they are. The dissolute screen queen and swoony high school girl hug. Marilyn kicks the gate shut.

The front door slammed. They're inside now. Sit down and talk, kids. The room bugs will eavesdrop.

Time slogged. Time stuttered and stalled. My brain trip outran it. I fantasy-perved on Lois and Pat. The front door creaked open. I got out and stood on my back bumper. My lens world expanded. Monroe and the Farr girl walked toward the gate.

They were dirt-smeared and disheveled. They kept brushing off their hands. I snapped three photographs. They hugged good-bye. Georgia Farr was five-ten. She loomed over Monroe.

The gate popped open. Georgia stepped out. Monroe cut back across her front lawn. She moved diagonal. That meant the garage.

She had a noon flight east. I jumped back in the truck and cranked a quick U-turn. I punched it down to Carmelina, cut north, and parked. I perched for ten minutes. Finally—there's that dumb Buick. It's drifting down Sixth Helena. Monroe's driving weavy today.

She turned north on Carmelina. Away from the airport. She fishtailed into a two-lane drift.

I tailed her. My surveillance truck had no pop. Monroe swerved east on Sunset. I goosed the gas and barely kept up.

We breezed through Westwood and Holmby Hills. We entered Beverly Hills. Monroe straddled traffic lanes. Horn honks bombarded her. She drove oblivious. She left-turned on Benedict Canyon. I blew a red light and hung in.

We went north. It was a climb. The road went twisty and one-laned. Monroe scuffed her whitewalls and caromed off of curbs. We crossed Mulholland and two-laned downhill. The steep grade jerked me forward and ratcheted up my speed. Monroe tap-tapped her brakes. I rode her back bumper. Fuck her. She'd never notice me. She drove zombified.

It's a Valley run. I rode the clutch and slid between first and second. The terrain went Valley-flat. Marilyn made goofy right and left turns. Ventura, Moorpark, north on Woodman. An alley and a dead end at Saticoy. She veered left. I stalled out at an unmarked retaining wall and slammed the truck in reverse. I veered left on Saticoy and sped up. The Buick was flat gone.

I slow-cruised three blocks and scanned intersections. I scoped parked vehicles. I saw the dumb Buick jammed between an Olds coupe and cholo Impala. A quick blip blipped me. That's her. She's waltzing down an alley, ten o'clock–left.

Shit—

I'm moving away from her. The curbs and driveways are car-blocked. There's no place to park.

It's Blown Tail #2. I'm somewhere in dogdick Encino. There's high-end ranch homes behind me. It's jumped-up apartment blocks here.

It's atypical Monroe turf. The locale torqued me. It vibed dope buy or sex tryst. It's 9:40. She's got a noon flight. Why's that lunatic here now?

I found a parking spot. It was three blocks and a half mile east. I re-vibed it.

She's meeting someone. She's doing something wrong. It's a new money/flash money neighborhood. Pool-cabana apartment blocks.

Stewardess hives, fag pads, kept-woman domiciles. The Aloha Gardens, the Hawaiian Lanais, the Tiki-Torch Village.

A notion buzz-bombed me. It was shitwork and drudge work combined. I didn't know where she was or who she was with. Parked cars engulfed me. I could jot down plate numbers and call my DMV guy. Plate stats might reveal hinky names and addresses. Underground garages engulfed me. They were gate-locked and remote-controlled. It restricted my access. It was all shitwork under the sun.

I worked it. I walked a three-block/car-to-car radius. Monroe's car was gone. She'd make her flight. I scrawled plate numbers for 143 vehicles. It took four hours. It was Valley hot. I sweated and soiled myself up. My tree-trimmer outfit oozed wet.

She's got something going. I'm the Derogatory Profile man. I want to know what it is.

It's Saturday night. We've got warm spring weather. There's bumper-locked cars crammed on PCH. It's party night. That means sound cover. It drifts house-to-house and muzzles entry sounds. It's 11:52 p.m. We're going in.

We'd stashed our cars at the bluffside post. Nat stashed our gear under a Lawford garage tarp. He did it brazen. In full daylight. He drove the tree-trim truck up on the curb and jammed the remote-control signal on the garage door. He cranked the door and dumped our gear. He trimmed two palm trees on the south walkway. The ruse took sixteen seconds, all told.

We lounged against parked cars. We wore party clothes and smoked cigarettes. Hula shirts, slacks, light windbreakers. That's Nat, Phil, Bernie, and me. We're four guys grabbing some air. We'll go back inside and re-party in a second. Robbie's our spotter. He's up in the bluffside post. He'll flash a red light to cue the intrusion.

Phil's got a police-band scanner. He'll lurk outside. Nat's the equipment runner. There's six phones on the premises. Three upstairs, three down. Bernie will wire up the wall bugs and tap the downstairs phones. I'll do the upstairs. Nat packed our shit in duffel bags. He'll backstop the cleanup. We're covered every which way.

Robbie flashed the red light. It blipped clear from four hundred yards and high up. Nat cranked the garage door and let himself in. Phil lurked by a '61 Lincoln. Bernie and I hustled down the north pathway and braced the kitchen-side door.

Bernie penlight-flashed the lock. I jammed a #4 pick in the keyhole and poked around. The door popped open. We stepped inside and shut the door behind us. A penlight beam strafed the floor. It was Nat. He entered through the garage. He gave us the A-OK sign and hauled our duffel bags up.

I tapped my Man Camera switch. I'd memorized the interior floor plan and phone-installation spots. I grabbed my duffel bag. I bit down on my penlight and followed the beam.

The front stairway took me up. The second floor was plain big. Front and rear stairways. Four squared-off hallways. Two kid-size bedrooms on the south side. Built-in bathrooms, en suite.

Wide hallways. Long hallways.

The absence of common space vexed me. It militated against conversation. People did not gather to talk here.

The walls were flat-walnut paneled. Pricey plein air originals lined all four. The entire landing was recessed bulb/overhead lit. There were no standing lamps to plant bugs on. The thin Persian carpets would betray the bug mounts jammed underneath.

I nixed upstairs bugs. Bernie would bug the downstairs up the ying-yang. People talked there.

I clocked the north hallway. Three closed doors meant three large bedroom suites. It hit me, belated.

Separate bedrooms for Peter and Pat. Separate phone extensions, dressing rooms, bathrooms. I snap-judged the arrangement. It was Pat's call. Pat censured Peter. She exiled him. She worked within the bounds of the Kennedys-stay-married-but-ignore-their-vows dictum.

I went weavy. I grabbed a stair rail and steadied myself. I scanned the north hallway and walked the hall, east to west. I jiggled the first doorknob. The door was unlocked. I cracked it, just for scent. The air reeked of cleaning solvent and stale maryjane.

I walked to the middle door. It was snagged on a throw rug and open a hairsbreadth. The scent of Tweed drifted out.

She wore Tweed on a summer night in 1945. She wears Tweed today.

I walked to the west-end door. I saw it and stifled a laugh.

The door had been customized. The U.S. presidential seal was eye-level affixed. It was gold leaf and light blue enamel. Gold-leafed below the seal: Jack's Shack.

I opened the door and walked right in. Hey, Jack—what's shakin', baby?

The bedroom dittoed the hallways. Pricey plein airs and walnut panels. Two nightstands flanked a big Craftsman bed. Note the flanking telephones—red and black.

I examined the phones and tracked attached cords to wall outlets. The black phone was your standard PC Bell job. The red phone was rigged with buttons and custom volume controls. The cord was heavy-duty brass and attached to a separate feeder plug. It was a Secret Service tech installation.

Jack, you cocksucker. It's your hotline to launch the Big One. Remember me? We shared a few grins way back when.

I got out my tools and unscrewed the black phone's receiver. I inserted spacers and twisted wires and planted the taps. It took 2.4 seconds. I hauled my gear down to Peter Lawford's room. The stale reefer smoke made me sneeze. I tapped his phone in 2.0 seconds flat.

I heard TV noise and voices downstairs. Bernie and Nat haw-hawed and watched the news. A commentator recapped Jack's big birthday bash. Bernie said, "I heard he gets more ass than a toilet seat."

Nat said, "Freddy used to score for him. He's a one-a-day man."

Peter Lawford said something. The TV volume swooped. Marilyn Monroe sang "Happy Birthday." I'm a bug-and-tap pro. I know her voice now. She was zorched out of her gourd.

I walked into Pat's room. I smelled Tweed and felt trapped room heat. I tapped her bedside phone and dumped that task quick. A step-through closet hooked back to the bathroom. I flash-lit crewneck sweaters and navy blazers with the girls-school emblems excised. She owned one cocktail gown and fourteen pairs of saddle shoes. She owned one tailored suit and eleven plaid Pendleton shirts.

The closet enclosed a merged fragrance: Tweed and sandalwood blocks. I ran my hands through her sweaters. I felt the blocks and stirred the fragrance up. I touched something off-kilter—slick-surfaced metal and glass.

Keepsake, artifact, hidden treas—

I pulled it out. There we are/there we were. The black frame offsets us, we're soft within chaos, Pat's tortoiseshell beret gleams.

(LOS ANGELES, 11:20 A.M., THURSDAY, 5/24/62)

I'm a West L.A. locksmith. It's a B and E shuck. My Key King jumpsuit and tool kit ooze verisimo. I'm casing 408 Bedford Drive, Beverly Hills. Ralph Greenson and Milt Wexler shrink heads here.

My old Chevy hogged two curb slots. I chain-smoked and stalled the approach. Jimmy H. wants a file and/or tape grab. I pioneered headshrinker B and E's in my Confidential prime. Juicy exposés resulted.

"Jittery Johnnie Ray. The Boys call him 'Nervous Nellie.' " "Nympho Call Girl Ring—June Allyson, J'accuse!!!" "Bibulous Bob Mitchum—this bad boy's head won't shrink!!!"

Jimmy Hoffa says, "Jump." I say, "How high?" My prime ran from '54 to '56. Shrinks got hip to late-night 459's. They code and vault their celeb dirt now. Jimmy's side gig vibed dud.

I stalled the walk-through. I popped two dexies to suppress ennui. I replayed my moments in Pat's bedroom and merged scents and sounds.

The wire job launched. The phone taps work swell. The Lawfords are back from New York and Jack's birthday binge. The downstairs wall mikes are shit. They spew garbles and fractured conversation. Yelping kids. Maids running vacuum cleaners. Peter Lawford watching TV. Barking dogs and no hints of Pat.

Monroe's back from New York. We've got her lockstepped, tapped, and bugged. She's at the Fox lot today. Nat called me two hours back. He relayed secondhand dish. His switchboard operator girlfriend reports:

Marilyn was tanked and holed up in her trailer. She called the White House and Justice Department main numbers. Nat's girlfriend put the calls through. She eavesdropped on the upshot. Both operators said, "We've been told not to take your calls, Miss Monroe." Nat's girlfriend was sure they worked off prepared scripts.

My three posts are now full operational. The two beach posts log

Lawford-house calls, in and out. We're double-focused on the house. It's Jack's L.A. wet spot. The twin-post concept gets results. Two locations, two frequencies. It levels out wave crash and car boom. It brings Pat's voice alive.

I habituate the bluffside post. I've seen Pat four times in five days. She walks her ridgeback dog twice a day. She rotates the crewneck sweaters in her closet. She ties her hair back in the mornings and wears it down in the afternoons.

Marilyn's purportedly tight with the Lawfords. We haven't logged a single house-to-house call yet. Marilyn works the Fox day shift and the homebody night shift. She did a quasi-nude photo shoot on the Got to Give set. Gofers shooed off peepers and instilled decorum. Robbie Molette circumvented it. He shot some palm-camera pix and consigned them to his sister Chrissy. They now pervade the fuck film underground.

I worked the golf course post last night. I caught a hilarious phone schmooze. Marilyn Monroe and Georgia Lowell Farr joust culture and moral trend. Marilyn calls Miss Farr "Lowell." Lowell calls Miss Monroe "Marilyn." It's half sock hop, half perv slumber party.

Marilyn: "Save the woof-woof for your wedding night, sweetie. Listen to the voice of experience here, and don't get embroiled with politicians."

Lowell: "Don't you think President Kennedy's a dreamboat?"

Marilyn: "He's a dipshit. He screwed Anita Ekberg and gave Jackie the clap."

Lowell squealed and went kid gleeful. I heard cut-in clicks. Lowell's mom picked up an extension. Lowell said, "Mom—I'm on the horn with Marilyn Monroe." Mom sighed—you and your crazy fibs.

I got antsy. Jimmy Hoffa says "Jump." I say, "How—"

Giant ants got me itchy and crawled up my ass. I grabbed my tool kit and rolled.

The building was tinted-glass/brushed-steel sterile. I entered and elevatored up to floor 4. Greenson and Wexler shared Suite 419. I walked over and walked in.

Shrink suites run identical. Receptionist's cubicle, separate entrance for shrinkees. Offices and file room behind the cubicle. Short inner hallways and connecting doors. By and large unlocked.

I knelt by the hallway door. I fiddled with the lock spring and waved to the receptionist. She rolled her eyes and waved back. I slid two spacers up against the spring mounts.

Jungle Juice.

I brewed a batch and worked three days straight. I rotated listening post shifts, three per day. My guys caught a breather. I monitored calls and reviewed the tape and transcription logs for calls already received. I kept a scratch-pad list of calls that explicate my specific Monroe Bifecta: Monroe and the K boys/Monroe's Grade-A Crazy Shit.

Jeanne Carmen calls Marilyn. 6:09 p.m., 5/24/62. Here's the Marilyn-to-Jeanne extract:

"…and I've got to be very careful when I call out. I make my really high-priority calls from pay phones, because this really heavyweight and dreamy guy told me to. His name's José, and I met him on a mission to Mexico, which I am not at liberty to discuss."

Pat Lawford calls her sister Jean in New York. 2:42 p.m., 5/25/62. Here's the Pat-to-Jean lead-in:

"Jack and Bobby have dropped Marilyn." Jean responds: "Can you blame them? She's nutty as a fruitcake. I think she's a candidate for the rubber room. She was good in River of No Return, though."

Un-ID'd woman calls Pat. 9:17 a.m., 5/26/62. Here's the Pat-to-woman extract:

"Marilyn's been acting up. 'Acting' says it all. She's always acting. She's been sounding terrified, because she says she's been getting breather calls, and someone broke into her house and moved things around, and she got a nasty letter in the mail."

Jungle juice. Listening-post rotations. The posts had upsides and downsides. The bluffside post had proximity to Pat and threadbare décor. The Sip 'n' Surf post had surfer girls and no kitchen. The golf course post adjoined the practice tee at Brentwood CC. Stray balls popped off the roof and made me go for my piece. Jungle juice spawns cabin fever. I decreed a breather and logged work time outside.

Monroe's Valley jaunt. My blown tail. They perplexed me and wrenched me. I went by the Hollywood DMV and braced my contact there. I gave him my plate list. It ran to 143 numbers. He said he'd run them and get full license stats. We settled on five bucks per name and address.

Monroe's fan mail and personal correspondence. It vexed me and wrenched me. Where was it? It's not in her house. It might be safe-deposit-boxed. That notion crunched me. It entailed legwork. I cruised twenty-seven westside banks and savings and loans. I impersonated a Federal bank examiner and showed fake ID. I got twenty-seven "No, sir" responses.

My pending shrink's office break-in. It vexed me and wrenched me. It mandated cool-head circumspection.

Beverly Hills PD ran two graveyard-watch felony cars. They targeted residential and business-address burglars. Greenson and Wexler kept a narcotics safe. It was headshrinker SOP. Bedford Drive was Headshrinker Central. I called up cool-head caution and resolve. I logged two late-night surveillance shifts.

I lurked in an alleyway and eyeballed 408 Bedford. BHPD felony cars rolled by once an hour. The break-in mandated cool-head restraint and an eye for obfuscation. The narcotics safe and junkie burglars. BHPD would buy that.

I developed a plan and secured the appropriate props. They included a nitro spritz for the safe. I could peddle the shootable dope and refortify my pill stash.

Jungle juice. It wears you thin. The flight decrees the crash.

My three-day run ran down. I went light-headed. I saw sunspots and things that weren't there. I ate three candy bars for sustenance and gobbled three red devils. I crapped out at the golf course post. My sleep was all noise and dank colors.

Phone buzz stirred me. It was light outside. I'd slept sixteen-plus hours. I dove for my headphones and crashed into the chair by the console.

The voice activator kicked on. Tape spun. A man greeted Marilyn. I popped two dexies and called up alertness. I made the voice. Roddy McDowall. We had a circa '54 run-in. Drag ball hijinx. Roddy in a ritzy gown. Freddy O. peeps and exposes all.

I yawned and guzzled cold coffee. Marilyn said, "What time is it in Rome? Come on, baby. You know what I'm angling for."

Roddy said, "This will have to be a teaser reel, because it's late-late here, and I've got a friend coming over."

Marilyn: " 'Friend.' Ho, ho."

Roddy: "Pietro something. Really, love. I deliver the transatlantic dish on a daily basis—to you, Sid Skolsky, and Eddie Fisher, and I never reverse the charges. Eddie's the only one with a vested interest, given Queen Elizabeth's misadventures, but you remain the most dish-crazed of the lot."

Marilyn: "I'll make it up to you. I'll buy you a pizza when you're back in town."

Roddy: "I know all about your penchant for pizza, and for the boy who delivers it to you. If you're not getting it for free by now, you never will be."

I laughed and lit a cigarette. Roddy gave good phone.

Marilyn: "Sweetie…"

Roddy: "All right. The highly abbreviated dish is that Cleopatra is the loser of all time, and I'll never get an Oscar nod, because this dog is both dramatically overbudget and drearily overlong, and once it's been cut, cut, cut, I'll be down to a bit part. But I'll get my revenge on Fox, though."

Marilyn: "Tell me how."

Roddy: "I happen to know of a certain storage room on the Fox lot where a great many Roman soldier costumes earmarked for the Lox of All Time are being stored. When I'm back in L.A., I'm going to enlist a crew and a dozen cute boys and make a fuck film that will demean, denigrate, and brilliantly satirize the overblown Cleo. As the uncredited director of Whipout Man, Fat Girl Love, Miscegenation Generation, and The Sexistentialists, you know what I'm capable of."

Marilyn: "I know you're jonesing for Pietro, but can't you—"

Roddy: "Liz is hopping mad at Eddie. His cheesy shtick at the Losers Club has pushed her over the edge. She's told her lawyer to take him to the cleaners. Now, love—"

Marilyn: "Don't you want to hear the latest on Jack and Bobby?"

Roddy: "Your latest dispatch from fantasyland? Darling, you shtupped Jack a half dozen times, and you told me he was hung like a cashew, and I doubt if you've ever shtupped Bobby, so—"

The call fritzed and dead-aired. Transatlantic feed lines ran temperamental. I took a piss and chained cigarettes. The dexies hit. Marilyn's phone re-rang. I jumped on the headphones.

The green console light blinked. It signified a Lawford house/ Monroe house call.

Marilyn picked up. She said, "Hello?" Peter Lawford said, "Listen, and appreciate the fact that I'm not enjoying this task. You are not to call or in any way contact Jack or Bobby again, and that's straight from the president himself."

Marilyn gasped. Lawford hung up. The green light blinked off. Marilyn sobbed into her telephone. The voice activator kept tape running. I timed the crying jag at four minutes straight.

10

(LOS ANGELES, 2:03 A.M., FRIDAY, 6/1/62)

Shrink job. I'm up on the fourth floor. I jiggled the hallway door and got clicks. The spacers worked. The door popped open. I stepped inside.

I stood in the reception room. I'd crowbarred an alleyway door and breached the building there. That door looks locked. If the F-car cops shake alleyway doors, I'm fucked.

I'd parked my sled at Linny's deli. My squarejohn attaché is a tool kit. I'm dressed squarejohn. The building rates Z-grade secure. I excel at security breaches. I know how to break, enter, steal, and/or perv and get out.

Man Camera flashback. I reprised my first glimpse.

There's the waiting room. There's the receptionist's cubicle. That's the connecting door to the right. I bit down on my penlight. That door should be unlocked.

I walked to the door and turned the knob. There's the click. I'm in the shrink-prototype side hallway.

I penlight-flashed the walls. I noted two closed doorways left, two closed doorways right. Unmarked doorways, right. Marked doorways, left. I know this floor plan. I pulled six shrink jobs for Confidential.

Shrink-session rooms, right. Shrink's offices, left. Tasteful name plaques anoint them. Dr. Greenson's toward the front, Dr. Wexler's toward the back. The last door's the file room. Where's the narcotics safe?

The floor plan confirmed my prior jobs. I jiggled the right-side doorknobs. The doors popped wide. I flashed the interiors and confirmed details.

Shrinkee couches and chairs. Shrinker chairs. Shrinkee entry/exit doors. Shrinkees were skulkers and back-door habitués. They feared exposure and ducked reception rooms.

I jiggled the left-side doorknobs. Greenson's door was open.

Wexler's door was locked. The probable file-room door was locked.

My first thought: The probable file room's a shrinkee pissoir. The receptionist has her own pissoir. Greenson and Wexler have en suite pissoirs. Where's the file room/where's the dope safe/your alleyway entry marks a 459 PC. Don't fuck with locked doors and leave tool marks. Don't individuate this office for 459 PC.

Let's imprint details. Here's the office of Ralph R. Greenson, M.D.

A big Danish Modern desk. Crazy tubular chairs. Picasso wall prints. Greenson's hep, Daddy-O. Hep plus smart. Dig his glass-encased shelves.

Floor-to-ceiling shelves. Crammed with patient files, stored spine out. Code numbers on the spines. No names revealed. Heavy glass. Eight hinged panes for reach-in access. Triple key-locked, eight times across. Burglar alarm tape seals all perimeters. I confront stymie, stalemate, defeat. This gig is fucked.

I peeped the room. I peeped the john. I sniffed Greenson's high-end toiletries. I peeped the receptionist's cubicle. Where's the dope safe? Maybe Wexler's got the dope safe. His door's locked. If I breach that door, I individuate this location. If there's no dope safe, there's no junkie-burglar ruse. Big Freddy O. takes it up the shit chute.

I walked back to Greenson's office and crashed in his desk chair. I yanked the right- and left-side drawer pulls and got no give. I tried the shallow middle drawer. It slid open, easy.

Peep it, numbnuts. It's your métier. It's all you're going to get.

I saw postage stamps, pens, pencils, erasers. I saw a brochure for the L.A. Civic Light Opera. There's a Richfield gas station receipt. Note the circa '50 Monroe publicity still. There's no visible ejaculate on it. But—there's a tape-spool box marked "Home Session, 2:40 p.m., 5/29/62."

It tweaked me. I closed my eyes and conjured. I smelled typewriter whiteout and heard typewriter keys tap.

Robbie Molette. His rolling stakeout report, three days back. Marilyn leaves her house at 2:26. She arrives at Greenson's house at 2:38.

I'm a toss pro. The drawer was still virgin. I know not to touch. I popped my attaché and grabbed my camera. It was prerigged with flashbulb attached.

The drawer was full extended. I framed the clutter and popped off a shot. I saw spots and smelled Marilyn's bedroom. I counted off sixty seconds and pulled out the print.

I overpacked for this gig. Gunpowder wicks and drills for the dope-safe ruse. My portable tape rig. The off chance I'd need to record on the spot.

The rig paid off. I felt like a taste now. I cracked the alleyway door at 1:59. It was 2:46 now. I could duplicate the tape on the premises. I could random skim and groove the gist now.

I slid the tape out of the box and spooled it on my rig. I kept the volume soft-murmur low. Marilyn said, "You make such good martinis." Greenson said, "It's not a skill I possess. My housekeeper whips them up." I goosed the volume. I pushed FORWARD/STOP/FORWARD and skimmed ahead on whim.

I caught Monroe in free-form monologue. It was all stale film-biz tattle. The reel spooled halfway through. I caught eleven "Jack betrayed me" prompts. #11 ran straight into a Greenson tut-tut.

Marilyn giggled. Marilyn said, "Hey, he speaks."

Greenson went tut-tut. Marilyn brought her voice butch-baritone low.

"I've got ugly, slimy dirt on Jack. I was just getting to it when you cut me off. I go back fourteen years with Jack. I'll use that dirt if he goes back on his promises to me, and if you keep cutting in on me just when I get to the punch line, I'll find myself a shrink who'll cosign all my crazy and not very nice ideas, and I'll leave you in the lurch like I leave everyone who stands in my way or starts to bore me."

The tape clicked off. Monroe's Jackalogue jazzed me. Baby, you closed strong.

11

(LOS ANGELES, 6/2–6/9/62)

“The job,” “the gig,” “the deal.” We’re right at two months in. It’s late-spring hot in L.A. Long-term surveillance jobs are wear items. This one’s started to fray.

I bailed on the Fox lot. Roving personnel ID’d me and my guys, for sure. Ex-deputy Phil Irwin ran into ex–Sheriff’s lieutenant Del Kinney. It was smack upside Soundstage #14.

Kinney left the Sheriff’s and gigged the State Beverage Control. He’s now the Fox security boss. He shares spit with Jimmy H., the Aadland brothers, and kindred craft-union creeps. Kinney and Phil shot the breeze. Kinney might have detected our on-the-lot presence from the gate. Hoffa might have told him and bought us an impunity waiver. Kinney vibed breach. I pulled my boys off the lot.

It was prescient. Fox sacked Marilyn from Got to Give, 6/4/62. Studio flacks cited her “spectacular absenteeism” and “willful violation of contract.” Zanuck and his high-command corps were browned off. They wanted to release Got to Give at Christmas and plug their Cleopatra cash drain. “Marilyn Fired!” scorched the tabloid news. TV camera trucks bottlenecked Fifth Helena. They derailed my static surveillance shifts. I suspended them. I forfeited all eyeball access. The job was down to bugs and taps, over and out.

Marilyn was a wear item. She’d worn out Jack and Bobby K. They blew her off. Jimmy Hoffa’s goal of a tittle-tattle squeeze played like a wilted wet dream. Marilyn played Marilyn, all day every day. Her exotic eccentricities held me and hinted at a secret life within her life of sloth and minor misalliance. Her obese-girl wardrobe. Her pay-phone calls. The forty grand under her bed. That non sequitur jaunt to the Valley, 5/19/62. My DMV guy and his plate check on 143 sleds. That tape I played at Ralph Greenson’s office. Marilyn’s purported dirt on Jack the K and their alleged late-’40s convergence. Her annotated Paul de River book. She threatens Greenson. “I’ll find a shrink who’ll cosign all my crazy and not very nice ideas.”

We're down to wiretaps and monitor-shift overlaps. My three posts still run twenty-four hours. I cruise the Brentwood and Sip 'n' Surf posts once a day and read through the tap-log transcriptions. They reveal zilch per the exiled Marilyn and exilers Jack and Bobby. I live at the bluffside post. It gives me candid home movies of Pat.

She walks her dog. She drives her kids to school. She rotates the crewneck sweaters and saddle shoes I saw in her closet. I saw her wash her Bonneville ragtop. Her ridgeback capered in sudsy water.

I savored her phone calls. I caught them live and replayed them. I memorized her inflections. She never talked about me. That was no surprise. I wondered who she told about us. She wouldn't tell her dipshit hubby or Jack. She might tell Bobby. She wouldn't tell her sisters. She certainly told God and sought out means of atonement.

She coffee-klatched with sisters Jean and Eunice, long-distance. She excoriated Peter and critiqued his compulsive infidelities. Peter, the sloppy drunk. Peter's temper tantrums and fawning allegiance to Jack. "He married my family. He didn't marry me. He bought himself a secondhand bloodline. He'll always be a second-class citizen."

Lawford's calls out and calls in ran innocuous. He called agents and studio geeks. They called him. The Lawford house was bedlam. Kids ran through and grabbed phone extensions. They eavesdropped and tee-heed. Lawford indulgently rebuffed them. He yanked his bedside-phone cord while he slept. He made clandestine calls from the 76 station on PCH.

I foot-tailed him three times. He kept the phone booth door cracked for air. He consulted an address book and deployed his "ooooh, baby" voice. His pay-phone stints played obvious. Monroe's pay-phone stints played devious.

The summer loomed hot. Monroe holed up at Fifth Helena. It deterred newshounds out to exploit her Fox-lot antics and expulsion from Got to Give. The housekeeper came and went. Pizza Dave failed to show. Nat, Phil, and Robbie spot-cruised by on whim and took note. News vehicles crammed the street, straight down to Carmelina. I pulled my static surveillance, right on cue.

Robbie spot-cruised Jeanne Carmen's place. The pill-party cars never showed. Monroe hid out at home. The press hounded her. I sensed her life contracting. I worked the golf course post and tracked her calls out. She called Doc Greenson, Roddy McDowall, and Lowell Farr.

Greenson withstood monologues and went tut-tut. Marilyn mewed discontent: Jackie's frigid. Jack's entrapping Playboy bunnies now.

I've nixed threeways umpteen times. Her Jack-and-Bobby bile runs the full fifty minutes. Long pauses induce line blur. Greenson's too bored to talk. I hear Marilyn chew ice cubes and slurp liquid. She's slamming Smirnoff 100 from 10:00 a.m. on.

Roddy McDowall engaged her and got her cranked up past self-pity. He dispensed schadenfreude and tales of Fox in duress. Cleo drains Fox. Roddy exploits the drain and rewrites Fox as Smut City. It's his vengeance for cuts in his Cleo role and no Oscar bid. Marilyn listens. Roddy's smut spoof of Cleo—oooh-la-la.

"Heads will turn, love. Just you wait and see." Marilyn, in her shock-the-world guise:

"I'd love to be in a fuck flick, if only good-looking, high-class people saw it, and it wouldn't louse up my career. I'd die if some fat Shriner saw me screwing and yanked his crank while he watched."

Wiretaps. Heard live, replayed, transcribed. The bug-and-tap job of a lifetime. And I've got the Wiretap Blues.

The detail work numbed me. I boozed and popped pills to stay fortified. Monroe's particular weirdness hinted at something. Her day-to-day indolence subsumed it. I felt unraveled. I kept losing details. I woke up in listening posts and didn't know how I got there. I might have to take the cure and steam-clean myself soon.

Monroe's got a late-call thing going with Lowell Farr. She gets the kid all gaga most midnights. Monroe listens more than she talks. Lowell reveals the kooky customs of the Pali High class of '63.

The big new thing? It's the prearranged makeout date. They transpire during weekend double features at the Bay. They're prearranged but anonymous. You know the boys from school. It's a nice kid's version of going to a motel. Girls' names and boys' names are dropped in a hat. You never know who you get. The kids are preselected. All porkers, uglies, and zit-faced kids are verboten. Lowell's had three dates, so far. She sort of remembers The World of Suzie Wong and Gidget Goes Hawaiian. Her friend Marcy supplies her with crib sheets to con her mom and dad.

Night owl Marilyn. Night owl Lowell. Night owl Pat tends to stay up late-late. I'd split the golf course post and roll to the bluffside post. Pat makes her night-shift calls up to 2:00 a.m. She calls her women friends and cuts loose on her limp-dick husband.

His drunkenness. His dope and girl habits. The "Girl Book" he keeps for President Jack's perusal. Nude shots of "wild and woolly" stewardesses. Samples of their wool taped to the pages.

"We're having a catered party on the fifteenth. Peter will be all over the waitresses. It’s his well-established MO.”

It’s been almost seventeen years. Why not? That beach party sounds like a gas.

12

High-style Freddy makes the scene. Dig my dupioni silk blazer and pink linen shirt. Note the white buck shoes. Note my Facel Vega rent-a-car at the valet stand. Peter Lawford owns one just like it. Fuck him sideways.

It was balmy working on crisp. Six college boys shagged cars off the PCH embankment. Guests lingered outside. I made studio types and Mayor Sam Yorty's chief deputy. Nobody made me.

Peter and Pat were inside somewhere. Pat and party crasher Freddy. She'll register shock. She'll sigh or boot my ass out on the street.

I scoped arrivals. Neighbors walked up. Big-ticket sedans disgorged westside swells. Monroe might show. I'd make book on it. A green VDub pulled up. Jeanne Carmen got out. She wore a summer shift and sandals. The driver got out. She had a butch-girl haircut and wore a hula shirt and twill slacks. I saw golf clubs crammed in the backseat.

I recalled this:

Something Phil Irwin said. Jeanne as current or ex–Sheriff's snitch. Plus her pill-party chum—a lezzie golf pro.

They waltzed inside. They vibed item. Ex-deputy Phil. He's working the Sip 'n' Surf post tonight. He might have the fill-in.

Party crasher Freddy. Don't be a chickenshit. You've got a right to be—

I walked in. The foyer and living room were half packed. I knew the floor plan. Come on—I hot-wired the place!

It helped me maneuver. I dodged eye contact. Pat would magnetize me. I didn't want that.

The downstairs den. It's off the north-side beachfront. It's dusty and underutilized. I'd tapped the phone there.

I hugged the north-side wall and dodged cater waitresses schlepping canapés and drinks. I kept my head low and made the door. I cranked the knob and let myself in.

The room was lights-off dark. A window overlooked the beach. Hawaiian torches lit clumps of people. I got out my penlight and flashed the phone extension. I risked a five-minute call.

I locked myself in and dialed the Sip 'n' Surf post. I said, "Phil, it's me."

Phil picked up. "Yeah, and at the party no less. Monroe might be there. Nat worked the golf course post this morning. She told Doc Greenson she might drop by."

I said, "Jeanne Carmen's here. Her date's a young lez with a green VDub. There were golf clubs in the backseat. You told me—"

Phil cut in. "Deedee Grenier. It's got to be—"

I cut back in. "Is Jeanne still snitching for the Sher—"

"Whoa, Freddy. Slow down. She's strictly ex. She used to rat pill pushers to Narco, to buy out of her own busts. But she paid off her debt to her handler, so she's out of the whole snitch deal. But, Deedee's snitching to the Sheriff's now, for money, because there's no real bread on the women's golf tour. And she's always at Jeanne's pill parties—so she has to know Monroe, and Deedee is nothing but dirty."

I said, "Dirty, how?"

Phil said, "She runs badger games on small-time businessmen. She works out of Norm's Nest, which is a bumfuck cocktail lounge up in bumfuck Van Nuys. The owner's an ex-LAPD man named Norm Krause. He was on the PD from something like '46 to '59, and he was allegedly some sort of extortionist. Anyway, he quits the PD, gets a liquor license, and opens up the Nest. Now, you want the kicker? Deedee's enforcer in the badger-game deals, playing the role of the irate husband, is her real-life brother, Paul Mitchell Grenier. He's a bit actor at Fox, he did Chino time, and he's your classic mean-queen type."

I kicked it around. Phil held the line. Ambient pier noise garbled up his end. I said, "Dig up rap sheets and/or internal memoranda on Krause and the Greniers," and hung up.

Garbled party noise hit me. Samba music and voice overlap. I cracked the door and looked out. The bash rocked loud now. The hi-fi and chatter cliques sent up a roar. I looked through the kitchen and back hallway. A cater waitress lugged coats toward the rear storage-room door.

Makeshift cloakroom. It had to be. The dish starts there.

The waitress opened the door and dropped the coats on a ratty daybed. Other coats and a pile of handbags had been dumped there. I had a clear shot through the kitchen. I stepped out and beelined straight in.

I tossed the bolt and propped a chair against the door. I exit-marked a beachside window and jammed up the sill. I worked by penlight. I inventoried nine women's coats and wraps and thirteen handbags.

Purse debris. Don't get distracted. Don't let female scents sidetrack you. Go for wallets and driver's license ID. Look for pocket address books.

I sat on the bed and rifled handbags. I clawed through cosmetics, cigarette packs, house keys, lucky charms. I smelled individual and aggregate women. I grabbed wallets and scanned photo sleeves. I orbed laminate licenses, pix of kids and hubbies, little books with innocuous names scrawled. I went through six handbags in fourteen minutes. I hit a black leather job with crossed-golf-club stitchwork—it had to be her.

Let's give it three minutes. Be thorough. Imprint what you see.

Chesterfields. A matchbook for Linda's Little Log Cabin. A Rancho Park scorecard, 12/4/58. Deedee shoots a 2-under-par 68. A Lanvin atomizer, half-full. I spritzed my pocket square and inhaled Deedee's musk.

A red leather wallet. Six transparent pocket sleeves. They contain this:

Deedee's driver's license. Pix of Jeanne Carmen, the Linda's Little Log Cabin softball team, a nudie pic of Lila Leeds.

A red leather address book. Pocket size. Let's savor this slow.

Deedee block-printed. She jotted phone numbers exclusive. She went alphabetical. The book ran "Annie" to "Zohra." Deedee's a sapphic sister. She's a grifter. She's circumspect. She gives nothing up. She lists only women's first names.

I recognized "Barbara's" number. As in Barbara Payton. She was an ex–film presence and part-time grifter. We went way back. "Jeanne's" number was Jeanne Carmen's number. I recognized "Lila's" number. Who else but?—Lila Leeds, the bait girl supreme.

I riffed to the M's. They hopped "Margo" to "Melinda." They bypassed "Marilyn" and her Gladstone exchange.

My brain clock buzzed, my toss time elapsed, I smelled Deedee Grenier all over me. "Annie" to "Zohra"—that's it.

I repacked the handbag. I replaced the items in perfect order. I laid the wallet on top. I saw a paper scrap wadded into a photo sleeve.

I pulled it out. Deedee had block-printed four phone numbers. They seemed familiar. They were all GL prefix. My brain waves meshed and kicked out an imprint.

Pay phones. Barrington Park and Beverly Glen Park. The phones Marilyn Monroe used. In her big-girl disguises. On her Mata Hari kick.

I heard footsteps outside the cloakroom. I slid the chair aside and the dead bolt back and vaulted out the window. I tumbled onto hard-packed sand.

My pulse raced. I felt weavy and punchy. I brushed myself off and stumbled over to the south-side footpath. I lit a cigarette and ambled back to the valet-park stand. Neighbor guests walked up. I joined them and re-crashed the party.

The head count ran ninety plus. The living room overflow flowed up the two stairwells and packed the poolside deck. Three downstairs Portabars served up booze. I squeezed over to the bar by the north stairwell. The cater waiters did overflow biz. I scanned the room and didn't see Pat. I re-scanned the room and didn't see Marilyn. My wig felt loose. I scanned the room and tallied fourteen bug-mount locations. It resettled me. I pictured Phil at the Sip 'n' Surf. His bug-feed reception would play high-decibel loud.

Familiar faces bipped by. I matched their pedigrees. There's that TV actor. He threatened to sue Confidential. I kicked his ass outside Dale's Secret Harbor. A guy recognized me. He flipped me the bird and bipped off. I went Huh? I didn't know who he was or what I did to him.

The booze line inched forward. I looked around for Lois. My brain glitched and *un*glitched. Lois didn't know this crowd. Lois lived in New York.

A cater waiter smiled at me. I stuffed a fifty in his vest pocket and pointed to a highball glass and his sour-mash jug. He got the picture and filled the glass. He pointed to a wingback chair beside a wall credenza. I eased myself over and sat down.

Body heat and talk overlap. It fucking deluged me. I smelled Deedee Grenier's crazy life all around me. I guzzled half the glass and lulled the volume way down. I got an urge to take the Deedee lead and cut and run. I got a counterurge to hold on for Pat.

Peter Lawford saw me. I caught it, full-on. I watched him walk over. He was flush-faced and half in the bag. I stood up. Lawford stepped in, too close. He ran a cheap-shot number upside my face.

Who'd you steal that coat from, Freddy? Put the screws to any closet queens lately? Dope any racehorses while you were at it?

I went boo! Lawford turned tail. I sat back down and sipped my monster drink. I caught stray chatter. It was flatline consistent.

Marilyn was fired/oh, God—Cleopatra—can you BELIEVE?

My pulse decelerated. The room temperature dropped. The high-volume talk leveled into a hum. Eddie Fisher and Bo Belinsky walked in. They didn't see me. The partygoers saw them.

They entered big. They constellated the crowd. Women swooned for Bo. They darted up and squeezed his left bicep. Their husbands ballyhooed his recent no-hitter. Party fools chanted, "We hate Liz!" Eddie yelled, "Liz who?" Fools whistled, cheered, and spilled drinks.

I sipped sour mash and made memory imprints. Peter Lawford hounds cater waitresses. Mayor Sam Yorty, coma-conked in a leprechaun hat. A starlet with a squirt gun filled with crème de menthe. She's telling people, "Open wide."

The party thinned out. I had a straight view of the pool deck. Here's an all-time imprint.

Deedee Grenier chips golf balls into the swimming pool. She aims at a floating Hula-Hoop and puts most of them inside. Three Lawford kids watch. They giggle and squeal.

"I can't believe you're still alive, and that you had the balls to show up here."

The madras shift, the saddle shoes, the too-big man's watch. Don't touch up that new gray hair—I won't let you.

We dragged deck chairs down to the wave line and kicked off our shoes. Pat brought a bottle of Pernod. We kept still more than we talked. I glanced back at the party and saw things.

Marilyn Monroe's late arrival. Bo Belinsky swarmed by horny wives. Peter Lawford as the big bad wolf. He's pie-eyed and stumbly. Cater waitresses elude his grasp.

Pat said, "My Christmas cards weren't enough. The brevity of the encounter failed to deter you. The services you provided my brother seem not to embarrass you. You display not one whiff of deference, given what the man has become."

I lit a cigarette. Pat lit up out of my pack. Propane torches flanked the pool deck. A breeze fanned orange light our way.

"I'm happy for you, for Jack, and for that other brother I met a few times, the one who always scowled at me. I was driving by, and I saw all the cars pulling up. I thought, Come on. The worst she can do is bounce you or call the cops."

"You're saying there's nothing more to it than that?"

I said, “That’s right.”

Pat said, “I don’t believe you.”

I said, “Don’t put the skids to this too fast. It’s late, and the party’s boring you, and you’d have sent me home if you didn’t have some half-assed urge to talk.”

Pat tossed her cigarette. “I met a handsome young Marine, and what happened happened. The handsome young Marine became a policeman, and by all accounts a crooked detective. You’re right. It’s late, the party’s a bore, and I have more than a ‘half-assed’ urge to talk—but I only have one question.”

I sipped Pernod. It burned going down.

“I know the question. It’s ‘How can you do what you do?’ The answer is ‘I like poking around in people’s shit and making money.’ ”

Pat laughed. “Have you kept my Christmas cards?”

I said, “Yeah, but I always x out your husband’s picture, and I always spend a lot of time looking at you in your Christmas threads and wondering what’s kicking around in your head.”

Pat nudged me, leg-to-leg. “So?”

I nudged her back. “So, you’re bored, and vexed. There’s all of it—your family, the world crawling up your ass because your brother’s what he is, your shoddy marriage, the whole deal. I read people. It’s what I do. The woman in the ’58 and ’59 cards is not the woman in the card I got last Christmas. You’re kicking around inside your own head because it’s the only place you can be alone and feel safe.”

Pat tapped my knee. “You’re right. It’s all too much. Just don’t propose yourself as a solution, because that’s a line I won’t cross.”

I said, “You’ll leave Peter the moment Jack’s reelected.”

Pat said, “I told him that very thing, just last week.”

(LOS ANGELES, 9:40 P.M., FRIDAY, 6/22/62)

Homework. Nightwork. Unamphetamized and boozed. It's late clerk duty. It's nothing more than that.

I typed a week's worth of tap transcripts and a 6/16 to 6/21 summary. I ripped off the cover of the current Life magazine and pinned it to my pictorial corkboard. There's the quasi-nude Monroe. She's got wet hair and one leg hooked on a swimming pool ledge. I pinned Robbie Molette's on-the-sly nude beside it. The Life pix were a worldwide sensation. Robbie's pic scorched the L.A. underground. It's a steal at fifty bucks per.

The pictorial corkboard oozed Monroe. It featured the Polaroids from my 4/11 break-in. The dissolute bathroom and bedroom. The forty grand stashed in the lockbox. The jumbo-girl clothes. The coin stash. The lists of lovers and dope-dispensing physicians. The name-scrawled sheets of paper. Monroe's nutty screed stuck inside Paul de River's nutty book.

The adjacent corkboard featured the week's random notes. I unpinned them and typed them into bullet-point briefs.

I started with Pat's emphatic assertion: Jack and Marilyn coupled a half dozen times, from '54 up to now. They were abbreviated assignations. Always conducted in neutral locations. Calvinist Bobby wouldn't poke Marilyn with a long stick. Marilyn attended last week's Lawford-house do. I feigned interest in the Jack/Marilyn rumors. Pat supplied the above tattle. I dissembled my way to Pat's punch line: Marilyn and the K boys were now kaput. Pat said she encountered Marilyn at the Palisades Gelson's. Marilyn spun a tale of recurrent break-ins at her new pad. The burglar moved around various objects and left her weird-o notes. The burglar besieged her with breather calls. Pat cited Marilyn's "mystery intruder" on a prior tapped call. I've got Marilyn dialed. The "mystery intruder" was Monroe fantasia.

I used Pat to get this information. The big reunion went down. I exploited Pat for dish to levy against her big brother. It felt ghastly. I did it anyway.

I bullet-pointed the week's legwork. That paper slip in Deedee Grenier's wallet supplied a solid lead. She'd jotted pay-phone numbers for Barrington and Beverly Glen parks. I spot-surveilled the two locations, all week. Monroe failed to show. The phones never rang. Nobody called out on them.

Legwork to brainwork. I contemplated another Monroe house B and E. The housekeeper's intermittent presence and Monroe's persistent presence deterred me. I contemplated rousting Paul de River. His sex-crime book. Monroe's florid note stuck inside it. She extolled heavy shit. Let's contravene passive and reactive behavior with direct criminal action. I nixed the roust. A de River approach was imprudent. De River was too volatile.

Brainwork to static surveillance. I put Norm's Nest under the spotlight. It was a dingy cheater bar in north Van Nuys. I installed Robbie there. He's the inside man. I'm too well known to work an ex-cop-owned joint.

I hovered outside. Robbie worked inside. Deedee Grenier and her brother Paul Mitchell no-showed. No badger games went down. No other badger-game women appeared.

Phil Irwin glommed Sheriff's green sheets on Deedee and Paul Mitchell. Here's the gist:

Deedee Montfort Grenier/WFA/DOB 8/8/29. Lezzie bar rousts: '56, '58, '61. Paul Mitchell Grenier/WMA/DOB 1/23/26. Six busts for possession of maryjane/no convictions. One stat-rape conviction, 6/54. Three years at Chino. Subsequent fruit roller busts/no convictions. Bit player at 20th Century–Fox, rumored smut-film artiste. 6:00 a.m. to 2:00 a.m. surveillance of Norm's Nest continues.

I bullet-pointed the above. I typed in a Monroe/Lowell Farr conversation.

Tuesday, 6/19/62. I boom-miked a backyard koffee klatch. Marilyn and Lowell dished the dish.

Lowell harped on her makeout dates at the Bay Theater. She said she had one penciled in for tomorrow night. I peeped said date. Lowell cuddled a tall boy with a jumbo pompadour. I sat through half of The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance. The kids made out and eschewed conversation. No Monroe leads resulted. I split for the bluffside post. I caught Pat's midnight dog walk. Pat wore her pink crewneck sweater and scuffed saddle shoes.

I rolled in a fresh sheet of paper. Nat Denkins left me a tape spool marked URGENT. He recorded it live at 2:00 a.m. today. Nat speaks Spanish. A Baja operator put the call through. The caller's name was José Bolaños. Nat grabbed our Baja reverse directory and looked him up. Bolaños lived on Calle Hueracho in Ensenada.

I slipped the spool on my tape rig and pressed START. I put on my headphones and hunched over my typewriter. I transcribed as Monroe and this unknown cholo jive-talked.

JB: "I will not soon forget, darling. Winter Storm Lucita and Winter Storm Marilyn."

MM: "Yes, but I was traveling incognito."

They spoke languid. Monroe was half-lubed. I typed fast and kept up.

JB: "I've forgotten the name you employed. I intend to recall you always as 'Marilyn,' as many lesser men than I have."

MM: "I travel incognito when we work together. I'm a businesswoman in disguise."

JB: "You have a capacity for business that I did not deem possible in a woman of your station."

MM: "Well, I'm Winter Storm Marilyn, so what did you expect?"

Winter Storm Lucita. It raked Baja in mid-February. I could buzz U.S. Customs. They could run visa checks.

JB: "What is that noise you are making? It sounds like slurping."

MM: "I buy cherry sno-cones at Wil Wright's and refreeze them. Then I douse them with vodka and green Chartreuse. It's kicks and grins, baby. Like you, and like moving freight for you."

"Freight." "Freight" as dope synonym. "Traveling incognito."

JB: "Speak discreetly, mi corazón. Our relationship is not all kicks and grins, and I am as much 'Señor Bolaños' as I am 'baby.' "

MM: "Don't be a drag. It's two in the morning, and I'm slurping a sno-cone."

JB: "Phone taps, my darling. The L.A. police are known to tap the telephones of enlightened people in the film colony."

MM: "They're in Dutch now with the press, I have to say. They shot two Black Muslims, a couple of months ago. One guy was really cute, like Harry Belafonte. My cleaning lady said he played the bongo drums. She's a Negro, so she's hep to what's happening with her people. And Chief Parker's a souse. That's a well-known fact."

JB: "You should invite him over for a relaxing sno-cone."

MM: "You're funny."

JB: "Not when it comes to fascistos like Parker."

MM: "Whoa, baby, whoa. Don't get so het up. I'm getting a nice drift off my sno-cone, and you're messing with it."

JB: "I am a businessman, as well as a Marxist-Leninist. Men such as I despise indecorous women."

MM: "'Businessman,' huh? I'll be generous and let it go as 'freight mover,' but that's just a euphemism."

JB: "Marilyn, you wound me."

MM: "The fascistos are a yawn. And I've tattled the LAPD to Jack and Bobby Kennedy, mucho times."

JB: "Marilyn, you are a fantasist and a name-dropper, nonpareil."

MM: "You'll change your tone when Jack divorces Jackie and marries me."

JB: "Marilyn, you are delusional."

MM: "Look who's talking. Look who'll be left holding the bag, if and when I put the screws to Jack Kennedy."

JB: "Jack and Bobby are genteel fascistos. Believe me, I know."

MM: "I like you when we plan our visits, and you do your Latin-lover routine. Otherwise, you wear me thin. Okay, José? That's just a word to the wise."

JB: "You are the world's number-one woman, and still you exasperate."

MM: "I'm just an overhyped movie star who wishes she was something else. You dig? I lick sno-cones and talk to strange men at two in the morning."

The long-distance feed severed. Loose tape flapped off the spindle. I hit the kill switch and doused the machine.

Phil Irwin knew a Customs guy. He could check travel visas and passenger lists. Winter Storms Lucita and Marilyn. Mid-February. It was a solid lead. We might score some good—

My work phone rang. I grabbed it and got "Yes?" out. Robbie Molette overrode me.

"I'm outside the Nest. Deedee Grenier's working a mark inside, and Paul Mitchell's in the tail car, down the block."

The North Valley. Shitkicker pads and juke joints. Machine shops and discount bottle stores. Vacant lots clumped with sagebrush and scrounging coyote packs.

Norm's Nest. A prefab Alamo, built to scale. Sandblasted adobe drilled with mock bullet holes and dribbled with mock blood. The façade was sign-plastered. FREEDOM ISN'T FREE, AMERICAN SPOKEN HERE, ORVAL FAUBUS FOR PRESIDENT. The Nest sat beside a disused Christmas-tree lot. It now thrived as a bomb-shelter lot.

Robbie and Phil stood outside. I parked down the block and walked up. Phil said, “Deedee’s inside. She’s got a mark, shit-faced and nothing but horny. Her brother’s parked across the street, down near the corner. That blue Ford’s the tail car. Deedee left her VDub in the lot.”

I opened the door and peeped the room. Bar/Naugahyde booths/ small dance floor. Remember the Alamo wall art.

TV show stills. Fess Parker as Davy Crockett. Raggedy-ass cowpokes and Mexicans piled dead. Three booths down: Deedee Grenier and a fat guy in a western-style suit.

I shut the door. Robbie said, “His Pontiac’s parked next to Deedee’s roadster. Deedee’s been trying to move him out for a good half hour.”

Phil passed his flask. We took triple pops. I said, “We’ll jump them at the cars. Robbie, you run the mark off. I’ll dump the brother.”

The lot was dark-dark. We passed the flask and hunkered near the car slots. 1:00 a.m. came and went. Drunks straggled up. They snagged their sleds and peeled dirt. The lot thinned out. We’re getting close. The Nest shuts down at 2:00.

We waited. We drained the flask. 2:00 a.m. came and went. We pawed the dirt. 2:01, 2:02, 2:04. That’s it—the door slams shut.

I heard oooh, baby coos. Deedee drape-walked the mark toward the car slots. She held him up. He was far-gone blitzed. He hummed some Spade Cooley lament.

He fumbled his car keys. Deedee hovered close. Shadows covered us. I cued up the swoop.

One, two, three—

Phil and I ran up and grabbed Deedee. Robbie grabbed the mark and frog-marched him off. He went drunk-compliant. I hand-muzzled Deedee. I said, “We’re friends of Jeanne’s. It’s a grand for an hour’s talk.”

Deedee kicked dirt and squirmed and made yes nods. Robbie and Phil rifled the mark’s pockets and tossed his car keys into some weeds. He staggered off, zonko. He set out for the Alamo or the Planet Mars.

Deedee went Shit and Shitfuck. Robbie baby-talked her. I pulled my belt sap and ran straight at Paul Mitchell’s old Ford.

Brother-hubby hit his high beams and lit me up bright. I blinked away the glare. He piled out and came straight at me.

He was big and lean. He threw haymakers. I got inside him and launched sap shots. I smashed his nose. He screeched. The sap stitches severed an earlobe and cut through his lips down to his teeth. I sapped his knees and put him prone in the gutter. He slithered under his car. I grabbed his legs and pulled him out and kicked his nards raw.

We two-car schlepped to Ollie Hammond's. Phil drove solo. I drove Deedee. She kept it zipped. She put out zero boo-hoo per her shit-kicked brother.

Ollie's was near dead. Robbie split to work the Sip 'n' Surf post. The maître d' set us up with a back room and after-hours liquor. Deedee was a Sheriff's informant. I crowned her Snitch Queen for a Day.

The queen and her court. Waiters brought refreshments. A pitcher of Old Crow highballs, steak skewers, fried shrimp. I laid ten C-notes on the table. Deedee lit a cigarette and snatched them up. I said, "It's about Marilyn Monroe. That's all you need to know."

Deedee blew smoke rings. "I know Marilyn. We share a history. Not much of one, but still."

I twirled my ashtray. "I'll get to her. We've got some lead-in questions first."

Phil sipped his highball. "Why do you and Paul Mitchell badger out of the Nest?"

Deedee laughed. "In a nutshell, Norm Krause. He's in The Life. He's tight with zillions of grifters and bent cops. He got fat off an ad-lib extortion deal, back in '49. Freddy here was Mr. Confidential. I'll bet he knows the story."

I said, "Try me."

"Norm was a motor cop then. He was working Wilshire Division, and he caught the state comptroller, Tom Kuchel, blowing a poof in a parked car off of 6th and Cloverdale. He arrested them, but Kuchel and the poof bailed out. Old Chief Worton hushed the deal up, but Norm still had the balls to extort Kuchel, and Kuchel lacked balls and paid big. That's it, in a nutshell. It's how Norm got the seed money for the Nest. He quit the PD around '59, and now he just lives off the Nest."

I downed half my drink. "Let's see if I've got this straight. It's a cheater bar. It caters to married folks looking for strange. They couple up there, they continue to socialize there. Krause refers them to hot-sheet motels and takes a cut. If the cheaters want pills, or maryjane, or weekends in Baja, Krause refers them."

Deedee said, "On the money."

I said, "The drift is that you snitch for the L.A. Sheriff's. If so, did Jeanne Carmen pass the gig on to you?"

Deedee sipped her highball. "Yes, I talk to the Sheriff's. Yes, Jeanne got me the gig. No, I will not reveal the name of my handler."

Phil speared a shrimp. "What specific division are you in touch with?"

"The West Hollywood squadroom guys, because those fools drool for gay dirt and dope tips. And I'm sure the squadroom guys share their dish with SHIT."

I popped two Dexedrine. "Does SHIT keep a dirt file on Marilyn Monroe?"

Deedee went Gimme. I tossed two dexies on her placemat. She chased them with highball dregs.

"No, SHIT does not keep a Marilyn file, because Marilyn has been known to lay her goodies on Pete Pitchess, once in a blue moon. LAPD Intel does keep files on Marilyn—and I got that from Marilyn herself."

I lit a cigarette. "Lay out the SHIT versus LAPD Intel deal. I sense a rivalry here."

Deedee blew concentric rings. "LAPD Intel is fully self-contained. SHIT is heavily in league with the FBI because Pitchess is an ex-agent, and he's rumored to be old man Hoover's choice to succeed him if the Kennedys give him his pink slip."

Deedee gives good dish. The Hoover/Pitchess dish confirmed persistent rumors.

"Keep going on that."

"LAPD Intel has got Marilyn files and surveillance footage up the ying-yang. Sometimes, Intel and SHIT have actual bidding wars and favor trades for documents and political rat-outs. A lieutenant named Daryl Gates represents the unit. Jim Hamilton's old and sick, and Gates is slated to take over when he retires or kicks off. A sergeant named Mike Bayless represents SHIT. He's called 'Motel Mike' because he torched some Mexicans at an eastside motel about six thousand years ago."

Motel Mike in a nutshell. Deedee was good. She rubbed her brush cut and cracked her thumbs. She was wired for sound and snitch-frenzied.

"Intel and SHIT have got half of freak-o, Commo, gay, and weird-o L.A. hot-wired and filmed. Bill Parker's got Sam Yorty in his pocket, because Mayor Sam digs threeways with lezzie girls, and Parker's got evidence. I've tricked with Mayor Sammy myself."

I brain-strained it. Dirt wars were my métier. I knew good dirt inside out.

"Why would Monroe have the main Sheriff's switchboard number written down on a scrap of paper, at her place?"

Deedee yocked. "Because she's got to schedule her next blow job with Pete Pitchess?"

Phil yocked. "Is Motel Mike your handler?"

"No, but he took my cherry a zillion years ago, and it pushed me toward girls in a very large way."

I yocked. "Current L.A. cops. Who does Norm Krause fraternize with?"

Deedee chained cigarettes. "Norm's a right-wing nut. He's tight with a West L.A. Division patrol sergeant named Jack Clemmons, and a nut pamphleteer named Frank Capell, who lives back east somewhere. They're all big pud yankers and boozehounds. They're members of some fringe group called the White Dog Bund, which probably has a total membership of three. Norm gave me a Bund armband. Marilyn tried it on once. It gave all the pill-party girls a laugh."

Phil laughed. I laughed. Phil went Gimme. I tossed two dexies on his place mat. He chugged them with coffee.

"You haven't asked Freddy or me who's behind all this. As in 'Who's the one with the money and the big curiosity about Marilyn and all her unhinged shit?' "

Deedee went Nix. "No, and I'm not going to. Freddy's a well-known bird dog for Bill Parker, but Freddy knows next to nothing about LAPD Intel and SHIT, so that rules Parker out. This is one of those deals where a girl is better off left in the dark."

I sipped my highball. "How did you meet Marilyn?"

"I met her through Paul Mitchell, way back when. They were in Hollygrove together. You know, that orphans' home, off of Waring and Vine. That was something like '35 to '38. I was a very little kid when they met, so I went to foster care when our parents ditched us, and Paul Mitchell went to the Grove, because he was Marilyn's age. She and Paul Mitchell still connect once in a while on the Fox lot, because Paul Mitchell gets bit parts and does grip work there. I got dumped in the Grove in '41, and I met Marilyn when she'd show up at alumnae meetings, during the war. And, for what it's worth, I used to run into Marilyn in the late '40s, when I played golf at Cal State and she was a quasi-starlet and call girl about town."

I said, "Why would Marilyn have forty grand in a lockbox stashed under her bed?"

Deedee made the jack-off sign. “Don’t jerk my chain. Marilyn is incapable of hoarding that kind of money. She gets bank drafts through her agent and has a manager who writes all her checks and pays all her bills. She’s in hock to half the quack doctors, shrinks, and pharmacies on the west side.”

“A Mexican Communist named José Bolaños. Ring any bells?”

Deedee reprised the jack-off sign. She reprised it two-handed.

“Listen. Marilyn talks red and goes to Commie demonstrations, and she beats the drum for civil rights and all that jive—but she is nothing but a scene maker, as well as being the fantasist and premier bullshit artist of our time. That girl cannot stop lying. Who’s José Bolaños? I don’t know—but Marilyn has been making up fantastical Mexico stories for months, like she’s been going in and out, disguised as a farmworker. If Marilyn ever set foot in Mexico, it’s to score dope in the legal pharmacies in T.J. Comprende, muchacho?”

Sí, yo comprende. But—

The plus-size garb in Marilyn’s closet. The disguises she wears to—

“I rifled your purse at the Lawford party. You had numbers for the pay phones in Barrington Park and Beverly Glen Park. Were you calling Marilyn there?”

Deedee flipped me off. “You’re a pal, Freddy. You rifle my purse, then you kick the shit out of my brother.”

“Deedee, come on.”

“The answer is no. Marilyn force-fed me those numbers. It was all part of some fantastical intrigue number she was running on me. For the record, Marilyn almost never gives out her home number. Get it? Don’t call me, I’ll call you. Get it? She’s the pathetic waif of all time, but she exerts total control over her gal pals, and she only really rolls over for celebs and pump jockeys and the guys who write her dope scripts.”

I said, “A shrink named Paul de River?”

Deedee chained cigarettes. “Not a name I know.”

“A shrink named Ralph Greenson?”

Deedee whooped. “Aka Marilyn’s fool, slave, master, and psychiatrist in pursuit. Marilyn thinks he slams the ham while he listens to the tapes of their sessions. Marilyn likes Greenson—but she doesn’t respect him—because he’s not radical enough for her. He’s a pill source and a soft shoulder to cry on, but there’s no ethical boundaries in this deal. Would you belt martinis with your shrink?”

Headshrinkers. Conventional to radical. Marilyn studies and interprets Paul de River. Marilyn to Greenson: “I’ll find myself a shrink who'll cosign all my crazy and not very nice ideas."

I brain-waved Deedee's shrink pitch. Greenson/de River/de River's specious criminalistics.

"Deedee, is Marilyn fixated on crime and criminals, and the whole criminal mind-set?"

Deedee went Yup. "She is. I mean, she and Jeanne worked call jobs after the war, and she must have known that type then, and she knows lots of people in The Life now, because half the grips and stuntmen and studio types are in The Life, in one form or another. Marilyn's been around Fox for years, and Fox and dickhead criminals go way back to the '30s. You've got Willie Bioff, Ben Siegel, Mickey Cohen's guys. Union guys like the Aadland brothers—smut peddlers, kidnap brokers, white slavers—fringe guys like that. It's Hollywood, baby. Everybody knows everybody—and they all brag about it."

I said, "Marilyn and the Kennedy brothers?"

Deedee said, "Unrequited love and delusion. Such despair. Jack pokes her at the Lawford place, when he's not running the world. She's got it just as bad for Bobby, but he considers her shopworn goods."

"Jack and other women?"

"Ask Peter Lawford. He keeps some so-called Girl Book that lays out potential stuff for the prez. Peter's Jack's chief pimp and dope supplier—which I heard you used to be."

I went Ouch. "Who told you that?"

"Pat Lawford. She also said you tripped the light fantastic together, back on V-J Day. She said she's never figured out if it was you or the historical moment."

Phil said, "You struck a nerve. Freddy's blushing."

Deedee said, "Maybe he's got a soul after all."

(LOS ANGELES, 11:05 P.M., TUESDAY, 7/17/62)

They're moving.

Wall wires, rug clamps, refitted phone jacks. They're changing colors and starting to fray. They're squirming. They're untangling out in plain view.

They wiggle. Bore holes leak Spackle. Discolored Spackle—alive with a glow. Tape drops from lamp bowls. Lamps topple and fall. Tap wires pop through handset perforations. Mike installations explode. They stain wallpaper metal-flake shades.

They're moving. They're pure combustion. They're out to set me aflame.

I opened my eyes. I recalibrated. The post was full dark now. I passed out in my work chair. Console blips are not tendrils. That's PCH out the window. That's Pat's beach spread just beyond.

I weaved to the bathroom and doused my face. I stepped on the scale. My weight clocked in at 174. My normal weight was 195. High-hoppers, booze, cigarettes. They caused the drop. Plus bad sleep or no sleep. Plus my all-candy-bar diet. My memory's in the shitter. My retention's in the tank. There's evidence threads I should remember—but don't.

It's the borderline DT's. I know the phenomenon and the solution. I should boil myself clean and jump-start the gig anew. L.A. featured luxe dry-out spots. Steam baths. Blood transfusions. Round-the-clock naps. Freddy O. takes the cure. I've done it twice before.

Let's resituate. Let's recalibrate. Pat's right across the street. Let's call up her glow.

I had a big fucking nightmare. Shrink your own head, dipshit. You just brain-screened a horror cartoon.

Here's the subtext:

You hot-wired Pat's home. Say she finds out. She'll hate you then. Fuck V-J Day. You're lower than snake shit. You blew your shot at some sort of reprise.

I crossed myself. I popped two dexies and gargled Old Crow. I lit a cigarette. Let's resituate and recalibrate. There's bum interior mounts at the Lawford house. They mandate quick attention. Line squelch spells that out plain. I need to get inside and rewire.

Post hoc ergo propter hoc. I show up at Pat's party. We rekindle or resizzle or re-something someplace good. The bum wires might buzz audible. That would tip Pat off. She detects the surveillance and knows that it's me.

The beach-view window stood open. I picked up my zoom-lens camera and scanned the house. The north-side door spilled light. Pat's ridgeback jumped out and pranced.

Pat followed. They turned toward the beach and cut off my sight line. Pat wore white tennis shorts and a pink polo shirt. I caught one half second—over and out.

Nightmares. Brain static. Booze-and-dope excess. Frayed neurons. Frayed wires at the Lawford digs. Long-term surveillance jobs are wear items. The gig was three months and six days in. It was running frayed into threadbare.

The K boys have abandoned Marilyn Monroe. There's no telephonic contact to or from. I've hopped gates and mailbox-skimmed Monroe's incoming and outgoing correspondence. There's no Kennedy mail or letters from Monroe's purported "burglar," "breather," and "dirty note writer." She gets studio mail, notes from Lowell Farr, and notes from ex-husbands DiMaggio and Miller. Monroe remains housebound. She only ventures out in big-girl disguise and only to make pay-phone calls. I braced a hinky PC Bell lineman. He told me pay phones cannot be tapped without judicial-district warrants. He added, "And don't think of trying to bribe me, because I'll call the cops."

I misplaced or lost the vehicle list I compiled on 5/19. It compounded my blown tail on Monroe. It scotched my shot to determine the purpose of her jaunt to the dogdick Valley. My DMV contact lost his copy of the list and his tally of the plate numbers he'd run thus far. Monroe's Valley run felt hinky then. It still feels hinky now.

I pulled the static surveillance on Fifth Helena. Justified paranoia dictated the move. Phil Irwin saw an old lady scrawl the plate number on his truck. Patrol cops cruised by and gave Phil the fish eye. That's it, we're gone, it's my unilateral call.

My access to Monroe has dramatically contracted. She visits shrink Greenson at his home now. I can't record their calls. José Bolaños hasn't called. Roddy McDowall calls less. Lowell Farr's off at Lake

Arrowhead with her mom and dad. There's no phone in their cabin. I'm down to zero visual access and 80%-reduced telephonic. I put Deedee Grenier on the Hoffa-snitch payroll. She relays pill-party drift and lays out Monroe in banal extremis.

More pills. More booze. More liquor-drenched sno-cones. The girls watch the TV news and shoot squirt guns at images of Jack and Bobby. Marilyn consults a voodoo book and consigns Jackie's death to Baron Samedi. Marilyn sleeps with a Jackie voodoo doll.

The gig had full-scale contracted. My brain overrevved to compensate. I popped pills, boozed, and cogitated. I lived in dark listening posts. Quack shrink Freddy O. He puts Marilyn Monroe on the couch.

I recalled three early mobile tails. I blew two of them. Tail #1: Monroe cops pills in Beverly Hills and visits Ralph Greenson. She bangs her car over the San Vicente median strip and plows shrubs. She flips off random drivers and tongue-kisses a hotel doorman. Here's my retrospective interpretation:

It felt calculated. It vibed Actors Studio exercise. Monroe's acting out some newfound liberation.

Tail #2: Monroe drives to that Holmby Hills party. She drives just as erratic. Her right-hand wheels scrape the curb and send hubcaps spinning. But—she never came close to causing a wreck.

Tail #3: Monroe's non sequitur trip to the Valley. She drives just as erratic. But—she eludes a seasoned mobile-tail pro.

I pursued the theory. I paid an LAPD traffic cop to research Monroe's driving record. She secures her California license, 8/49. Her record stays clean up to 10/61. Since then? She was stopped for reckless driving fourteen times and let off with warnings.

I brain-strained it. The conclusion came easy. She vamped fourteen L.A. traffic cops. She flirted, she played coy, she planted playful kisses and dared them to cite her. Theories are theories. I braced three of the cops and got embarrassed confirmation. Two men said she shot them some tongue.

Marilyn Monroe's got a secret life within her overarching life of dissolution. It affirms her resolve to plow a thoughtful and steady course as internal chaos subsumes her. I'm stitching evidential and theoretical links. They encompass her cash stash, her disguises, her surreptitious phone calls and her Valley jaunt. Add her wacked-out driving exploits and minor cop seductions. It all adds up to a revitalized bravado and a lunatic contempt for the gilded world she lives in and now seeks to violate by means of a startling and startlingly anonymous new portrayal. Add José Bolaños. He points to the fact that it's not all in her head.

Surveillance jobs are by nature reactive. This surveillance job is a smear-by-association effort geared to validate cease-and-desist extortion. The worse Monroe looks, the worse the K boys look. Monroe's public profile is bad marriages, pill OD's, nervous breakdowns and psychiatric clinics. Her shrouded life within may reveal itself as design or simple psychic incoherence. I'm forty-two grand ahead as of now. That's eight shy of the fifty the prez stiffed me for. I'll be up to a hundred grand by summer's end. Jimmy Hoffa wants the dirt. He knows I'll dig it up wherever it leads me. I love the work and want the money. The cease-and-desist aspect still seems naïve. Jimmy Hoffa plays strictly for money. He's a prim man without my need to know WHY? I want to milk this gig past summer's end. That means busywork right now.

Norm's Nest. It was 3.4 miles northeast of Blown Tail #3 and my license-plate tally. I knew a bent ex-cop named Harry Fremont. He retired out of Ad Vice four years ago. I slipped him five yards. He slipped me the Ad Vice package on the Nest.

Deedee Grenier was dead-on. Norm Krause was a right-wing nut. The Nest hosted boozefests for the National Renaissance Party, the National Indignation Party, and the Moose Lodge Anti-Communist League. The White Dog Bund? Total membership, three men. That's Krause, patrol sergeant Jack Clemmons, and pamphlet pounder Frank Capell—author of A-Bomb Jew York City (A Modest Proposal). Krause, Clemmons, and Capell were lapsed Lutheran dog worshippers. The Nest served as an "underground railroad" for divorced dads ditching out on child-support payments and Cuban exiles who venerate los perros blancos. The convivial nitespot warmly welcomed wife swappers from the nearby Lockheed aircraft plant, and members of a "dirty shutterbug club." Norm's Nest catered to stone white trash and was in no way Marilyn Monroe's scene.

The dexies kicked in. I got that urgent stomp-the-world rush. I zoom-lensed the Lawford house. There's the ridgeback, trailing his leash. There's Pat. She's been wading. She's barefoot and soaked to the knees.

They ducked inside. I blew a kiss. The console lit up. Amber-light incoming—Peter Lawford's got a call.

I slid on my headphones. Two rings reverberated. Lawford picked up.

He said, "Hello? It's Peter, and it's getting late. Say something provocative, or I'll doze off on you."

A woman said, “Hi. It’s Eleanora. Remember me, Peter? I was a cater waitress at your party last month. Remember? You told me I could call you.”

The party. Cater waitresses galore. Tight black slacks/white shirts/red vests. All young, all fetching. Actress-manqué types.

Lawford said, “Elean*ooora.* I remember you. You said you were an actress, and your boyfriend doesn’t approve, and I told you I knew how that scene went, because my wife hates what I do, but what can I do? My wife’s an incipient zombie, but she’s a Kennedy, so she provides a good deal more pizzazz than most society girls do. So, who am I to deny that aspect of the marriage?”

Eleanora: “I see what you mean.”

Lawford: “Anyway, who am I to complain? I’m just a movie star and John F. Kennedy’s secretary of Young Fox Procurement, which allows me cabinet-level status, and my very own Playboy Club key for the oval office. I’m serious. Hugh Hefner is the president’s chief domestic adviser.”

Eleanora: “It’s nice to see a man with the world by the shorts who can still make fun of himself.”

Lawford: “Oh, well. You come in on the up-and-up, and people still think you’re working for laughs.”

Line pause: 16.4 seconds. Eleanora: “Peter, it’s not that I’m not enjoying our chat, but I’m trying to find a man who owes me money.”

Lawford: “That’s a drag, because I was just starting to grok this conversation.”

Eleanora: “I was grokking it, too.”

Lawford: “How much do you need? I’m a soft touch, and I’m not averse to being paid back in trade.”

Eleanora: “That’s not my scene.”

Lawford: “Boy, you’re erecting roadblocks.”

Eleanora: “His name is Rick Dawes. He’s a cater waiter. I thought you might have a line on him.”

The name ditzed me. I’d heard it before. I’ve got booze-and-dope aphasia. This summer dislodged some brain cells.

Lawford: “I don’t know any Rick Daweses, baby. Sorry, no sale.”

Eleanora: “It was just a shot in the dark, and it was good of you to talk to me.”

No-class Lawford tried to hustle Eleanora. Eleanora cut him slack and stayed on point. The dynamic surprised me. Eleanora worked Lawford from jump street.

Lawford: “I’ll tell you one thing that might interest you. I heard a rumor about house burglaries in Beverly Hills, all in what you might call the wake of cater-waitered and -waitressed parties. How's that grab you? Jewels and furs were stolen, and cater waiters turned out to be the suspects the cops were looking for."

Eleanora: "Well, that does sort of sound like Rick's scene. He's also been known to fruit-hustle."

Lawford: "Sorry, luv, your pal Rick doesn't ring any bells with me."

Eleanora: "Que será, será. I thought I'd give it a shot."

Lawford: "I'm glad you called. No lie. You've got the Rick Daweses of the world who owe you bread, and the Peter Lawfords of the world who'd loooove to blow bread on you, as in trips to Vegas, Aspen, places where a girl like you could really swing—"

It hit me. The name Rick Dawes. Monroe's house. My 4/11 break-in and peremptory prowl. The plank bookshelf. Monroe's scrap-paper scribbles. Monroe wrote this:

"Rick Dawes. Mean—maybe a fag." Beside it: ballpoint-pen cross-outs. They were telephone-answering outfits. It was one big, illegible list.

15

(LOS ANGELES, 3:30 P.M., WEDNESDAY, 7/18/62)

Double duty. All fucked-up phone work.

Monitor the Sip 'n' Surf feed. Record Lawford-house calls. Skim Yellow Page directories. Cold-call caterers and phone-message outfits.

Double duty. With fucked-up distractions.

There were frayed wire mounts at the Lawford house. They induced sound belches past comprehension. It's okay for now. Nobody's calling in or out.

The Sip 'n' Surf blasts sound. It's "Bikini Twist Party" Wednesday. Beach babes gyrate ten feet from my console enclosure. An overamped hi-fi cranks the "Peppermint Twist."

My headphones itched. That distracted me. The cold-call volume daunted and vexed me.

Dig it:

There are 171 caterers in the L.A. Yellow Pages. There are 256 message outfits. It's epic dreckwork. I've been at it since 8:00 a.m.

That "Eleanora"/Monroe/"Rick Dawes" lead scorched me. I checked the paper-scrap Polaroid I shot and tacked to my board.

The "Rick Dawes" is full legible. The phone-service listings are *ill*egible. The crosshatch marks beside them indicate phone numbers. The half-legible word serv indicates "service." Monroe scrawled four lines of words that end in "serv." The service names read as gobbledygook.

Peter Lawford hustles "Eleanora." He mentions Beverly Hills house burglaries. Cater waiters emerge as suspects. It's a good tangential lead. Tough shit. I can't solicit BHPD for their 459 files. I've got no police agency standing. I can't bribe my way in. It's too risky. I'm a well-known shitbird PI.

I've called twenty-one phone-service switchboards. Twenty-one operators refused to divulge their client lists. I've called twenty-four catering switchboards. I've impersonated an LAPD Burglary detective. I've stressed "Eleanora," "Rick Dawes," Beverly Hills 459's and cater waiter suspect pools. I've stated that I have no physical descriptions to work from. I've gotten "Huh?" "No," and "Beats me," twenty-three times. One major-domo type leveled with me.

He said, "Look, cater waiters and waitresses in L.A. are all so-called actors and actresses, and they use stage names, pseudonyms, and aliases routinely. In other words, they're invariably hustlers, prosties, call girls and boys, pill pushers, pot peddlers, and opportunists hustling the L.A. film folk for all they can get. Burglary or fingering burglary is in no way beneath the moral range of these kids."

I yawned and scratched my ears. The Lawford pad broadcast skreek and dead air. I was up late last night. I wrote Jimmy Hoffa a summary report. I ran my projector and screened Lois in Alcoa Presents. I thought about Lois to quash thoughts of Pat. I thought about Pat to quash thoughts of Lois. I reskimmed The Sexual Criminal. Paul de River crawled up my ass. Hey, Marilyn—why are you so hipped on this guy?

Fetish murder. Demonic delusion. Blank-eyed psychopaths. De River's got a monkey on his back.

I yawned and walked out to the beach deck. Hi-fi reverb twanged the boards and made my shoes vibrate. I looked in at the Bikini Twist Party. The "Percolator Twist" assailed me. Twist girls shimmied. Their bikini bottoms wriggled hairpie low.

The bar and tables were SRO packed. Summer twist shows drew pierside gawkers and a big lecher crowd. I orbed a front table. Four coeds in Pali High sweaters peeled shrimp and dunked clams. The man with them stood out.

I made him. I'd met him on the PD. Sid Leffler. A West L.A. squadroom dick. Curly-haired, glasses, a nebbish type. Mid-fifties. A going-nowhere guy working divisional detectives. His part-time PD gig was "Officer Sid." He toured westside high schools and inveighed against Commies and dope. Sid, the shtickmeister. Some kind of film-biz pedigree. Fuck him. He's feeding underaged girls zonk-your-ass mai tais.

I walked back to the post and locked myself in. It squelched the music and muted the roar in my head. The amber console light blinked, on-off.

Outgoing call/Peter Lawford's extension. I pulled on my headset. I caught Lawford mid-spiel.

"…and, Diana, the man loved you. I mean, he called me from the oval office to say, 'Peter, I'm no fan of oaters, but something told me to tune in Bonanza, so you tell Miss Van der Vlis the next time I'm in town I'd enjoy—' "

Line warp cut him off. Bum wire mounts induce line warp. The line stuttered and spit background noise. Lawford said something, the actress said something, an off-line voice cut in.

Quit pimping for my brother, you fucking—

The actress screeched and hung up. The broadcast cleared exponential. Lawford said, "You fucking bitch." Pat said, "You goddamned—"

Then crash sounds. Then hurled-object sounds. Then "Get your hands off me or I'll—"

Then shattered-glass sounds, line blur, and blank air—

Line blur. Blank air. Pat on a stutter tape inside my head.

Get-your-goddamn-hands/Get-your-goddamn-hands/Get-your-goddamn-hands—

I bolted the Sip 'n' Surf and hauled to the bluffside post. I got dead air off the console. I zoom-lensed the house. I saw no window movement and no shadows and no movement on the grounds. Both garage doors stood open. Lawford's Rolls and Pat's Bonneville were tucked in. I gobbled dexies and guzzled Old Crow and worked my pulse up and down.

I eyeballed the house. I ran zoom-lens circuits. The calm status quo held. I called Nat and Phil and issued directives.

Grab your walkie-talkies. Drive to the 76 station on PCH and perch. Marital tiff. Red Alert. I know this shit. They'll pull a two-car driveaway. Nat, you tail Pat. Phil, you tail dipshit. I've got my handset here. Call in at one-hour intervals. Track your mileage away from the site.

I waited. I watched the house. Spots popped in front of my eyes. My arteries pinged. My feet went numb. I lost weight as I tried to sit still. My watch dangled slack on my wrist. I saw things that weren't there. I saw the Taft Building on August 15, 1945. Pat and I stood naked, in our room across the street. We watched the Miller High-Life sign blink.

5:19 p.m. Pat enters the garage. Three kids trail her. She dumps two suitcases in her Bonneville. She backs out and peels northbound on PCH. There's Nat's Ford wagon. He peels out of the gas station lot and bird-dogs her.

5:53 p.m. Lawford enters the garage. He hops in his Rolls and peels southbound on PCH. There's Phil's Valiant coupe. He peels out of the gas station lot and bird-dogs him.

I shut my eyes. I ran Man Camera clips. I replayed Freddy and Pat, start to finish. I recalled our opening dialogue, near verbatim. My handset squawked at 6:22 p.m.

Nat reported in. Pat's still heading northbound on PCH. She just passed Oxnard. Nat thinks she's headed to Santa Barbara.

My nerves decohered. I popped two yellow jackets to tamp them down and quash this schizzy limbo. My handset squawked at 6:56 p.m.

Phil reported in. Lawford was holed up on Ewing Street in Silver Lake. The place reeked of love crib. He checked his reverse directory. The crib was owned by one Lorelei Gudis. Phil ran her through Sheriff's R&I. She had twelve pandering priors. They went back to '55.

I crossed myself. I grabbed my tool belt, a ski mask, my beavertail sap.

I could do it. I knew that. I knew I had options. I could take it just so far and stop there. I could take it all the way and frost a homicide beef. I thought, Restraint. I thought, Don't blow the gig. If you do it, you'll burn the gig and burn Jimmy Hoffa. He'll kill you, no questions asked.

My head hurt. I saw spots. My numb feet put me up on my heels. I splintered a window ledge and vaulted my way in. It was sloppy work. It decreed a mock-459 ruse. I went straight to the kitchen. I filled two paper bags with sterling silver flatware and placed them by the front door. I left my pill stash back at the post. I verged on an overjolt and knew it.

The Lawfords stocked their liquor cabinet with the most and the best. I siphoned high-test juice from six bottles. My headache abated. The spots vanished. My tremors subsided. I troubleshot the six phone extensions and the downstairs bug mounts.

I replaced the handset wiring and the listen/speak microphones. I bunched the defective wires and mikes up in a tool belt pouch. The new wires and mike flanges were silicone-coated. They would not fray.

The booze jolt diminished. I prayed off an urge to fall out on Pat's bed. I restrung the downstairs bug mounts and spackled the mount holes.

I spray-painted the dried Spackle the perfect wall-color shade.

Spackle dust billowed. I vacuumed it up and hand-plucked every stray fleck of grit. I squinted my way along baseboards and started seeing double and triple. I hand-plucked every stray fleck of grit. I'm sure I did. I quadruple-checked my work. They'd detect the burglary. They'd note the missing silver. They'd never detect the surveillance gear. That meant Pat would never know.

Dipshit was shacked in Silver Lake. Phil sat on the house. I fine-tuned my hearing and willed the key in the door lock. That meant you do it. Pat took luggage. She'd be gone several days. Lawford would odds-on roll home at noon. Phil would cue me. Two short phone bursts. He's on his way.

I passed out standing up. I woke up prone on the living room floor. I collapsed in a wingback chair and woke up in a kitchen chair. DT blobs grew faces and went for my eyes. I screamed and covered them. They ate their way through my hands and bored into my face. I muffled screams with a kitchen towel. I heard a key-in-lock sound or willed a key-in-lock sound so I'd do it. It sounded real. Peter Lawford coughed and made it real, for sure.

I slipped on my ski mask and pulled my sap and ran toward the sound. I slammed Lawford low and jammed a wad of acoustical baffling in his mouth. He thrashed and pissed his pants. He bleated. I sapped his legs, his feet, his back. I drop-kicked him in the balls. I pulled his gag so he wouldn't gorge on puke and suffocate. He twitched and made funny noises. I sapped him in the ribs and heard bones shear. I picked up the bags of silverware and ran.

Kwan's Chinese Pagoda. A C-town mainstay since 1928. Open-all-nite. After-hours booze for LAPD, Sheriff's, and DA's Bureau brass. Hop Sing Tong–allied. The basement opium den goes unmentioned. Chinese interns at Queen of Angels do research in underground suites. Six rooms house inebriates in need of deep rest.

I've dried out there before. As in '51 and '57. I split the Lawford house and drove straight to Kwan's. I dumped the stolen silverware down a sewer hole en route. I called Phil and told him to boss the gig for a week. Work the posts, run the taps, surveil the Lawford spread. Sniff out the presence of fuzz. Determine if Lawford reported the beating and 459. Determine if the repaired wires are back at 100%. Track Pat's whereabouts. Tell me when she crawls back home.

I doused the lights and went Adieu. The interns hooked me to an intravenous sleep drip. I woke up and smoked opium. The interns fed me pork fried rice and lobster à la Kwan and put me back to sleep. My room was windowless and air-conditioned. There was no wall clock. They hid my wristwatch and smothered all my notions of time. I slept through a head-to-toe blood rotation. My putrified blood was replaced with the hormone- and herb-packed blood of some new Asian master race. I slept twenty-plus hours a day. I purged in steam baths and ice-water plunges. I floated in space-age decompression chambers, buoyed by saline-infused water and fragrant oils. I slept. I did not dream. My brain wires reconnected. I brain-screened real and imagined moments with Pat. I recited long Bible passages, verbatim. I first memorized them as a kid in bumfuck, Massachusetts.

The freight weighed in at fifteen grand. I paid out in Jimmy Hoffa's C-notes and tipped the interns a grand apiece. Phil picked me up and drove me home. He reported in full.

The Lawford house taps now worked 100%. Fuckhead visited a doctor and limped for a week. He did not report the thumping or the burglary. Pat crawled home, three days later. The restored tap lines now hum. Presidential pimp Lawford cranks calls. He's been buzzing actresses King Jack has seen on TV. Jack digs the Method type. Shirley Knight, Joan Hackett, Whitney Blake. If Lawford perv-calls Lois Nettleton, I'll kill him.

Phil said the gig felt tapped out. Monroe hides at home. She's poised to go back to work on Got to Give. She calls Roddy McDowall in Rome and Lowell Farr at mom and dad's place. She gets late-breaking dish from the Cleopatra set and ripe accounts of Palisades High intrigue. Monroe alternates shrink-session modes with Doc Greenson. It's backyard cocktails at his place or her calls to him. Her anti-Jack-and-Bobby rage ascends, call to call. Phil said her most repeated phrase is "I've got the goods on them."

Phil said he's getting paranoic. He's seen private security guys down the street from the golf course post. I said, Let's get inside and pull the Monroe mounts. Phil agreed. He said, Monroe might not cooperate. She's turned recluse. She doesn't don disguise and make pay-phone calls. She eschews Jeanne Carmen's pill parties. Deedee Grenier hasn't phoned in dirt briefs. José Bolaños hadn't called. Phil summarized his update. "Freddy, the gig feels atrophied."

But I felt good. And I looked good. Who's that handsome camel fucker in the mirror?

Transfused, reborn—it's your call. I regained my lost weight. I felt quietly revitalized and determined to push forth on the gig. I X-marked my wall calendar. Days off booze and dope. Seven, eight, nine, ten, and counting.

I took a weeklong breather. I schemed gig strategy and considered Pat and the risk I took to avenge her. She's a dilettante sunk by astounding privilege and my inimically idealized better half. I considered Lois. She's as ill-born and hardscrabble as I am. I'm her slum reclamation project. I fulfill her penchant for the outré. I considered Marilyn Monroe and her secret life and made the three women a troika.

I sheet-draped my living room corkboards. I covered my evidence photos and pinned-on notes and crafted a No-Monroe Zone. I banned visual stimulus and went at her through straight reflection.

She craved the authentic. Material success had failed her. She had the world by the shorts. Affluence offended her. She embraced the pervy Weimar Berlin aesthetic. "Authentic" connoted dark photographic art. Her wall frieze. Bull dykes shooting dope. Defective kids in Mickey Mouse beanies. De River's Sexual Criminal. Traumatic case histories. Banal brutality as the fount of true human horror and thus great art.

And the incubating force behind her own vastly overpraised gifts.

De River has replaced Lee Strasberg and the Actors Studio. He can render her authentic in a way that no New York stage guru ever could. Monroe is now attempting to achieve authenticity. Her new mode? A sustained and most likely criminally defined portraiture that film moguls and her trillions of idiot fans will never see.

I ran sight tails off of Carmelina and Fifth Helena. It was her one car lane to L.A. at large. I staked it out three full days. Day #3/2:12 p.m. There's Marilyn's Buick. The housekeeper's with her. Nail it: she's going to the store.

I tailed them to the Brentwood Market. I figured it gave me ninety minutes, tops. I drove back to Fifth Helena and impromptu B and E'd it. The day was hot-hot. I stepped through a gauze-curtained window and worked dervish quick.

I pulled all my bugs and tap mounts. I yanked all attendant wires. I put myself in a bind with Jimmy Hoffa. It forced me to scheme some all-new method of approach.

I went out the back door and pored through her trash cans. I found twelve empty TV dinner containers and sixteen empty cans of Metrecal. I found four empty Nembutal vials. Marilyn had crossed her name off the labels. She wrote in their place: "Not my name anymore."

17

It was hot. My window units rattled. I sat in the living room and brooded the day up.

I stared at my evidence boards. Thumbtacks stretched the sheet drapes taut. They cloaked photographs/tap transcripts/report carbons/bug logs/jotted notes/photo close-ups of odd scraps of paper. They detailed the gig from 4/10 to now. They shut down my visual memory and forced me to extrapolate with reduced stimuli.

Marilyn Monroe in extremis. What's going on here?

Brain loops had me light-headed. I smoked myself hoarse. I levitated in my favorite chair.

Door knocks blitzed my concentration. It pissed me off. I got up and opened the door.

She wore a pink linen dress. No stockings and scuffed white bucks. She wore her hair down and parted left.

She was still gawky, working on regal. She ran gaunt now. There were no soft planes to her face.

She said, "Your scent lingers."

It felt rehearsed. It fell flat. Her arms were too thin. Her man's wristwatch dangled. I must have stared.

She said, "My party in June. You wore that cheap lime cologne in 1945, and you're still wearing it today. My kids told me they smelled it for a week."

Everything went TILT. I got "This can't be" out. Pat jiggled my hands and pushed me inside. I kicked the door shut.

Reprise.

The bedroom-window unit rattled. Cold air merged with trapped air and the wet we'd stirred up. Pat pulled a sheet over us. She shivered, I trembled. I know she caught the distinction.

We stretched out under the sheet. We were tall and spanned the whole bed. We reached up and laced hands and laid them on the headboard.

Her too-big wristwatch slid off. I grabbed it and stuck it under a pillow. Pat laughed. I said, “You’ll start thinking you’ve got a husband and kids out at the beach, and you’ll be gone before I can blink.”

Pat squeezed my hands. “That’s your injunction. Here’s mine, and it has just as much to do with time. Don’t mention a certain moment and place and tell me what you recall, because I remember it a certain way, and to me it’s sacrosanct.”

Our eyes were dialed tight. Hers were red-flecked hazel. I’d just noticed it.

“That’s the best thing anyone’s ever said to me.”

“You mean a woman’s ever said to you.”

“Men tell me ‘Fetch, Freddy, fetch’ or ‘Shake down this guy, will you?’ So, you’re right. There’s a distinction.”

Pat said, “I noticed two things in your living room.”

I gulped. “Yeah. My covered-up boards and what else?”

“A framed theater Playbill from October ’56. Somebody circled a notice. ‘Lois Nettleton replaces Barbara Bel Geddes in the role of,’ and then some folderol about the play itself.”

I laughed. “Lois is a friend of mine. We see each other intermittently, but compared to you and me, we’ve been shacked up from the gate.”

Pat roared. Some tears squeezed out. I kissed them away.

“Let’s not talk about Lois, or Jack, or your pressing engagements out at the beach.”

Pat said, “Freddy’s a party crasher.”

I said, “ ‘Freddy loves Pat.’ I carved it on a tree at the LAPD Academy, three weeks after I met you.”

Pat shut her eyes. I did the same. We squeezed our linked hands into fists and tapped the headboard. I saw things and heard things. Pat’s kids trip on bug wires. Pat picks up her bedside phone and hears telltale clicks.

I said, “You honor me.”

Pat said, “Oh, dear. I have made such a hash of it.”

I said, “We’re running neck and neck there.”

—

Reprise.

Man Camera meets stopwatch. It lasted two hours and fourteen minutes. Pressing engagements, superseding commitments. She almost ran out the door.

I paced my living room and bumped into furniture, dead sober. I was all Tilt and Swirl.

The phone rang. I grabbed for it and capsized an end table. I caught the receiver two rings in.

“Yes? Who is this?”

There’s that prairie twang. “It’s Bill Parker, Freddy.”

I said, “Yes, sir.”

Parker said, “I need you. It’s a kidnap, and a film-mogul acquaintance of mine needs a favor. Open your front door and look out.”

I put the phone down and did it. Bill Parker excels at presentation. He outdid himself here.

Four big men stood beside an unmarked prowl car. I saw five pump shotguns propped up in the backseat. The men wore pearl-gray suits and straw fedoras. Max Herman, Red Stromwall, Harry Crowder, Eddie Benson. Who else but for kidnap grief?

I blinked.

The men waved.

I crossed myself.

Oh shit. I’m jungled up with the Hat Squad, once more.

PART 3

TRUTH JUICE

(AUGUST 4–20, 1962)

18

(LOS ANGELES, 11:50 P.M., SUNDAY, 8/4/62)

Okay—she's dead. It's some all-new cluster fuck now. Bill Parker has designs. Robert Kennedy was en route. The press would grab the dead bait girl and not let go.

I parked across the street and watched the house. I called Phil first thing. He rolled out and parked three car lengths behind me. The street was otherwise dead. Midnight passed. It's Sunday morning now. Phil and I eye-strafed the house. We walkie-talkie gabbed to kill time.

Bill Parker has designs. He told me to meet the Hats at PC Bell. The Chief seized opportunities. Like yesterday. Hey, Freddy—I've got a kidnap play. Dump this guy, will you?

My thoughts tumbled. I killed a man and caressed a dead woman. Heat left her body. My hand went cold. I saw Motel Mike Bayless rescue Gwen Perloff and logged anomalies. Monroe scrawled the main Sheriff's number on a paper scrap. Deedee Grenier goes back with Motel Mike.

Headlights bounced east, off Carmelina. The left light glared defective. That meant the housekeeper. She pulled up beside the front hedgerow and walked through the gate. I heard key-lock sounds. Okay—she's inside. There—that's her bedroom light.

I'd locked Monroe's bedroom door. I knew the house routine. Moms won't check the door before noon. I've got time to work angles. Bill Parker's got time to fine-tune his play.

The housekeeper's light blipped off. I smoked and ran the car radio. A 1:00 a.m. news flash blared. Bold kidnap job! LAPD detectives and celeb PI kill one suspect! One suspect arrested, three suspects at large!

I smoked myself hoarse. I was still half-cranked on jungle juice. The housekeeper's room light blinked on. I clocked it at 2:42.

I heard thunk, thunk, thunk. She's knocking on Monroe's door. She's the petulant and persistent type.

Phil buzzed me. I hit the RECEIVE switch. Phil said, "She'll know something's wrong in about two seconds."

I hit the SPEAK switch. “She’ll call Greenson. It’ll take him twenty minutes to get dressed and drive out here.”

Phil rogered out. I clicked off my handset and squelched shortwave skreek. I counted minutes off the dashboard clock. Greenson drove a road-hog Lincoln. It cut up Carmelina at 16:32.

He parked behind the housekeeper’s car and went through the gate. Moms stood in the doorway. Greenson trudged the front lawn. They left the door ajar and veered toward Monroe’s bedroom. I heard thump-thumps. I knew that sound. Pops throws elbows at the doorjamb and yelps each time.

I got out and peeped over the hedgerow. Greenson ran outside. He held an andiron. He ran around to Monroe’s French windows and smashed the glass in. I heard him kick away shards and stomp through the bedroom. He opened the door and let moms in. The old lady screeched.

Okay—she’s dead. Can the boo-hoo, let’s get on with—

I heard phone-dial sounds. Greenson’s calling a doctor colleague or the local fuzz. I perched in the car and gauged response time. It’s twenty minutes for the doctor, fifteen for the fuzz.

I was antsy. Time schizzed on me. A late-model Cadillac pulled up to the house. A slender man got out.

Phil buzzed me. “That’s Dr. Engleberg. I tailed Monroe to his office in June.”

Engleberg entered the house. The door stood wide open. It was 3:09 a.m. Brentwood was dark-dark and hushed-quiet. The Monroe spread glowed bright-bright.

An LAPD black-and-white skidded up. It nudged Engleberg’s back bumper and scraped his BAN THE BOMB sticker off. It looked deliberate.

The driver got out. I made him. Robbie Molette shot surveillance pix at Norm’s Nest. It’s Sergeant Jack Clemmons. He’s Norm Krause’s tight pal and White Dog Bund Kamerad.

He grabbed a clipboard and walked up the lawn. He wore Bill Parker’s scowly subdue-the-masses look. I got out and stood on my back bumper. The crowd ran to four now. Housekeeper, Clemmons, Greenson, Engleberg. No deputy coroner. No squadroom detectives, no lab crew, no photo car. It’s a dead celeb. They’ll send a mortuary sled and rig a temporary freeze. The coroner would take it from there.

I heard voices. Greenson and Clemmons groused. A K-car jammed up behind the black-and-white. Bob Byron got out. He was Parker’s man at West L.A. station. He’ll call the shots now.

My walkie-talkie buzzed. I jumped in the car and hit the sound switch. Phil said, “It’s on the civilian radio. KHJ has it. Somebody at the station must have spilled.”

I hit the kill switch. The sound gap juked voices up on the lawn. Byron gave Clemmons what for. Call the mortuary. Get some bluesuits. There’s news bulletins. That means crowds. Chop, chop. You know the drill.

Clemmons trudged back inside. Byron huffed off and drove off. Greenson slammed the front door and shut out looky-loos. My day loomed long.

Meet the Hats at PC Bell. Spot-check the Lawford spread. The Chief would issue directives. The Hoffa job had me backlogged. Some sort of new job would swamp me. I popped two dexies and re-revved.

Dawn broke. The day vibed scorcher. Clemmons walked out and peeled out. He left the doctors to deal with the mortuary guys. Cars turned off Carmelina and beelined right here.

Reporters and camera dinks piled out. They parked haphazard and blocked doorways. They climbed the gate and swarmed the front lawn. They went from zero to forty-odd, fast. They passed around wake-up jugs and dropped film wrappers and cigarette butts on the grass.

They talked loud. They raised a ruckus. Neighboring houses lit up. Doors popped open. Yokels plopped into porch chairs and grooved on the show.

Fan types drove up and walked up. Triple-parked cars tight-packed the whole street. Fans climbed up on car roofs and hoods. They got wide-angle views. Fans piled out of cars and trampled front yards to get close. Fifth Helena went claustrophobic. Parked cars blocked Carmelina. Lowell Farr crawled over a high-backed old Dodge. She cut her hands on a window ledge and wiped blood on her sweater. She was weeping.

It got crazy bad. The crowd quadrupled. Daddy types waltzed kids around on their shoulders. The kids futzed with portable radios. KHJ broadcast the Fifth Helena Show. KNX broadcast an all-Marilyn retrospective. An ice-cream truck hawked Popsicles down near Carmelina.

Parked cars and raucous mourners boxed me in. The mortuary van no-showed. I lost sight of Lowell. Patrol cops shooed souvenir hunters off of Monroe's lawn. They were ripping out clumps of grass and stuffing their pockets.

I had to move. The van would probably traverse Sixth Helena and off-load the stiff through the garage. TV truck broadcasts blitzed my walkie-talkie frequencies. Phil was boxed in thirty yards behind me. This shit would build and burst. Desist! warnings would fizzle. Tear gas might work. LAPD would eat police-brutality shit and further besmirch their image.

I backed my sled up on some squarejohn's lawn. I brodied on wet grass and popped the clutch in first gear. I slid-skid west. Mourner-revelers dodged me. I plowed lawns, toppled water fountains, cracked driveway paving. I knocked over mailboxes and caromed off parked cars. Kids in Davy Crockett hats waved. I made Carmelina and punched it. I fishtailed and swung right on Sixth Helena. I shot clear up to Monroe's garage.

It was 7:10 a.m. I timed it on the dot.

The death van was parked snout out. The loading hatch was wide open. Monroe's dippy Buick was jammed upside a pepper tree. Scavengers pored through it. They snipped upholstery swatches with pruning shears.

Four male nurse types wheeled a gurney up. Monroe's sheet-draped and buckled-in. Six cops ran interference. Grass snippers and upholstery slashers stopped to pitch boo-hoo. The cops and nurses tossed the gurney up and in. A cop slammed the hatch. A nurse took the wheel and laid tracks.

They shot down Sixth Helena. I stuck right behind. The hearse was a '59 Caddy. The exhaust pipes spewed grit. We turned south on Carmelina and west on San Vicente. We cut south on Moreno Drive and back east on the San Vicente one-way. They drove slow. I drove slow. Two-car funeral cortege.

We passed through Brentwood Village and curved south on Barrington. We caught the light at Wilshire and curved east. We cut by the VA hospital and cemetery. The van jockey veered right and turned right at Wilshire and Westwood Boulevard. A pocket funeral home was tucked behind Truman's Drive-In. The van pulled straight up to it. An intake crew stood by.

They knew the protocol. So did I. Hold the stiff. The coroner's men would grab it and schlep it to the morgue. Doc Curphey would order the autopsy. Scalpels and organ scales at 2:00 or 3:00 p.m.

I thought about Pat. PC Bell was out at the beach. I had time to swing by the Lawford house and still make my meet with the Hats.

Wilshire was Sunday-morning lulled. I caught next to no traffic and a long string of green lights. I breezed through Santa Monica and caught the California Incline down to PCH. The run north took ten seconds. I parked on the landside curb and eyed the Lawford spread.

Pat and dipshit Peter stood out on the sand. They wore hokey presidential-seal robes and sipped coffee. Pat looked haggard, dipshit looked hot to fawn. They stared up at the sky. I heard rotor thumps and saw a chopper approach.

It throttled down and hovered low. It landed twenty feet from them. A cockpit door popped open. Robert Kennedy hopped out.

PC Bell was on Wilshire, due east of the beach bluffs. I got there early. I parked curbside and built lies, full blast.

The Hats would snatch Monroe's phone records. We'd scan them. Names, dates, phone numbers, and call times would jump out. I'd memorized and imprinted the gist of most of the calls. The Chief had no clue. I told him I'd worked a recent Monroe gig. He expected full disclosure. He knew my bug-and-tap expertise. He didn't know who hired me. He would interrogate me himself. I could prevaricate, dissemble, fabricate, concoct, and play off his vanity. I could not lie away the breadth of the Hoffa gig.

I brain-segued. I jumped from Bill Parker to Pat. Bucktooth Bobby was huddled with the Lawfords now. Peter would tell him he found Marilyn dead and suborned me. I'd told him I was Bill Parker's man per this deal. Bobby has a file on me. He knows what I do. He'll think bug job tout-fucking-sweet. He'll tell Pat. She'll confront me. I'll falter. She'll see straight through me.

I glanced up Wilshire. A PD prowl sled was parked outside Biff's Char-Broil. Max Herman stood in the doorway. He saw my car and waved a manila folder. I got out and walked over.

We shook hands. Max said, "It's been too long, son."

I lit a cigarette. "As in last night. It's all coming back to me. We tossed a man off a cliff."

"We saved the girl, though. The Chief chilled us, and it's the Sheriff's headache from here on out."

I tapped the folder. "Monroe's phone records?"

Max eased me inside. "That's right. And toll tickets, up through Thursday night. The Chief has a hunch you're up-to-date on the conversations, but he'll discuss that with you himself."

I gulped. Max steered me to a back booth. Red, Harry, and Eddie wolfed steak and eggs.

Red said, “There’s Freddy.”

Harry said, “Freddy the O. Twice in twenty-four hours. Just when you think you’ve seen the last of him.”

Eddie sniffed the air. “Freddy’s in the shit. He just can’t seem to avoid it.”

I sat down. Harry poured me coffee. Max passed me the folder. I skimmed names, phone numbers, dates.

Jeanne Carmen. Ralph Greenson. Temp shrink Milt Wexler. Familiar times, dates, chitchat. Calls to the White House and Justice Department switchboards. The house-to-D.C. calls peaked and decreased. Monroe utilized the Fox switchboard toward the end. Calls to Roddy McDowall in Rome. Pharmacy calls. Calls to La Barbara’s Pizza. Pizza Dave worked the delivery route. Calls to Fox, the Lawfords, studio flacks and gofers. The call tallies flatlined in May and June. Monroe was on a pay-phone kick. No Monroe-to-Lowell Farr calls were listed. Brentwood to the Palisades was a toll-free zone. Monroe did not call Ensenada. José Bolaños called her.

I passed the folder back to Max. The Hats skunk-eyed me.

Red said, “Well?”

Max said, “Marilyn called the pizza delivery boy ‘Big Dick Dave.’ ”

Harry said, “I’ll bet you’re wondering how we know that.”

Eddie said, “Here’s a hint. You didn’t mention it during your perfunctory phone chat with the Chief last night. You told him you worked a recent Monroe gig, and left it at that.”

Red said, “Nobody can say that you weren’t forthcoming. The Chief requested a forensic, and you complied.”

Max sighed. “Freddy’s waiting for the punch line.”

Harry sighed. “Freddy deserves the punch line.”

Eddie sighed. “Freddy’s trustworthy. We trusted him to toss a kidnap freak off a cliff, so we can sure as shit trust him with the punch line.”

I sighed. I rolled my eyes. I’m too bored to live. I’m shitstorm-prone. Here comes Shitstorm #389—

Red lit a cigar. “2:00 a.m., this morning. Wilshire Vice nailed Robbie Molette on fourteen counts of pandering, peddling goofballs, stat rape, and receiving stolen goods. The Vice dicks knew we shared a history with Robbie, so they brought him to us. We leaned on him, and took him to Georgia Street Receiving for a little cleanup. Robbie said, ‘Okay, I’ll give,’ so we bought him breakfast at Kwan’s. He had three double Bloody Marys. They got him all loosey-goosey. He gave up your Monroe gig in minute detail, and bought himself an immunity waiver off of Miller Leavy. He's in the clear, but your boys Irwin and Denkins are not. Your fate appears to be ambiguous, but you are not without friends."

Max lit a cigar. "Turn around and look out the window."

I did it. I saw two black sedans parked on Wilshire. They were cop sedans. They had smoked windows and fringed antenna flags. A sea breeze pulled them taut. The LAPD crest and the Justice Department seal fluttered.

Red and Max grabbed my elbows and pulled me up. They nudged chairs aside and frog-marched me to the sidewalk. Robert Kennedy stepped out of the PD sedan and stepped into the Fed car. He left the back door ajar. Max went After you. I slid in beside Bill Parker.

He wore civvies and a Jesuit lapel pin. He winked and slapped his knees.

"You've held up well, given the hoops I've put you through. The kidnap job and Monroe in one go is a stretch."

I lit a cigarette. "I said I'd brief you the next time we talked. I was planning to, and I didn't intend to withhold. It looks like Robbie Molette and the Hats got there first."

The backseat featured a Portabar. Parker poured two short ones. Early Mass and a face-off with the AG. He deserved a jolt.

"I've just cut a deal with the attorney general. In consideration of a 'certain favor,' I will be appointed director of the FBI, after President Kennedy has been reelected. The 'certain favor' is you, Freddy. You are to work a variant of your recent operation for a crooked labor leader. You are to create a scandal sheet—wholly defamatory, but factually verifiable—on the late Marilyn Monroe. It will posthumously serve to damn Miss Monroe and discredit, refute, or at least mitigate any public awareness of her possible misconduct with Les Frères Kennedy. Accordingly, the sheet will also defame John and Robert Kennedy. You will stiff the AG with a second, entirely disingenuous set of reports and general memoranda, which will purport to be the 'real skinny,' but which will be pablum when compared to the dirt you report to me. This 'smear sheet within a smear sheet' will provide me with an extortion wedge should that feral cocksucker Bobby renege on our FBI-boss deal. Your other job is to quell newspaper, radio, and TV speculation per Miss Monroe's death. No unseemly hints of homicide, conspiracy, or any sense of unseemly alliance with the Kennedys may see print or appear on the airwaves."

I bolted my drink. Parker bolted his. He quick-built two refills.

"You will be issued valid credentials for the L.A. District Attorney's Bureau of Investigations. You will be sworn in as a lieutenant. This appointment has been vouched by DA McKesson and his chief criminal prosecutor, J. Miller Leavy—who, quite frankly, despises you. That's of no import, because Mayor Sam Yorty likes the cut of your jib. You will have a carry permit, a badge, and the power to issue subpoenas and search warrants written by Miller Leavy and run by a 'rubber stamp' Superior Court judge. You will work out of the LAPD's Intelligence Division, under Lieutenant Daryl Gates."

I popped sweat and weaved. I blinked and saw double. Two Parkers harangued me.

"Your three listening posts will be raided, late next week. All your evidence will be seized and held by the Justice Department, with all tape and written documents duplicated and held at LAPD Intel. The seizure of Lawford-house evidence will put you in the shit with Robert Kennedy, but you've been in the shit with the Kennedys before, and I want you in the shit now—it will put Bob Kennedy on the edge. The Kennedys must fear debilitating exposure, now, and your shitbird reputation is a surefire means to make this occur."

I guzzled my refill and crossed myself. Dear Lord, Pat will know.

Parker tapped his wristwatch. "We're due at St. John's. I trust you to be forthcoming, but I don't trust your memory."

—

Coerced performance. Interrogation. Brain scrub.

The room spooked me. Straitjackets and bite restraints were piled on wood-plank shelves. The metal table was bolted to the floor. I was strapped tight. An anesthetist mixed the jolt.

Scopolamine, Amytal, Pentothal. Some space-age compound. Parker called it the "KGB Cocktail."

He stood by the table. Ditto the Intel exec, Daryl Gates. Robbie Molette sat by the door. He'd feed Parker and Gates prompts and cues. Max said the hump revealed the full Hoffa op. I believed it. I had three goals here. Gauge the questions and determine what they knew. Restore my booze-and-dope-maimed recollections. Rebuff all queries per Pat.

The doctor fed a spike and swabbed my arm. He hit a fat blue vein. The rush hit head-to-toe ecstatic.

It was a warm-water plunge. I swam in bright colors. I saw Pat and Lois naked. It shamed me. I asserted brain control and screened bland settings. Parker jumped on my 4/11 break-in. I fed him fluff on Monroe's bedroom sloth. Gates jumped on the money in the lockbox. I lost Pat and Lois. They swam off into a waterfall. I described the forty grand and the Polaroids I took. I blabbed wiretap outtakes. Eleanora and dipshit Lawford discussed some cat named Rick Dawes.

Gates mentioned José Bolaños. I gave up the Monroe-Bolaños tap call. Parker brought up my blown tail to the Valley. My brain glitched. I saw myself with the Hats. It was just last night. We're chasing Sheriff's prowl cars. We're hot to rescue Gwen Perloff.

Parker asked questions. Gates asked questions. Robbie fed them cues. I ran mental-solvency tests and answered questions hit or miss. Parker and Gates looked perplexed. The doctor looked bored. Robbie looked apprehensive. I saw that morgue shot from last night. It's Carole Landis, it's '48, she's on a gurney just like mine. Monroe's in the morgue now. Why did she have that photo? Why am I seeing that photo at this time?

The doctor said, "He's a lousy subject. He only submits so far. I think this summer's a blur to him, and that's why you're getting these fragmentary responses."

Monroe Gig #2. Day one was all mortification. #2 supplants #1. The first job was all money, peeper kicks, and sunshine. #2 connotes legal jeopardy and high-stakes censure.

The truth juice wore off at St. John's. I snoozed on the gurney. Parker and Gates took off. Robbie slunk off. I walked back to PC Bell and got my car. I drove straight to the wheelman lot at Beverly and Hayworth.

I steered herky-jerky. I wore palm-and-finger-weighted sap gloves. Steel weights were stitched in.

My thoughts tumbled.

The evidence raid was slated for late next week. I had four days to hide my office stash and listening-post documents. That meant four all-day workdays.

I pulled up to the lot. Punk wheelmen loitered by the pay phone. Divorce lawyers called in and hired surveillance guys. They tailed cheating spouses to hot-sheet flops and kicked doors in. Flashbulbs and divorce decrees popped. I'd done the work myself.

Robbie stood by the Coke machine. I hit him at a full sprint. He cartwheeled. I pinned him prone and stuffed a handkerchief in his mouth. I threw right and left uppercuts. Robbie gagged on the hankie and spit teeth and gum flaps in my face.

I heard his jaw break. My knees snapped his collarbone. I went downstairs and slammed his ribs. Sheared bones poked out at odd angles. Nat Denkins ran up and bear-hugged me. Phil Irwin said, “Whoa, Freddy, whoa.”

19

(LOS ANGELES, 5:08 A.M., MONDAY, 8/6/62)

I was dead asleep. The truth juice fucked with my system. I thought I heard things and heard things, straight up.

I woke up. Metal scrapes roused me. I heard lock-pick sounds out on my porch.

Little pokes, digs, and prods. There's a twist. There's male whispers. It sounds like three men. There's the snap.

They can't get in. I'm wise to lock picks and stealth. I installed blocker strips.

I grabbed my bedside piece. I screwed on the suppressor. I heard mutters and shuffles. The front door came down.

It crashed. It hit the floor, flush. It cracked floorboards and made very big noise.

I heard footsteps. Three penlight beams strafed the bedroom. I saw three men. I saw dark suits and wide bulletproof vests.

They sensed me, they smelled me. They saw me and charged me in bed.

I shot them flush and hit them. Muzzle flash lit the room. They caught two vest shots each. Big-bore shots knocked them flat on the floor.

I jumped out of bed and tripped on top of them. They cursed and screeched. They got up and dogpiled me.

They threw elbows and rabbit punches. They wrestled me and grabbed at me. I kneed them in the balls and went for their throats. They pinned me down. They had dinky Fed badges pinned to their belts.

A Mex type drop-kicked me and smothered me with a pillow. Two paddy Feds kicked me in the head.

Ratfuck Bobby fucked us. He staged the evidence raid four days early. I got sandbagged. I had no time to prepare.

They got everything. My corkboards, my bug-and-tap logs, my boxed tapes. They got my photo sprays, my scrawled notes, my pictures of Pat. They dressed me, they cuffed me, they hauled me outside.

Three Fed sleds lined the curb. They packed the trunks with my evidence. They bagged all my paper scraps and operational minutiae. They strongarmed me into the lead car. Their vests were bullet-pocked and dented. They groaned and rubbed the welts on their chests. They limped from my nut shots.

Three Feds, three Fed sleds. The Mex type took the lead car. I rode in the backseat. The two paddy Feds followed close. My neighbors stood on their porches and gassed on the show.

We caravanned west on Sunset. I was concussed. I saw quadruple everything. The Mex type motormouthed. He said he wasn't Mex. He was proudly Cubano. As in vintage '59 Cuban exile.

He was a Justice Department lawyer/investigator. His name was Edgar Chacõn. Señor Bob Kennedy was his personal jefe. Señor Bob put him through Georgetown Law School and helped him pass the D.C. bar exam. He has a swell garage apartment at Señor Bob's Hickory Hill estate. He's Señor Bob's bodyguard and dirty trickster. He drives Señor Bob's kids to school and walks Señor Bob's dogs. He's killed lots of Castroite militiamen. He scalped them and cut their dicks off. He drinks with Señor Bob and Señor Jack at the White House. He has personally fucked fourteen thousand women and is widely known as the "Lizard of Love."

The caravan veered south on Barrington and west on San Vicente. That bodes a golf course raid. We hooked around the median strip and hit the side street by Brentwood CC. An LAPD unmarked car beat us there. Phil Irwin and Nat Denkins were cuffed in the backseat. Two plainclothes cops loaded Monroe-pad gear in the trunk.

Eddie Chacõn idled up to the LAPD car. I recognized a West L.A. squadroom guy.

Sid Leffler. A nosebleed cop from way back. "Officer Sid." Mr. High School Toastmaster. I saw him at the Sip 'n' Surf, midsummer. He was feeding underaged girls booze.

The other cop was square-jawed and fit. Eddie Chacõn pointed to him and hissed.

"J. T. Meadows. In my informed opinion, a maricón. In my view, all handsome men are suspect."

I yocked. "What about me? I'm handsome as shit."

"You are ugly as shit, pendejo. However, on occasion ugly men supersede handsomeness. As proof of this, I point to the fact that Vice President Johnson gets more ass than Señor Jack."

I re-yocked. Leffler and Meadows dumped my transceiver and headphone sets in their trunk. The Fed follow cars peeled out, northwest. My guess: a run to the bluffside post. It's one big evidence stash.

Eddie Chacõn hung a U-turn. Leffler and Meadows piled in their car and pulled up behind us. I craned my neck and scoped Phil and Nat. They looked glum. I knew why. They saw this deal as indictment/trial/conviction.

The deal was half shuck. They didn't know that the LAPD would extend their employment. The raids were a crack-the-whip ploy. Ratfuck Bobby and Bill Parker colluded. They wanted us cowed.

We cut north to Sunset and west to PCH. Chacõn tapped his red lights and siren. Next stop: the Sip 'n' Surf lounge.

Eddie played it bravura. He sluiced through oncoming traffic and brodied all the way up on the pier. Salt-racked boards creaked and partially snapped. Leffler and Meadows fishtailed up behind us. Bait-shop crews and surfer riffraff goggle-eyed the scene.

Eddie got out and brandished a pump shotgun. Ditto, Leffler and Meadows. They hit the Sip 'n' Surf at port arms. The joint evacuated. Barflies, kitchen help, bikini girls. It was one big exit sprint.

I heard door-crash noise inside. I heard kicked-over chairs and consoles and phone mounts ripped out of walls. I heard file cabinets dumped and high-line bug gear slammed into boxes. Chacõn and Meadows ran out with their arms full.

They filled their trunks. They got back in their cars and spun U-turns. They gained, lost, and gained tread. Cracked boards sheared and dropped in the surf.

We made PCH southbound. Pier geeks shot us fuck-you fingers. I trembled. I knew our next stop.

I shut my eyes and prayed it off. Eddie zoomed there. He pulled right and grazed the beachside embankment. He cut the ignition. I opened my eyes.

The two paddy Feds dumped bug mounts on the north footpath. Peter Lawford examined a yanked-out telephone. Pat stood close by. My window was rolled up. She stared straight at me.

I stared straight at her. She walked over and spit on the window. She did it a dozen or two dozen times. She spit-covered the whole window glass. Nobody backed down. We held dead-on stares.

(LOS ANGELES, 8/7–8/13/62)

Monroe Job #2. I eased into it.

The Feds whomped me good. A doc at Georgia Street fixed me up and shot me some righteous pain dope. Ratdog Bobby made nice-nice. He sent a crew out to refit my kicked-down door and trashed floorboards. Jurgensen's Market dropped off a bottle of Dom Perignon. Bobby included a note: "Freddy—all the best." He signed it "RFK."

I called Jimmy Hoffa and shoveled up a snow job. Boss, I'm sorry. The LAPD lab turned up my prints at the Monroe post. They leaned on my guys and took it from there. Hoffa seemed to buy it. He took the pricey blown op nonchalant. He said he'd pay out the pledged bonus bread.

I mollified Jimmy. I expressed confidence. The Feds and LAPD won't jump you for suborning the op. Jimmy said, "Fuck them if they do. I've already burned the tapes, logs, and all your paperwork."

He's paying out unearned wages. He's dispensing unearned bonus bread. He destroyed essential evidence for no good reason. He's got to have a money motive. I thought so at the gate.

I've penciled in a week's transition. I drive by the Monroe pad twice a day. Nutty fans congregate. They bring guitars and throw hootenannies. They revise old labor ditties and blame Monroe's death on "The Man." Candlelight vigils extend to 2:00 a.m. High-school kids plug phonographs into car dashboard lighters and play swami music. I've seen Lowell Farr three times.

My Monroe World is high-stakes extortion. The world's Monroe World is disingenuous schmaltz. Gene Kelly was "deeply shocked." He "just didn't understand it." Anita Ekberg was "shocked, and so sad." Yeah—but Marilyn told Lowell Farr that you gave the prez the clap and he passed it on to Jackie. Liz Taylor was "very sad, and deeply shocked." Yeah—and Marilyn and Roddy McDowall ragged on your fat ass on a near-daily basis.

The Fourth Estate weighed in. The New York Times, the L.A. Times, Klansman magazine, L'Osservatore Roma. They blamed Marilyn's childhood privation, the film biz, her orphanage stint, Father Coughlin's Rosary Crusade, and the Learned Elders of Zion. Local disk jockeys played "Image of a Girl" twenty thousand times a day. Noted clerics inveighed. Marilyn exemplified "America's permissive new malaise." Jive genius Dizzy Gillespie told an unknown police source, "That's too bad. She was a fine muthafuckah." Local newshounds played up the death of almost-star Carole Landis. She was another "busty bombshell." Curvy Carole "pounded pills and sadly succumbed to suicide." Yeah—and I found a Landis morgue pic in Monroe's pad.

Coroner Curphey called me. He laid out the autopsy call: barbiturate OD or suicide. It was strictly routine. Monroe was a long-term dope fiend. Here's two non sequitur tweaks:

Tweak #1: minute puncture marks on Monroe's left earlobe. Traces of liquid collagen pooled at the spot. Curphey said, "It might have bloated her face somewhat. Maybe it was for a role she was playing."

My first thought:

José Bolaños calls Marilyn. They discuss her Mexican travels. She rolls "incognito." She might be "moving freight." Marilyn tells Deedee Grenier that she hits Mexico in disguise. She's done up as a migrant farmworker. Collagen injections? Deliberate facial bloating? I'll buy that.

Tweak #2: a healed and faded human bite mark. It's "some years old." It's smack on Monroe's left bicep. Curphey said, "It looks like a sicko sex wound."

My first thought:

The fuckee-suckee pix I saw on my 8/4 break-in. They were '58 or '59 vintage. Marilyn and a cruel-looking stud enact the Kama Sutra. I saw no such bite mark or bite mark scarring. Curphey's noted bite mark was most likely late '59 or early '60 vintage.

Crazy Marilyn. Collagen injections. Bite marks. Her forty-grand stash. Her plus-size threads. Her nutty pay-phone calls.

It's one big cluster fuck. She OD'd or pulled the plug. I attended the funeral. It was a sanctified cluster fuck. LAPD Intel shot surveillance film. Thirty-five friends and Dust Bowl–esque "family" showed up. Eight hundred fans mobbed Wilshire and Westwood Boulevards. Lowell Farr stood among them. She pitched muted boo-hoo by teenage-girl standards.

Monroe's ex–acting coach eulogized her in the Herald. Natasha Lytess was tight with Monroe, '49 to '56. Miss Lytess nailed a noxious gestalt.

"She projected a shopworn enchantment. It entrapped only those susceptible and most willing to succumb. She wore most people out in the end."

Amen, sister. You've got the last word so far.

Daryl Gates called me. It was noon on 8/10. He relayed urgent bad news.

Ratfuck Bobby filed a superseding-evidence writ. He filed it with a Ninth Circuit Court judge. The judge signed the writ. Four Justice Department investigators served the warrant and enacted the provisions. It went down at 10:00 last night.

They seized the LAPD's cache of all my tapes, transcript logs, and mimeographed reports to Jimmy Hoffa. They seized LAPD's copies of my corkboard evidence, bootjacked by the Feds on 8/6. I now have no access to the photographic evidence I compiled during my 4/11 and 8/4 break-ins.

Ratfuck Bobby orchestrated a two-prong attack. His goons kicked down my door and tossed my pad-office. His goons usurped the LAPD's copied, logged, and filed evidence. I would have utilized said evidence in my new gig for Bill Parker. The grab resoundingly states that Robert F. Kennedy does not trust Bill Parker, Daryl Gates, and Big Freddy O. It suggests that Kennedy may take the evidence to a Federal grand jury and seek suborning and criminal-conspiracy indictments against Jimmy Hoffa, me, and my men. Said indictments would render me a bit player in the Hoffa/Kennedy war. They would most likely net me big Federal time.

I brooded it up to a fucking fare-thee-well. I plotted remedies, countermeasures, solutions. It came down to replication.

Nat, Phil, and I could confer and replicate the pertinent tap calls. Only I could replicate what I saw and imprinted on 4/11 and 8/4. Hans Maslick inspired me. Maslick developed the techniques of photographic memorization that I employ today. He was a Berlin homicide cop, part-time Brownshirt, and full-time dope fiend. He worked overlapping murder jobs and lost his synaptic grip on priority cases in the overall glut of his *werk*load. My 4/11 and 8/4 prowls served up Marilyn Monroe. I sensed it then and know it now. My snapshots provide a verifiable record of my first impressions. I'm sober now. I was zorched to the gills on 4/11 and 8/4. I need to replicate the enhanced acuity of B and E under the influence. I need to replicate the sex thrill of a strange woman's dwelling. I need to merge recollection and imagination and yoke them to my eideteker's mental discipline and voyeur's need to know.

I got out a notebook and pen. I cooked up a batch of jungle juice and took three good jolts. I took two more jolts. I got my first replicative buzz. I smelled the wet towels in Monroe's bathroom.

Mental pictures enhanced the smell. I relived camera clicks and flashbulb glare. It's all transposition—recalled sights become words on paper.

Monroe's bathroom and living room. Evidence Pix #1 to 7: pill vials, hashish cubes, bathtub grime.

Into the bedroom. I smell her. Stale sweat/presumptive sexual exertion. Pic #8: soiled bedsheets. Pix #9 and 10: the lockbox and the forty grand spread out on the bed. Pix #11 to 23: Monroe's crazy handwritten lists.

I smelled the paper. I replicated shutter clicks and bulb glare. Pharmacy lists/dope-refill lists/"nice Drs." lists. Replication, immersion, transposition—I got all the names and dates right. Not so fast—there's the random-lover list and dick-size drawings. Shit—I can't recall the men's names.

Replication, immersion, transposition. Separate Sheet of Paper Pic #1: "Rick Dawes. Mean—maybe a fag." Illegibly crossed-out names of phone-answering outfits. Separate Sheet of Paper Pic #2: the main number for the L.A. County Sheriff's Office.

Camera glitch/aphasic lesion/fuckup. I know I shot a list of first-name-only men. They were tagged "studio grip," "makeup man," "studio flack." Then was then, now is now. I can't recall their names or any listed phone numbers.

Replication, transposition. Scrawled Bookmark Pic #1: "Jack at White House," plus switchboard number. "Bobby at Justice," plus switchboard number.

A headache tapped in. I saw flashbulb glare and caught break-in blips out of sequence.

The pillowcase stuffed with coins.

The closet stuffed with big-girl threads.

Monroe's quote in Paul de River's book:

"When all other forms of applied therapy have failed, it may be possible to contravene absent, passive, and self-destructively reactive behavior with the imposition of direct criminal action."

The headache abated. I saw Monroe dead. I didn't conjure her. She just appeared. I jumped to 8/4/62, unbidden. I felt the hot air of nine nights ago.

I saw the print-wiped clock radio. I saw the footprints on deep-pile carpet. I saw the left-behind bug mounts. I saw Monroe's head on the pillow. I touched her leg. It was still warm. I slid my hand up and pulled it back. I lost track of what was then, what was now, what I wish I'd done then.

I took two more jolts. The juice electrified me. Replication, transposition. I'm back in sync.

Underwear Drawer Pic #1: Marilyn's underwear. Underwear Drawer Pic #2: morgue photo of Carole Landis. Underwear Drawer Pic #3: note composed in cutout/glued-on magazine letters.

"I loved her before I loved you. She was nicer. You're more desperate and pretentious. I had to learn to love you. She made it easy."

Underwear Drawer Pix #4 to 11: pornographic snapshots.

Who's the cruel-looking stud? He looks familiar.

It's '58 or '59. There's no bite mark on Monroe's left bicep.

Note the crusted semen. I scraped a sample off and froze it. It's in my icebox. The Fed goons never checked. Talk to Daryl Gates. He'll order lab comparison tests.

Replication, transcription. I retrieved and described eleven pages of Polaroid snapshots. It stands as 85% recall.

She was dead. I felt her and smelled her all over me.

—

The foot.

Max Herman says, "Sink him, Freddy."

The foot.

Daryl Gates said something about a foot.

I yawned myself awake. It was full daylight. I crapped out on the couch. Notebook pages covered the floor.

I gathered them up. I recalled the retrieval. That's right—eleven full pages. That mug on the floor—it's cold coffee.

I was out for fourteen hours. The jungle juice revved me up high and laid me out flat.

I weaved to the can and took a leak. The foot dream resurrected. Gates said a motor cop found Richie Danforth's left foot. It was three miles north of the dump site. Vultures ate the meat and Richie's left sock.

I weaved back to the couch and scrawled a task list:

1)

—Take frozen jizz to lab.

2)

—Find missing report on blown MM tail job to the Valley.

2-A)

—Why did Valley locale look familiar? (It's a recent memory, I'm sure.)

2-B)

—Per tail job itself: I compiled list of 143 parked-car plate #s, on adjoining blocks. MM rendezvous? With whom? Locale non sequitur for MM. List now missing/DMV list missing/Do Justice cops have my list?

3)

—Per Separate Piece of Paper Pic #1: "Rick Dawes. Mean—maybe a fag." Work off subsequent tap call: "Eleanora" to Peter Lawford. "Eleanora" pumps Lawford for info on cater waiter "Rick Dawes," possible Beverly Hills 459 suspect. Contact BHPD per Dawes. Continue canvass of (200-odd) cater biz's & (131) phone-answering services.

4)

—Check with U.S. Customs. Did MM fly to Mexico, 2/62, in disguise as migrant worker?

4-A)

—Run paper on José Bolaños: Local PD's, state & fed HUAC (Bolaños is Commie). Also check LAPD & LASO Narco.

I walked out to the porch and snagged the Mirror. Monroe hoo-haw smeared the front page. She was a vixen, a sexpot, a bombshell and beyond. She was a tigress, a coiled serpent, an enchantress, a rebuker of the stodgy and unhip. Again, Natasha Lytess logs the last word:

"The world had yet to become exhausted with her. She was taxing the world's patience, however."

I went back inside and skimmed the paper. I hit "Kidnap of Starlet"/"Sheriff's Detectives Bemoan Dearth of Clues." I speed-skimmed the lead paragraph. It was the Mirror's standard crime blah-blah.

Sergeant Michael J. Bayless/blah-blah/three suspects at large/two suspects now regretfully dead.

That set me back. Two dead? Richie Danforth and who else?

I flipped six pages forward. There's the lead: "Kidnap Suspect a Suicide/Grisly Death at Highland Park Station."

I speed-skimmed the gist:

August 4 kidnap/starlet Gwen Perloff/suspect Hershel "Buzzy" Stein—suicide in his cell/suspect Richard Danforth—killed by Hat Squad stalwarts and celeb PI Freddy Otash, specially deputized by—

I heard door knocks. I tossed the Mirror and opened the door.

Pat came at me. She hit my face, gouged my neck, kicked me, and kneed me in the groin. I grabbed her wrists. She sobbed. She pushed me half off my feet. I looked past her and tried to hold her still.

A Fed sled was parked at the curb. Eddie Chacõn leaned against it. Who's that beady-eyed putz in the backseat? It's Ratfuck Bobby the K.

21

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 A.M., TUESDAY, 8/14/62)

I bopped through the DA's Bureau squadroom. Twenty-four cops worked at partner desks. I wore a drip-dry summer suit and starched white shirt. My Marine Corps service pin echoed the Big War. I packed a belt piece and a beavertail sap. I felt ring-a-ding good.

The cops checked me out. Shitbird Freddy's back. He walks among us, he's one of us, he outranks us all.

Such pissy outrage.

Miller Leavy's office adjoined the squadroom. He prosecuted high-ticket homicides and put sex slashers and cop killers in the Green Room. He burned Caryl Chessman and the Santo/Perkins/Barbara Graham mob. He built his Airedale a mock-gas-chamber doghouse.

His door stood open. I breezed in like King Shit. I dragged a slat-back chair up to his desk and perched.

He saw me. I dangled my arms off the chair back. He said, "I was opposed to the idea of a ceremony. I would have handed you your credentials in a back alley somewhere, but the DA and Bill Parker overrode me. Don't extend your hand to me. I won't shake it."

I lit a cigarette and grabbed an ashtray off the desk. Mr. Green Room flinched.

"How's the count, Mr. Leavy? You've burned eleven, haven't you? By the way, you owe me for Fred Stroebel. I traced the little girl's underwear back to his garage, and I kicked the shit out of him at the Wilshire DB."

Leavy smirked. He was short. Three seat cushions scooched him up to eye level.

"I can hardly blame you and the Hats for dumping Richard Danforth, and Buzzy Stein's suicide is between him and God. The three actual kidnappers remain at large, though. I would appreciate it if you would attempt to identify and apprehend them."

Nuisance. Minor irritant. The kidnap deal low-simmered. Only putzo legal types cared.

"I'll poke around, if I get the chance. Kidnap's a gas-chamber bounce. You could make hay there."

Leavy beamed. Daryl Gates and Mayor Sam Yorty walked in. Gates was Bill Parker's hand-picked successor. He watchdogged Mayor Sam for the Chief. Mayor Sam ran fascist-police-force riffs during the '61 campaign. Ad Vice cops set him up with two call girls and shot peephole film. Mayor Sam got apostatized. He recanted his fasco spiel and embraced the Chief. They booze at Ollie Hammond's most Tuesday nights.

I stood up. Miller Leavy stood up. We huddled by Leavy's desk and dispensed backslaps and Freddy's-the-Man pap. Gates tossed me my badge and credential folder. Mayor Sam told me to raise my right hand.

I complied. Mayor Sam invoked a jive oath of service. I whooped. I'm back on the fuzz, citizens. It's a license to steal and a ticket to ride.

Mayor Sam produced a flask. He took two pops. I took two pops. Gates and Leavy declined. The boys checked a wall clock. Macht schnell—let's move this along.

Mayor Sam said, "Governor Brown told me a good one. A lion is fucking a zebra. The zebra looks over his shoulder and says, 'Oh shit, baby! I see my husband! Quick—pretend that you're killing me!' "

Gates and I laughed on cue. Leavy said, "I don't get it." Mayor Sam scoped the wedding-stone cut on my cheek.

I said, "A woman who used to love me. I was overmatched."

We walked to the PAB. Gates reserved me a wall cubicle at Intel. I could work there, nest there, make phone calls. His secretary would shag my message slips.

The division fielded forty-eight detectives. They deployed in round-the-clock shifts. Intel was down from Robbery and Bunco. It ate up twice the floor space. Forty-eight partner desks—that's de rigueur. Ditto the wall offices and conference rooms. Equipment rooms goosed the extra space.

They stored movie cameras/still cameras/strobe lights/electric power packs/bug-and-tap mikes/installation tools/refrigerated film-can vaults/partitioned-off darkrooms and extensive film and tape libraries. Plus boom mikes, radio transceivers, and detachable prowl-car two-ways with individual-frequency reception. A wallboard held keys for fifty-six surveillance rides. A photo room was plastered with racy pix from a current political entrapment.

Identify, scrutinize, surveil. That's Intel's ethos. Eyeball and collect data on:

Commies/Commie front groups/left-leaning dimwits/rowdy civil rights groups/jerkoff right-wing groups/politicians and Third World potentates out to get bombed and get laid. Plus film-biz stupes known to fraternize with the above. Plus anybody who fucked with Chief William H. Parker and the LAPD.

We talked in Gates' office. I tossed him a changeup straight off.

"Early a.m. Sunday, the fifth. Phil Irwin and I have Monroe's house staked. The housekeeper calls Doc Greenson, who calls Doc Engleberg. They call the West L.A. desk. A patrol sergeant responds. His name's Jack Clemmons. He's a tall blond guy, about thirty-eight. An informant told me he's a right-wing nut. He's in the White Dog Bund, whatever that is. He's tight with an ex-PD motor cop named Norm Krause. This dink owns a juice joint out in the Valley, and he allegedly extorted the then state comptroller, Tom Kuchel, for public fellatio, back in '49. He's in the Bund, too. Does any of this ring any bells?"

Gates said, "None. I don't know or know of Clemmons and Krause, the Kuchel deal, or the Dog Bund. Who cares? It's got nothing to do with our Monroe business at hand."

I lit a cigarette. Gates slid his desk ashtray over and hit the AC switch.

"First, the Chief and I know you'll dissemble and omit—but don't overdo it. Second, let me restate the parameters. Our deal with Bob Kennedy entails the demonizing of Marilyn Monroe, to discredit her if talk of her alleged romantic attachment to the Kennedys surfaces to the world at large. Our side deal entails that you develop a concurrent derogatory profile on John and Robert Kennedy, to utilize if Bob renegs on his pledge to shoot the Chief the FBI job. And, of course, facilitate my ascent to Chief."

I grinned. "I understand. And, parenthetically, an informant told me that old man Hoover wants Pete Pitchess to get the job if the Kennedys can him. Pete's a lawyer, and he's ex-FBI. Maybe SHIT has some ops going to juke Pete's shot at the job."

Gates shrugged. "It's possible."

I said, "Okay, Justice sandbagged us. They've got all the copies of all my evidence from the Hoffa gig, which leaves us holding our dicks. Do you think that little hump Bobby will convene a grand jury and deploy the evidence against Hoffa, which would sure as shit bring collateral indictments down on me and my boys?"

Gates said, "It's possible. We should also consider the fact that you killed a man while on temporary assignment from the Chief, and that you've been publically identified in the press."

"It's a 'put-up job,' Daryl. Danforth was saying that as he waltzed off the cliff."

Gates squared his necktie and shot his cuffs. He was fastidious. He wore a gold-coin wristwatch.

" 'Put-up job' wouldn't surprise me. Buzzy Stein drinking lye in our custody troubles me, though. A jailer at Highland Park told me he was terrified of something or somebody. He refused to talk to our guys, after he witnessed the dump job and revealed Gwen Perloff's location. Why mince words? This bullshit caper—whatever it is—could bite us on the ass six million ways."

I crushed my cigarette. "Did the Sheriff's come by Highland Park and brace Stein? Mike Bayless is the lead IO. He's working it for the West Hollywood squad."

Gates said, "Oddly, they did not drop by. Not so oddly, you see where all this is heading. The Chief and I would like you to look into the kidnap deal, and stand ready to squelch any anti-PD rumors that might arise."

I said, "I'm on it."

Gates smiled. "You're susceptible to guilt, Freddy. It's one of your more humanizing aspects. Do you feel bad about Danforth?"

I flinched. "I need to brace Paul de River. Monroe was fixated on him. She annotated a copy of one of his books. She told Greenson she was in the market for a 'more radical' shrink."

Gates yawned. "Brace him. Stay aware of the fact that he hates us. Bill Parker sacked him, and he's never gotten over it. He'll rat us to the L.A. Times in a heartbeat."

I nodded. The office went hot to cold. Gates futzed with a jade paperweight.

"Talk to your man Nat Denkins. Have him put out some counterintel on his radio show. All rumors about Monroe and powerful politicians are bunk. I'm offering two concessions here. I'll allow the weekly crap game in the KKXZ basement to continue, and I'll cut his brother Kareem loose. We've got him for CCW in that Muslim snafu, and I'll get the charge dropped."

I stood up. Gates stood up. He fidgeted and quashed the urge to primp.

"One last thing. We've been informed that Morty Bendish at the Mirror has a tattle piece on Monroe and the Kennedys in the works.

Put the squelch to it. Morty’s peddling beaver pix of Monroe in the morgue. You might squelch that, as well.”

22

(LOS ANGELES, 6:00 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 8/15/62)

The Herald morgue. L.A. in mid-August. Four rooms crammed with chairs and file shelves.

News clips glued to cardboard sheets. Big boxes crammed full. News clips culled worldwide. Monroe kicked eleven days back. Her clip glut totaled seven thousand–plus obits and puff pieces.

I was fourteen hours in. I locked the outside hallway door and worked in my skivvies. I aimed a porta fan at my balls and stirred up a breeze. I scanned clip-to-clip. I trolled for tidbits on Monroe and the K boys. I got Jack's New York birthday bash and no derogatory dish or inuendo. Moldy newspaper induced sneeze attacks. It was shitwork, par excellence.

I was seven clip boxes in. I had one box to go. Beside my chair: one thin-ass L.A. Mirror file.

The Gwen Perloff kidnap job. So what? The crime-king Mirror gave it short shrift.

I saved the file for kicks and grins. It goosed me to speed-read the Monroe shit. The clips played soporific.

Jean-Paul Sartre said, "Marilyn was devoured by the psychic nothingness of American values." This sentiment pervaded the Euro press. The U.S. dailies and news glossies spritzed celeb kudos and kvetchy grief. On to the UCLA Daily Bruin, the USC Daily Trojan, the Cal Berkeley Golden Bear. More kudos and kvetch from a college-kid perspective. The New York Times, New York Herald Tribune, New York Journal-American. "What killed Marilyn?" Hollywood and the too-cruel world—J'accuse!!! Here's a mitigating laugh. Trumpet boss Miles Davis tells a DownBeat scribe: "She was déclassé, baby. I always thought of her as Dorothy Dandridge for the poor."

The clip cutters went all out. They glommed clips from the daily rags of L.A. high schools in summer session. Lowell Farr wrote "Bop Requiem for Marilyn" in the Palisades High Daily Dolphin. Dig the text:

We lost sacred Bix and Bird back in paleolithic times;
Now Marilyn splits this jive earth and rings our mourning chimes;
She follows cool Carole Landis to the Pill Parthenon;
The sick and the sentient wonder where she went wrong.

Lowell published her dirge in the 8/9 Dolphin. Fan letters followed. The “Bop Requiem” drew some critical flak. “Big Bob” Berglund slammed it in the 8/12 Dolphin. “Lowell Farr’s Monroe poem was a pretentious shuck. Let’s admit it, Lowell is a pseud.”

Lowell fires back on 8/14. “Big (Ha!) Bob Berglund is a nosebleed, a nimrod, a ho-daddy and a pseudosurfer. He’s not a natural blond. He bleaches his hair, and he’s never been to the beach. Let’s admit that. Moreover, the Dolphin intelligentsia scoffs at him.”

I cogitated. Lowell’s dirge buzzed me past the laugh stage. As in the Carole Landis reference.

There’s the Landis morgue pic. There’s the crazy note, beside it. “I loved her before I loved you.” The note was spelled out in excised/glued-on magazine letters. It’s a classic sex-fiend missive.

I found a letter scrap and a glue daub on my living room floor. They were right below my pictorial corkboard. The Fed raid missed them. The LAPD crime lab keeps a cut-letter exemplar set. I ran my letter scrap through it, yesterday. I studied glue-sample charts/paper-stock notations/named-magazine lists. I got no matches and no evidential tweaks.

Lowell Farr tweaked me. Monroe spilled Jack-and-Bobby dish to her. On at least two dozen tap calls. I don’t want Lowell to regurgitate it. She’s seventeen. I’ll need mom and dad’s consent to debrief her. Miller Leavy can set it up.

I quick-skimmed the last Monroe box and lit a cigarette. I replayed a long skull session with Phil Irwin. We crashed in my new Intel office. We brainstormed and re-created a tally of Lawford and Monroe house tap calls. The total hit 281—to, from, and between. The preponderant tap topic was the grave vibe at 20th Century–Fox.

Giant lox Cleopatra. Fox veers toward bankruptcy. Celebrity sex skank in Roma. Roddy McDowall’s pornographic Cleo spoof. Fox execs and rank and filers hatching money schemes. They’re fail-safes should Cleo tank the studio. There’s endemic frayed nerves and bad behavior on the lot.

Monroe’s antics tanked Got to Give. Monroe worked for Fox. Ditto, Gwen Perloff. Fox deserved a look-see. An unknown caller tipped Darryl Zanuck to the kidnap play. Zanuck tipped LAPD. Hence “Sink him, Freddy" and big potential grief.

I skimmed the Perloff file. It was threadbare local news. Perloff, thirty-six, is an "aging starlet." The three snatch men wore Fidel Castro masks. Short sleeves reveal two white males and one Latin-type male. The snatch car descriptions vary. '57 Imperial, Chevy Nomad, '51 Ford coupe. Vehicle checks go pffft. The Sheriff's triple-canvass Miller Drive and the cross streets above the Strip. It goes pffft. Perloff has a boss crib in a boss modern building. She's jumped outside. Switchboard glitches stall the eyewit calls to West Hollywood station. The patrol desk sounds a belated alarm. The LAPD's "famous" Hat Squad and "celeb" PI Freddy O. are tipped to the hideout pad of suspects Stein and Danforth. The Hats plus Freddy O. bust them. Danforth is killed during a "pitched battle" with Max Herman, Red Stromwall, and Freddy O. Stein reveals the San Fernando Valley location where Perloff is currently stashed. Sheriff's Sergeant Michael J. Bayless leads a daring rescue raid. The stash pad was rented by a "heavyset" older woman. She paid cash in advance and employed an obvious alias. Sergeant Bayless called the case "one big baffler."

Two sidebar columns laid out Gwen Perloff. She's an L.A. native and "plucky hard-luck girl." She lost her parents in a car wreck and grew up in foster homes and an orphan facility. Her eight-year-old sister, Mitzi, disappeared off a Hollywood street on 2/17/37. Gwen was not quite eleven then. The riddle of her vanishing and probable death has remained unexplained.

Gwen studied at the Pasadena Playhouse and worked as a runway model for Jantzen swimwear. She secured Universal and Fox contracts. She appears in dance-craze flicks and horror movies. She was notable in Universal's The Tattered Dress and Fox's Sons and Lovers. Columnist Hy Gardner said, "Yum-yum—she's the American Anna Magnani, minus all those pasta pounds." Now, Miss Perloff essays strictly B-film roles. She plays the "sexy older woman" in dance-craze and monster flicks geared for a teenage market.

A Mirror clip featured a swimsuit ad. It's 6/18/54. There's La Gwen in a floral-print bikini. She's ever the schoolmarm knockout. She's sporting her trademark tortoiseshell specs.

I went home and showered off the morgue. I put on a drip-dry blazer and poplin slacks. It was a ranking cop's ensemble. Let's flash the new credential and see who scoffs and who quakes.

West Hollywood station was close by. I waltzed through. The squad boss told me Motel Mike just rotated back to SHIT. I asked to see the Perloff file. The squad boss nixed it. My DA's buzzer hit him nonplussed.

Squadroom cops fish-eyed me. A kid deputy was working a tip-line phone on the job. I scoped his call-log sheet. The tipsters were logged as "bored anonymous women." That's your standard L.A. kidnap drill.

Beverly Hills station was close by. I waltzed through. I braced the squad boss per the 459 series with cater waiter suspects. I stressed "Rick Dawes" and "Eleanora's" tap call to Peter Lawford. The squad boss addressed me as "Lieutenant" and dropped the gate.

I will not share information. You cannot see the file. You may not interview the IO's. Submit a formal DA's Office request.

I broomed back downtown. I adjusted my rearview mirror and admired the wedding-stone scar on my face.

Pat landed flush. I stepped into the punch. She roughhoused with her candy-ass brothers and knew how to grapple a bit. She was the tall and strong sister. Drawn and gaunt worked for her. I knew I'd never see her again. Not with this new gig, not on Ratfuck Bobby's dime.

I conjured up Lois. She'd be thirty-five tomorrow. I'd send her red roses and mark the card "I Remember You." We met in '55. Lois was a telephone trickster. She met her husband that way. He had a radio call-in show in New York. Lois dug him and kept calling him. That's how she met me. She called Nasty Nat's Soul Patrol and dropped my name. That's how I met Nat. I shook down a film-biz geek, fall '57. It force-fed me the blues and the guilts. I bought KKXZ and tossed Nat the deed. You get what you pay for. Nat got a radio station. I got sporadic stints with Lois Nettleton.

The day went hot and smog-choked. The 101 was backed up to Normandie. I took surface streets downtown. The Hall of Justice lot was swamped. I boxed in two steno-pool cars and stuck an OFFICIAL VEHICLE ON CALL card under my wiper blades. The Sheriff's DB was up on Floor #12.

I elevatored up. SHIT was wedged between Homicide and Auto Theft. The squadroom was half the size of LAPD Intel. The equipment rooms were laid out identical. Deputies got partner desks. Sergeants got wall cubicles. Lieutenants and up got offices. The wall pix lionized Pete Pitchess.

Sheriff Pete with Duke Wayne, Kirk Douglas, Joan Fontaine. Sheriff Pete with Miss America finalists. Sheriff Pete outside the Green Room. Thrill killer Stephen Nash sucks gas.

Mike Bayless had a neat corner cubicle. His view featured Lincoln Heights and smog. He sat at his desk and flipped paper clips. He wore a mid-gray suit. Sheriff Pete espoused the Fed automaton look.

I grabbed his desk chair. Motel Mike flipped a paper clip in my lap. I flashed my credential. Motel Mike lip-synched Eat me.

"Woo-woo. Mr. Shakedown's working for the DA, and I'm guessing he's a bird dog for Bill Parker, who's got justified concerns that Mr. Shakedown and the Hats dusted one of my kidnap suspects, and now my case is dead stalled. Does that sound accurate to you?"

I made the jack-off sign. "Woo-woo. Motel Mike toasts four beaners back in the ice age, and it goes to his head. Motel Mike's so far up Pete Pitchess' ass that he buys his suits at Oviatt's, clothier to Gerald L. K. Smith and Gay Edgar Hoover."

Motel Mike sighed. "Tell me what you want."

I said, "A two-minute Perloff case summary and access to the file."

"Yes to the summary, no to the file. Here's your overview. The case is dead stalled. Gwen Perloff was banging Darryl F. Zanuck. Mr. Mogul got a tip call from a woman, who gave up Richie Danforth and Buzzy Stein and spilled where to find them. Then Zanuck called in Bill Parker, because the LAPD has got more marquee value than my department. Enter Mr. Shakedown and the overzealous Hat Squad. Now, Danforth and Stein are dead, and Parker and Daryl Gates have sent you out to see what I've got, because Parker and the PD took it in the shorts on that Black Muslim deal, and you're out to squelch potential bad press on Danforth, vis-à-vis that dive he took."

I whistled and clapped. Motel Mike bowed. I went Don't stop now. Motel Mike complied.

"We've worked this job into the ground. We triple-canvassed a half-mile radius and hit the not-at-homes twice. There was not one credible description of the snatch car, so we couldn't run vehicle checks. We ran full forensics on both stash-pad locations and got nothing. Our informant queries turned up zero. Our tip line, likewise. Richie Danforth's a cipher. He's got no extant print cards within the Continental U.S.—state, Federal, or U.S. Armed Forces. He's got no state crime bureau record extant—and that's for all fifty states. Your dump job scotched our shot to roll his prints. Truck tires pulped his hands and feet. We're eleven days in, and we've got nothing worth a shit to work off."

I lit a cigarette. "Give me Perloff's account."

"What's to give? She was chloroformed, blindfolded, and gagged. She came to in the closet of that Tiki-Torch dive. The snatch guys hooked a hose from the air-conditioner inside the closet, so she could breathe and stay cool. They fed her water and two hamburgers. They walked her to the can, twice, and there was no pervy stuff. She did not recognize their voices. You see what I'm up against—"

I cut in. "I watched you waltz her outside. She didn't look like a kidnap victim dumped in a closet."

Motel Mike flipped paper clips. "I gave her ten minutes to get herself together. She's an actress. She's got that 'show must go on' mentality."

I said, "Known associates. Criminal types at Fox. Lovers, ex-boyfriends, powerful guys she's shtupping, besides old man Zanuck. Shithead film-biz guys who know guys who know guys. You see where I'm going here."

Motel Mike lit a cigarette. "The Sheriff would like to see this job vaporize. He's kowtowing to old man Zanuck on this. You know Del Kinney, right? He's the Fox security chief, and he used to be on the Sheriff's and the ABC."

Kinney. Monroe Gig #1. The full Otash crew roams the Fox lot in plain view. Kinney might have known or suspected.

"Yeah, I know Kinney."

"Well, old man Zanuck told him to keep cops away from Gwen. He's got the Sheriff's backing in that regard. This means my investigation is hamstrung. Zanuck's got X number of young talent on his string at all times, and he's determined to keep them all anonymous."

I crushed my cigarette. "Parker and Gates want me to shake some doors on this deal. Regardless of what the Sheriff and Darryl Zanuck want."

"So, do it. Watch out for Del Kinney, though. He goes way back with Gwen Perloff. It's a big brother–kid sister thing they've got going. It's powerful, and when you see them together you can sense it."

I said, "What are you telling me?"

"I'm telling you that Gwen's kid sister got abducted and sure as shit snuffed. It was up in Hollywood, maybe '37 or '38. Mitzi was eight, and Gwen was something like eleven. Kinney ran the Sheriff's mounted posse part of the job. They were digging up dead kids in Griffith Park, but they never found Mitzi's remains."

I crossed myself. Motel Mike crossed himself. He flipped paper clips at me. I tossed a changeup.

"Does SHIT have surveillance film on Marilyn Monroe?"

Motel Mike shrugged. "We have some. She was a pinko and a ban-the-bomber, so she mandated our attention. Why do you care? LAPD has ten times the footage, so ask Daryl Gates for a peek. LAPD's the font of show-biz dirt in this town, not the Sheriff's."

I stood up. "It was good seeing you, Mike."

"Mr. Shakedown. Destined for the Shit Magnet Hall of Fame."

—

Motel Mike's spiel percolated. He worked the case pro forma. Studio politics intervened. He was borderline credible—with one red flag up.

Richie Danforth cartwheels. He shrieks "It's a put-up job" as he spins.

I drove north on PCH. I decided to recanvass the Lawford house and Monroe house turf. Nat and Phil would launch a full-on canvass within forty-eight hours. Daryl Gates was working up bogus credentials. Nat would be Customs, Phil would be Treasury. They'd concoct cover stories. They'd press for Monroe/K boys dirt. They'd be out to disprove and defame, simultaneous.

My credentials were legitimate. I devised a Big-"H"-hits-the-beach cover and walked a beat north of the Lawford spread. Pat and Peter's neighbors were show-biz and real-estate stiffs. I deployed scare tactics and stressed the proximity of our squeaky-clean prez and AG. The neighbors knew that Jack and Bobby partied at the Lawford digs. I dropped Monroe in, oblique. Oh, yes—they'd seen Marilyn at cocktail dos. So tragic—and to die so terribly young!

Yawn, snore, the Secobarbital Express. One geez said the Lawfords threw "degenerate-type parties." His wife said, "You're just chagrined that they didn't invite you."

Yawn. Snore. Nobody tattled sex shit. I fed them cues. Nobody did a big double take and spooned out the dish. I shagged my sled and cut east to Brentwood.

8:00 p.m. traffic snagged and crawled. I passed Pali High. I thought of Lowell Farr. I passed the Bay Theater. Now playing: The Notorious Landlady and The Devil at Four O'Clock. I thought of Lowell's anonymous make-out dates. "It's a nice kid's version of going to a motel."

Traffic unsnared at Mandeville Canyon. I made good time to Fifth Helena Drive. I caught a beach party five miles inland.

A dozen kids sunned themselves on Monroe's front lawn. A boy cooked hot dogs on a hibachi. Kids twisted and danced the wah watusi. Transistor radios wafted "Marilyn's Song," "Image of a Girl."

Teen queens preened in Marilyn drag.

I parked across the street. I recanvassed Fourth Helena and Falkirk Lane. I laid out my pitch and logged deadpan looks—Huh? and What? predominant.

A pissy guy said Robert F. Kennedy was Monroe's drop-in lover. His pissy wife contradicted him. No, he was a UPS driver. He just looked like Robert F. Kennedy.

The recanvass slogged. I got Huh? and No. I got The Kennedys? and Her life was such a tragedy. I hit Dunoon Lane and scored three houses in.

A man was outside, pulling weeds. I badged him and reran my spiel. I got to "Marilyn Monroe's house." He cut me off and bored straight in.

"Well, here's something that might interest you. An older, sickly looking woman rented a house on Dunoon, right after Miss Monroe bought her place. And I have to tell you, this sickly woman bought the dumpiest house in all of Brentwood. She used to skulk around Miss Monroe's house late at night. I even saw her up on her roof, peeking through binoculars at the house."

(LOS ANGELES, 4:00 P.M., THURSDAY, 8/16/62)

Nat said, “Jimmy Hoffa sent me a bank draft for ten grand. He’s paying bonus bread for a job the Justice cops fucked up to a fare-thee-well. I should be jubilant, but I’m nothing but scared.”

KKXZ, 56th and Figueroa. Nat’s broadcast room/command post. Album covers pinned wall-to-wall. Gone sides from Diz, Bird, Miles, and Nat’s house band—the Synagogue Sid Trio.

It was blast-oven hot. Three floor fans stirred wet air. We lounged in scuffed Eames chairs. We shared one ottoman. We kicked each other’s feet to make points.

I said, “You’re scared because it’s un-Jimmy. I feel the same way. It has something to do with Monroe and the Kennedys, and I intend to suss it all out.”

Nat kicked my feet. “Money. Let’s remain on the topic. What’s your pal Gates paying us? I know it won’t be Hoffa-type bread, but he’s got to match your daily rate, or Phil and I will go on strike.”

I said, “He’ll match it. Intel’s got a big expense fund. There’ll be bonus money, and he’s already done you two solids.”

Nat went Huh? Nat hummed “Money, honey.”

“He needs a favor, so he’s fed you two in advance. One, your weekly card game is now LAPD-sanctioned. Two, Gates got Miller Leavy to drop the CCW charge on Kareem. He’s out, and he’s sleeping it off at my place as we speak. In consideration of this, you will abstain from theorizing per Monroe and the Kennedys on your show, and put out some counterintel. I brainstormed a semicomprehensive list of calls Monroe made to the White House and Justice switchboards. We’ve got the times, dates, and the length of the calls. Cite them, and lay out some jive on Monroe calling up to gab civil rights. Brace your main switchboard squeeze at Fox, and slide her two g’s to alter her callout log, and to erase all documentation on Monroe’s calls to the two switchboards.”

Nat tapped my shoes. “All right. That’s fair enough.”

I lit a cigarette. “What else are you afraid of?”

Nat ticked points. “The upscut of that raid on your pad. Federal indictments. Open-court testimony on a guy who snuffs guys routinely. They raided my place and scared my wife half to death. I hit that Cuban guy with a fungo bat, which is ADW on a Federal agent. I know you vest-shot the three guys, which is worse, but then you’re braver and stupider than me. The list goes on and on. If you don’t perform for Parker and Bobby, life for us fools is preemptively over.”

I popped my briefcase. I grabbed a U.S. Customs/special agent’s badge and ID holder. Plus a small white calling card.

On the front: “Bill Parker.” Plus his home phone number. In cursive, on the back: “This man is a close personal friend. Please extend him every courtesy.”

Nat snatched the swag and perused it. He wore a loud Hawaiian shirt. Goose bumps popped up his arms.

I tapped his feet. “You’re Customs, Phil’s Treasury. I want an extensive canvass. Up PCH a mile north and south of the Lawford house, and a half mile out from the Monroe house. Concoct jive cover stories. Buzz every house you talk to on Monroe and the Kennedys. Work for defamation and exoneration. At the same time, go for times and dates that might prove verifiable. Keep detailed logs, and hit the not-at-homes until they are home. I want certifiably depraved shit on Monroe—because that’s one level of our assignment. The second level is safeguarding the Chief’s FBI-boss deal with dipshit Bobby. Blackmail’s our only protection there. Get me Jack and sex, Jack and dope, Jack and jailbait, Jack and all those TV actresses Peter Lawford sets him up with. It’s a heavy-duty skank deal. And skank’s the only thing that will stop Bobby from waltzing us in front of a Federal grand jury.”

Nat whistled. “That’s a two-week canvass. What will you be doing all that time?”

“Trying to decode Monroe’s last four months on earth, based on what we’ve got so far.”

Nat stood up and stretched. “We should find work for Kareem.”

“Gates needs a man inside the mosque at Slauson and Broadway. It’s a hundred and fifty a week and expenses. And tell Kareem no liquor stores. There’s stakeout squads all over the southside, and they’re looking to take scalps.”

Nat smiled. “Lois called me. She’s in town, and she wants you to know she’s been thinking about you.”

Lois ran nocturnal. Her métier was the late-night phone call. She snared her husband that way. She snared me with calls to KKXZ.

She always made me wait. I perched by my phone, up to 1:30. Waiting implodes me. I shook loose and drove to Brentwood. The dumpy house. Dunoon Lane. The “sickly old lady” with binoculars. It was a lead. It was a peep-the-peeper task.

I found the place. It was a stand-alone eyesore. Faded peach stucco. Weed-clumped grass. Add-on top floor, built askew. It’s two hundred yards northeast of the Monroe spread. There’s a flat roof and downward eyeball path. A ’49 Ford stood in the driveway. It accessorized the dump.

I parked and walked up the driveway. The Ford reeked of sickbed balm and stale sweat. The windows were down. I penlight-flashed the steering column and checked the registration strap. Natasha Lytess owned the heap. I made the name, fast.

Monroe’s ex-acting coach. Mordant per Monroe. A standout eulogizer. Monroe and her shopworn enchantment.

I flashed the front seat and strafed a Vicente Pharmacy bag. I reached in and pulled out a vial of four-grain Dilaudid. There’s some enchantment.

I unscrewed the vial and popped two Big “D” ’s. I walked back to my sled and grabbed my binoculars. The house had thick window ledges and raised cement ornamentation. I circled the perimeter and gauged hand- and footholds. The north-side neighbor’s fence would cloak me.

I hung the binoculars around my neck and climbed a drainpipe. The cement strips held my weight. Two footholds, two handholds. I vaulted up on the roof.

The Monroe house was south-southwest. I walked to the edge of the roof and dialed my distance gauge tight. I saw blue-green grass, night-muted stucco, and yellow window light.

It’s the east-facing living room window. I know that room. I’ve peeped it and worked it and smelled it. The colors were off, the shadows were wrong, a candle light flickered, left to right.

I dialed in, dialed out, stepped back and reframed. The dope hit me. It cocooned me, warm and safe. It resituated the shadows and magnified the candlelight.

Lowell Farr walked across the room. She wore a Pali High sweater and a red beret and carried a paintbrush. She stood by the north wall and painted a woman perched on a bedside.

She worked in bold red. The dope let me mute and enhance shades at will. Lowell switched brushes for the detail work. Black paint for definition, flesh tones, blue-gray for the eyes. Blond hair, then gray, then chalk white. It's Monroe twice her age. Lowell sees her inside out.

She switched brushes. She blacked out the bedside perch and recolored Monroe's hair. She x-ed out the old Monroe's face and gave her a tall and ungainly girl's body. She painted an arrow. It extended from the X mark to a clean white swatch of wall.

She painted a close-up there. It was her own face in extremis. She got the kid good looks, the bumpy nose, the not quite buck teeth. She borrowed Marilyn's eyes and something from her smile. She's the enchantress. She achieves transmogrification.

24

(LOS ANGELES, 11:20 A.M., FRIDAY, 8/17/62)

Silver Lake. Due east of Hollywood. High hills above the smog line. I climbed in low gear. Morty Bendish had a stilt house off the reservoir. Silver Lake was mudslides and collapsed foundations. It was a beatnik/film-slave enclave. Wags called it the "Swish Alps."

I afterglowed on the filched dope and Lowell Farr's art show. I slept in the Intel cot room. I rolled out early and worked.

Lab work first. I dropped off the frozen jizz caked on the Monroe/Cruel Stud fuck pix and buzzed Ray Pinker for quick results. Ray cited his 829 preserved jizz vials. It would take at least three weeks to log comparison tests.

Phone work next. I got out my cater-biz list and called seventeen outfits. I got zero, zilch, nein, and nyet. Nobody knew a cater waiter named Rick Dawes. Nobody knew a cater waitress named Eleanora. Cater waiters were by nature dicey. They were all fly-by-nights.

I ran "Rick Dawes" and "Richard Dawes" through LAPD and Sheriff's R&I. I got hits on twenty-four Negroes and two old white guys. A phone book check fizzled. There were no Dick Daweses or Richard Daweses in the L.A. area white pages.

Dawes to José Bolaños. I stiffed formal file-request calls to state and Fed HUAC and the Mexican State Police. They pledged results "within one month." I called Miller Leavy and begged favors. He refused to brace BHPD for their 459-string files. "No, Freddy—not off a slip of paper and one illegal wiretap call." I told Miller to contact Mr. and Mrs. Willard D. Farr and request an interview with seventeen-year-old Lowell. Miller balked. "He's a big Republican fat cat! Mayor Yorty would kill me!"

Scratch Lowell for now. I called my casting director contact at Warner's and dunned him for dish on Natasha Lytess. He checked his files and dished good.

Born in Russia, 5/16/11. Studied under the "revisionist" Vsevolod Meyerhold. Immigrates to the United States. Tanks as a second-lead actress. Gets a drama coach gig at Metro. Meets Monroe on The Asphalt Jungle. Becomes infatuated with her. Follows her. They work studio to studio and film to film. Bunks with Monroe briefly. It's now 2/56. Monroe's shooting Bus Stop at Fox. Lytess has become clingy and overbearing. Lezbo rumors circulate. Monroe and Fox dump Lytess cold. Lytess plagues Monroe with calls and weepy letters. Monroe's lawyer makes her desist. '56 to '62: some sort of torrid torch burns—

There's Morty's hut. It's all space-age prefab. Aluminum panels and tinted Plexiglas. A crushed-rock carport. Stilt-anchored terraces and three dark rooms. L.A. Mirror foto art throughout. Morty on dead-body calls, Morty on the gas-chamber beat up at Quentin.

I parked and walked right in. I heard Morty cough and beelined for the rear terrace. A breeze stirred, the stilts swayed, a striped awning flapped.

Morty worked at a stand-up draftsman's table. The surface was crammed with foto proofs, news clips, pencils, pens, and pocket-size pamphlets. Morty hunkered low and proofread. He saw me and rolled his eyes.

"Hi, Freddy. It's been a while."

I said, "Can the piece on Marilyn Monroe and the Kennedys. Bill Parker finds that sort of thing offensive."

Morty scratched his balls. He wore a soiled T-shirt and plaid boxer shorts.

"I covered the interfaith prayer breakfast at Temple Beth Shalom. Bill was half in the bag. He told Cardinal McIntyre and Rabbi Magnin the story of Come-san-Chin, the Chinese cocksucker. He shouldn't drink in public."

I yocked. "Give up your source on the Monroe piece."

Morty tossed me a pamphlet. The title: Weird-O Death of a Sex Siren, by Mr. Fearless Fuzz. The cover art: Monroe in a Milady brassiere ad, circa '46.

I quick-skimmed the text. Fearless Fuzz "scandalously scoped" the sleek Marilyn, dead in her bed. Her "boss bod" was dotted with leprous puncture marks. Fearless Fuzz "determinedly deduced" that the Kennedy mob decreed her death. Their motive? To quash "rampant rumors" of her liaisons with John and Robert and their plans to establish a "Mormon ménage" at the president's Camp David retreat. A civil wrongs gang performed the snuff. Marilyn's collection of Harry Belafonte records underscored her "race-mixer tendencies."

Fearless Fuzz predicted the collapse of the Kennedy mob and mass suicides within the Kennedy family—once the whole story is laid out in this groundbreaking pamphlet series.

I lit a cigarette. "How far out in the ozone does this Monroe/ Kennedy rumor fly?"

Morty bummed a cigarette. "It's afloat in hip circles, where everyone spritzes. What true insiders—like you and me—know is that Jack's a two-minute man, and that he allows an hour for his assignations, which includes the martini, the club sandwich, and the conversation. And before you ask, Bobby don't stray. Take that to the bank."

I said, "Who's Fearless Fuzz?"

Morty dredged his ears with a paper clip. "A nutty West L.A. Division patrol cop named Jack Clemmons, who got the call to view the dead Marilyn. You know me, Freddy. I go for verisimilitude, and even then, my standards are low. If I dig it, I figure it's true, and I publish it. Corroboration is strictly for Communists and fags."

Clemmons. Deedee Grenier snitched him off. He was tight with ex-cop/lounge lizard Norm Krause. Big Norm worked Wilshire Motors, circa '49. He extorted now–U.S. senator Tom Kuchel on a fruit beef. Clemmons and Krause: right-wing nuts and pals of pamphlet putz Frank Capell.

I sifted it. I drained it and strained it dry. I pointed to a stack of tabloid foldouts. They were ultralurid and green-inked.

Morty pooh-poohed me. "It's a private skank sheet that I sell to subscribers. Don't worry—mum's the word on Marilyn and the K boys."

I peeled off five C-notes and dropped them on the table. Morty went Oooh-la-la.

"In consideration of your squelching the Monroe piece and burning all the beaver shots, along with the negatives."

Morty went wistful. Oh bird thou never—

"Somebody snitched off your piece to Daryl Gates at Intel. Who do you think?"

Morty picked his nose. "My guess is Motel Mike Bayless, at SHIT. Gates and Motel Mike trade dirt tips on a regular basis. It's like baseball cards. I'll trade you dirt on the Muslims if you trade me dirt on some faigelah deputy browning guys in Ferndell Park. Motel Mike's a ganef. Maybe he's got his own hustle going."

I tossed a slider. "That kidnap babe, Gwen Perloff. She vibes bait girl to me. What have you heard?"

Morty tee-heed. "I heard you and the Hats dusted one of the kidnap guys, and now Parker and Gates fear repercussions."

"Perloff, Morty. What have you heard?"

"I heard she's been around. I heard she couriers sketchy notes and bearer bonds for mogul types like Darryl Zanuck, Jack Warner, and Lew Wasserman. I'd call that a bait girl–adjunct thing to do."

Bearer bonds. It confirmed rumors. Like the Cleopatra cash drain and Fox in deep shit.

The Pico gate guards waved me in. My new credential flummoxed them. I didn't slide them cash or wink. They went You're seeing who? I went Don't fuck with me—I'm with the DA now.

I cut over to the casting office. I parked outside and barged in brusque. The waiting room was packed with teenage girls in bikinis. They mulled around and practiced dance steps. They wore signboards marked with the name of the audition flick: Twist Party Stakeout.

They twisted and mash-potatoed all around me. I badged a stooge dispensing signboards and demanded a full credits sheet for Gwen Perloff. He dug through cubbyholes and passed me a glossy leaflet. I walked out to my car and went through it.

La Gwen. Her Fox credits dated back to 1951. They ran intermittent. Frequent Jantzen swimwear gigs diverted the flow. Big Gwen—5'10"/140. She always wore glasses. She part-time modeled for Eyeking Opticians. She played third leads in expose-the-wetback-problem screeds. She played soon-to-die sexpots in monster films. She played somebody's nympho mom in four recent exploit-the-surf-craze jobs.

It was snoresville. Darryl Zanuck's office was close by. I strolled over and stood by his private side door. I primped and pulled my coat back to display my belt shit. The door stood ajar. I ambled right in.

He saw me. He made me. He quashed a scowl. He scrolled my pedigree and barrage of crimes against Fox in two seconds.

My exposés. My smear jobs. My gay film folk exploited and Fox stars vilified. My bugged bathhouses and contract studs entrapped at the Manhole and the Cockpit.

Say something, Pops. Pretend you're not scared. Hide behind your big desk. Pace your office and act bluff.

Zanuck said, "All right. I know who you are. The gate guards buzzed me. You're on the lot, and you want something you think I—"

I pulled a leather wing chair up to the desk. I snagged a big cigar from a big humidor. I lit up and blew smoke rings. Zanuck went sclerotic red.

"It's about Gwen Perloff. I represent Bill Parker and the DA's Office. I thought I'd spare you the ignominy of a trip downtown."

Zanuck lit a cigar. The room fumed up. He popped two pills, on the sly. My bet: digitalis.

"I already spoke to a Sheriff's sergeant named Bayless. I was extremely forthcoming, and he seemed to be satisfied."

I went Nix. "Did you receive a blackmail demand?"

"No. You know the chain of events, because you were a participant. A wheezy old lady called me and informed me that Miss Perloff had been kidnapped. She gave me the names of two of the men holding Miss Perloff hostage, and the address where she was being held. The old lady didn't know the names of the men who actually grabbed Gwen. I called Bill Parker and explained the situation. He sent you and the Hat Squad in. You know the rest, because you were there."

I said, "Did you recognize the old lady's voice?"

"No."

"Did she call you through the Fox switchboard?"

"No. She called my direct office line."

"How'd she get the number?"

"I don't know."

"Could she have been an ex–Fox employee?"

"That thought occurred to me."

I plopped my feet on Daddy-O's desk. A family portrait capsized.

"Are you shtupping Gwen Perloff, Pops? Is that the lit fuse behind this whole deal? Is that how the old lady knew to call you?"

Zanuck gnawed his cigar. He bit through the end and severed it. He grabbed the burning part and snuffed out the ash. Wet tobacco popped off his lips.

"Miss Perloff and I have a mentor-protégée relationship."

I made the jack-off sign. "Give me the drift on her private life. Who else is poking her? Does she swing both ways? Do you put her out as bait to rope in big investors?"

Zanuck sputtered. He gagged on tobacco mulch and spit in his handkerchief.

I said, "How'd you meet her? Who introduced you? It was 'Some Enchanted Evening,' right?"

Zanuck wiped his face. His flush subsided. His eyes stayed red. He went albino white.

"I was walking through the accounting office. Someone—I can't recall who—said, 'Boss, this is Gwen.' "

A side bar adjoined Daddy-O's desk. I poured a double brandy and guzzled it.

"Rumors abound, Pops. They all pertain to your lox, Cleopatra. There's lots of talk that your execs and rank and filers are scuffling for bread, should the whole studio tank. Some of the shit's legal, some of it's not. I got a tip that Gwen Perloff was running bearer bonds. For you and some other big studio guys."

Albino white back to red. The "bearer bonds" did it. I grabbed a fistful of cigars and waltzed.

Fox ran a twenty-man guard force. They were more than ornamental and less than full-sworn. Del Kinney ran the show. Mike Bayless said Kinney went back with Gwen Perloff. Kinney was pedigreed up the ying-yang. He was an ex–Sheriff's lieutenant and ex–ABC agent. He ran the Sheriff's mounted posse, '37–'38. He led the search for Mitzi Perloff's remains. The Fox cops were ex-LAPD and Sheriff's war hires. That means undraftable. That means low-rent by L.A.-cop standards. The PD and Sheriff's bounced them in '46. Get out—we've got our real guys back now. Kinney hit Fox in '53. He hired up a new kop korps. Kinney purportedly sold ABC vault liquor to the Aadland brothers. They were Foxed up the ying-yang. So was Del K.

The cop hut was locked tight. Nobody saw me. I grabbed a tethered golf cart and cruised the accounting building. It was soundstage-size. Somebody set Pops Zanuck up with Gwen P. "Boss, this is Gwen."

Accounting had its own parking lot. I counted fifty-four slots, full up. I cruised the rows and scrawled plate numbers in my notebook. It was one big DMV/R&I job. Hot names might jump out. Hey, look at me. I'll tell you about Gwen.

The plate job took two hours. I felt unraveled. I had Lois and Pat on the brain. I planned to buzz-bomb Lois tonight. I might buzz-bomb Pat tomorrow. Hit the Lawford spread. Hard-nose Peter. Coerce a look at Jack's top secret Girl Book. Pat might swoon. She loves to see Peter emasculated.

I split Fox. Fox felt unraveled. Zanuck lied per Gwen Perloff. Zanuck might fink my intrusion to Bill Parker. The Chief would dig it. The Parker-Kennedy deal observed laws and ignored laws and condoned shit-magnet intrusions. The intruders spawned fear and demanded information. The intrudees complied in the end.

Monroe Job #2 unraveled me. One evidential omission glared. Monroe, the pack rat. Her notes inked on paper scraps. Break-in #2. The Carole Landis morgue pic, 7/48. The magazine-letter notes. How many other perv notes and/or pix did Monroe receive? If any, where are they now?

Her known bank accounts have been examined. Her will has gone through probate. Where are her fan letters and pervy keepsakes? Nobody has turned an address book. Not me, not the West L.A. cops. Did she rent safe-deposit boxes under a fake name? I ran some quickie West L.A. bank checks and got zilch.

I drove downtown. I stopped at Andrews Hardware and purchased a shitload of office supplies. I drove to the PAB and hauled my gear up to Intel. I redid my cubicle, wall to wall.

I replicated my home corkboard motif. I marked Corkboard #1 "Monroe" and Corkboard #2 "Kidnap." I tacked note slips below the headings. Red slips for "Monroe," green slips for "Kidnap." I pinned my eleven-page list of jungle-juiced recollections to Corkboard #1. I jotted red-slip observations and pinned them right below.

(Jack Clemmons views body. Early a.m., 8/5. Significant?) (JC tight with Norm Krause, ex–shakedown man.) (Deedee Grenier: Monroe KA. Attends Jeanne Carmen's pill parties. DG's brother: Paul Mitchell Grenier/ ex-con, fruit hustler, runs badger games with DG.)

Plus: Lowell Farr, Pat & Peter Lawford, Roddy McDowall, Natasha Lytess. (Lytess moved into house near Monroe & was seen peeping her.)

I jotted green-slip observations and stuck them to Board #2:

("It's a put-up job": Richard Danforth, 8/4/62.) (Mike Bayless: borderline credible per kidnap chronology and Sheriff's response.) (Darryl F. Zanuck: deceptive on all Perloff queries. Denies that Perloff couriers bearer bonds. Rebrace & further intimidate DFZ.) (Brace Del Kinney, per Perloff.) (Amass data before Perloff approach.)

My cubicle featured a pneumatic tube gizmo. It shot message slugs straight to R&I. I stuck my Fox accounting list into a slug and added a cover note: all plate numbers/all vehicle stats/all personal stats/all rap sheets. I stuck the slug in the chute and heard it go whoosh.

I segued to phone work. I called Nat and Phil and told them to take over the cold calls to catering and phone-message outfits. Yeah, now—fuckers. On top of your Lawford house/Monroe house canvasses. I grabbed a Yellow Pages and cold-called mid-Wilshire banks myself.

I talked to thirty-two branch managers. I logged thirty-two straight noes. It took four-plus hours. No, Lieutenant—Miss Monroe did not rent safe-deposit boxes from us.

She could have employed a pseudonym. She could have utilized forged credentials. She could have worn a bulked-up disguise.

Shit.

She'd prepare. She'd expect me to bring flowers. She'd expect a late arrival. She'd orchestrate the moment. She was a wait-by-the-phone type, just like me.

The Chapman Park Hotel and Bungalows. Her bungalow. The canopied swing on the terrace. It summoned rainstorms. I already felt a breeze and wet air. There were no visible stars at 10:20 p.m. Lois Nettleton wrote the book on enchantment.

I parked in the rear lot and walked over. She sniffed the air and laughed before she saw me. I overdid the flowers, like I always do.

There she is—my midnight caller.

In a twill skirt and blue oxford shirt. Note her brown penny loafers and white ankle socks. Add a new shag hairdo. She's back to her natural mid-brown.

I set the flowers in a room-service pitcher. The white wine and chilled lobster salad were laid out. Lois patted the swing and rocked it back. I sat down beside her. We put our heads together and looked up. Lois said, "Your cheap lime cologne." Pat always mentioned it.

I held a hand out. Three raindrops hit home. The Ambassador and Cocoanut Grove were just across Wilshire. Dick Haymes was headlining. I caught strains of "How Are Things in Glocca Morra?"

Lois smiled. She loved the song. I said, "So, how are they?"

Lois said, "Routine. I live there and work there. I'm married there. When I've had enough, I concoct an excuse to come find you."

I smiled. "I hope Nat didn't tell you what we've been doing."

Lois sipped wine. "He did. He told me I should tell you, because he would regret withholding from you, and you mustn't think he dissembled. He said he can't believe the sheer scope of it, and how many ways it could go wrong."

I said, "He's right about that. There's no certain way to get through it. That's the troubling thing."

Lois slipped off her wedding band and tossed it in the salad. A lightning flash backlit Wilshire.

"I thought you'd open with 'I've got some money. Let's go someplace and fall down together.' Nat said you were flush."

I went Nix. “Enough of that. You’re here, and I’m here, and you’re here for reasons that have nothing to do with me. You know I’ll always be here, and I’ll always be receptive.”

Lois lit a cigarette. “I got a costar gig at Metro. It’s a stewardess-in-love flick, and it shoots early next year. I’m in for early rehearsals, and I’m testing for two B films at Fox. One’s a teenage dance turkey, and the other’s about a ghetto rat who eats nuclear waste and grows ten feet tall. Fox is hitting the B flicks hard—they’re losing a fortune on Cleopatra.”

Rain doused our dinner. Lois put out her cigarette and shivered. She smiled as a segue. I caught the cue and carried her inside.

We undressed in the bedroom. I threw the south-facing curtains wide. We got lightning and high-tide Wilshire Boulevard. Lois killed the room lights.

We got in bed and played hide-and-seek under the sheets. We didn’t do it because we’ve never done it and we probably never will.

Hide-and-seek diminuendoed. We kissed and touched and entwined ourselves in new ways. We fell asleep. It rained all night. I saw Marilyn Monroe and Lowell Farr in a dream.

I recalled a certain day. Marilyn and Lowell walked to the front gate. They were visibly dirty. I figured they were rooting in the garden. That wasn’t right. They were too dirty. It had to be something else.

(LOS ANGELES, 10:05 A.M., SATURDAY, 8/18/62)

I parked on PCH. The curb slot was Lawford property. It put me in Federal breach. Doofus Peter had issued a restraining order against me.

I had Fed shit and Kennedy shit on the brain. Eddie Chacõn called me. He addressed me as Señor Freddy. He said Señor Bob requested my presence tomorrow. 9:00 a.m./the U.S. Attorney's Office. I brainwaved a jazzy evidence prop. Señor Ratfuck would shit.

I bopped down the north footpath. I wore last night's clothes with Lois and drove to Villa Pat. Scent-hound Pat. Maybe she'll be here, maybe she'll sniff last night's rendezvous.

The gate stood open. I hit the back terrace. Lawford lounged in a deck chair. He wore tennis whites. He sipped a Bloody Mary and bounced a volleyball.

He saw me. He sighed. He said, "You've got a nerve."

I looked left. A sliding glass door thumped and creaked. Pat looked out. I winked at her. She deadpanned it.

Lawford stood up. I pushed him back down and kicked the volleyball into the surf.

"I want the Girl Book you keep for Jack. We're going inside. You're going to hand it over."

Lawford said, "In a pig's eye."

I grabbed him by the hair and pulled him upright. He yelped. I bitch-slapped him and shoved him into the door glass. He hit nose-first. He yelped. He shouldered the door aside and tripped into the kitchen.

I followed him. He dripped blood on the floor and veered toward a side hallway. I crashed in the breakfast nook and poured myself a Bloody Mary. A Nikon camera was hooked on a wall peg. I checked the exposure slot. A full film roll was tucked in.

Lawford weaved back to the kitchen. He pressed a towel to his nose and lugged a leatherette notebook. I snatched it. The cover was presidential seal–embossed.

I yocked. Lawford said, “You’re a cheeky fucker.”

I said, “I’m on a top secret mission for the attorney general. Attorney General Kennedy would not condone the president’s access to this book.”

Pat chuckled. I pegged her location.

She’s in the back alcove. She’s out of sight and within eavesdrop range.

I flipped pages. The book featured overlit snapshots. Lesser-known actresses displayed their oooga-boooga. Full beaveroo, attached pubic hair. Names, phone numbers, measurements, and TV credits. Rubber-stamped once per page: “Ask not what your country can do for YOU—ask what YOU can do for your president!!!!!”

I adjusted the camera lens and shot the first eight pages. Lawford hovered and weaved. The nose-blot towel seeped and dripped blood.

“Where did you get it, and who put it together?”

Dipshit hijacked my Bloody Mary and siphoned it. He wiped blood and tomato residue off his lips.

“A cater waitress peddled it to me, maybe three months ago. I don’t recall her name, but she was a queen-bee type. She’d heard whispers about Jack and figured he’d gas on the book. Jack said he’d peruse it the next time he blew through.”

I tap-tapped the book. “Midsummer. A cater waitress named Eleanora called. You leched on her, and she pumped you on a cater waiter named Rick Dawes—who’s a possible fruit hustler and burglary suspect. Do you recall this conversation? Is Eleanora the ‘queen-bee type’ who sold you the Girl Book? Do you recall any aspect of this conversation?”

Lawford blubbered. “I don’t know, lots of chicks call me. I’m a well-known swinger and sugar daddy…. shit, my nose hurts.”

I shot the last eight pages. I nailed more overlit snapshots. Stewardesses displayed their woof-woof. Full beaveroo, attached pubic hair. Names, phone numbers, measurements, and airline affiliations. The stews wore their pillbox airplane hats.

Lawford tittered. “Every cloud has a silver lining. I know a doctor who makes house calls. He’ll give me a shot and put me in the Twilight Zone.”

I hauled the Girl Book to the kitchen sink. I hit the garbage disposal switch. Lawford bitch-shrieked. I ripped out pages and shoved them down the drain. Gears shredded and whined. Paper pulp and taped-hair strips blew back out. Orange rinds and coffee grounds spritzed my Sy Devore coat.

I grabbed the camera and split. Sink-rotor skreek and bitch shrieks trailed me. Somebody'd stuck a note under my wiper blades. I pulled it out.

Well, then.

"I like you again. P."

26

(LOS ANGELES, 9:04 A.M., SUNDAY, 8/19/62)

Ratfuck Bob sweat-boxed me.

Eddie Chacõn picked me up and drove me downtown. We smoked Darryl Zanuck's Cuban cigars en route. Eddie kvetched. Aaaay, caramba—your Magnum loads tore up the vests of three Federal agents and severely bruised our chests. I yuk-yukked it off.

Traffic snarled, the heat index spiked, the smog layer rose. Eddie double-parked his Fed sled and ushered me inside. I expected an office confab. Eddie dumped me in a twelve-by-twelve box.

One table, two chairs, three blank walls, one mirror wall. Hot-wired for sure.

Bobby was late. I'd brought my briefcase. I duplicated the Girl Book pix at Intel and tagged them "Exhibit A." Bobby despised Peter Lawford. The pix should fan that flame.

The door popped wide. I stood up. Bobby lugged a leather evidence case. I said, "Sir." He said, "Lieutenant." Our ensembles matched. We wore white shirts, blue ties, gray Dacron suits. It was off-the-rack cop couture.

Bobby unlatched the case and flashed the contents. My Hoffa gig evidence was crammed in. He pulled out a manila envelope and slid the case under the table. I sat down. He sat down across from me. Okay—it's on.

I suppressed a grin. Bobby emptied the envelope on the table. Three photo stacks tumbled. He snapped off the rubber bands and formed photo sprays.

Man Camera redux. We're back at my 8/4/62 break-in.

"Snapshots number five to twenty-seven. All living room. The left-behind electric wall mounts and telephone-mike spacers. Who do you think installed them?"

"Initially, I thought the prior owners of the house were being surveilled. I checked them out through the Realtors who sold the house to Monroe. They were complete squares, who in no way played as surveillance targets. The mounts look like FBI or L.A. Sheriff's issue, and SHIT does a lot of wire work for the Bureau's L.A. office. My best guess is that it was an amateur operation, which employed professional equipment. I'm thinking it's either hoods or rogue cops working independent."

Bobby said, "Okay. Marilyn's underwear drawer. Snapshots number four to eleven, the pornographic ones. Tell me the status of the crusted-on semen. Do you have a possible make on the man in the pictures?"

I said, "The semen is being comparison-tested at the LAPD lab. That entails going through hundreds of already logged samples. Phil Irwin and Nat Denkins have gone through a total of forty-three LAPD and Sheriff's mug books for leads on potential westside perverts. We came up 100% empty."

"Okay. Marilyn's undie drawer, again. The Carole Landis morgue photograph and the crazy note composed in magazine letters. What is this?"

I said, "It's most likely nutty fan bullshit. Those Landis morgue shots have been all over town since the late '40s. A morgue jockey duplicated them and made a million copies, and I used to peddle them myself. Some nut sent one to Monroe, and she ended up going out behind yellow jackets, just like Landis. So what? Likewise the letter—which brings up a request I want to make. It pertains to the issue of hidden fan mail."

The AG drummed the table. "I'm listening."

I drummed the table. The AG, RFK, Lord Fauntleroy incarnate. I mimicked his impatience.

"This occurred on May 19. I was surveilling the house and saw Monroe and Lowell Farr walk out the front door, very dirty. At first, I thought they were gardening in the backyard, but then I came to believe they were doing some digging under the house. I want a search-and-seizure warrant."

Bobby sighed. "I'll get you one. While you're begging favors, is there anything else?"

Scrawny lace-curtain Irish cocksuck—

"I misplaced a sheet of paper with one hundred and forty-three license-plate numbers on it. I'd tailed Monroe out to the Valley, but I lost her. I ran a radius check to run through the DMV. The locale played weird for Monroe. Also, I've got a memory of that location that I can't quite pull up. It's messing with me, and it seems to be a memory from after I tailed Monroe that day."

“You’re thinking that the sheet of paper might be in with the ones that Eddie and his boys removed from your apartment? All right, I’ll look for it.”

I rocked my chair back and stretched. Baby Bobby tapped his coat pockets. He smoked cigars, like Big Baby Jack. I tossed him a hijacked Cuban. It bounced off his necktie and hit the table.

He scowled. I flicked my lighter and leaned close. He took the light.

“Let’s move on to ‘Eleanora’s’ call to Peter Lawford. What are you doing about following up on the ‘Rick Dawes’ burglary lead?”

I ticked points. “I’ve got Phil and Nat cold-calling every cater-waiter service and telephone-answering outfit in L.A. They’ve been stonewalled so far. Miller Leavy refuses to dun the Beverly Hills PD for their burglary files.”

Bobby smoked his cigar. “As well he should. I wouldn’t mess with municipal police departments, either.”

I popped my briefcase. I’d prepped my own photo sprays. Two cardboard sheets and Scotch tape. Twenty-four TV actress and stewardess pix. Girl Book de-luxe. All nude/full beaver.

I laid them on the table. Up close and offensive. Bobby examined them.

“I took these off Peter Lawford yesterday. They were displayed in a binder embossed with the presidential seal. Lawford told me that a ‘queen-bee type’ cater waitress passed the pictures to him. Lawford intended to give the so-called Girl Book to the president the next time he passed through L.A., but he does not recall his telephone chat with ‘Eleanora.’ ”

Bobby stubbed his cigar on the floor. His killer gaze decohered. He full-on blushed.

“I owe you a thank-you for taking the book away from Peter. I owe Mr. Denkins a thank-you for his reinterpreting quite a few of Marilyn’s calls to the White House and Justice. I owe you a warning as to your blunt and overly familiar references to members of my family, and I would caution you never to mention my sister Pat.”

I leaned in. “Fuck your thank-yous, warnings, and cautions, Mr. Kennedy. In lieu of them, you might assure me that you will not take the evidence that I accrued while in Jimmy Hoffa’s employ and call me up before a Federal grand jury to testify against him, which may well get me two slugs in the head in the long run.”

Bobby leaned in. His killer gaze re-cohered.

“Under no circumstances. Because I know that Bill Parker has charged you to build a subsidiary dirt file on my brother and me, to supplant the derogatory profile on Marilyn that the Chief and I have agreed on. It's his hole card to assure that my brother and I won't renege on our promise to can Hoover and give Parker the big spot. Can you candidly tell me that that is not Parker's design?"

I said, "No. I can't tell you that."

"All right. What have you dug up on us so far?"

I cracked my knuckles. "A right-wing-nut cop wrote a crazy tract about the two of you and Monroe. I put the skids to it. I confirmed that there's no mention of you and Jack—I mean, the president—in the twelve million press clips I've read. The president's inclinations are well known in film-biz circles—but not outside of them—and my canvasses have confirmed that a dozen times over. So far, nobody's inclined to talk. Jack—I mean the president—is safe there."

Bobby said, "Call him Jack. Do you think I'm so pious and chickenshit that I'd object to that?"

I cracked my thumbs. "Hoffa concerns me. It's not so much you slamming him in court, and me getting subpoenaed. It's his attitude in regards to you busting up his Monroe gig. He's nonchalant. He's paying me and my boys our bonus bread, unsolicited. He's got to be playing a money angle somewhere, or this whole blackmail-the-prez-and-the-AG-over-movie-star-pussy deal makes no damn sense."

Bobby dug through his evidence case. He snagged a sheaf of tap-call transcripts and quick-skimmed them.

"This is Marilyn and my sister. Marilyn tells Pat that her house has been burgled, things have been moved around, she's received nasty letters and breather calls. How do you interpret it? Is this the jerk who sent the Carole Landis picture and the magazine-letter note, or is it just more of the humdrum crazy-fan ilk?"

I shrugged. "I don't know, but my guess is that she's performing for Pat. Boo-hoo, 'I'm scared, look at me.' Pat's all empathy. She's Monroe's perfect audience."

"Yes, she is. And she's your perfect audience, as well. Don't go all red-faced, Lieutenant. I'm the brother Pat confides in, and her confidences err on the candid side."

I grabbed my briefcase and stood up. My legs fluttered. Bobby skunk-eyed me.

"Take care, son. You toss a kidnap suspect off a cliff, and it can come back and haunt you."

27

(LOS ANGELES, 9:20 A.M., MONDAY, 8/20/62)

Three-man dig. That's Nat, Phil, and me. We stood outside Fifth Helena. We brought shovels, pry bars, and entrenching tools. Bobby K got our warrant. Miller Leavy ran it by a Superior Court judge. It sanctioned us to bust down the door at 9:30.

We lounged by said door. We chain-smoked. Fifth Helena was flat quiet. West L.A. patrol cops ran the party kids off last night. They popped six kids for vag and possession of maryjane. I read the arrest sheets. Lowell Farr dodged the rousts.

I was glad. Lowell was a witchy kid. She B and E'd the pad and communed with Monroe on her own stick. I peeped her from Natasha Lytess' roof. I couldn't shake her wall art. Monroe as herself/herself as Monroe. The imagery shook me.

I fidgeted. I had fan-letter caches, private-mail caches, and psycho-fan caches on the brain. Monroe's will went through probate. Daryl Gates wrangled an inventory. "Routine correspondence" went to her lawyer. Small sums of money, books, and furniture went to her white-trash kin. The will took me nowhere.

Lab tests and records checks, likewise.

The jizz-stained photos—still being checked. The file runs on José Bolaños—no kickbacks yet. No R&I kickbacks on the cars parked outside Fox Accounting. I called Fox Personnel and requested a list of all Accounting Department employees. A supervisor blew me off. Who introduced Gwen Perloff to Darryl F. Zanuck? I compiled a list of names from Peter Lawford's Girl Book. I added physical descriptions and airline affiliations for the stews. I submitted the list to the file-room cops at Intel and R&I. I logged no results yet.

Phil tapped his watch. It's 9:30—let's go.

I had Intel's master key. One turn got us in. The living room was swamp hot. Nat and Phil opened windows. A cross breeze circulated. I walked straight to the south-facing wall. Lowell Farr's portrait had been obliterated.

Kid vandals sprayed it with kandy apple paint. Kid pundits scrawled it up. "Fuck Apartheid," "Surf Nazis Rule," "We Shall Overcome," "Goldwater in '64."

We fanned through the house. We looked for wall, floor, and closet-space inconsistencies. Marilyn and Lowell were dirty that day. They weren't digging outside. I scoped the exterior twenty times since that day. They were digging inside. It had to be.

The walls sat flush. They felt solid. The closet floors were void of trapdoor cracks and hinges. We studied the floors. The house was '20s vintage. All the rugs were gone. Bedrooms, hallways, living room. The floors were down to scuffed hardwood planes.

The bedroom floors were pristine. No mismatched planks, no hinge-crack indicators. The hallways dittoed the bedrooms. We walked back to the living room. The walls were solid white stucco. I eyeballed the floorboards, Man Camera tight.

Back and forth, up and down, sideways. North, south, east, and west. One time, two times, three. What's that by the south-facing wall? That's the kid-artwork wall. What's that right—there.

Anomalous floor planks. Extending off the artwork wall, five planks across. Unscuffed new wood. Extending out six feet. Planed and sanded. Enjoined to old wood planks. Rugs covered the new planks before. I caught the inconsistency now.

Nat and Phil hovered. I pointed down. Bright lads—their brain bulbs popped bright.

I saw a quarter-inch crack at the wall juncture. It extended across all five planks. I stuck my pry bar in at a midpoint and pulled up.

A hinge mechanism kicked in. All five planks creaked and sprang up at a forty-five-degree angle. Nat and Phil gasped. I looked straight down.

It's a hideaway/stash hole/big secret compartment. Rough wood foundation walls and a packed-dirt floor. The walls run identical to the living room walls. There's a wall-mounted ladder right below me.

Nat whistled. Phil handed me a flashlight. I went down the stairs. The temperature dropped. The dirt stink made me sneeze.

I flashed the wall right beside me. My beam hit a light switch. I flipped it. An overhead bulb lit the stash hole. I saw this:

The floor, the walls. A basement built on the living room floor plan. Empty, except for this:

A big steamer trunk. Old and weather-beaten. A clasp-affixed top pushed up at a right angle. Two sets of footprints from the trunk to the ladder. Coming and going prints. Easily ID'd.

Marilyn had small feet. Lowell had big feet. I saw drag marks from the south wall to the middle of the hole. The girls dragged the trunk over. The big foot/small foot prints spelled it plain. They opened the trunk under the overhead bulb. They wanted maximum light.

I walked over to the trunk. Nat and Phil tumbled down the ladder. They coughed and sneezed and walked up. I knelt down and framed close-ups. Nat and Phil lit the trunk. I went through it, item by item. I inventoried this:

A crayon sketch. Red crayon on old sketch paper. The sketch depicts a late ’40s moderne house. The sketch is dated 6/22/48. The sketch is signed NJB. The initials must designate Norma Jean Baker. It was Monroe’s kosher name then.

A gummed stack of physician’s prescription pads. Also old and weathered. Embossed with “Sheldon Mandel/M.D., Practice in Psychiatry.” Plus a Bedford Drive/Beverly Hills address. Plus a four-digit Crestview phone number. The four digits denote the 1940s.

A rotted paper bag. Spilled maryjane buds and leaves. Fat buds and leaves. It’s good maryjane.

Empty pill vials. Legibly labeled. Scripts filled at the Beverly Wilshire Hotel pharmacy. Scripts for phenobarbital and sodium secobarbital. Prescribed to Norma Jean Baker. Prescribed by Dr. Sheldon Mandel.

The “Norma Jean Baker” had a black ink line running through it. Monroe printed “Not my name anymore” beneath it. Man Camera reprise. I went through Monroe’s trash, one month back. I found an empty Nembutal vial. She’d crossed out the “Marilyn Monroe.” She wrote “Not my name anymore” beneath it.

Man Camera reprise. I B and E’d Ralph Greenson and Milt Wexler’s office. I played a Greenson-Monroe tape. Monroe told Greenson she had Jack-and-Bobby dirt going back fourteen years. That meant 1948.

Here’s the final item. It looks brand-new. It’s a laminated business card.

The card advertises “Foxtone Services.” It features a leering-fox logo. The furry fucker is panting. He’s got a big forked tongue. He wears a fetishistic spiked collar and sports a jumbo two-headed schvantz. The card reads:

“Foxtone Services/PO box 6969/L.A., Calif/Your Wife Or Mine?/ Investment Opportunities”

*FOX*tone. 20th Century–FOX. Cleopatra as cash drain, FOX in the shit, Cleo bleeding FOX dry.

I broomed west on Fountain. The Foxtone fox hovered behind me. He was the hellhound on my trail. We were three hours into the chase.

He chased me downtown. I went by Intel, Ad Vice, and the Postal Inspection Service. I got the lowdown on PO box 6969. The 69 box block was assigned to “Bev’s Switchboard.” It was off of Fountain and Crescent Heights. The proprietress was one Bev Shoftel.

It’s a legitimate storefront mail drop. The clients possess front-door keys. The keys permit them to enter and grab their mail, twenty-four hours. Bev caters to low-life Hollywood. Lunatic actors and actresses, call girls and boys, smut-film purveyors, hipster artistes.

I went by the DA’s Office and jacked Miller Leavy. Get me a search warrant, boss. Miller said, “The U.S. mail is Federal. You’ll need a Federal warrant.” I zipped over to the U.S. Attorney’s Office and hit up a second-rung guy. I dropped Bobby the K’s name and laid out my rationale for the paper. The dink said he’d think about it.

I pulled up to the storefront and parked. I sized the place up. It had triple-thick window glass. Plus a steel-plate door and roll-up window mesh. It looked impregnable.

The door was propped open. I walked in. The dump was small post office size. It was box-shaped. Pull-out mail slots covered the side and back walls. They ran floor to ceiling. Bev Shoftel sat in a lawn chair and sipped a Lucky Lager. A transistor radio belched a Dodgers game. Bev wore pedal pushers and a Dodgers scoop neck.

She saw me and went Show me. I walked up and flipped my credential case. She shook her head. I got out my billfold. She crooked a finger. I dropped three C-notes in her lap.

She said, “I don’t reveal my clients’ names. I don’t snitch off the specifics of what they do. Your three yards entitles you to an overview and no more.”

I said, “Box 6969.”

Bev said, “Aaahhh, the much-coveted soixante-neuf series of boxes. I will guardedly state that the whole series is rented by so-called entrepreneurs employed at 20th Century–Fox. They’re out to capitalize on the Cleopatra fiasco. My fool renters are hawking Fox Savings Bonds, along with whatever other fool scams they can think up.”

—

The same bungalow. The same terrace. The same canopied swing. The same white wine and cold lobster salad.

I said, “Eddie Fisher’s back at the Losers. I’m working the gigs. They just fell back in my lap. Three nights only. You should check it out.”

Lois checked the sky. There were no clouds at dusk. That meant no rain.

“What’s wrong with you? All this intrigue you’ve got going isn’t enough?”

“Come on. It’s three nights at a nightclub.”

“You work yourself frazzled, you work your men frazzled. Nat and I gab on the phone, as you well know. He said he and Phil are putting in twelve-hour days on the canvass.”

I laughed. “Nat’s indiscreet, but he’s got limits. He’s not going to give up the inside dirt on the deal, which I know you’ve been angling for.”

Lois lit a cigarette. “He told me you’ve got a thing going with Pat Lawford.”

“He’s not quite up-to-date.”

“I saw her with her sisters at the Peppermint Lounge. She’s too tall and too thin. I know her type. Coffee, cigarettes, and two salads a day, tops.”

I jiggled her hands. “Pat saw you on Alcoa Presents. She said you’re short, and your eyes are too close together. She said you look like a Siamese cat.”

Lois howled. “I do look like a Siamese cat.”

I laced up our fingers and stretched our arms full length. Full dusk hit. The temperature dipped.

“The canvass is a bust. It had to be done, so we did it, and I’ll hit some of the places Nat and Phil marked as questionable. The Hollywood people have heard stories, but not the rich squarejohn folks. Here’s the bottom line. Jack and Marilyn. It’s out in the ether, and the ether’s running thin.”

Lois twirled her ashtray. “The story’s inevitable. Jack and Marilyn. Bobby and Marilyn, when the wind drifts a certain way. People pick up glimmers or bits of stories, and they embellish like mad.”

I feigned a yawn. Jack and Marilyn/Bobby and Marilyn. Nat and Lois talk. Pat confides in Bobby. It’s all extraneous yak-yak.

“Let’s change the subject. You’ve got the stewardess-in-love flick, and you’re reading for this schlock guy at Fox, Maury Dexter. I heard he’s a pillhead in the Freddy O. mode. What else? Oh, yeah—he’s got a giant-rat job and a twist flick, and you'll have to settle for scale."

Lois dropped an ice cube in her wineglass and kicked off her shoes. She rechecked the sky. No summer storm tonight.

"I'll get both jobs, and I'll get more than scale. I'm a name in New York, and Maury knows it. I'll play second fiddle to a large rodent and a bevy of stacked high school girls. They twist all night, while a psychopath stalks them, and a daring cop lays in wait. Can you believe it?"

I said, "Twist Party Stakeout, right? I was passing through Fox and caught some auditions."

Lois rolled her eyes. "That's it. And the truly funny thing is that some working L.A. cop wrote the screenplay."

I hooked a chair over. We put our feet up and slouched on the swing. Lois laid her head on my shoulder. I smelled her green-tea shampoo.

"Here's a curveball. Have you ever been headshrunk? It's not a critique. All actresses go that route, don't they?"

Lois tickled me. "No, not all actresses. I've never been headshrunk, let alone headshrunk by Ralph R. Greenson, currently well known to readers of the L.A. Herald-Express."

I sighed. "You're right. I've got this job on the brain. Monroe's on the couch with Greenson, but she's looking for a more radical shrink who'll cosign her criminal tendencies, and Nat and Phil and I found a pill vial prescribed by—"

Lois squeezed my arm. "A shrink named Shelley Mandel, right? I talked to Nat a few hours ago, and he told me. Well, Doc Shelley never shrunk me, but he cruised all the pageant girls back when I was Miss Chicago."

I whistled. " '48, right? '48 into '49?"

"Right. I was a Miss America runner-up, and the show junketed through L.A. The big postwar VD epidemic was at its height, and our chaperones had Doc Shelley lecture us. He also passed out prophylactic kits, but that was strictly on the sly. I read him as harmless. He leched on the girls and wrote pep-pill scripts, which shocked a few of us, but not me. He purportedly knew all sorts of call girls and bottom-line starlets, which is hardly startling news, given the time and place."

Confluence, showbiz, postwar hijinx. I grabbed it and filed it.

Lois rubbed her chin on my shoulder. Her shag hairstyle worked. Miss Chicago, '48—despite her weird eyes.

I said, "Do you love me?"

Lois said, “I’ll think about it.”

PART 4

SHRINK WRAP

(AUGUST 21–28, 1962)

28

(LOS ANGELES, 10:30 A.M., TUESDAY, 8/21/62)

Doc Greenson served coffee and cakes. He'd served Monroe martinis. I peeped their sessions at this selfsame spot.

Miller Leavy set up the confab. He furnished my cover. I was adjunct fuzz on coroner Curphey's "Blue Ribbon Panel." The panel's goal: to analyze the glut of suicides and inadvertent OD's for creative types. It was a full-fledged phenomenon. I cited Monroe and Carole Landis. I thought bloviator Greenson would bloviate on Monroe and Landis. He'd groove them as sicko sisters under the skin. He didn't bloviate on them. He bloviated self-justification.

"It's these radio call-in shows hosted by women with undergrad psych degrees. The callers are 99% women. They despise male psychiatrists and attribute the basest of pathologies to those who treat female celebrities. I'll concede that I might have been overly available, but to assert that I was at Marilyn's 'beck and call,' as some of those women have, is preposterous."

I witnessed it. Deedee Grenier embellished it. Greenson was Marilyn's slave and faux daddy. He pulled his pud while he spun tapes of their sessions. Marilyn tweaked him with lurid sex jive.

"There have been shrinks who've violated their psychiatric briefs by performing gynecological exams right there in their offices, so these accusations do have a basis in fact. I could name you—"

I cut in. "Dr. Shelley Mandel. An informant told me that he gave starlets and call girls prescription pads as stocking stuffers. Of course, that was back in the swinging postwar era."

Greenson sipped coffee. His hands shook. The cup and saucer rattled.

"Shelley was a gifted immunologist. He specialized in sulfa drugs and dabbled in psychiatry. He liked racy young women to an untoward degree, rather like the late Marilyn and powerful politicians."

I said, "I was at a party, shortly after Miss Monroe's death. People were discussing Miss Monroe’s liaisons with John and Robert Kennedy, as if they were established facts.”

Greenson buffed his glasses on his necktie. He spotted cake crumbs on his shirt and brushed them off.

“You’re straying rather far from the panel’s mandate, Lieutenant. But I’ll humor you, because Marilyn’s fantasy apparatus intensely interests me.”

I said, “I’m listening, sir.”

Greenson smirked. “Well, there’s no smut here, so I’m afraid you’ll have to indulge my abstractions. Simply put, Marilyn was a congenital liar and a ham-handed fantasist, with a very weak grasp on verisimilitude. Her initial perceptions of John F. Kennedy were quite lucid, and I believed them because she portrayed the president as feckless, shallow, usurious, and even more self-involved than she was. She did not inflate the sexual value of their first coupling, but she gradually, session by session, escalated her own importance to the point where the president of the United States was no more than her sexual submissive, while his brother Robert feared for his mental solvency and took over the role of Marilyn’s lover as an ‘issue of national security.’ From there, Marilyn’s romantic fantasies grew to include the banishment of Jacqueline and Ethel Kennedy, mass divorce, and Marilyn installed as First Lady. Concurrently, her alcoholism and drug addiction spiraled, apace with her fantasy life.”

She knew you dug the stories. You fed the cues/you said, “Jump”/ Marilyn said, “How high?”

My office break-in. That tape I played. Marilyn says she’s got filth on Jack and Bobby. It was fourteen-year-old filth. That meant ’48. Carole Landis suicided in ’48. Monroe knew Shelley Mandel in ’48. 1948 triggered jackpots.

I said, “I’m fishing here, Doctor. Did Miss Monroe come to the realization that her relationship with the brothers was entirely fantastical, and at that point did her fantasies turn vindictive?”

Greenson checked his watch. My questions vexed him. Some Blue Ribbon panelist. I wore him thin.

“Yes. Her narrative arc described her sexual dominance, her instigation of domestic chaos, and her intention to ‘get’ Jack and Bobby for the ‘degradation and debasement’ they inflicted upon her fourteen years ago, although she never stated just what that degradation and debasement was. Once they were revealed, it would strip them of their power, and she’d beneficently help them to rebuild their lives.”

I said, "That was white of her."

Greenson said, "Touché."

I twirled my coffee cup. "Miss Monroe claimed to have received breather calls and perverted letters during the last days of her life, and she told friends that her home had been burgled. Did she tell you this, and did you believe her?"

Greenson said, "No. She told me the same thing. It was patent fantasia."

"I understand that she was in the market for a 'more radical psychiatrist.' One who would encourage her more aggressive fantasies."

Greenson flinched. "I don't recall her pursuing that line of chat with me."

You lying sack of shit.

Paul de River. Real name Paul Joseph Israel. Reconstructive surgeon and ophthalmologist. A psychiatric dabbler, à la Shelley Mandel.

I parked outside his office. He had a top-floor duplex spot off of Oakwood and La Brea. It was lower-Hollywood residential. He must keep criminal-patient files and psycho-treatment narcotics. Top-floor spots were rough entries. You had downstairs neighbors. You had exposed landings. De River knew from security. The door frames and window casings were steel-reinforced. That meant interior bolt mounts. Note the "Brinks-patrolled" decal on the front door.

My thoughts ping-ponged. I stalled the door knock. I did law library and Intel file research last night. I exhumed Carole Landis and Mitzi Perloff. I put Del Kinney and Doc de River under the lens.

The Hearst rags gave Landis big play. She was twenty-nine. She lost at love. She was a yelp-for-help suicide attempter. Her career was skidsville. She breezed through husbands. She was now on #4. She had a big spread in the Palisades. Boo-hoo. Nobody loves me. She had a torrid tilt with Brit heartthrob Rex Harrison. "Sexy Rexy" refused to dump waifly wife, Lili Palmer. Carole pulled the plug—7/5/48.

It was straight-up suicide. It was investigated and adjudicated as such. It's fourteen years later. Sexy Rexy's playing Julius Caesar in Cleopatra. Call it boo-hoo redux. Marilyn Monroe offs herself. Some nut sent her a Landis morgue shot and a note.

"I loved her before I loved you."

It was fourteen years ago. The nut had to be at least an adolescent then. ’48 to ’62. Who’d the nut perv on during that interval? Did the nut send the pic and note and leave it at that? Is the nut the burglar-breather that Monroe beefed to Pat and others? Did the nut pull similar shit with Landis way back when? I checked the Landis DB file at Homicide. Souvenir-hunter cops had picked it clean. All Landis-to-Monroe throughlines had been snipped.

Landis to Monroe. On to Mitzi Perloff. The law library kept a full run of Vivid Detective magazines. The rag wrote up the Mitzi snatch in the May ’37 issue. Mitzi vanished on 2/17/37. She was eight. Sister Gwen turned eleven in March. The girls were Hollywood born-and-bred. They lived in a foster home on De Longpre and Wilton. Mitzi was a roamer. She picked flowers in the gardens of Immaculate Heart High School and Ferndell Park. The LAPD’s Hollywood squad and the Sheriff’s mounted posse worked the job. Local pervs were hard-braced. No leads surfaced. Pervy IH boys and ped-o priests were hard-braced. No leads surfaced. The mounted posse scoured Ferndell and Griffith Park. They dug up three skeletized little girls. Tests were performed. They were ID’d as circa ’28 sex-fiend victims. Sergeant Delbert W. Kinney, Jr., led the posse. The search extended to the Pasadena-Monrovia foothills. Two more skeletized little girls were found. Tests were performed.

They were circa ’26 sex-fiend victims. Sex-fiend files were reviewed. No leads surfaced.

Intel kept blue sheets on ranking L.A. cops. I found one on Del Kinney.

Delbert Welbourne Kinney, Jr. DOB 9/13/09/Sparta, Wisconsin. Joins LASO, 1/18/31. Works custody at the Mira Loma and Wayside honor ranchos. Promoted to sergeant, 4/36. Runs the Sheriff’s mounted posse, ’36–’39. Runs the Sheriff’s Alien Squad and supervises the roundups of Japanese nationals and native-born Japanese in the wake of Pearl Harbor. Promoted to lieutenant, 11/44. Lateral transfer to the state Alcoholic Beverage Control Board, 7/46. Directs undercover operations. Investigates liquor hijacks out of three ABC field offices. The focused subject of an internal investigation, 9/49.

Two trucks packed with un-tax-stamped liquor are jacked at a rest stop off the 101 southbound. The ABC agents driving and guarding the shipments are gagged, hog-tied, and left in a secluded shack nearby. The robbery was accomplished in a brusque and professional manner. The stolen liquor was brand-name/top-shelf/high-retail-per-pour stock. The shipment was tagged “Level-one security.”

Four ranking ABC men knew the what and where. Del Kinney was one of them. The internal investigators called him their top suspect. They had no proof. They filed no charges. They worked off of rumored affiliations and surmise.

Del Kinney was "cordial" with film-studio humps/white slavers/ labor agitators/pornographic-film distributors Hershel Aadland (1904–)/Meyer Aadland (1906–)/and Ira Aadland (1907–). The Aadland brothers purportedly trafficked in counterfeit tax stamps and owned a chain of bar and grills that served contraband liquor. Lieutenant Kinney weathered three grueling interrogations and cleaved to his innocence. The investigators pressed him on the two prevalent rumors that came to their attention.

One: that Kinney owed significant gambling debts to Hersh Aadland, and fingered the booze shipment to pay off the debts. Two: that Kinney interceded on the behalf of a young woman who had embezzled large sums from two Aadland-owned roadhouses in Monterey County. He fingered the booze shipment. It repaid all outstanding debts.

Kinney remained on the ABC. The Aadland brothers hid behind their lawyers. The hijack case remains unsolved. The young woman was not identified. Kinney retired from the ABC, 4/53. He got the security-boss gig at Fox a month later. The Aadland brothers are big machers at Fox. It is widely held that they got Del K. the job.

What's the lowdown here?

Who's the young woman?

Kinney to Paul Joseph Israel/aka Paul de River.

Eye doctor, sawbones, psychiatric hobbyist. Sex-fiend afficionado. He studies them, interviews them, writes about them. He gets Marilyn Monroe hopped up on them. He ran his "Sex Offense Bureau" out of LAPD. He held sex fiend coffee klatches and group therapy sessions. Sex fiends test-piloted Dr. Paul's gourmet dope compounds. Dr. Paul watched sex fiends masturbate while hooked up to respirators and blood-pressure cuffs. Dr. Paul arranged blind dates for male and female sex fiends and chaperoned them to Walt Disney flicks and burgers and malts at Bob's Big Boy. Ex-chief Worton admired de River. Bill Parker hated him. He canned him and dissolved the Sex Offense Bureau. Thus, de River hates the LAPD.

2/28/51. The State Board of Medical Examiners censures him. The beef? The "indiscriminate prescribing of narcotics." His medical license is nearly revoked. He gets a chump admin job with the VA. His wife dies in '61. He sells their Orange County home and moves back to L.A. He's sixty-nine now. He still consults and sees patients. He's got that steel-buffed/unbustable office, right across the street. L.A. breeds swinging sex fiends. I can't fault his return.

Hey, dad—remember me?

Dads was wisp-thin. He spoke raspy. His New Orleans drawl was a shuck. He skimped on his office. The rugs ran threadbare. His analysand chair gored my ass. He splurged on his file-tape room.

Steel-reinforced doors. Blinking sensor lights. Alarm-rigged file compartments—make book on it.

No receptionist. He answered my door knock. My credentials rubbed him wrong. He hated and feared cops. He tried to door-slam me. I eased him back inside. He flopped in a ratty Barcalounger and glared impotent.

I shot my cuffs. "'When all other forms of applied therapy have failed, it may be possible to contravene absent, passive, or self-destructively reactive behavior with the imposition of direct criminal reaction.' Why would Marilyn Monroe have written that in your loopy book The Sexual Criminal?"

De River said, "I have not the slightest notion. I never met the late Miss Monroe."

Liar. Prevaricator. Dissembler. Here's the tell. His hands spazzed up at "Marilyn."

"She took her home-decorating cues from you. She collected photographs in that pervert-modernist style you seem to favor. She posed for pornographic snapshots with a rough-trade boy who disguised his identity with whiteout eye strips. They were just like the ones you put on Otto Stephen Wilson."

De River said, "Steve was a horrible boy, but I rather liked him."

I said, "I beat him half dead at Lincoln Heights. Just for kicks and grins."

De River coughed. His lungs were shot. He was frail. His life span loomed as next week.

"For a DA's Bureau investigator, you're rather coarse. And I can't see you as a member of coroner Curphey's Blue Ribbon Panel. You seem to lack compassion for Miss Monroe."

"Miss Monroe told her shrink Ralph Greenson that she was in the market for a more radical analyst. I thought of you right off the bat. Miss Monroe goes back with headshrinkers, by the way. Dr. Sheldon Mandel was feeding her dope back when she went by the name Norma Jean Baker. I'll bet you crossed paths with Shelley. You're both physicians with an amateur psychiatrist bent."

Doc Shelley buzzed him. Here's the tell. His stick legs spazzed.

"Did you headshrink Monroe, boss? Did she play to your vanity? Did you hear out her twisted fantasies and get your rocks off? Did you soothe her and baby-talk her and tell her that her puerile fixation on fuckhead criminals and freaks was avant-garde, and that she was the most misunderstood and underestimated artist of our era?"

De River scoped me, half gaga. He gnashed up his hands. His outsized veins pulsed.

"Why would Marilyn Monroe make a great many pay-phone calls and dress up in fat-girl disguise to do so?"

De River went deep gaga. His eyes went dope floaty. He levitated somewhere off Planet Earth.

"Why would Marilyn Monroe keep forty grand in a lockbox under her bed? Why would she fly to and from Mexico, under a false name, in disguise, vouched by false documents?"

De River rocked his Barcalounger. His legs twitched.

"Does the name José Bolaños sound familiar to you? He's a Mexican Commie, and a probable dope pusher. Does he ring any bells?"

De River sighed. His dentures protruded. They were nicotine-hued.

"Did you inject her with collagen, to alter her appearance? Did she explain the bite scar on her upper left bicep? You must have known quite a few psycho biters. Did you introduce her to criminal manqués you thought she might find engaging? Did you set her up with a sweet guy who mails out morgue photos of movie stars and sends glued-on-letter notes along with them?"

De River plotzed. He covered his mouth with a seat cushion and stifled a whimper or screech.

Dads was infirm. He verified zilch. He reacted to digs. He lived and breathed the criminal demimonde. His reactions might indicate foreknowledge. His reactions might be plain neural response. I ridiculed his expertise. I humbled him. I learned one thing. He fucked with Monroe on some level. I know that. I had to get at his files. That meant a kamikaze play.

I stopped at a pay phone and stiffed update calls. My DMV man was backlogged. He hadn't run the plate checks on my Fox accounting cars. R&I was backlogged. They hadn't run the name checks on Peter Lawford's Girl Book.

Backlogs. That means loose ends. Loose ends in West Hollywood. Here's a tweaker—Jeanne Carmen lives just off the Strip.

I swooped over and parked out front. The gate opened up on a courtyard pool and lounge pit. Out-of-work actresses splashed and chugged mimosas. Jeanne's pad overlooked the pool. The door was wide open.

I walked up. I caught a pill-party hangover, full stop.

Deedee Grenier was passed out on the couch. Babs Payton snoozed in a chair. Lila Leeds dozed in a sleeping bag on the floor. An old-fashioned glass was propped up against her. Jeanne putted golf balls in and around it.

"Freddy O.'s here. Let's hope he brought money. There's a horror festival on Channel 9 tonight. Pizza and booze would be nice, but we're flat."

I passed her two yards. She air-kissed me and sank a long putt.

"Marilyn Monroe's old drama coach, Natasha Lytess. Unload her for me."

Jeanne said, "She's dying. She's got the Big C, and she's cutting out fast. She's known in the biz as the 'Bride of Dracula,' when she'd rather be known as the 'Bride of Marilyn,' but Marilyn don't fly that way, except for brief moments. She's been goony for Marilyn ever since The Asphalt Jungle. She's very pushy, and Russian. Marilyn got sick of her, and Darryl Z. banished her from the Fox lot. She's an acquired taste that not many people acquire."

I lit a cigarette. "Would it surprise you to know that Miss Lytess moved into a house within peeping distance of Marilyn's place on Fifth Helena?"

Jeanne blew a short putt. It hit Lila's head and ricocheted. Lila dozed on.

"There's your intro right there. You're fellow peepers."

I yocked. "Dr. Shelley Mandel. You landed here after the war, so you must have known him, or heard of him. Why would Marilyn have a prescription pad of his from '48?"

Jeanne lit a cigarette. "All the girls in The Life knew Shelley. He gave away script pads as goodwill gestures, like the Marshall Plan for young chicks. There were lots of pervs afoot in L.A. after the war, because the war messed with their heads. Shelley's big thing was getting call girls to double-date when they went out on jobs, because there's safety in numbers. That's how I met Lila, back in '47. We used to shtup in adjoining rooms at the Roosevelt. Marilyn was working call jobs then, and I know she had a girl she doubled up with, but I don't know who."

I said, "What happened to Shelley Mandel?"

"The last I heard, he was still around. He was moving black-market penicillin during and after the war, and the BNDD has been halfheartedly looking into him ever since V-J Day. He's mobbed up, in a very minor way. He's related to the Aadland brothers by marriage."

The Aadlands. Fox. Del Kinney. Shelley Mandel. The Aadlands. That name spool-threading through—

"Come back for the fun tonight, Freddy. We're painting a wall tribute to Marilyn."

—

Flowers and champagne. Amends for the dope I filched. She might be testy. It couldn't hurt.

Her old Ford was parked in the driveway. It torqued my memory and sent me eidetek. I leaned on the doorbell and got no response. I walked around to the back.

There's Miss Lytess.

She reclined on a lawn lounger. A date palm half shaded her. She wore an old cardigan and a mauve slip. It was 96 and humid. She shivered. She clamped down on the lounge slats and stanched tremors.

She looked bad. "Cutting out fast" said it. She coughed into a handkerchief. The fabric was bloodstained.

I coughed. She noticed me. She said, "Don't you start doing it."

I dragged a matching chair up. Miss Lytess studied me. I passed her the champagne and flowers. She popped the cork and spritzed up her slip. It clung to her rib bones. She was tall. She weighed in at ninety pounds, tops.

She said, "I've seen you before."

Her old car. It retweaked me. I snagged the full memory.

"November '54. You were sitting in your Ford, parked on Waring and Kilkea. You were staring at an apartment house window, because you thought Marilyn Monroe was engaged in an assignation there. It turned out that she wasn't. Miss Monroe was married to Joe DiMaggio then. I was there, and Frank Sinatra was there. DiMaggio was jealous. We kicked in the wrong door."

Miss Lytess chugged champagne. She grasped the jug two-handed. The effort taxed her. Her arms fluttered.

"Yes. The notorious 'Wrong-Door Raid.' Yes, you kicked in the wrong door, but Marilyn was next door, in an adjoining apartment. She was with her silly lover, Timmy Berlin. He was a film editor on Bus Stop and River of No Return."

"It sounds as if you disapproved of him."

Miss Lytess went ha! "I disapprove of all men who do not acknowledge me as the creator of Marilyn Monroe. Additionally, I disapprove of policemen who ply me with cheap domestic champagne before they introduce themselves, and share the purpose of their impromptu visits."

I stifled a grin. "My name's Otash. I'm with the DA's Office, and we're conducting an inquiry into Miss Monroe's suicide. Rumors have surfaced, and we're obliged to verify or dispel them. You were seen observing Miss Monroe—repeatedly and acutely—during the last months of her life. You were close to Miss Monroe at one time, so I'm quite anxious to get your perceptions."

Miss Lytess coughed blood in her handkerchief. She dug a pump inhaler and a pill vial from her pockets and dosed herself. She wheezed and expelled green shit. She chased two Dilaudid with my champagne.

She smiled and winked at me. Oh, you kid.

"The liquid tastes like fennel and wintergreen. The pills induce a certain enchantment."

I smiled and winked—Oh, you kid.

"All right. You're spying on Miss Monroe, and—"

"I have spent a goodly part of my life spying on Marilyn Monroe, and the last fallow months of her life were no exception."

"Why 'fallow'?"

"Fallow, because I sensed her moving toward her tether's end in a prosaic, entirely predictable, and boring fashion."

"For instance?"

"For instance, her sexual antics with a pizza delivery boy and a United Parcel Service driver who rather resembled Robert F. Kennedy. Her waddling out her front gate in ensembles designed for three-hundred-pound women, lugging pillowcases stuffed with God knows what. Her boon companionship with a very tall teenage girl who lavished adulation on her and would have continued to do so for another few months, until Marilyn dropped her flat. Her self-destructive behavior on her last film, widely reported in the press and on television. Her obscene performance at our sexy young president's birthday do in New York, and her—"

"When did Miss Monroe meet the president? Can you narrow it down?"

Miss Lytess unclenched. Her dope load hit. Her eyeballs pinned.

"I witnessed the fatuous moment of their convergence. Charlie Feldman threw a party. It was summertime in '54. They were there. They played themselves superbly that day. Marilyn dumped me in '56, you know. But for the last two years that I knew her, she harped on young Senator Jack to no end. She predicted his election, lived for their very infrequent quickies, and blathered on and on about herself as our 'shoo-in' First Lady. I blew up at her one evening and demanded that she say something real about the young man. Marilyn giggled and said, 'He has a small penis.' "

I strained it. I sifted and shifted it. It confirmed my foreknowledge.

"Did Miss Monroe ever indicate that she knew Jack Kennedy before she met him at that party?"

"Yes, but she was in her cups, because young Jack had stood her up on the occasion of their latest quickie. She said she had met him 'years before' Charlie Feldman's party, and she had 'impeachment-level' dirt on him, which she would 'go public with,' should he fail to divorce Jackie and marry her. I pressed Marilyn for more details, but Marilyn said, 'My lips are sealed.' "

I said, "Did Miss Monroe know the late Carole Landis? Do you recall her discussing Miss Landis' suicide?"

"No. I met Marilyn late in '49. Miss Landis was already dead. She wasn't a current topic of conversation."

"I know that Miss Monroe broke off with you sometime in '56. I would assume you haven't seen her since then. I'm trying to determine the genesis of a bite scar on her left bicep."

Miss Lytess made a face. "I have reviewed many magazine photographs of Marilyn. I recall no such scar."

"Did you actually converse with Miss Monroe during the time you were living here and observing her?"

"No."

"She told friends that her house had been burgled, that articles had been moved, and that she had received nasty letters. Did you observe men prowling in the vicinity of her house, and placing objects in her mailbox?"

"No. And I am not the type to burgle houses and peek in mailboxes myself."

I leaned in close. "I think Miss Monroe fell in with some people, near the end of her life. I think she indulged in a great deal of risky and perhaps dangerous behavior. I sense this very strongly. Are you privy to what might have occurred? Did you witness any incidents? How accurate do you consider my speculations to be?”

Miss Lytess sipped champagne. “Marilyn overestimated her sway over people. She played her cards too quickly and desperately, in her efforts to impress and seduce them. She gave herself up cheaply, in all ways. If these people you posit were canny and properly reserved, and if she wanted to imitate their self-sufficiency and general hauteur, she would have set out to prove herself to them in most dangerous ways.”

29

(LOS ANGELES, 11:15 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 8/22/62)

I tracked the scar. Sex biters were rare turds. My "psycho biter" crack buzzed Doc de River. I worked in the Intel screening room. I studied late-'50s magazine clips with a photo loupe.

The jizz-crusted Polaroids. Four in all. I sensed the Cruel Blond Stud as the biter. They were '58 or '59 vintage. Monroe was younger. The Feds seized my photos and bootjacked the PD's copies by court decree. I'd memorized every detail. I compared the thirty-two or thirty-three-year-old Monroe to a glut of news mag pix. I saw no close-up/bare-arm shots. I got no indications of healed and faded scarring.

I set up a projector and raided the surveillance-film vault. I selected four no-sound reels. They covered 5/59 up to this summer. The boxes were marked: time/date/location/gist of surveillance. Monroe gambols at ban-the-bomb/civil rights/bash-the-fuzz demonstrations. They were marked "daytime-exterior." They were shot outside City Hall and the PAB.

I doused the lights and spooled in a 5/59 reel. Black-and-white footage hit the screen. The specific date is 5/16. We're facing north. We're slow-panning east to west along the 1st Street sidewalk. The City Hall lawn provides a backdrop. Sixty-odd pinkos agitate.

They schmooze and pop placards. Beatniks, college kids, suffragette spinsters. They don't dig the A-bomb. Their lips move, no sound emits, their faces contort. Their placards read:

BAN THE BOMB. I DON'T WANT MY CHILD GROWING UP WITH STRONTIUM 90 IN HIS BONES. THE BOMB IS NOT GOOD FOR CHILDREN AND OTHER LIVING THINGS.

Establishing shots, a slash cut, close-ups and slow pans. There's Monroe. She's waving a strontium 90 sign. Protest punks point to her. Hey, look who's here!

The camera zooms close. The cameraman's gassed on Monroe. She's sporting a dark skirt and a head scarf. She's wearing a bare-arm blouse. The cameraman zooms ultraclose. He gets Monroe and bongo king Preston Epps in one shot. Tilt—there's no scar on her upper left bicep.

There are no new scar or healed-scar fade marks. Monroe had soft-toned arms on 5/16/59. My instinct solidified. The bitedown occurred during the let's-shoot-fuck-pix assignation. My '58–'59 shoot date was pure conjecture. It could have been later than that.

A memory tugged me. Why does the Cruel Blond Stud look familiar? This protest Monroe is the same Monroe as the fuck-pix Monroe. Her facial set and age lines run identical.

I yawned. I slept bad last night. Natasha Lytess got to me in some weird way. I traded Teletypes with Bill Parker. The Chief was pissed. Old man Zanuck beefed my smackdown. I Teletyped Parker back. I told him I had to juke my shit-magnet antics at Fox. I wanted to re-brace Zanuck. I wanted to hardnose Del Kinney before moving on Gwen Perloff. Parker Teletyped me back. He said he'd call Zanuck and tell him to grin and bear it. He'd lay in a threat: accommodate Lieutenant Otash or endure a search-warrant barrage.

I changed reels. It's 3/8/61 now. We're back outside City Hall. We're beefing segregated lunch counters. It's the same north-facing/east-to-west-track motif.

And there's Monroe. She's performing today. She's signing autographs. Fuck social protest—let's party! She signs a butch nun's WE SHALL OVERCOME! placard. Harry Belafonte walks into the frame. They perform for the fans. Marilyn grabs Harry. They break into the dirty dog twist.

Monroe's wearing a skirt and bare-arm blouse. The voyeur cam goes close. Re-tilt—there's the faded scar and skin-tone contrast. It's vivid in crisp black and white.

I'm convinced:

Cruel Stud bit Marilyn. I've revised my date range. The fuck-pic shoot and bitedown occurred between 5/16/59 and 3/8/61.

Slash cut. The camera pans the Broadway sidewalk. We're west-facing. Beatniks and disaffected squares mingle. Slash cut and perspective shift. The camera pans curbside spectators and parked cars. There's a 1960 Valiant sedan. The L.A. Sheriff's drive Valiants, exclusive. Two men stand by the car and gas on the show. It's Sheriff Pete Pitchess and Motel Mike Bayless.

Deedee Grenier dished Marilyn and Pete. They had an intermittent thing going.

The spool fluttered and slipped off the spindle. I slipped on a 5/4/62 spool.

We're outside the PAB. It's a Bash the PD bash. The Black Muslim shoot-out was hot news. Biracial protestors mingle. The camera spotlights the west sidewalk. Marilyn's wearing a black mourning dress. She's jabbing a sign. It reads CHIEF PAR*KKK*ER MUST GO!!!

I laughed. The camera cut off of Marilyn and focused on the jumped-up hoi polloi.

A time code ticked off. The lower left screen flashed a display. Sixteen minutes elapsed. Protestors bopped down Los Angeles Street, north to south. It bored me. I yawned. Then I saw something.

*A dress. A dress I saw in Monroe's bedroom closet. A Large Marge is wearing that selfsame dress. She's jabbing a Chief Par*KKK*er Must Go!!! sign.*

I squinted. The camera swung low. I saw legs and feet but no faces. I caught the hemline on the dress. I caught thin ankles and the black pumps Monroe wore as herself sixteen minutes back.

She went somewhere. She changed clothes. Why did she do it?

The camera arced up and panned faces. It caught Monroe as Large Marge. Her face looks puffy now. She shot herself up with collagen—or someone else did. She switched identities in the middle of a roiling protest gig. She's got the "dreamy eyes" Doc de River attributes to sex psychopaths. Schizo Marilyn. The '48 pill vial I saw. The '62 pill vial I saw. Marilyn crossed out "Norma Jean Baker" on the '48 vial and wrote "Not my name anymore" beside it. Marilyn crossed out the "Marilyn Monroe" on the '62 vial and wrote "Not my name anymore" beside it.

The room went claustrophobe hot. I turned off the lights and walked back to my cubicle. An R&I green sheet was squared off on my desk.

> Per "Girl Book" photograph #6. Be advised that subject has been identified as: Ingrid Norma Irmgard/WFA/DOB 12/8/33. Mexicali Airlines stewardess. Felony possession of marijuana/12/14/60/International Airport PD/Dismissed at arraignment. Crnt address: 1750 N. Lucretia Ave, Echo Park/NO-32859.

Scando Fox, Vivid Valkyrie. I reprised the Girl Book snapshot. Mexicali pillbox hat and full beaver. Saunas. Frozen vodka. Call Ingrid for the "Norway Doorway."

Ad Vice had an updated address card. 1750 Lucretia—a stewardess rotation flop behind El Mundo Bestbuy Market. Suspected hot-sheet hut. Se habla español at El Mundo and Casa Ingrid. Mexicali and Aeroméxico stews rule the roost.

I drove over. I parked in a curb slot and walked back. Four Mexicali pilots squeezed by me. They wore snazzy blue uniforms. They smiled and went Buenos días. I smiled back. They were airport-bound. They sipped Bloody Marys in plastic cups.

The hut was sandblasted stucco. Old paint jobs peeled off pink and lime green. Ingrid sat on a tin-roof porch. She wore a crocheted bikini top and tight jeans. She saw me and gulped.

I hopped the steps and leaned on a porch rail. Ingrid scooched her chair back. She turned and plugged in a porta fan. I caught her right-shoulder tattoo: "El Manny" and crossed boxing gloves.

"It's nothing you should worry about. It's just a few questions, and I don't intend to toss the place."

Ingrid lit a cigarette. "You wouldn't find anything in my space, but I can't vouch for my roommates or their visitors."

I smiled. "It's about Peter Lawford, and some photographs you posed for. I'm interested in how you met Lawford, how you came to be photographed, Lawford's so-called Girl Book, what resulted from the photos, and how things stand with you and Lawford now."

Ingrid blew smoke rings. "You want to know a lot, don't you?"

"Not a lot. A few candid answers, and I'll leave you alone."

"You could stick around. My roommates on the Mazatlán layovers are whipping up margaritas."

I rubbed my back on a porch post. My coat gapped. Ingrid caught my belt shit.

"Okay, Peter Lawford and yours truly in a hundred words or less, even though it's really embarrassing."

I twirled a finger. Let's move this along.

Ingrid said, "Okay, I part-time gig as a cater waitress. It's what you might describe as a semireputable line of work, and I've worked for some semisketchy people—and before you ask, I won't give up the places I've worked, because my Manny hates snitches, and I subscribe to his code."

I tingled. "Cater waitress" did it.

"That's all right. Just keep going."

"Okay. As you may know, most cater waiters and waitresses are in The Life. They hustle, they hawk their booties, they do favors for movie people so maybe they can catch a break. Okay, so I met Peter that way. I dated him, and I posed for some pictures, and all that was fine, but when Peter tried to set me up with his wife's brother, the president, I said, 'No, sir. That's just too creepy.' My Manny keeps me on a long leash, but I'm not a call girl or a concubine for that swishy John F. Kennedy. My Manny's a Nixon man. He says Kennedy's a puto communisto, and his daddy bought him the presidency."

I said, "Lawford told me that a 'queen-bee-type' cater waitress conceived the Girl Book deal, but he didn't know the woman's name. Queen-bee cater waitresses. Give me your first response."

Ingrid shrugged. "What response? All the cater girls I know are wage slaves and would-be actresses. Peter took some semisketchy pictures of me, but it was a single-o kind of deal, and I don't know any other cater waitresses who stew, or stews who cater-waitress. Stews and cater girls are all big blabbermouths, but nobody's ever told me they posed for beaver shots for a queen-bee type or for Peter Lawford. And, before you ask, I will not ask around, because my Manny would kill me."

I went Whoa. "Two names. Eleanora and Rick Dawes. Eleanora's a cater waitress, and she's a candidate for the queen bee. Rick Dawes is a cater waiter, and a possible fruit hustler, and a possible suspect in a string of Beverly Hills house burglaries."

Ingrid crushed her cigarette. "No to Eleanora, no to Rick Dawes. My Manny got popped for 459 once, but it was a humbug rap, because he's a straight-arrow guy. He was twenty-four and sixteen as a welterweight, but he wasn't that good. He took a night-school course to be a TV repairman, and he got a job at a repair shop in Brentwood. I brought my TV in to be fixed, and that's how we clicked."

Two Aeroméxico pilots weaved outside. They sipped Bloody Marys and noshed celery sticks.

"One last name. José Bolaños. He's a jack-of-all-trades. Communist, dope pusher, Hollywood suck-up."

Ingrid mock-spit. She supplied sound effects. It was vivid. She was vivid. I dug on her.

"No. I know lots of Josés, but no Bolaños."

I zinged her. "Ingrid, are you running dope to Mexico, for El Manny?"

"Not in this lifetime. It's not his bag, and it's not mine."

Stage-door Freddy. I fit the role. I'm built to yearn, watch, and wait.

Fox. Soundstage #11. Lois reads for schlockman Maury Dexter. The audition room was polar-AC'd. Bikini girls huddled in anoraks. A stooge scrounged them off a sex lark called Baby, It's Cold Outside.

Bill Parker came through. He called Darryl Zanuck and told him I had on-the-lot carte blanche. It sanctioned me to work raw. The Chief was up Ratfuck Bobby's ass on the FBI-boss deal. Monroe/Kidnap. I was two-front sanctioned to intimidate at will.

Lois read for schlock king Dexter. She's a divorced mom and chaperone for a twist party–cum-nightmare. It was a B quickie. Zanuck planned to flood the B market at Christmas. It was a Cleo-loss ploy.

Lois would be miscast. She's thirty-five and childless. She's no man's full-time woman and nobody's mom.

I was bughouse. I called Daryl Gates and told him to run the moniker file for thirtyish cholos named "El Manny." I gave him the soundstage call number and went Chop, chop. I told him to glom me a copy of the IO's task list on the kidnap job. He said it might be problematic. I told him to set it up as an Intel/SHIT trade. Offer up pap on the mosque at Slauson and Broadway. Pete Pitchess might succumb.

I paced the soundstage, front to back. I saw a pile of Cleo-esque debris in a corner. Swords, scabbards, breastplates. Spiked helmets and steel-cup jockstraps. Roddy McDowall popped through a side door and poked through them.

He's back from Rome and the dizzy debacle. I logged a hundred Rome-to-Brentwood tap calls. Roddy regales Marilyn. He's going to craft a gay smut film. It will utilize Cleo detritus and reframe Cleo as epic farce. It will be a work of stunning revisionism and "sound the prophetic tonal chord for a whole new era of revolutionary filmmaking."

I yocked. Roddy caught it and saw me. He flipped me off and scrammed out the door. Confidential skewered the Saints and Sinners drag ball, eons back. Roddy's date was Miss Drag America, 1953. He was six-eight and shot hoops for the St. Louis Hawks.

I bopped back to the audition room and watched Lois read. I snagged a copy of the Twist Party Stakeout script.

The title page ditzed me. Doofus Sid Leffler wrote it. Sid, the nebbish squadroom cop. "Officer Sid," high school toastmaster. Sid feeds Pali girls booze at the Sip 'n' Surf. I saw it myself.

Lois read with a gum-popping coed. Gee, mom—a psycho killer is loose in the Palisades! Does that mean I can't go to the beach? Do I have to cancel my party tonight? Well, Sally, we'll just have to see about that!

The wall phone rang. I grabbed it.

Daryl Gates said, “We got one hit on El Manny. Your guy has to be Juan Manuel Salas, DOB 11/4/26, L.A. One Chino bounce for stat rape, August ’54. One dismissed house burglary charge, May ’57.”

Lois winked and flashed a thumbs-up. She aced the audition and got the job.

30

(LOS ANGELES, 9:30 A.M., THURSDAY, 8/23/62)

My tube gizmo rattled. I heard a telltale whoosh. The feeder lid retracted. I reached over and pulled out the tube.

Daryl Gates delivered. I spread the task list out on my desk. Motel Mike Bayless block-printed. It was a thought-through memorandum. It laid out straight-ahead detective work.

Motel Mike bossed a five-man crew. West Hollywood station ran a twenty-four-hour tip line. They ran nationwide paper on the late Richie Danforth, the late Buzzy Stein, and Gwen Perloff. Gwen came up clean. Buzzy Stein's sex priors were noted. Danforth came up nationwide clean. It confounded Motel Mike. No print cards, no NCIC numbers, no fifty-state arrest records. Danforth's hands were pulped, Danforth's feet were severed and mashed. It scotched state, local, and Federal print runs and a shot at baby footprints in hospital archives. There were 284 Richard Danforths culled in the 1960 census. All were contacted. All were accounted for. None was him. Nobody knew shit about him. Buzzy Stein's wife and three kids were braced. They revealed jackshit and hid behind Buzzy's lawyer brother.

The Hats and I popped Danforth and Stein at a back house off of 6th and Dunsmuir. A "heavyset older woman" rented it. The same woman rented the Tiki-Torch pad where the Sheriff's rescued Gwen. The heavyset woman paid cash in advance and stiffed the managers with a phony name and unverifiable references. Both locations had been print-wiped and solvent-scrubbed. Sheriff's techs snagged zero latents. Fiber collections went pffft. The three go-throughs snagged innocuous grit. Door-to-door canvasses revealed zilch. Six eyewits viewed the snatch. They described six dissimilar vehicles. That scotched DMV checks. Gwen Perloff was chloroformed and remained unconscious for the city-to-Valley haul. She was blood-checked at Queen of Angels. Tests revealed the chloroform and six grains of sodium secobarbital. The kidnap guys fed her heavily spiked burgers and induced a long snooze. Perloff was unconscious for most of her confinement.

She was interviewed three times. She repeatedly stated that she had no enemies and did not know who snatched her. Motel Mike ran checks on the casts and crews of the last six films Perloff appeared in. Numerous drunk-driving and spousal-battery beefs were revealed and dismissed as irrelevant. The men were interviewed and cleared. Perloff refused to discuss her romantic life. She denied a wingding with Darryl F. Zanuck. Motel Mike interviewed Zanuck. DFZ denied the wingding.

Motel Mike asserted that the Hat Squad and Freddy O. blew the case. The Danforth toss was a "vigilante action." He urged Sheriff Pete Pitchess to seek legal redress. Pitchess refused.

We shouldn't have tossed him. I know that now. So do the Hats. We also know this:

Danforth's exit line: "It's a put-up job."

Gwen Perloff was in on the snatch.

I staked out her building. I parked across the street and just sat there. It was a two-story/hipster-moderne job. She lived in the upstairs front. Her living room window looked out on me. Gwen, this is Freddy. Freddy, this is Gwen.

She was home. I preprowled the underground garage and tossed her sled. She owned a '59 Triumph. I master-keyed the driver's door. I found a copy of yesterday's Hollywood Reporter on the seat. I leafed through it and caught a back-page squib. It was inked in trade paper–ese:

"Kidnap vict Gwen Perloff to star in saucy self-scripted biopic. It's on tap as 'Hard Luck Girl.' Fox to produce. DFZ himself 'to provide personal input.' Pic details kid sister's baffling disappearance and probable lust murder. Talent hunt for nifty child actress to play Miss Perloff as a 'busty preadolescent.' Fox's 'Baron of the B's,' Maury Dexter, to direct."

In the glove box:

A staghorn-grip .38 Smith automatic. Six in the clip, one in the chamber.

I disassembled the piece. The serial number had been acid-dipped. It was a no-provenance cold piece. It confirmed rumors of Gwen in The Life.

Behind the seat:

A triple-reinforced pillowcase. Filled with nickels, dimes, quarters.

I got ice chills. I got whiplash. Perloff/Monroe/Perloff/Monroe. I could not think beyond the two names.

That was three hours back. My mind spooled that stutter loop, nonstop. I heard the names and stared down Perloff's front door.

I was shot to shit. I spent half the day at the County Plans Office. I studied postwar file photos of recently built houses. I tried to match pix to Monroe's sketch of 6/22/48. Nothing came close. Why should it? I found the sketch in a hidey-hole. It footnoted Monroe's crazy life.

Perloff/Monroe/Perloff/Monroe. I couldn't think past it.

She walked out her door. She wore sun-bleached jeans and a man's white shirt.

She eyed the street. She made me. She knew I was perched there. She looked away. I hit the horn. She heard it and ignored it and walked back inside.

Del Kinney checked my badge kit. It was disingenuous. The Pico gate guard called and prewarned him. Pops Zanuck must have warned him. We're hamstrung, Del. Bill Parker wants this. He'll nuisance-warrant us if we don't comply.

The security hut was scrunched behind a Gay Nineties set. It featured a muster room/guard's lounge/golf-cart repair shed. Kinney's office was air-cooled and knotty pine–paneled. His desk was half Zanuck size. He's got a comfy wing chair. My chair wobbled on uneven legs.

He tossed the kit back. It dropped in my lap.

"You've come up in the world, based on what I know about you. I'll talk to you, within discreet limits."

I snickered. "Clarify something for me. Were you tipped that I was running a crew on the lot from April through June?"

Kinney lit a cigarette. "Hersh Aadland called me, at Jimmy Hoffa's behest. You, Denkins, Molette, and Irwin had already been seen habituating the Got to Give set, and Mr. Hoffa's message was to leave Mr. Otash and his boys alone. I figured you were jobbing Marilyn Monroe for Mr. Hoffa, and given that you're you, the deal was extortion."

I flushed. Kinney opened strong. I dug my legs in. My chair wobbled—Whoa, now.

Kinney said, "Okay, so Marilyn's dead, and you're credentialed up. Here's my guess and Pete Pitchess' guess. You've switched sides, and you're doing mop-up work for Bill Parker and the Kennedys. Let's put Freddy O. out as a dirt sieve and see what he collects. You're dirty on the Hoffa job, and you and the Hats are dirty on the Perloff snatch. Really, Freddy. Did you have to waste that Danforth guy? Couldn't you and the Hats have just thumped him until he gave up Gwen's location?"

"Gwen, huh? I dig the intimate tone."

It fell flat. I fizzled. Kinney evil-eyed me.

"I met Gwen when she was ten years old. I ran the mounted posse when her sister disappeared. She's the kid sister I never had, and I'm the big brother she never had. Watch what you say about Gwen."

I bore down. "All well and good. But she's dirty, and the kidnap caper's dirty, and that trumps all your brother-sister jive."

Kinney splayed his hands. They covered half his desk. He had strongarm-goon mitts.

"I'll concede the point, and I'll toss you a bone that will permit you to walk out of here with your balls intact."

I gulped. My Adam's apple popped. Kinney saw it and smirked.

"Bill Parker and Pete Pitchess have a handshake deal to let the kidnap job go. Pete knows it's dirty, and he doesn't want to sully his department. Parker wants you to work it for the sole purpose of covering LAPD on the Danforth deal. Miller Leavy sees the job from an entirely different perspective. He's waxing fifty-fifty right about now. Half of him wants to can the job. Half of him wants to burn you and the Hats for Danforth."

I coughed. It was camouflage. It hid my borderline shakes.

"Gwen Perloff. She couriers bearer bonds for Zanuck and some other studio hotshots."

Kinney said, "No comment."

"Gwen Perloff. She's banging old man Zanuck, and he set her up in that vanity Hard Luck Girl production."

Kinney said, "No comment."

"Fox is in the shitter. People here are scared. Bonds, dope, wife-swap clubs, you're taking calls from the Aadland brothers, and they're as bad as they get."

Kinney said, "No comment."

I bore down. "Let's keep both our sets of balls intact. Give up Gwen's known associates that you just cannot tolerate because you've got this big fraternal thing going with her."

Kinney resplayed his hands. "Or you'll do what?"

I said, "I'll do you a solid going in. LAPD Intel has a blue sheet on you. It pertains to you laying off hijacked booze on Hersh Aadland, and it suggests a cherchez la femme angle. I'm betting Gwen's the femme, but I'm too much of a gent to ask you. I shred the blue sheet, you give up Gwen's shitbird KAs."

Kinney futzed with a toothpick. His hands shook.

"Paul Mitchell Grenier. He's a real piece of shit. He works as a grip here, and he acts in fuck flicks and runs badger games with his sister, Deedee. He did time at Chino for stat rape. Something like '54 to '57. I've seen him talking with Gwen, here on the lot. He swings both ways. He gets in brawls at leather bars and bites guys. Is that unsavory enough for you?"

Deedee Grenier. Her snitch aria, early summer. Paul Mitchell and Monroe/Hollygrove/1930 something. Paul Mitchell's a biter. The bite mark on Monroe's arm.

"SHIT. Motel Mike Bayless. Toss me some crumbs."

Kinney rolled his eyes. "Bayless is Pete Pitchess' muscle guy at SHIT. There's this crazy LAPD hump, Jack Clemmons. He filed for the Sheriff's election race, early in March. Bayless extorted him out of the race, and Pete ran unopposed."

The Bonneville ragtop clued me. The red stood out. I knew the plate number. The hood was warm. She parked two curb slots north of the Strip.

I parked under my building. I knew her MO. My MO diverged. She lurked. I yearned and peeped.

Okay—I'll play.

I hooked around and up the front pathway. She stood on my porch. She lit a cigarette and worked at ennui. I noticed new things. Her loose wristwatch drooped too loose. She wore new white bucks.

I ambled over. She pulled off her barrette and shook her hair loose. Her hemline rode high. Knock-kneed women jazz me.

"I'm starting to see where this is going. Every time I do something bold and stupid, you reward me."

"I'm calling a time-out on my marriage. Can you blame me?"

"I'll get us a motel room on PCH next time. It'll save you the commute."

Pat touched the wedding-stone scar on my cheek. I ducked my head and nuzzled her hand.

The bedroom broiled. Late August L.A. Swamp heat and smog drifts. Lois willed thunderstorms. Pat lacked the gift.

We stretched out full length. Our feet drooped off the sheets. We laced our hands up and tapped the headboard. Pat orbed her watch. I grabbed it and slid it under the mattress.

"Your duties back at the beach bore me. Get your slaves to feed the kids and walk the dog. Tell Jack you've got something going, and you're neglecting your family for the foreseeable future. Tell Bobby I'm on the job, so leave me alone."

Pat dug through her handbag. She pulled out today's Variety and held it open. I saw "Luscious kidnap victim," Hard Luck Girl, and a swimwear pic of Gwen Perloff. Big Gwen—always the glasses.

Pat jabbed the photo. "I saw Peter and this woman on the beach, late this spring. I couldn't hear their conversation. Peter passed her some money, and she passed him a large manila envelope. It was months before she was kidnapped and you were called into the whole thing. I thought you'd want to know."

It was the Girl Book. Lawford lied to me. He said a "queen-bee" cater waitress sold it to him. He claimed not to know her name. Ingrid Irmgard lied to me. She was a cater waitress. She said Lawford shot her Girl Book pix. She claimed not to know any queen bees. Gwen Perloff defined the queen-bee prototype.

Pat watched me cogitate. She caught a tremor and pressed my hand to the bed. I skimmed Variety. The gist mimicked the Reporter.

Gwen Perloff. "Busty Bawd of the B's." Hard Luck Girl/foster-home kid/who grabbed Gwen's little sister?

Variety mimics the Reporter. It diverges right here:

She's a foster-home kid. Plus an orphanage kid. She was dumped in Hollygrove, '37–'39. It's conclusive. She was in Hollygrove with Marilyn Monroe and Paul Mitchell Grenier.

The room spun. Monroe/Kidnap/Monroe/Kidnap Monroe/Kidnap. The two case lines of 8/4/62 intersect.

Pat said, "There's something else you should know. Peter and I attended a reception two nights ago. It was mostly city government people. Peter buttonholed a DA's man named Miller Leavy and cut into you. He told Mr. Leavy that you killed that kidnap man in cold blood, and Mr. Leavy's face lit up."

I said, "Oh shit."

The Losers Club. Eddie Fisher's three-night stand launches. He's back. He's here to croon his corny repertoire and spritz his self-loathing. The Liz/Cleo mess drags on. He's here to reair it. He's got a packed house.

Eddie and Bo Belinsky were holed up in the greenroom. Nat and Phil worked the rope line. I stood near the bar and gassed Eddie's opening act.

Milt Chargin and "Junkie Monkey."

Milt's a low-rent ventriloquist. Junkie Monkey's a stuffed chimpanzee. He's got a hinged jaw and mouth. He wears a porkpie hat. There's a dope spike glued to his left arm. Their patter runs phantasmagoric.

Milt said, "I heard you've been doing some traveling, baby."

Junkie Monkey said, "Yeah, dad. I hopped a spaceship out of Cape Canaveral. Five Martians were at the controls. We headed for the Belgian Congo. We wanted to catch all the political upscut, live and up close."

Milt said, "Was it a nonstop flight?"

Junkie Monkey said, "Naw. We had to stop in Cuba to refuel."

The crowd tittered. Milt said, "That sounds dangerous. That putz Castro's the big bossman down there."

Junkie Monkey said, "He's a swell cat. He loaded me up with goodies, just for Eddie's debut gig here at the Losers."

Milt reached in his pockets and pulled out two fistfuls of five-cent cigars. He threw them out at the crowd. Dipshits reached, grabbed, spilled drinks and toppled tables. The room roared. A hi-fi kicked on and blared Afro-Cuban riffs. Drink girls sambaed and mamboed. The hi-fi clicked off. The crowd stomped and cheered.

Milt said, "Calm down, you schnorrers." The schnorrers calmed down. Junkie Monkey said, "We picked up some hitchhikers in Havana. They wanted to groove on the Martians, and beat feet to the Congo and catch the scene."

Milt said, "Who were the hitchhikers? Did you catch anybody of note?"

Junkie Monkey said, "Count Basie and his Atomic Band, twenty-four Playboy Playmates, Governor Orval Faubus, Lenny Bernstein and thirty-two sailors he picked up at Lavender Leo's Lovenest, the Mormon Tabernacle Choir, four Klan geeks from Moosefart, Mississippi, Miss Mahalia Jackson, that dink who plays Captain Kangaroo, and forty-one Hollywood High cheerleaders."

The crowd yock-yocked. Milt went Whew!

"Wow! It must have been packed in that spaceship!"

Junkie Monkey said, "No, but it was stacked—that's for sure!"

The crowd re-yocked. The drink girls did bumps and grinds.

Milt said, "Did you ever get the chance to refuel?"

Junkie Monkey said, "We didn't need to. Dr. Feelgood broomed down from the Apple and geezed the gang up with joy juice. We got there on our own head of steam."

The crowd re-re-yocked. They were lubed. The Losers served triple shots.

Milt said, "So, you arrive in the Congo. What happened then?"

Junkie Monkey said, "The head Martian split the spaceship and walked up to the nearest native. He said, 'Hey, man—take me to your leader.' The native said, 'Lumumba, Tshombe, Mobutu, or Kasa-Vubu?' The Martian said, 'Hey, man—we'll dance later. Right now, take me to your leader!!!' "

The crowd stood and cheered. They knew from punch lines. Women chanted "Edd-ie, Edd-ie, Edd-ie!"

Enough.

I ducked into the greenroom. Eddie was backstage, yakking up his combo. Bo Belinsky plucked pills from the goofball and high-hopper bowls.

He said, "This can't be legal."

I said, "It's not."

"The pink ones and green ones look good."

"Don't plan on driving home tonight."

Bo popped a pink one and a green one. He stretched out on the couch to await results.

"Eddie's miffed at me. Liz told a paparazzi guy in Rome she wants to shtup me. I keep ribbing Eddie about it. I keep saying I'll shtup her if she gives him an alimony reduction. The joke went stale after a while."

"Jokes tend to do that."

Bo said, "You're downbeat tonight, Freddy. The world's crawling up your ass, and you can't take much more of it."

Monroe/Kidnap/Monroe/Kidnap/Monroe/Kidnap. It kept spooling. The tape ran on, unspliced.

I camped out in a lounge chair. Bo drifted off. I almost popped a pink one and a green one. Sam Yorty walked in. Two bodyguards backstopped him.

They about-faced and shut the door. Mayor Sam said, "I tracked you down through your service. They said you'd be here."

I got up and poured him a scotch. He said, "Forewarned is forearmed," and chugged it.

I said, "Tell me."

Mayor Sam kicked the couch. "Bo Belinksy, down for the count. A no-hitter in May, and he owns my town. Now, he's a stooge for a pussy-whipped crooner."

I winked. "It's Bill Parker's town. You're just the mayor of it."

"Ain't it the truth."

" 'Forewarned is forearmed,' Mayor Sam. I'm here to listen."

He poured a refill. He chugged it and cut loose.

"I ran into Miller Leavy at the Jonathan Club. He was beet red about you and the Hats. You're Nazi thugs. You're Bill Parker's Brownshirts, you killed that kidnap chump for kicks, you're a DA's Bureau lieutenant now, and isn't it disgraceful? He wants to burn you and the Hats for Murder One. He wants to singe Bill Parker while he's at it. He said he's already talked to Bob Kennedy. Mr. AG expressed intense interest. Miller thinks he can wrangle a Federal judgeship out of that numbnuts, because he'll be the man who took down you and the Hats, and blew up the overhyped LAPD in one go."

The club closed at 3:00 a.m. Eddie did turn-away biz. Ring-a-ding—he took two drink girls home with him.

Bo snored it up in the greenroom. He'd be coma-conked at least fourteen hours. Nat and Phil faded back to their canvassing gigs. Milt Chargin and Junkie Monkey bopped home to their tract pad in Pacoima. Pat was home with her kids and presidential-pimp hubby. Lois was back at the Chapman Park Hotel. She was probably calling up strange men.

Monroe/Kidnap/Monroe/Kidnap/Monroe/Kidnap.

I leaned toward straight convergence. Monroe kept coin stashes. Perloff kept a coin stash in her car. Monroe/Perloff/Paul Mitchell Grenier. Late '30s Hollygrove alums.

Bar-brawl biter Paul Mitchell. Marilyn's bite mark. Fuck-film actor Paul Mitchell. The jizzed-on fuck pix in Marilyn's drawer. A dozen record checks, lab tests, and shit tasks unfulfilled. Monroe/Kidnap. Don't stamp it strict convergence—quite yet.

Gwen Perloff sold Peter Lawford the Girl Book. Ingrid Irmgard might play out dirty. What's with Juan Manuel Salas? Lawford blows me off to Miller Leavy. Mayor Sam gets more specific. Leavy wants to burn me and the Hats.

I sat in my car. The Losers lot was eerie still. I ran options. I tagged conclusions. The Hats wouldn't crack. I wouldn't crack. Perloff wouldn't crack. It boiled down to hearsay witnesses and Leavy's courtroom flair. I had to stop it short of indictments. I had to ID the kidnappers and kill them.

31

(LOS ANGELES, 8/24–8/26/62)

Three days. Psychic limbo. I'm paranoid-schizo. The world's out to get me. Shrink-wrap me, baby. Call Doc Greenson and Doc de River. Rack me out on the couch.

The world's out to get me. Plus the Hats. Bobby K. and Miller Leavy suck the world's poison dick and enact the world's poison mandates. I huddled up Max Herman and Red Stromwall. They cosigned my plan. Let's kill the kidnappers and squelch Murder One, preemptive. Harry Crowder and Eddie Benson concurred. Freddy O. and the Hats ride again.

Shrink-wrap me. I'm paranoid. I see wisps and hear voices where there might be none.

What's Jimmy Hoffa's play? He told Hersh Aadland to call Del Kinney. Hersh A. complied. Freddy O.'s on the lot. His men, ditto. Jimmy told Del to ignore us.

Shrink-wrap me. The world's pulled a work slowdown on me. My lab checks and record checks slog as I hit overdrive.

The lab can't match the jizzed-on pix. They've checked 621 samples. They've got two hundred plus to go. I buzzed the personnel boss at Mexicali Airlines. He cited Ingrid Irmgard's squeaky-clean work record. I checked Ingrid's work sheets back to January and scanned passenger manifests. The name José Bolaños did not appear. Customs supplied inbound and outbound U.S.-to-Mexico passport pix. I scanned ten dozen. I trolled for Mexican fat women who might be Monroe in disguise. I got todos nada there. State and Fed HUAC shot me suspect sheets on José. They were 85% redacted and thus meaningless. The redactions meant Bolaños was a snitch. He ratted Commie motherfuckers and skated on his own misdeeds. Customs won't cough up their Bolaños files. The Mex State Police have flat refused.

I drove Hollywood and West L.A. streets for ten straight hours. It was futile. I could not tag the house that Monroe sketched in '48. The search warrant for Bev's Switchboard is still "in the works." I need to re-brace Darryl Zanuck. He said a "wheezy-voiced" old lady called in the tip on the Danforth/Stein/Perloff location. I took Natasha Lytess a bottle of scotch and some flowers. I wanted to jolly her and set up a shot at a second interview. She had a wheezy voice. She might have called in the tip. Her tip would push Monroe/Kidnap to full-stop convergence.

The old Monroe-pad bug mounts still tweak me. I found a carpet displacement pic I shot during the 8/4 break-in. I took it to the lab. Ray Pinker did a walking portrait. He called the cat six-one/190/size 11 feet/slight left-leg limp. That narrowed it down to ten million men.

Nat and Phil concluded their Lawford house/Monroe house canvass. Here's their final assessment:

The Monroe/Jack liaison was an open secret in showbiz circles. Basic rumors circulated. They were repeatedly embellished. They devolved into fantasia. Bobby did not pour Marilyn the pork. UPS men and pizza-delivery boys poured her the pork. Nat and Phil agreed: it's banal for a derogatory profile.

I ID'd the other stews in the Girl Book photos. I chopped the headshot portions off the beaver shots and flashed personnel honchos at four airlines. I got names and glowing work reports on the young women. I ran them through R&I and got zilch. I nixed hard-brace interviews.

Nat and Phil worked the "Rick Dawes"/"Eleanora"/cater waiter front. They made cold calls. They repeatedly caught the same drift:

Who's Rick Dawes? Who's Eleanora? Come on. These cater kids are all hustlers and hopheads.

I itched to study my own master file. I had to reconnect with the bug-tap transcripts and photo evidence. Justice hoarded the file. I Teletyped Bobby K. I besieged his ass. Let me view the file. It won't leave the U.S. Attorney's Office. The little prick relented. I read the file, dawn to dusk. Eddie Chacõn watched and kibitzed. The file was rife with penciled-in check marks. They denoted felony infractions. Said infractions were attributable to:

F. Otash, J. Hoffa, Nat D., and Phil I. It justified my paranoia. Bobby's out to slam us all.

I studied the file. I took notes. I Man Camera'd the four-month misadventure. It refitted my memory. I found a long-gone wad of papers crammed down a file-box seam.

There it is. My report on events of 5/19/62. I tailed Monroe out to the Valley. She blew the tail. I compiled a plate list of 143 cars parked near the location.

I rescribbled the numbers and Telefaxed them to Daryl Gates. He put in a superrush order with the DMV and R&I. I got the results, nine hours on:

One hundred and forty-three cars. Full stats per the registered owners. Thirty-four misdemeanor busts between them. My eidetek memory unscrambled. I retrieved that post-5/19 brain glitch:

I thought, I've been here before. Why does this West Valley turf seem familiar?

Here's why:

I tailed Monroe to the locale on 5/19. I was back at the locale on 8/4. I saw Mike Bayless and a Sheriff's crew rescue Gwen Perloff at the Tiki-Torch Village apartments.

Here's the punch line:

Gwen Perloff parked her '59 Triumph a half block from the spot where she was rescued. She parked there seventy-odd days BEFORE she was kidnapped. It was one block from the spot where Monroe blew my tail.

Monroe/Kidnap. Monroe/Perloff. Spell it out. It's officially coincidence into convergence.

Cut to Monroe/Perloff/Paul Mitchell Grenier. They're Hollygrove kids, way back when.

Hollygrove. The "Grove." The orphan's home just north of Melrose and Vine. Film-biz largesse built the place. The kids got TLC, good chow, local public school classes and outings. I charted the overall convergence. I craved intimate details. I planned a low-key approach.

It backfired.

I dropped in and dropped on the headmistress. I badged her. I told her I had a tangential interest in Marilyn Monroe. It shut her down. She railed at Monroe sycophants, hagiographers, and obsessives. I requested the files on all the kids from '36 to '38. She said, "No." She said, "Get a court order." She said, "Our lawyers will attempt to block it every step of the way."

I slunk off. I replowed old forensic ground. I went by the county morgue and viewed Richie Danforth's pulverized remains.

He was footless. His hands were too pulped to pull prints from. His teeth were cracked and ground to dust. I couldn't issue a fifty-state dental alert. This stone criminal went unprinted and was fifty-state clean? He had to be deploying fake ID. He had to be ID-able somewhere.

Forensic shitwork. Clue-chaser shitwork. I had to interview Lowell Farr. I placed a request with the PD's juvie division. I wanted to re-

brace Natasha Lytess. She held back last time. I sensed it loud and clear. I goosed R&I and my DMV man per my plate list for the cars outside Fox Accounting. The goose job worked. I got ownership stats on the fifty-four vehicles—and a paucity of rap sheets on the owners. But—one name stood out.

Albert Morris Aadland/WMA/DOB 7/12/24. No criminal record. One illustrious surname.

I called Del Kinney and ran the name by him. “Is this guy related to the Aadland brothers? Distantly related to Dr. Shelley Mandel?”

Del confirmed me. “Yeah, that’s Albie. He’s a nebbish and a Fox wage slave. His mom and dad had a late-in-life baby. He ain’t like his badass brothers at all.”

Albie Aadland. It was a weak lead. It was a probable dud. Shelley Mandel hawked barbs to the pre-Monroe Norma Jean Baker. He’s a probable dud lead himself. It lays out as a film-biz/Foxed-up confluence. L.A. is one big confluence its own self.

The Fox confluence. It re-tweaked me. Paul Mitchell Grenier triple-tweaked me, resultant. Grenier. He’s a leather-bar biter. He was at Hollygrove with M. Monroe and G. Perloff. He’s an ex-con. He’s a Chino grad. He’s a Fox bit player. He’s a switch-hitter/fuck-film actor. Let’s revisit this shitbird.

I prowled regional Vice Squad files and read old occurrence reports. I hit Central Division, Wilshire Division, Highland Park and Hollywood Divisions. I got gay bar/bar-brawl notations at Central. I got a gay bar/bite-brawl notation at Highland Park. I scored on a male prosty sheet.

Hollywood Division, 1/14/58. Parked-car assignation, Selma and Las Palmas, 2:20 a.m. Paul Mitchell Grenier attacks a trick with his teeth. The trick rats Grenier to the fuzz and later declines to press charges. Two mug shots are attached to the sheet.

I studied the shots. I saw Grenier earlier this summer. Phil Irwin and I busted up the Deedee Grenier/Paul Mitchell badger game at Norm’s Nest. I sapped Paul Mitchell’s punk ass. I saw him on a dark street. We were under duress. He’s much thinner now. These early ’58 mugs slap on twenty pounds plus. Cut to 8/4/62. I view the Monroe/Cruel Stud fuck pix. I thought Cruel Stud looked familiar. Here’s why:

Cruel Stud was Paul Mitchell Grenier. The white strips over his eyes concealed the fact then. He weighed twenty-plus pounds more then. The fuck-suck pix are ’58–’59 vintage. There’s no bite mark on Marilyn’s bicep. I saw 5/16/59 shots of Marilyn at a ban-the-bomb rally. There was no raw bite mark or bite-mark scar on her bicep.

Let’s track Marilyn’s age backward. Let’s track Paul Mitchell Grenier’s appearance. The pix are surely ’58–’59 vintage. Marilyn is unmarked on 5/16/59. Cut forward. Go to 3/8/61. Marilyn’s surveilled at a civil rights wingding. We see the faded bite mark now. We mark her sustained relationship with Paul Mitchell Grenier. Sex biters are very rare. Marilyn knew only one in her lifetime. Grenier mauled Marilyn sometime between May ’59 and March ’61. He’s a sex psycho. Dangerous people converged with Monroe in the months preceding her death. I’m sure of it. I’m double sure this piece of shit Grenier was one of them.

(LOS ANGELES, 10:04 A.M., MONDAY, 8/27/62)

Zanuck mandated Round Two. I Teletyped a case update to Parker and Gates late last night. Gates wrote back. His brief: the whole deal is Fox-derived. Make more noise on the lot. Parker wrote back. His brief: be a shit magnet. It's what you do best.

I strolled the lot. I unplugged a golf cart outside Soundstage #6 and zipped up to Zanuck's side door. I had carte blanche now. I'd lubed Del Kinney. The nuisance-warrant threat vouched me. I barged right in.

Pops was alone. He saw me and moved slow. He went for his desk phone. I yanked the wall cord. He went for his intercom. I kicked out a floor plug. He yanked drawer pulls. I saw a Minnie Mouse purse gun and beat him to it.

Zanuck said, "You won't always be a policeman, and Bill Parker won't always enjoy the kind of pull he has now. I won't always run this studio, and I'll deal with you at my leisure then."

I ejected the chamber round and popped out the clip.

"What's the latest on the Cleo drain?"

No response.

"How deep in the shit are you?"

No response.

"Somebody at Accounting introduced you to Gwen Perloff. Was it Albie Aadland?"

No response.

"Did you green-light Hard Luck Girl so Gwen would keep it zipped on the kidnap?"

No response.

"Did you ever run into a psycho bit player named Paul Mitchell Grenier?"

No response.

"Was the wheezy-voiced woman who called you and ratted off the kidnap deal Natasha Lytess?"

No response.

Gear shift. Let's shaft this geek.

I pulled out a Foxtone Services business card. As seen in Marilyn Monroe's basement. I mimeographed three hundred duplicates last night. Nat and Phil were combing the lot now. They were tagging parked cars. One card per left wiper blade. Let the word spread.

Zanuck fumed and mush-mouthed his cigar. I dropped the card on his desk. Note the leering-fox logo.

"Your wife or mine?"

"Business opportunities"

"Contact PO box 6969"

Zanuck examined the card. His eyes clicked off-kilter. He flushed and pulled down his necktie. He gasped and expelled his cigar.

"I heard you're a wife swapper from way back, so I thought you'd want to see what some colleagues of yours have got going. And check the schvantz on that fox. It's got two heads. You think he gets laid?"

Pops dry-popped digitalis. His veins throbbed, purple-blue.

"Organized prostitution, postal-code infractions, felony financial malfeasance implied. I'm thinking there'll be Federal and municipal grand juries, and you'll be called to testify. Not to mention this. Surrender all your personnel files to me, or I'll lay everything I suspect on Morty Bendish, and he'll slam your ass in a groundbreaking Mirror-News series."

Zanuck palsied and jittered. He's Jello-O in an earthquake. I poured him a nice glass of scotch.

The casting hut overflowed. Twist Party Stakeout and giant-rat-flick hopefuls spilled into the prop barn. The coordinator said Lois and Maury Dexter were checking out the set house. It was somewhere in the Palisades. Pali High girls kibitzed and swooned for the Stakeout/ rat bifecta. Maury needed sixty dance kids and run-from-the-rodent kids. He said it was a big motivational stretch.

I walked into the barn. I saw Roddy McDowall pawing Cleopatra discards. He fondled leather breastplates and red velour capes. A lanky man separated scabbards and steel jockstraps.

Confluence. Film-biz scavengers. Dipshit cop Sid Leffler wrote Stakeout. Roddy culled costumes for Cleo Goes Greek.

He looked up and saw me. He did an arch-queen double take. The lanky man looked up. Roddy said, "Timmy Berlin, Fred Otash. You two share a history, which you may or may not want to acknowledge."

The name ditzed me. Natasha Lytess mentioned this guy. Click—the Wrong-Door Raid. Berlin was Monroe's backstreet lover.

We shook hands. Berlin grooved Roddy's aside. The raid, the star-lit cast, the event lingers.

I said, "I talked to Natasha Lytess recently, Mr. Berlin. Please accept my condolences for the loss of Miss Monroe."

Berlin went somber. Boo-hoo. He studied his shoes. Nobody knows de trouble Ise—

Roddy stage-tittered. "Freddy's on his best behavior, but he never just drops by to chat. Soooo, Freddy—who or what is it this time? And don't tell me this isn't you with questions, and me with answers, and that you're not obliged to provide compensation."

Berlin slapped his knees. I slapped my wallet. Roddy struck a hands-on-hips pose.

I said, "It's about Gwen Perloff, and a Fox bit player and alleged smut-film performer named Paul Mitchell Grenier."

Berlin reacted. He deadpanned the "Perloff." The "Grenier" slammed him. He unzipped his windbreaker. I saw a hip-holstered .38 snubnose.

"He's a very disturbed man. He was in Hollygrove with Marilyn, you know—and he was capable of talking her into almost anything."

Roddy jiggled the gun grip. He lived for the dish. Don't stop nooooow.

Berlin slapped Roddy's hand and zipped up his jacket. He studied his shoes and sucked in his breath.

"I kept in touch with Marilyn after we fizzled, and—several months ago, I'd say—she told me she wanted to make a smut film, just for grins—and she wanted me to edit it. She said she was on a consorting-with-hoodlums kick, and she wanted to see how far she could take it."

I got goose bumps. I scalp-bristled and twitched.

"Where does Grenier fit in?"

"He was Marilyn's proposed costar, but Roddy told me about his reputation. I tried to warn Marilyn off, but she ignored me. Grenier approached me, independently, and said he wanted me to cut the film, but I said, 'Never.' He left me alone then, but I carry this gun in case he ever comes back."

I said, "Do you know if the film was made?"

Berlin said, "No, it wasn't. Marilyn assured me of that."

"Be careful, sir. Grenier's nobody to mess with."

Berlin skulked off. He played the wounded boyfriend with Method aplomb. Boo-hoo. Marilyn loved me and left me. He ducked his head and kicked prop boxes out of his way.

Roddy said, "Freddy, you spawn bad juju wherever you go."

I said, "Give me your perspective on Grenier."

Roddy rubbed his thumbs and forefingers. I slid him three yards. Roddy mimed a pitching ace winding up.

"You may or may not know that I've directed smut reels, and you probably do not know that I know Paul Mitchell from the Tradesman, the Jaguar, and the Falcon's Lair, or that he appeared in my films Whipout Man and Fat Girl Love. You do know that I collect rumors, and if I trust the rumors, I pass them along—in your case, for money."

I lit a cigarette. "I'm with you so far."

Roddy bummed a cigarette. I lit it. Roddy reprised his windup. Here's the pitch:

"Some Marilyn rumors I buy, some I distrust and decline to repeat. I buy the rumor that she and Paul Mitchell posed for a fuck deck—that is, a run of fifty-two pornographic playing cards, which were produced in a limited edition and sold, on an exclusive basis, to wealthy perverts who wanted to possess the decks as a collector's item and investment. Other name and would-be-name actresses had gone the fuck-deck route before—because the decks went for ten g's per, and the performers got a substantial cash cut. Plus, the pervs traded the decks among themselves, just like baseball cards. As in, 'I'll trade you one Ann Savage for one Barbara Payton or Lila Leeds.' But of course a Marilyn Monroe fuck deck would be a much more valuable commodity."

Monroe. Grenier. The Polaroid pix. '58–'59 vintage. Possible fuck deck outtakes?

"When were fuck decks a big deal? I've seen black-and-white shots of Monroe and Grenier, but they were from '58 or '59."

Roddy nixed me. "Fuck decks were full color, beautifully produced, and the craze peaked in the late '40s. This is not dreck we're talking about."

"What about a Carole Landis fuck deck?"

"Not to my knowledge. Poor Carole pulled the plug at the onset of the craze. Carole Landis morgue shots, however, are as common as dirt. You sold me mine on the set of Midnight Lace."

I said, "Gwen Perloff. Tell me something I don't know."

Roddy went wistful. "She may be one for the ages. She's everywhere you concurrently want and don't want to be. If you must view the goods, there's a horror double bill at the Wiltern tonight."

—

Spawn of the A-Bomb. Universal, '56. Gwen Perloff at twenty-nine. Plus, The Red Ant People. Universal, '58. Gwen two years on.

Cheesecake posters lined the lobby. Beach shots. Bikini chicks flee large insects and mutant reptiles.

Spawn rolled first. Summer-vacation kids hogged the orchestra and balcony. They sent up a ruckus. The cartoon and newsreel drew jeers. They booed John F. Kennedy and civil rights stalwarts. They craved monsters and sex.

I took an aisle seat, close in. I was bleary. I'd played hunches and run checks all afternoon.

The downtown library. Local newspaper coverage. 2/17/37. Mitzi Perloff disappears. Let's confirm Gwen's Hollygrove arrival. Let's buttress the Monroe/Perloff/Grenier meet and greet.

Mitzi goes poof! Gwen remains in the foster home at De Longpre and Wilton. The Herald and Times supplied that detail and no more. Variety ran another puff job on Hard Luck Girl. Script scribe/star Gwen P. was "raised primarily in Hollywood-area foster homes and orphan facilities." I called the L.A. child-protective service and chased Gwen's orphanage stint. A nice old lady combed files and told me this:

Gwen went wild after Mitzi vanished. The foster home canned her. She hit Hollygrove in mid-March '37. This confirms the convergence. Monroe and Grenier were already there.

How did Gwen go wild?

She boosted ensembles out of Hollywood shops and sold them to kids at Le Conte Junior High.

She was a grifter then. She was not quite eleven. It was back in '37. I was fifteen then. I was peeping windows in Dogdick, Massachusetts.

Kid grifters and peepers. Fuck decks. Psycho biters and movie stars embroiled in felony smut. Here's some good late-breaking news:

Bobby K. delivered the search warrant. We raid Bev's Switchboard at 10:00 a.m. tomorrow. The Hats plus Freddy O., Daryl Gates, and two postal inspectors. Pump shotguns and legal sanction to trash the place.

The newsreel ended. The kids booed. Spawn of the A-Bomb rolled. The kids cheered. It was black and white. The kids razzed it. Credits beamed over a static shot of Malibu Beach.

Cut to the gist. Two young women slink at the water's edge. They wear low-cut bikinis. It’s big, rangy Gwen and a skinny blonde. Gwen’s wearing her tortoiseshell specs.

High-school boys woof-woofed and wolf-howled. Their dates shushed them. Gwen delivered her first lines:

“Marge, I don’t want to sound like a Commie—but the atom bomb gives me the creeps.”

I knew that voice. It was “Eleanora’s” tap-call voice. She called Peter Lawford, midsummer. She worked him for dirt on cater waiter “Rick Dawes.” Monroe wrote “Rick Dawes. Mean—maybe a fag” on a pack-rat scrap of paper.

(LOS ANGELES, 10:02 A.M., TUESDAY, 8/28/62)

We're on. It's classic cop overkill. We're convoyed up on the south side of Fountain. Bev's is straight across the street.

Eight cops in three prowl sleds. Two matrons in civilian cars. I perched with Daryl Gates. The Hats had their own ride. Two postal cops rolled in a Fedmobile.

Walkie-talkies cinched us up. We jump at 10:05. The boss fed would cue the move. Shotguns and crowbars. The mail slots were hard-fixed to the walls. Bev might hide her master keys.

It's a sweep-through. We hit en masse. Customers will be grabbed and held on the premises. The matrons will toss female patrons' handbags and skin-search them in the can. The postal cops will slam Bev Shoftel with the warrant and demand her master keys. Gates and I will hit box 6969. Foxtone, here we come.

I chain-smoked. My nerves were shot to shit. Convergence plus no sleep and an overamped agenda. I was up all night. I typed out a detailed Monroe/Kidnap brief. It was soundly reasoned and up-to-date. I mimeographed copies for Bill Parker, Gates, the Hats, and Ratfuck Bobby. I dropped copies off at the PAB and the U.S. Attorney's Office. I went out to find Paul Mitchell Grenier and hard-roust him.

He had no fixed address. My DMV contact informed me. He forfeited his driver's license in 1/58. He got popped for that bite assault plus unpaid traffic citations. He had no busts or citations from that point on. I went by the Falcon's Lair, the Jaguar, the Tradesman, the Klondike. The boys said Paul Mitchell slept around with one-night guys. I went by Arthur J.'s and the Gold Cup. Fruit hustlers hobknobbed there. Their consensus: Paul Mitchell was out in the ozone. He's pushing amyl nitrite poppers. He's got a "base of operations" somewhere. He's a skin dog. He digs the donkey show in T.J. Try the Planet Mars.

My walkie-talkie crackled. The boss said, "We go now."

Gates and I piled out. We lugged shotguns and pry bars. The Hats and postal cops piled out. They held 12-gauge pumps at port arms. The matrons piled out. They packed handcuffs and come-along chains.

We caught a break in the traffic and ran across Fountain. Max Herman and Red Stromwall kicked the door off its pins.

It crashed inward. It hit the floor. The glass door panes shattered. Overkill meant Big Noise and Riveted Attention. We got it here. Crash noise/shattered-glass noise/overlapped shrieks.

Bev Shoftel screeched. Three male patrons evinced tremors. Two female patrons screamed. The matrons quick-marched the women into the can. The postal cops dropped the warrant on Bev and dumped her purse out on her desk. They grabbed a ring of PO box keys and lobbed them at Gates. Bev squawked and beat her fists on her legs. The postal cops cuffed her hands behind her back and shoved her down in a chair.

The Hats headlocked the three men and hauled them out to the alley. Gates and I beelined for box 6969. I fumbled the key in the lock. My hand shook that bad. The key clicked, the door popped, I looked inside. The box was stone empty.

I said, "Shit."

Gates said, "Shit."

I unlocked box 6970. It was stone empty. I unlocked box 6971. It was stone empty. I heard wood-crack noise and screeches. The postal cops pry-barred crazy Bev's desk drawers. Bev screeched police-brutality shit.

I unlocked boxes 6972, 6973, 6974 to 6981. They were all stone empty. I unlocked box 6982 and saw this:

Four tabloid-foldout pamphlets. Green-inked covers. Identical to rags I saw at Morty Bendish's pad. Morty published a "private circulation" dirt sheet. This had to be that.

I scanned the four covers. Morty titled his rag the L.A. Lowdown. The cover line promised a "priapic preview" of a new Mr. Fearless Fuzz exposé. "Pssst—Whiskey Bill Parker cut a deal with ball-busting Bob Kennedy. It's Fearless Fuzz's sex-soiled sequel to Weird-O Death of a Sex Siren, Part 1."

I squelched the Part 1 pamphlet. This pamphlet was mailed prior to my warning. Morty B. would not knowingly fuck me. And, Morty told me this:

Fearless Fuzz was West L.A. patrol sergeant Jack Clemmons. And Del Kinney told me this:

Clemmons filed to enter the spring '62 race for L.A. County Sheriff. But—Motel Mike Bayless coerced him out and Pete Pitchess ran unopposed.

I stuck the pamphlet down my waistband. I unlocked boxes 6983 to 6988 and got zilch. I unlocked box 6989 and pulled out this:

A printed flyer. An announcement. There's an upcoming key party and wife-swap bash. "Write to box 6969 for details."/"Couples only"/"$200 at the door"/"Other fees apply."

I removed the flyer. I looked at Bev Shoftel. She said, "Fuck you and the camel you rode in on." I scanned the empty boxes. They'd been cleaned out. Someone passed the word. I got lucky on boxes 6982 and 6989. Bev's perv contingent rented the 69-series boxes and deployed them as in-house mail drops. Bev's patrons had front-door keys and twenty-four-hour access. Their system was foolproof.

Then it hit me:

I passed the word. I sabotaged the raid. Nat and Phil plastered Foxtone cards to cars in the Fox lot. I told them to tap three hundred sleds.

I weaved on my feet. Crazy Bev cackled at me. I heard Daryl Gates and the Hats hard-nose the pervdogs back in the alley. The matrons waltzed the female pervs out of the can. They were handcuffed. I dug in and went back to work.

I unlocked box 6990, box 6991, box 6992, and box 6993. All four were empty. I unlocked box 6994. A single sheet of paper was tucked in.

It's a typed receipt. It acknowledges two hundred dollars received. That's the key-party fee. It's a box-to-box communiqué. There's the time and date of the bash. Somebody sketched Foxtone's leering-fox logo. Foxtone's throwing the bash.

10:00 p.m. Sunday, September 2. 1464 North Havenhurst, West Hollywood.

PART 5

WIFE SWAP

(AUGUST 28–30, 1962)

34

(LOS ANGELES, 2:20 P.M., TUESDAY, 8/28/62)

I print-dusted PO boxes. It was penance shitwork. My Fox antics blew the raid. It was in-close detail work. I dusted hinge flaps and interior surfaces. I worked solo. A patrol cop blocked the kicked-down door.

I'd elimination-rolled the cops, the customers, Bev Shoftel, and myself. I tape-transferred the prints to a cardboard sheet and photographed them. The box grab was low-yield. The print grab was all smudges and smears.

The Hats warrant-checked the male customers. All three came up clean. The matrons warrant-checked the two women. They had traffic warrants extant. The Hats grabbed the address books in their handbags. I photographed all the pages. We'll run the names, addresses, and phone numbers through R&I. Criminal names and/or locations might pop up.

The male pervs waltzed. The female pervs went to jail. Bev Shoftel was popped for smut-through-the-mail violations. She'll bail out sure as shit.

Max Herman called me with an update. Red and Harry grabbed Jack Clemmons at his Mar Vista crib. They took him to the downtown DB. A hard smackdown bodes. Max and Eddie picked up Morty Bendish and ran him downtown. Bill Parker might can Clemmons. His "Fearless Fuzz" shit plays psycho. I think we should suborn Morty B. His brief? Newspaper propagandist and paid lapdog. Fetch, Morty, fetch!

I dusted box 6969. I turned up a rubber-glove partial. Glove prints scream criminal design. A torn fingertip revealed partial loops, tents, and whorls. I tape-transferred the partial to a glossy-backed card and photographed it in tight. It looked like a male right index finger.

The print job loomed as all day/all night. I dropped the card in my briefcase and lit a cigarette. I grabbed a copy of the L.A. Lowdown and skimmed the "priapic preview":

Mr. Fearless Fuzz. He's Sergeant Jack Clemmons. He's a White Dog

Bund Reichsführer and Norm's Nest habitué. The preview enhanced the cover line. Whiskey Bill Parker and Bobby the K. Their doomonic devil deal. Parker covers up the Monroe snuff and whitewashes Monroe's ties to the K boys. Jack and Bobby dump Gay Edgar Hoover. Lawyer/cop Parker's the new FBI boss.

It wasn't a snuff. Bobby did not poke Monroe. The cover-up part was all true. Somebody fed Clemmons the rumor. I've got a hunch who.

The L.A. Lowdown. This issue was mailed before I told Morty to cease and desist. "Weird-O Death of a Sex Siren, Part 1" was already out in the smog. I skimmed the text at Morty's pad. It was fanciful shit. Morty pandered to pervert-lunatic subscribers. The L.A. Lowdown posed no threat to the K boys.

I skimmed past the priapic preview. I hit "Sicko Psycho in Furtive 459 Prowls!!! Passive Putz or Fitful Fiend Soon to Explode???"

The author? Detective Slithering Sleuth.

The piece ran four pages. Slithering Sleuth mimicked Confidential's jive prose style. The piece laid out six soft-prowl/nobody's home B and E's in Brentwood and Pacific Palisades. The "Sicko Psycho" targeted the "swank" houses of single women. "Sex-clusive! How many posh pads did he hit altogether? Six women reported the pad break-ins. There may be more!!!"

The crimes ran from 11/18/61 to 3/12/62. Slithering Sleuth described the crime scenes. He merged jive prose and copese here. He dropped words like victimology and phrases like "white female American." Sicko Psycho did not loot the posh pads. He dumped furniture and wall artwork. He dumped medicine chests. He jacked off and shot his load into underwear drawers. He left notes. They were composed in glue-fixed magazine letters. The LAPD crime lab examined them.

The letters and paper stock were "markedly archaic." The Sicko Psycho's MO escalated. He destroyed property and jizzed twice at the sixth victim's pad. All semen scrapings went to the lab. Sicko Psycho was poised to further escalate. His final break-in occurred on 3/12/62.

The ceiling dropped. The floor dipped. The room contracted. My blood pressure red-lined.

Marilyn Monroe moved to Brentwood in March.

(LOS ANGELES, 6:10 P.M., TUESDAY, 8/28/62)

Sweatbox #3. It's twelve-by-twelve and mirror-walled. There's one table and four chairs. Hallway speakers supply sound. Note the phone book on the table.

At the table: Max Herman, Red Stromwall, Jack Clemmons.

I stood under the speaker. Max and Red drummed the table. Clemmons hemmed and hawed. I grokked him, up close. The blond crew cut. The black-frame glasses. The chinos and windbreaker. No brown shirt and no White Dog Bund armband.

The party lulled on. I came in late. I concluded my print work at Bev's Switchboard and hauled downtown. Plain watching gored my goat. I got antsy and went through the door.

Clemmons stirred. Max said, "Hi, Freddy." Red said, "Lieutenant Otash is here. Jack, tell the lieutenant what you finally told us. What it took you four hours to reveal."

I straddled a chair and lit a cigarette. Clemmons scratched his neck and adjusted his basket. He was scared.

"Well…okay. I'll concede that I made up Weird-O Death of a Sex Siren, but you've got to admit it could have happened that way. You don't get to see high-quality stuff like Marilyn Monroe dead and naked, not just any old day. Maybe my imagination got the better of me."

Max said, "You made up Part 1, maybe. You succumbed to the moment, because you're a wishy-washy guy."

Clemmons huff-huffed. Me, wishy-washy? Address me as mein Führer or I'll put you on report.

"What's with the Part 1? I made the whole thing up. Morty encourages his contributors to go for the pizzazz. He learned under William Randolph Hearst."

Red said, "Here's what Sergeant Herman's trying to tell you. Somebody leaked you the drift on Chief Parker and the AG."

I said, "Give it up, shitbird."

"Give what up? Nobody leaked shit to me. You're the only shitbird in this—"

I grabbed the phone book and head-smacked him. His glasses flew off. He rubbed his left ear. Phone-book shots induce reverb.

Max passed him his flask. Clemmons took two nips. Red made nice and passed him his glasses. They fit crooked now.

I patted the phone book. I Sieg heil'd Clemmons. He's the beat-on Bundsman. Red stifled a yock.

Clemmons sniveled and wiped his nose. He wore a cheesy signet ring. Dig the snarling mastiff. He's got green rhinestone eyes.

"Motel Mike Bayless. That Sheriff's sergeant at SHIT. He told me about the Chief and Bob Kennedy. What LAPD Intel don't know, SHIT does. Them two units are always trading intelligence, because cops are the world's worst gossips."

I said, "Why would Bayless even know you exist?"

Clemmons shrugged. Max waved the phone book. Clemmons wrung his hankie—white flag for defeat.

"Bayless turned me out as an informant. I filed to run in the Sheriff's race, last spring. I figured my pals in John Birch, the Minutemen, and Pastor Smith's crusade would turn out, and I'd have a shot to unseat Pete Pitchess. Well…right about then…I met a woman. She was a real looker, and she called herself Gail Penrose. She just shows up at Norm's Nest one night, and one thing leads to another."

Red said, "We're linking the dots, Jack. Don't stop now."

Max said, "We know where you're taking us, but we need to hear it from you."

Clemmons sucked the flask. "It was a tank job. We were asleep at a motel in Van Nuys, and I woke up and checked her purse while she was sleeping. Her real handle was Gwen Perloff, and if it sounds familiar, that's because she was the kidnap victim on that job where you guys dropped that guy on the freeway and got him creamed. I'm married, and guess what? Some SHIT guys shot infrared film of me and the Gwen chick going at it. Then I get a phone call telling me to withdraw from the Sheriff's race, which I sure as shit did. Then Motel Mike makes it his business to find me and tell me he might request some information now and then."

Monroe/Kidnap/Perloff. Case lines intersect. Max and Red winked at me.

I said, "Is the dump job common cop knowledge now?"

Clemmons said, "Yep. And it's getting to be common knowledge that Miller Leavy wants to burn you for it."

Max said, “And you just happened to get the Marilyn Monroe dead-body call? You were on your way to a Klan bash, and the call just happened to hit the desk?”

Clemmons grinned. “Sometimes you just get lucky—and movie-star OD’s are the cream de la cream.”

Red lit a cigarette. “Do you honestly believe that the Kennedys ordered the snuff on Monroe?”

“No, I made it up. But I pulled that rumor on the Chief and Bob Kennedy off the cop grapevine. Morty Bendish liked it, so there we are.”

I said, “How do you know Morty? Did somebody introduce you to him?”

Clemmons rubbed his ear. I phone-booked him good. The reverb lingered on.

“Sid Leffler introduced me. He’s Morty’s brother-in-law, and he’s worked the West L.A. DB a dog’s age. You guys know Sid, right? We call him ‘The Author’ and ‘The Professor.’ He wrote a sensational piece for the L.A. Lowdown. Morty says it’s a masterpiece of the docudrama style. Sid and his partner, J. T. Meadows—who’s a nice kid, but a bit of a nosebleed—worked this twisted 459 string, which ran to six jobs total. It went on for a while, then just stopped. Sid wrote it all out, and Morty loved the piece, but they didn’t catch the guy in the end.”

I blinked. I flashed Man Camera outtakes. I caught bulb glare. A crazy notion formed in that blink.

We moved Jack out and moved Morty in. Morty spooked easy. The phone book scared him.

“It looks bad for you, Morty. Don’t shit a shitter, right? You’re facing a battery of Federal charges. You sent subversive materials through the U.S. mail, and you aided and abetted Bev Shoftel in violation of six statutes on the dissemination of felony pornography. You’ve suborned prostitution, and you’re looking at lewd and lascivious conduct raps up the ying-yang. You’re just lucky I talked the postal cops into placing you in LAPD custody.”

Morty went Oy. Morty fretted his mezuzah.

“That a sterling champion of free speech should come to such an end.”

We yakked in Sweatbox #3. An audience grooved Morty. The hallway was full-packed. Bill Parker, Daryl Gates, and the Hats. They watched and caught the speaker feed.

I slid Morty my flask. Morty glug-glugged. I said, “The Chief and I don’t want to see you take it in the shorts. We venerate free speech as much as you do. I’m cooking up something that could get you a skate. I’m finalizing it in my head right now.”

Morty said, “Anything, Freddy. I’ve got no beef with the LAPD. I soft-pedaled all that Muslim shit, and I pooh-poohed those cops who drilled that retarded kid.”

I lit a cigarette. “Fill me in on Sid Leffler and that ‘Sicko Psycho’ piece he wrote for the Lowdown. The case interests me, and I’m thinking I could work it into this deal I’m cooking up.”

Morty said, “Sid’s a genius. He’s the smartest guy I know. He exudes talent. He’s got a flick in preproduction at Fox, and he wrote every word of it. He’s educated, and he knows the criminal mind—which is why this ‘Sicko Psycho’ piece is so pithy. He studied under that shrink—what’s his name—the guy who analyzed all those sex dinks up at Quentin.”

I said, “Oh, you mean Paul de River?”

36

(LOS ANGELES, 5:30 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 8/29/62)

Predawn Wilshire. Green lights straight through Beverly Hills. Pat told me the AG was shacked at the Lawford house. I planned to intrude.

I'd been up two full days. I succumbed to fried-brain syndrome and popped two Dexedrine. We cut Jack Clemmons and Morty Bendish loose. I huddled up Parker and Gates. A late skull session ensued.

They'd read my case updates. Mimeo copies went to the Hats and Ratfuck Bobby. I updated the Bev's Switchboard misadventure and took the blame for blowing the raid. I laid out "author" Sid Leffler and his "Sicko Psycho" piece in Morty B.'s dirt rag. I laid out my specific plans for Morty and my plan to craft a big diversion. It would quash all potential Monroe/Kennedy rumors and secure the Chief the FBI-boss gig. Said plan would force the AG to desist on the get-Otash front. It would squelch Miller Leavy's plans to burn the Hats and me for Richie Danforth.

Parker clapped. Gates went Woo-woo. Parker said he'd lean on the BHPD. We need the names of their cater waiter suspects. Gates praised Morty Bendish. He's a born propagandist.

Parker stressed Gwen Perloff. Work her. Deploy your reputation. She's jungled up in bad-money schemes. Make like you want in. Gates stressed Sid Leffler and partner J. T. Meadows. Work them. Be a shit magnet. They may play out unclean.

I cut down the California Incline and cut north on PCH. I U-turned and parked outside the Lawford spread. It was predawn dark. I leaned on the doorbell. Brrrr noise drilled the house. I stood by the door-front peephole. I heard foot scuffs inside.

Eddie Chacõn opened the door. He wore a "Free Cuba" T-shirt and plaid boxer shorts. He held a .45 automatic.

He said, "Señor Freddy. And at such an hour."

I said, "Mr. Kennedy, now."

Eddie loomed. I eased his gun hand off to the side. He about-faced and quick-marched upstairs. I timed the wait.

The AG coughed to announce himself. He rolled out in six-plus minutes. Bobby, you shouldn't have.

America's Top Cop dressed for me. Polo shirt/madras shorts/deck shoes. Very Hyannis. It upstaged my wilted suit. He walked up. He rolled an unlit cigar.

"The kitchen. You know where it is. Eddie pulled a bug mount off a lamp bowl."

I followed him in. He grabbed a coffeepot off a warmer and poured two cups. I perched in the breakfast nook. Cups, saucers, cream spout —the AG served me.

"Justify your intrusion. Make it good. Don't tell me you came to beat up my sister's husband again."

I smirked. "Have you read my most recent summary reports?"

"Yes. They were persuasive, but there's no hard evidence to prove that Marilyn's death and the kidnapping case are anything but coincidental occurrences within a movie-business sphere. You portray Marilyn in a well-documented and defamatory light, which shows her to be drug-addicted and psychically impaired. That's nothing but good. You posit her as a consort of criminals who traffic in pornography, which I especially like. That said, you have not given me a salutary throughline, one which will serve to dash all specious public discourse on Marilyn's alleged involvement with my brother and me. Also, the issue of public exposure concerns me, especially as it pertains to the people whose names you stated in your summary. Public exposure means public inquiry. Public inquiry means scandal. Two things trouble me here. One, assuming the public silence of the people you name in your summary. Two, supplying the public with a factually valid alternative solution for the death of Marilyn Monroe, one that will invalidate Marilyn's fantastical rantings about my brother and me, and one that will seduce and entertain Joe and Jane American and scrub their dirty minds free of filthy thoughts regarding the brothers Kennedy."

I sipped coffee. Depth charge. It spiked the juiced blood in my veins.

"I've got the alternative solution. I'm working on it now. It's factually valid, and I'm working up a newspaper source to put it out there."

Bobby rolled his cigar. "You must control the public exposure of your named suspects and expurgate their attributed statements."

I said, "Convene a sub-rosa Federal grand jury. Handpick Democratic Party–stooge jurors. Subpoena the key people mentioned in my summary, promise them immunity, let them read prepared statements, and hold those statements in abeyance as a wedge to keep them from going forward. The grand jury proceeding will serve as an extortion move to ensure their permanent silence."

Bobby lit his cigar. "What do you want for yourself?"

"Your promise not to prosecute me, or my men, for the Hoffa operation. Your pledge to steer Miller Leavy off of attempting to nail the Hats and me for the Danforth job."

Bobby said, "As of this moment—no."

I sipped coffee. I jiggled the cup and burned my hands.

"I need a Justice man to help me black-bag a doctor's office."

Ratfuck Bobby. Smug little shit. He blew perfect smoke rings.

"Eddie's good at that sort of thing."

I heard footsteps behind me. A man cleared his throat. I knew it was dipshit. I smelled Pat's Breck shampoo.

I turned around. They wore White House souvenir robes. Robert F. Kennedy brayed.

"Pat, your boyfriend's here. Peter, don't grovel or explode. The noted camel fucker is joining us for breakfast."

37

(LOS ANGELES, 3:00 P.M., WEDNESDAY, 8/29/62)

Babs Payton and Lila Leeds car-hopped. They hopped Stan's Drive-In at Sunset and Highland. It was a front. They peddled goofballs to Hollywood High kids. They supplied local night crawlers and raked in their real bread. Chef Fritzie whipped up biphetamine-laced malts. I craved one. I was work-slammed and running on fumes.

Breakfast with RFK and the gang. It was too tense to be funny and veered to depraved. The beach to the PAB. Phone work with the Hats. We photographed the address-book pages glommed off our Bev's detainees. Miller Leavy got us quickie phone-bill subpoenas for all five. Plus Gwen Perloff, Paul Mitchell Grenier, and Ingrid Irmgard.

We scanned bills. We looked for Fox-specific names in the calls-to columns and general names to run through R&I. We hit Grenier, Perloff, and Irmgard first. Fly-by-night Grenier had no fixed address and got no phone bills. Perloff made innocuous calls to Fox B-flick personnel. No calls-to names mandated attention. Irmgard called her Mexicali work boss and her boyfriend Juan Manuel Salas. Her calls seemed innocuous. El Manny might be innocuous. I should roust him on GP and find out.

We worked. We eyeball-hopped. We went from case-file scans to detainee scans. We scorched our eyeballs. The detainees called lots of people. No hot names scorched us. Our consensus so far:

The detainees are new-breed swingers. They swing within set guidelines and steer clear of the fuzz. That meant this:

More shitwork loomed.

I pulled into Stan's. I'd called ahead. Babs and Lila saw my sled and skated over. Babs schlepped a car-door tray. On it: three pineapple malts.

She hooked it to the driver's door. I pushed the seat back. Babs and Lila piled in. They dumped their skates. We snuggled in, three across. I passed out Chef Fritzie's specials. Babs said, "L'chaim."

Prom date or pervathon? It's your call.

We lit cigarettes. We sipped our malts. I caught that good dope aftertaste.

Lila said, "This is a bait gig, right? You're not here because you love us and you can't live without us."

I caught a bloodstream jolt. My scalp prickled. I got re-vivified.

"We're attending a wife-swap party, next Sunday night. Babs, you're my date. Lila, your date is a cop named Harry Crowder. You get five hundred apiece. We're there to look for hinky shit, which might well pertain to hinky shit at Fox. I'll probably be recognized from my so-called heyday, which is okay. The job's complex. I'm looking to bait some bent motherfuckers and see how they react."

Babs sipped her malt. "Okay, but Harry Crowder's a cop, so what's the point of it all?"

"It's about squelching some Marilyn Monroe rumors, plus a tangent angle on that kidnap deal from three weeks ago."

Babs hooted. "'Kidnap deal'? You and the Hat Squad guys dusted a man, and a motor cop I know told me it put your dicks in the wringer."

I mock-groaned. Lila said, "The kidnap's got 'publicity stunt' written all over it. And I know Gwen Perloff, going back eons. She and the late Marilyn worked call jobs together, back in the late '40s, when I was teamed up with Jeanne Carmen."

Confluence/convergence. More back-page lives connect.

Babs sipped her malt. "Listen to the voice of experience here. I know from wife-swap and key parties, and they are strictly moneymaking propositions. There's always a strict ratio of men to women, and lots of fees and extras you've got to pay if you're looking to swing. And there's no built-in random factor to spice things up. Pictures have been prescreened, to make sure no uglies and fatsos get in, and the whole drop-your-keys-in-a-bowl-and-go-home-with-somebody aspect is nothing but a shuck. People just pair off—and nobody gets stuck without a date. Motel rooms and hotel suites—all that's arranged in advance, and that's another extra you've got to pay for."

It made sense. "Moneymaking propositions." It jibed with Foxtone Services and Fox in duress.

I said, "Fuck decks. Roddy McDowall enlightened me, a few days ago. Raise your hands if you're familiar with the phenomenon."

Babs raised her hand. Lila said, "Ancient history, but I remember the craze."

I went So? Lila said, "I would have, but I never got the chance."

Babs said, “We should have been so lucky.”

I laughed. “The possibility that Marilyn posed for a fuck deck with Deedee Grenier’s brother, Paul Mitchell.”

Babs shuddered. “I’d call it remote.”

Lila said, “No, but Marilyn mentioned something along those lines. We were at a pill party a few months ago, and she said she wanted to do a smut film based on the ‘Wrong-Door Raid’—which, of course, you were involved in, Freddy.”

That’s a scalp crawler. I said, “Don’t stop there.”

“Who’s stopping? She said she wanted her ex, Timmy Berlin, to play himself, while she played herself. Smut pros would play Sinatra, DiMaggio, Phil Irwin, and you. She wanted an old lady with smut experience to play the old lady whose door got kicked in, and she wanted to shoot the film on the real-life locations.”

Babs lit a cigarette. “Fuck decks, key parties. You’re taking me back.”

I said, “Don’t stop there.”

Babs said, “The deck craze started with these aspiring actresses working the call-girl circuit after the war. These investor types would come around and try to suss out which girls had a shot to become real movie stars. They paid the aspirant stars to perform in the decks, with these stud-type costars. Then they supposedly held back distribution of the decks, so the aspirant types had a chance to become real stars.”

Calculated. Perverted. In equal measure. Hot kicks in the moment. Profits down the line.

Babs crushed her cigarette. “Then the decks would be auctioned off in some sort of rich perv circle, for big bread. Nobody I know has ever seen a fuck deck, but these rumors persist. I heard things like Barbara Bates, Joan Camden, and Ella Raines in a lezzie deck. The only thing that’s for sure is that the biggest deck investor was this bent headshrinker named Shelley Mandel. I think he might have invented the decks, and I know for a fact that he tapped beauty pageants, where all the girls were aspirant stars, and he told them that for one hour in a motel room, the money they made would put them through the Pasadena Playhouse.”

More shitwork.

More cross-checks. More paper glut. More phone bills and R&I sheets to study and more names to anoint. We worked in the Intel squadroom. We worked at five jammed-tight desks. Intel cops worked around us. They fish-eyed us and judged us. Oh, those clowns. They pushed a guy off a cliff. It's on the cop-talk Teletype.

We worked. Daryl Gates told his secretary to comb Ad Vice and divisional Vice files. She indexed a list of organized-vice offenders. We worked off photographed address-book pages, the detainees' phone bills, rap sheets, and the index. We hopped page stack to page stack and scanned columns. We stalked names, names, and names. We crossed out names and X-marked them. The Hats worked diligent. I worked, unraveled and schizzed.

Babs Payton's riff. Shelley Mandel in all guises. Penicillin peddler/call-girl hound/scrutinized by BNDD. He conceives the "fuck deck." He might have sideswiped Lois. Doc Shelley habituates beauty pageants and slides the girls rubbers and pills. He snuggles up to pageant girls and proclaims the fuck deck gospel. It fucked with my wig and threatened to quash my love for Lois. She meets him, she talks to him, she face-to-faces him and provokes his lust.

She was Miss Chicago, '48. She pageant-toured L.A. Doc Shelley was out to corrupt young women. He would have buzz-bombed Lois. He would have touched her. He would have contaminated her and poisoned her freewheeling heart. Aspirant actresses are susceptible to charm and easily bamboozled. I saw Lois and cheap studs in fuck-deck poses. I was still full-up wired. I couldn't punch STOP and squelch the brain reel. I saw Lois in poses we had never and would never assume. I saw it and saw it. I tried to pray it away and faltered. I wanted to see it because I'd never see it for real. It was all Man Camera/bulb glare/shutter click verisimo. The obscene brain reel spun on and on.

It poisoned my imagination. It devoured brain cells. I prayer-hexed it to a stasis and willed my mind pure and white-screened.

I blew off the desk work an hour back. The Hats went Huh? I holed up in my cubicle and called Eddie Chacõn. I told him to expedite a check on Dr. Sheldon Mandel. I ran down the particulars. Eddie said he knew agents at BNDD. "Give me a half hour. I'll call you back."

I waited at my desk. The juice jolt wore down. I maintained my blank brain screen. The effort drained me and left me limp. Eddie called me back. He said he had information. He told me this:

Doc Shelley was a longtime BNDD informant. He ratted overprescribing headshrinks. He didn't sell black-market penicillin. He donated it to Zionist groups during the '48 war. So did other Jewish physicians. So did Mickey Cohen, Neddie Herbert, the Aadland brothers. Jewish mobsters ponied up big. The BNDD investigated

Shelley. They desisted in ’49. They succumbed to political pressure. The Truman gang backed emergent Israel. The word filtered down to BNDD. Leave this guy alone. He’s borderline harmless. He’s giving the medicine away. BNDD worked out of Treasury. An agent turned Shelley as his snitch. Shelley knew low-rent Hollywood and the shrink netherworld. He snitched overprescribing shrinks, wholesale. He still does. He’s tight pals with the agent. They play golf once a month. Shelley lives in seclusion somewhere. He’s very weird. Treasury loves him. Are you satisfied, Señor Freddy? If so, leave this pendejo alone.

Okay, mi amigo—for now.

I went back to work. Max Herman said, “Hey, the lieutenant returns.”

Red Stromwall said, “He outranks us now. I still can’t believe it.”

Harry Crowder said, “Freddy got me a date for the wife-swap party. Lila Leeds. She had some kind of movie career, and she’s still a dish.”

Eddie Benson said, “The jury’s out on Freddy. If he gets Miller Leavy off our ass, I’ll grant him real-cop status.”

The chitchat vaporized. The Hats resumed work. I scanned phone bills and cross-checked them. Time vaporized. I crafted a work void. It kept my mind off Lois and what she did/might have done/would never do.

I stifled yawns. I imposed a no-dope vow. Phone bills, R&I sheets, the Vice index. I scanned columns and got bupkes. Red said, “I’ve got a match. One of our female detainees called a hairdresser at Fox.”

I stifled more yawns. You’ve got five full-time cops. A full day’s work nets one match. This deal’s a probable wash.

Time re-vaporized. A uniformed policewoman walked through the squadroom. I registered her as Lois and blinked. Phone-bill columns and green-sheet type blurred. I shut my eyes and went out.

Max said, “I’ve got a match. A male detainee called a woman in the index. She was running a housewife prostitution ring in Burbank.”

I opened my eyes. Harry said, “The lieutenant awakes.”

A secretary walked up. I stood up. My legs held. She passed me a thick folder.

“For you, sir. It’s that BHPD burglary file the Chief requested.”

I cleared space and dumped the contents on my desk. Five flapped envelopes/five 459’s/an early ’62 time string/five north-of-Sunset cribs, de-luxe. The envelopes were date- and address-marked. The contents were listed below:

Crime-scene reports/victims’ statements/stolen-item inventories/canvass reports.

I spread the folder wide and looked for loose sheets. An envelope dropped out.

It was clasp-sealed. It was hand-marked: "Cater waiters questioned & released."

The Hats oohed and aahed. I hefted the envelope. It felt like a photo stack. I dumped it out on my desk.

It was photographs. They were six-by-eight mug shots, all black and white. The subjects ran to a type. They oozed actors with no pot to piss in. They ran from twenty-three to thirty-five. They oozed insolvency and rage and I'll be a movie star by next Tuesday. There were fourteen pix in all. The Hats moved up to my desk and scanned them, left to right. I trawled at their speed. Max tapped Photo #14. All five of us gasped.

We knew this guy. He's not listed as "Rick Dawes" or "Richard Danforth." He's listed as "Ronald Dewhurst." We knew this guy. We killed this guy. This guy put us in a whole world of shit.

Max said, "Gwen Perloff was calling around, looking for him, months before the kidnap job."

Red said, "Yeah—she called Peter Lawford."

Eddie said, "That cinches up the kidnap as a humbug deal."

I crossed myself. I saw Dewhurst/Dawes/Danforth sail off that cliff.

We bypassed the white wine and cold lobster salad. Lois saw me stretched and weak on my feet. We blew off the swing and the nightclub music across Wilshire. We went into the bedroom and doused the lights.

We undressed in the dark. Lois pulled the curtains wide. The radio reported rain about 10:00 p.m. I crashed on the bed. I jammed my face in the sheets. Lois stretched out on my back. She threw her full weight down on me. She pushed down on me and opened me up and made me breathe past spurts.

Her knees raked my back. It felt good. I sucked air in and got words out. I got out Shelley Mandel/pageant girls/dirty pictures. Shutter click/resultant bulb glare. I saw the pictures/Lois and cheap studs/fifty-two-card decks. Lois pulled me up and laid me out sideways. She got our eyes close and slapped me. She said, "I wouldn't do that."

She slapped me. She said, "No one could make me do that." She slapped me. She said, "I wouldn't do something so ugly." She slapped me. She said, “I would never do something so shameful and hurt the people I love.”

She bloodied my face and blotted it dry with a pillow. She tucked a bunched-up sheet under my head and made me breathe deep. The room swirled. I smelled my blood and her Chanel No. 5. She slapped me, hard. She said, “I knew I’d love someone like you one day. That’s why I didn’t do it. I had every chance to do it, but I sent up prayers and walked away.”

38

(LOS ANGELES, 10:30 A.M., THURSDAY, 8/30/62)

Shit Magnet.

It’s your definitive pose. Reprise it now. You’ve got an all-cop audience. Bill Parker sanctions you. Fetch, Freddy, fetch.

Lois banged me up last night. Her welts looked like razor burns. She slapped. Pat used her fists. She left that wedding-stone cut. My two women marked me. It enhanced my shit-magnet panache.

West L.A. station. Santa Monica and Purdue. I parked across the street and got my wig tight. The BHPD folder induced aftershocks. It cinched the case for Danforth/Dawes/Dewhurst as one man. Monroe knew him, Perloff knew him, he was a probable 459 man. I ran beaucoup record checks. R&I/FBI/NCIC/fifty-state queries. All their Ronald Dewhursts were old, fat, colored, imprisoned, or dead.

Daryl Gates told the Hats to work the Dewhurst/459 angle. That meant file study and phone calls. Nat Denkins and Phil Irwin were frog-tailing Deedee Grenier. Big brother Paul Mitchell traveled underground. A rolling Deedee stakeout might flush him. I called the California Adult Authority an hour ago. I talked to Juan Manuel Salas’s ex–parole officer. He shot me a glowing report. El Manny went straight. Es la verdad. He took a TV-repair course during his Chino bounce and did follow-up work at Cal State L.A. His ’57 house-break bust? Humbug from the gate. The DA refused to file. El Manny was a canvasback welterweight—but, man, can he fix TV sets!!!

I orbed the upstairs squadroom window. Sid Leffler and J. T. Meadows walked through my frame. I read their personnel files yesterday. Bill Parker and Daryl Gates had them memorized. I’m here to bootjack their “Sicko Psycho” investigation. I’m here to revise the facts to fit Monroe/Kidnap and squelch Monroe/Kennedy rumors. “Shit magnet, Freddy. You live to offend.” Daryl Gates does not speak with forked tongue.

I grabbed my briefcase and locked the car. It was hot. The station doors were propped wide. I walked in, bold and bad. Desk cops moped and glugged soft drinks. They made me. O*h, shit—it's Freddy O.*

They saw me, they sniffed me. Is he still around? Yeah, that's Freddy. His camel's double-parked outside.

I walked upstairs. The squad bay featured partner desks and a CO's cubicle. I tagged fourteen men. That's seven roll-out teams. I sniffed thick cigarette smoke and heard typewriter clack.

Eyeballs clicked my way. Hey, isn't that? Yeah, it is. What's with the briefcase? I heard he's credentialed up. That kidnap deal, remember? He stepped on his dick there.

Leffler and Meadows sat upside the far wall. I beelined and dragged a stray chair. It thunked on the floorboards and sent up a racket. Dirty looks drilled me.

I propped the chair up against a wall post. I faced Leffler, head-on. He wore aviator glasses. He wore a cheap pinstripe suit and fruit boots with elastic side gores. Meadows vibed afterthought. He was tall and too handsome. He wore a hopsack blazer and gray slacks. He worked the vice traps in Will Rogers Park and entrapped crotch honkers wholesale. His personnel file glowed.

I flashed my credentials. Leffler and Meadows took long looks. Meadows went What's this? Leffler rolled his eyes. He knew from harrassment. I slow-orbed the room. No typewriters clacked. It's all eyes on me. My shitbird rep precedes.

I turned back to Leffler. I went stentorian. I pitched the whole room, loud and clear.

"Intelligence Division is assuming command of your 'Sicko Psycho' investigation. That's direct from Chief Parker. The CO is Lieutenant Daryl Gates. I'm the lead field man. The DA's Office liaison is Miller Leavy. The Hat Squad will be working with me. You and Officer Meadows have just been rendered redundant, but I'll shoot you some clue-clown work, so you can save face with all your colleagues who now know that I've got your balls in my pocket. I won't need to interview Officer Meadows. He's clean in my book. But, Leffler—you're borderline sketchy. You've got dubious ties to Morty Bendish, illegal smear-sheet journalists, and nut cops like Jack Clemmons. That piece you wrote for the L.A. Lowdown violates fourteen Federal postal codes per the illegal passage of unregistered mail, and the Postal Inspection Service is building a case against you and Bendish. We also have the matter of your Officer Sid gigs at high schools within this division. I'm wondering if it's nothing but a smoke screen for you to exercise your penchant for underage cooze. I personally observed you plying a group of Pali girls with booze at the Sip 'n' Surf."

Leffler trembled. He popped sweat. His glasses slid down his nose. He pushed them back up. Meadows stood up. I grabbed his waistband and pulled him back down. I scanned the room, I owned the room, all eyes on me.

I said, “Stand up.”

Leffler stood up. He went weavy and futzed with his glasses.

I said, “Walk to the front hallway, turn right, step into the second interrogation box on the left side.”

Leffler complied. He grabbed chair backs to steady himself. He walked pigeon-toed. He kept his head down and plumb-lined off the floor. He cut right and almost toppled. I stepped ahead of him and got the door.

He stepped inside. The box was prerigged. Bolted-down table/two bolted-down chairs. Two-way mirror wall. Phone book on the table. Full-sound hookup. Outside-hallway feed.

I spread Leffler up against the wall. I frisked him. I pulled off his holstered .38 and placed it on the table. I plucked his wallet and went through it. I pulled him upright and shoved him into a chair.

I sat down across from him. He said, “You’ve ruined me.”

I lit a cigarette. “You’re dirty. The Chief thinks so, Lieutenant Gates thinks so, I think so.”

Leffler waved off my smoke. “Here’s what I’m thinking. I’m thinking this is some kind of buyback deal you’ve got going. I was part of that PD-Justice raid on your listening posts. You were working bug jobs on Marilyn Monroe’s house and the Lawford place. A Justice cop told me the raids were strictly cosmetic. The Palisades and Brentwood. Get it? The Monroe house is right there. The ‘Sicko Psycho’ pulled his jobs not that far west of there. Parker’s afraid the kidnap deal and the number you and the Hats pulled with that Danforth guy will blow wide, and he’s looking to buy some good press for the Department, because the Department sure needs some good PR.”

I clap-clapped. I slid my flask across the table. Leffler took two pops.

“My Hoffa op. How far is it blown?”

“Who spilled on the Hoffa op? That Justice cop and who else?”

Leffler said, “Jack Clemmons.”

I made the jerk-off sign. “Who’s in with you and Morty B. in your little pamphlet venture?”

Leffler went harumph. “Clemmons is batshit crazy. I’m a serious writer and student of human psychology, who also happens to be a veteran police officer. I'm Morty's highbrow guy, and Clemmons pitches to Morty's lowbrow readership."

I blew smoke rings. "You don't fraternize with Clemmons or an ex–motor cop named Norm Krause, who owns a dive bar named Norm's Nest?"

Leffler went harumph. "No. Certainly not."

I said, "Okay, you did strikebreaker work at Fox, back in the early '30s. Fox interests me, so I'll toss you a compliment before we go any further. You weren't far off when you called Monroe and the kidnap job a buyback deal. That said, let me throw some Fox-associated names at you."

Leffler smirked and sucked flask juice. He's getting cocky. He mandates a smackdown.

I said, "Gwen Perloff. Have you ever met her?"

"No—but I know she was the victim in that kidnap job you and the Hats botched so bad."

"Paul Mitchell Grenier?"

"No. I've never heard of him."

"Del Kinney, Jr.?"

"Everybody in L.A. law enforcement knows Del. I don't know him from Fox, but I knew him from the Sheriff's and the ABC."

I said, "Albie Aadland?"

Leffler said, "Well, he's an Aadland. I'm a Jewish kid from L.A., and all us landsmen know the Aadlands, and we've all got the good common sense to be afraid of them, and I'm not ashamed to admit that I benefited from their largesse, back when I was a kid, starting out."

I tapped the table. "Explain that."

Leffler shrugged. "What's to explain? Hersh, Ira, Meyer—they lent money to Jewish families in trouble, and they'd hire kids to run errands and cause a little tsuris. I threw a few stink bombs and broke a few windows for them, and then I graduated to more suitable adult work."

I said, "Such as?"

Leffler flushed. I hit a nerve. The Aadlands rattled his cage.

"Well, it's the '30s into the '40s, up to and after the war. It's not that I'm proud of it, but the brothers ran a string of fuck pads. You know the concept. Hot-sheet joints, sin pits. You've got sex shows, smut films, illegal pharmaceuticals, interracial fraternization, jam sessions, all that avant-garde stuff. It was all right, I guess. At least by prevailing standards then. The Depression, the war—people needed to unwind. You had quiet little places in quiet little neighborhoods, and a high-class clientele. I worked those places as a doorman and something of a security guard. You read my personnel file, right? I spilled all that at my background interview. It was the Depression and the war. The background cops made allowances."

Yes and no. Leffler hired on in '42. He was a temporary war hire. War-hire standards ran low. He went on the regulars in '47. His war-hire record was good. He wasn't re-background-checked.

I said, "Let's get back to Albie Aadland."

Leffler said, "Why? He was much younger than Hersh, Meyer, and Ira. He was underfoot when I broke up some picket lines at Fox, which are probably the only times that I ever saw him."

I cogitated. Leffler sucked flask juice. He gassed on the Q and A. He rolled with the flow.

"Fox, today. A general sense of panic. Cleopatra's headed for the shitter. Criminal conspiracies are popping up. Dope, bearer bonds, vice shit. You're an old Fox hand. What have you heard?"

Leffler drummed the table. "Cleopatra's common knowledge. As for the rest of it, I've heard bupkes."

I drummed the table. I dead-eyed him. He was bent. He craved young stuff. He knew I had his shit dialed.

"Okay, I'm starting to get it now. Monroe was shooting her last picture at Fox. The kidnap girl was working at Fox, so somehow it's the focus of your buyback deal."

I twirled my ashtray. Three full circuits. Leffler's nerves stretched.

"You're a ham. You're a movie buff. You did crowd-extra work, you met people and made connections. You've got the writing bug, you wrote detective magazine pieces under a pseudonym, you've got a master's degree, you took some of Paul de River's classes, you went on LAPD as a war hire in '42, and a regular in '47. Is that about right?"

Leffler sneered. "Hey, the man knows how to read a personnel file."

I said, "Don't take that tone with me. I'll kick the shit out of you the next time."

Leffler put his hands up. Okay, okay, okay.

"Did you have a close personal relationship with Doc de River?"

"No, the old dink gave me no personal attention."

I mock-sighed. "You're a talented cat, Sid. I've got a source on Twist Party Stakeout, and I heard you wrote the script. I'm wondering if you exploited your 'Officer Sid' assignment and recruited the underage girls who will appear underclad in the dance scenes."

Leffler said, “Yes, I did recruit them. And they’re not underclad by any and all enlightened standards.”

I cracked my knuckles. The phone book vibrated. I packed brass knucks and a beavertail sap.

“Do not ever feed underaged girls liquor. I’m out to nail you for contributing and put you in the fruit tank at Mira Loma.”

The Sidster laughed. “Who’s your source on my picture? Tell me, so I’ll know who to avoid.”

I said, “Lois Nettleton.”

Leffler laughed. “That Method actress drip? I hope you’re not poking her, bec—”

I went with the phone book. I threw a sidearm shot to the head. It ripped the leg bolts out of the floor. The chair toppled. Leffler hit the wall face-first.

PART 6

SEX CREEP

(AUGUST 31–SEPTEMBER 8, 1962)

39

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 A.M., FRIDAY, 8/31/62)

The PD kept a suite at the Ambassador. Two bedrooms/living room/office/kitchenette. It housed out-of-town jurists and high rollers. Ranking cops entertained illicit girlfriends. Boozefest conclaves ran twenty-four hours.

Parker, Gates, and I hogged the office. A room-service waiter laid out a plush spread. We noshed eggs and smoked lox and gulped coffee. The Hats hogged the living room. They babysat Morty Bendish.

The office was air-cooled. A sliding door supplied privacy. We sat in matching wing chairs. Parker laid on the lawyerese.

Monroe, the kidnap job, and the "Sicko Psycho" string comprise a triumvirate. Fox is a "presumptive point of convergence." He fears the "degree of evidence obtained by illegal surveillance" and "the degree to which all three jobs are wholly assumption and speculation."

Gates said, "The 'Sicko Psycho' file runs to six big boxes. I lugged it over to Intel late last night. Leffler and Meadows kept assiduous reports, and they dotted all their i's and crossed their t's. Leffler's dirty, okay, I believe that—Freddy made the point in that report he filed yesterday. Sid's a worker, though—and Meadows is a comer. He's got a law degree, he's California Bar–licensed, and he's got a future with us. The important thing is that the file is jam-packed with dirt that Morty can use in his series."

Parker said, "The Mirror's a dirt rag. We'll get Morty to ladle it on. Especially as it pertains to Monroe. Morty will drag her through the mud like there's no tomorrow."

I said, "I talked to Bob Kennedy. He's up-to-date on the 'Sicko Psycho,' and he's conversant on the overall plan. Here's a good lead that may cinch Monroe to the first six break-ins. Leffler and Meadows submitted all the letters the Psycho left at the first six crime scenes, and I submitted a paper scrap of the letter I found at the Monroe house. Ray called the paper and letter stock in all seven samples 'visibly archaic.' If we push him, we might get a confirmed evidential match on the paper, the glue, and the cut-up magazines that shitbird used. On top of that, I froze a semen scraping from the smut pix I found that night. I submitted that to Ray, and Leffler and Meadows submitted all their jizz samples."

Parker spiked his coffee. Old Overholt. It's the Breakfast of Champions.

"We've got to lay off of Fox. That approach is wildly untenable. It's based solely on our unprovable assumptions that the place is a fount of criminal endeavor—when all we've got is key-party and mail-drop bullshit, most of which derives from Federal postal infractions."

Gates sipped coffee. "Freddy's grand jury plan is a winner. It permits us to present sealed testimony with the assurance that the testimony will not result in indictments, and that the guilty parties who testify will receive immunity—but will remain municipally indictable should they break silence on our cases, most notably the kidnap job. It may also serve to scotch any plans Miller Leavy might make to burn Freddy and the Hats for the Danforth job."

Parker lit a cigarette. "Danforth, Dawes, Dewhurst. Who is this guy? He's 100% clean, nationwide. Let's go through those BHPD burglary files. There has to be dirt we can pull."

I said, "Morty's series will provide your basic numbskull reader with a Monroe-job solution that will engulf any and all Monroe/Kennedy rumors that might surface. And it will serve to convince Bobby K. not to go for indictments on me and my boys. But we need to conclusively ID the kidnappers, pop them, and convince them to testify, for an assured waltz on all kidnap and related charges. So far, I'm fairly certain that Gwen Perloff and possibly Paul Mitchell Grenier were in on it—but it's all instinct and no proof."

Gates laughed. "Perloff, Grenier, one unknown male Caucasian, one probable male Latin. Maybe they'll resist arrest—and Freddy and the Hats will have to toast them."

Parker swirled his drink. "Have the boys bring Morty in. I'm due downtown."

Gates got up and slid the door wide. The Hats ushered Morty B. in. I pulled a chair out. Red Stromwall sat him down.

Parker said, "The 'Sicko Psycho' will henceforth be known as the 'Sex Creep.' You will author a sensational, multipart, ongoing series on the Sex Creep in the Mirror-News. We will apportion information to you, and you will deploy it to our exact specifications. Lieutenant Otash and the Hat Squad are taking over the investigation into the Sex Creep's first six West L.A. burglaries. Your brother-in-law, Officer

Leffler, and his partner, Officer Meadows, are out as of now. Again, we will tell you what to write. In consideration of your efforts, all of the Federal and municipal mail-fraud charges filed against you will be dropped."

Morty stood up. He did a little heel-click/Jawohl, mein Führer number. It garnered big laughs.

"I'll do it. But where's this series of mine going? What's the furkakte punch line?"

I said, "Don't be dim, Morty. The Sex Creep murdered Marilyn Monroe."

Skull session. The Hats and me. We've planned a detailed read-through.

We've got occurrence summaries, lab sheets, record checks, and field interrogation cards. We've got field-interview reports. Leffler and Meadows worked the string. They weren't Burglary-desk cops. They were night-watch felony-car detectives. The complainants called West L.A. station. Patrol cops responded. Leffler and Meadows were dispatched, pro forma. They viewed the crime scenes, hot and fresh. They took extensive notes. They maintained a crime-scene photo file.

I redid my cubicle. I took down my "Monroe" and "Kidnap" corkboards and taped a plastic-sheath wall map in their place. The map spanned the northern section of West Los Angeles. It covered Brentwood, Mandeville Canyon, the Santa Monica Mountains, and Pacific Palisades. I grease pencil–marked it: "Sex Creep 459 locations."

The Hats showed. I shoved my desk into a corner and bought us sit-down room. They brought straight-backed chairs. I passed out grease pencils and mimeographed copies of the six occurrence reports.

We formed a chair circle. Max and Red passed out coffee and ashtrays. We jumped on the work.

459 #1: 11/18/61. (DR #63882, 1 of 6). 13821 Corsica Drive, Pacific Palisades. Complainant: Marcia Maria Davenport/WFA/DOB 6/12/19. Twice divorced, lives alone. Lives off trust fund. Complainant's call to station: 9:49 p.m. Suspect pushed up half-cracked window and entered house. No items stolen. Suspect dumped lingerie drawers, kicked over furniture, scattered barbiturate sleeping pills taken from medicine cabinet on bathroom rug. Suspect masturbated and ejaculated on lingerie-drawer items. (Semen sample to lab). Suspect left note composed in cutout/pasted-on magazine letters in lingerie drawer. Both magazine letters and paper backing appear to be significantly dated. The note reads “I saw you hiking at Will Rogers Park. Do you remember the moment you pulled your blouse out to scratch your back? I do.”

I checked the map. I X-marked the address. Local geography. Corsica Drive adjoins Riviera Country Club. Will Rogers Park is one mile northwest.

459 #2: 12/4/61. (DR #63882, 2 of 6). 12242 Marlboro Street, Pacific Palisades. Complainant: Leona Jenks Hagedohm/WFA/DOB 4/16/28. Once divorced, lives alone. Math teacher at Paul Revere Junior High School. Complainant’s call to station: 11:18 p.m. Suspect reached through pet-access flap and unhooked kitchen door. No items stolen. Suspect dumped lingerie drawers, dumped furniture in fireplace, slashed guest-bedroom mattress, masturbated and ejaculated on photographs of complainant in complainant’s 1946 Santa Monica High School yearbook. (Semen sample to lab). Suspect left note composed in cutout/pasted-on magazine letters in lingerie drawer. Both magazine letters and paper backing appear to be significantly dated. The note reads “I like your way with the kids at Paul Revere. Are you too frigid to have kids of your own?”

I checked the map. I X-marked the address. The Sex Creep’s creeping west. He’s still south of Sunset. Marlboro Street is two blocks south of Paul Revere. The Sex Creep peeped Victim #2 as she walked to work.

459 #3: 12/16/61. (DR #63882, 3 of 6). 1545 Monaco Drive, Pacific Palisades. Complainant: Wanda Jean D’Allesio/WFA/DOB 1/9/30. Twice divorced, lives alone. Alimony recipient. Complainant’s call to station: 10:04 p.m. Suspect vaulted in pushed-up window and entered house. No items stolen. Suspect dumped lingerie drawers, kicked over furniture, dumped and burned family photo albums in the living room fireplace, dumped barbiturate pills in the master-bathroom toilet, masturbated and ejaculated on a snapshot of complainant and first husband in swim attire. (Semen sample to lab). Suspect left note composed in cutout/pasted-on magazine letters in lingerie drawer. Magazine letters and paper backing appear to be significantly dated. The note reads “Two husbands is nothing. Carole Landis had four, and she died younger than you, even if I kill you tomorrow.”

I checked the map. I X-marked the address. The Sex Creep’s creeping back northwest. He’s escalating. He’s getting more agitated and more violent. The Carole Landis reference clinched it. The Sex

Creep creeped the Monroe pad. Monaco Drive is one-half mile from the Landis pad on Capri Drive.

459 #4: 1/19/62. (DR #63882, 4 of 6). 10116 Mandeville Lane, Brentwood. Complainant: Arden Jane Brownleigh/WFA/DOB 5/21/32. Once divorced, lives alone. Alimony recipient. Complainant's call to station: 11:31 p.m. Suspect picked lock on rear service porch and entered house. No items stolen. Suspect dumped lingerie drawers, disconnected and overturned basement appliances, shattered glass-encased wedding photos of complainant and ex-husband, stuck pins in their faces and nailed the frameless photograph to the living room wall. Suspect masturbated and ejaculated in lingerie drawer. (Semen sample to lab). Suspect left note composed in cutout/glued-on magazine letters. Magazine letters and paper backing appear to be significantly dated. The note reads "You think you look like her. You fashion yourself after her. You're nowhere near."

I checked the map. I X-marked the address. The Creep's creeping east. He's into Brentwood now. He's veering toward Fifth Helena Drive. I checked the file photo of Arden Jane Brownleigh. She's got that vapid blond/Monroe look.

459 #5: 2/29/62. (DR #63882, 5 of 6). 10110 Highwood Street, Brentwood. Complainant: Lorraine (NMI) Smith/WFA/DOB 10/25/27. Twice divorced, lives alone. Alimony recipient. Complainant's call to station: 9:29 p.m. Suspect used glass cutter and entered bedroom window. No items stolen. Suspect dumped lingerie drawer and formed a tableau, consisting of soggy bathroom towels, dumped cigarette butts, pages torn out of complainant's address book scattered on random bookshelves. Suspect masturbated and ejaculated in lingerie drawer. (Semen sample to lab). Left note composed in cutout/glued-on magazine letters in lingerie drawer. Magazine letters and paper backing appear to be significantly dated. The note reads "You're like Cape Canaveral. You're my launching pad to greater things."

I checked the map. I X-marked the address. The Creep's creeping close. It's 2/29/62. I sense this.

He's already prowled the Monroe house. She's set to move in within two weeks. The trades reported it. He's been inside her prior cribs. He knows how she cultivates sloth and disarray. He's anticipating the sloth and disarray at Fifth Helena Drive. The creepoid Creep's on the hunt—

459 #6: 3/12/62. (DR #63882, 6 of 6). 2802 Fourth Anita Drive, Brentwood. Complainant: Dorothy Dilys Trent/WFA/DOB 7/21/33. Once divorced, lives alone. Registrar at University High School.

Complainant's call to station: 12:41 a.m., 3/13/62. Suspect kicked in bedroom window. No items stolen. Suspect dumped lingerie drawer and formed a tableau, consisting of dumped soggy towels, dumped cigarette butts, torn pages out of complainant's address book scattered on random bookshelves. Suspect masturbated and ejaculated in lingerie drawer. (Semen sample to lab). Suspect left no note. Suspect left 1948 nude morgue photograph of actress Carole Landis in lingerie drawer.

I checked the map. I X-marked the address. Sex Creep! Sex Creep! Sex Creep! His internal shit's imponderable. He plays suicidal. He does not play homicidal. So what? Morty Bendish will twist established facts to spell MURDER ONE. We'll track the Sex Creep down and corner him. He'll try to escape. We'll shoot him dead and indict him for the Monroe snuff, posthumous. The lurid art of it will outcreep any and all Monroe-Kennedy rumors.

Max said, "Off the top of my head, he's no killer."

Red said, "Yeah—but Morty needs a punch line for his series."

Harry said, "He's in jail for some other sort of offense. That, or the nut bin. That's why he stopped in March."

Eddie said, "Not March—he was B and E'ing the Monroe crib in June and July. Remember? Marilyn was talking it up to her friends on Freddy's phone taps. It has to be the same guy—but Marilyn didn't report the break-ins. The Creep stiffed calls to three of the six victims. I read ahead to the follow-up reports, so that's how I know that. Remember? Marilyn told her friends she got breather calls."

Red said, "I heard those tapes. Her account of the break-ins played kosher, but the breather-call bit came off like a fabrication."

I lit a cigarette. "She kept the smut pix he jizzed on. I know her. She was a sick twist who craved sick attention. This fucker is nothing but sick drama, and that's the kind of shit Marilyn got off on."

The Hats dispersed. They had a mimeo file copy and took it to Vince and Paul's Steakhouse for a nosh-and-read. I read and chain-smoked in my cubicle. I tipped to one aspect, fast.

The Sicko Psycho/Sex Creep string was Sid Leffler's baby. He got seduced and worked it with and without J. T. Meadows. The Burglary-desk cops wised up and tossed him the string. The sex shit must have jazzed him. He studied under Paul de River. That meant this: more case lines and dubious headshrinkers constellate.

Leffler and Meadows worked it. They studied FI cards. They were submitted by night-watch patrol cops on the six break-in nights. Leffler and Meadows braced twenty-seven male Caucasians and three non-Caucasians out strolling Brentwood and the Palisades. They called in warrant checks and rap-sheet checks and got zero. Nobody popped up and shrieked "Bust me!" They roused known westside burglars and registered sex offenders and got zero squared. Print men dusted all six 459 locations. They got smudges/smears/the complainant's prints off exemplar sets and rubber-glove prints that indicated a small-handed man. Leffler schmoozed Ray Pinker into a favor. Ray did a walking portrait in the 459 #4 living room. A flat-weave carpet retained foot depressions. Ray tagged the Creep as a small-footed man. His stride was short. He walked heels out. He ran antithetical to the tall/big-foot man who tracked through the Monroe pad on 8/4/62.

A photo crew snapped all six 459 locations. I Man Camera'd the pix and merged sight and savvy. Leffler and Meadows canvassed the immediate neighbors. They described all six complainants as lonely divorced women. Said women spent most evenings alone. They played Broadway show tune albums and juiced. Neighbors said they heard songs from Camelot and The Fantasticks blasting on the break-in nights, during the break-in time frames. The complainants were out of their homes and the Sex Creep was plundering. That meant this:

He cased his intended victims. He cased their homes. He learned their habits. He surveilled them and pounced when they split for the evening. He observed their attire and extrapolated dates and social engagements. He calculated time spans. He broke in and spun disks. It sound-covered his ransackings. I skimmed crime-scene photos. I saw hurled furniture and jizzed-up lingerie. I played "Soon It's Gonna Rain," "Try to Remember," and "If Ever I Should Leave You" in a separate brain vault. It ran my Man Camera stereophonic. I went through the photo stacks. I saw the soggy towel/dumped ashtray tableaux. I saw the scattered address-book pages. I saw the cutout/glued-on magazine letters. I played those mawkish show tunes concurrent. A brain chant cut through my sound track:

Lonely women, lonely women, lonely women.

Leffler and Meadows milked the string dry. They set the Hats and me up for a shit-kicking reprise. Add Morty B.'s print barrage. Plus possible radio and TV. Something had to give.

I called Ray Pinker. I told him to rush-job the six semen scrapes. I told him to run cell-isolate tests on my Monroe-pad scrape. Ray said he'd work late tonight and do it.

I called Miller Leavy. He was barely civil. I told him to write to Lowell Farr's parents and goose my interview request. Leavy said he would. I told him to stiff a formal interview request to Albie Aadland. Leavy snarled and said he would.

I called Nat Denkins. I told him to goose his spot tails on Deedee Grenier and run them full-time. Nat squawked and called me a slavedriver. I pledged double pay. That brought him around. I called Phil Irwin and told him to rent a phone truck. Park it on Miller Drive, north of Gwen Perloff's pad. Hold down high-up/look-down surveillance. Eyeball the front door. Let's see who visits Big Gwen.

Daryl Gates cruised by. He said the Chief's monthly lunch with Sheriff Pitchess was inked in for tomorrow. Pete has some "hot" Black Muslim footage. He wants to sell it to Intel. "I'm looking for a quid pro quo, Freddy. A favor the Chief can lob at Pete."

I said, "Have the Chief ask him why Motel Mike Bayless transferred out of SHIT at the exact moment of the Perloff snatch, only to transfer back to SHIT in the immediate wake of the snatch, with only rudimentary work on the job completed. I'll get you a contact mike to attach to the table, so I can gauge Pete's answer."

Gates agreed and bopped back to his office. I called Eddie Chacõn and urged him to lean on BNDD. Shelley Mandel was a big Zionist. He funneled black-market meds to the Irgun and the Haganah. I'm impressed—but get me Doc Shelley's current whereabouts.

Red Stromwall cruised by. He said the Hats were still matching phone bills and address-book listings from the Bev's Switchboard raid. He scheduled an interview with that Fox hairstylist. One of the swinger women from the raid called her three times. Eddie Benson jammed that woman who ran the housewife prosty ring. He said she's a wash—she don't know shit from Shinola.

Red scrammed. My cubicle was wicked hot. I goosed the AC dial and aimed a vent at my balls. Aahh—that's good.

I file-hopped. I jumped LAPD to BHPD. Both files denoted 459 PC —burglary/residential.

Five occurrence reports with missing-item lists. With station-house mugs but no print cards. The jobs occurred in the wake of cater-waitered parties. "Cater waiter" is a suspect occupation. It sustains bad boys between 459's, fruit hustles, and gigolo jaunts. I dumped the photo sheaths. Ronald Dewhurst smirked up at me.

He's aka Rick Dawes. Marilyn Monroe and Gwen Perloff knew him. I knew him as Richie Danforth. It was brief. Here's our denouement. Max Herman says, "Sink him, Freddy."

I crossed myself and dumped the print manifests. The squad lieutenant included a cover note. He wrote “Smudges, smears, partials and elimination-printed latents found at all locations. In addition, two different sets of rubber-glove prints were found at all locations. (Note photo blowups).”

I dug through the print sheath and pulled out the photos. “Differentiated?” That’s dead-on. I studied the print card. I noted this:

Individual prints. Plus full hand spreads pressed on touch-and-grab planes. Hands pressed to window ledges, doorjambs, and drawer pulls at all five locations. The big-hand man had spatulate fingers. I never noticed Richie Danforth’s fingers. The small-hand man had short, slender fingertips, down to the flex digit. These glove prints looked familiar. I naked-eyed them, in tight. They resembled the rubber-glove prints from the Sex Creep jobs.

The Intel darkroom featured a twin-lens microscope. I bundled up the BHPD print pix and the Creep manifest. I hit the darkroom and worked them.

I rigged the slides. I grabbed an X-Acto knife and excised representative print close-ups. I got a right-index-finger doorjamb from Sex Creep Job #3 and a window ledge from BHPD Job #5. #3 went under the left slide. #5 went under the right slide. I adjusted the eyepieces and dialed the lenses in identically tight.

Way tight. Near-cellular tight. Count the pixels, the microdots, the stretch flaws in taut latex.

Squint now. Cover your right eye and squint left. Note those three crosshatch dots. It’s a subcellular cluster. You’ve got it memorized.

Now squint right. Cover your left eye. Squint down. There’s something like those same crosshatched dots. Stressed latex meets hard surface. It’s representative. It’s not a match.

My eyes watered. I wiped them on my coat sleeve. I covered my right eye. I adjusted the left-hand slide and squinted left. I saw a big fat rubber-glove seam from BHPD Job #5. I saw a minute fissure near the digit flex. I switched eyes. I covered my left eye and adjusted the right-hand slide. I squinted right. I saw the same fat rubber-glove seam from the Sex Creep’s Job #3. There’s that same fissure near the digit flex.

It’s a match. It’s pure forensic gospel. The Sex Creep did the divorcée 459’s solo. The Sex Creep doubled up with the Beverly Hills burglar. Said burglar might or might not be Richie Danforth/Rick Dawes/Ronnie Dewhurst. It’s not courthouse-valid evidence. Who gives a shit? Richie/Rick/Ronnie’s dead and the Sex Creep’s a newspaper casualty and X-marked for a lynch mob.

I shitworked past dusk. I reread the Sex Creep file and the BHPD burglary file and memorized small details. I reread the Sheriff's kidnap file and annotated inconsistencies. I called Nat Denkins. He reported: Deedee Grenier was shacked with a lezzie bar pickup. He'd resume the tail, tomorrow. Maybe she'd lead him to Paul Mitchell. I called Phil Irwin. He said his crane surveillance paid off, quick.

Darryl Zanuck showed up at Gwen's pad and stayed inside three hours. Pops left at 3:05 p.m. Phil tailed Gwen to Bullocks Wilshire. He followed her up to Ladies' Wear. She purchased a nifty black dress. She told the saleslady she was wearing it to a party Sunday night. It has to be the wife-swap bash. I'll be there. With "wife" Babs Payton. Harry Crowder will be there. With "wife" Lila Leeds.

I got cabin fever. The all-day shitwork stint compressed me. I split the PAB and cruised twilight L.A.

It was a hot summer night. I cruised with intent. I broomed out to West Hollywood. I dropped by the Jaguar, the Tradesman, the Falcon's Lair. I chatted up the lads. I gleaned zero leads per Paul Mitchell Grenier. I forked out ten-spots and phone-number slips. Call me if Paul Mitchell returns to Planet Earth. I pay C-notes for solid leads.

I drove by Bev's Switchboard and parked outside. No perverts, call girls, or call boys appeared and grabbed their mail. I split and buzzed out to the Palisades. I zigzagged residential streets and looked for the house Monroe sketched on 6/22/48. I saw nothing close.

I pulled up to 13821 Corsica Drive. Divorcée #1 lives here. Marcia Maria Davenport/current age forty-three/twice divorced, lives alone. Let's prowl the perimeter, let's peep windows, let's channel the Sex Creep and PEEP.

I did it. Sycamore trees enclosed the property lines on both sides. I hunkered low and popped up to scope lighted windows. I caught the living room first. Marcia Davenport paced and smoked. Her hi-fi belched samba music. Marcia popped her hips and sambaed wall to wall. She had bleached-blond Monroe hair. She wore it in the Monroe flip style. She grabbed a glass off an end table and sipped as she sambaed. It looked like straight gin.

The Sex Creep dug Marcia. She vibed experience. He perved her, he peeped her, he pursued her. He learned her routine and desecrated her home. I grokked it. I got the gestalt.

I drove to 12242 Marlboro Street. It's two blocks south of Sunset. Divorcée #2 lives here. Leona Jenks Hagedohm/current age thirty-four/once divorced, lives alone. It's a white Spanish job. Palm trees provide peep cover. I got out and strolled the perimeter. I caught Leona in the kitchen. She was wearing a panty-and-bra combo and nothing else. She chugged off a highball glass. She sudsed up her arms. She had short blond hair with dark roots. Two divorcées down, two dye jobs noted. The Sex Creep's got a type.

I cut out. I drove to 1545 Monaco Drive. Divorcée #3 lives here. Wanda Jean D'Allesio/current age thirty-two/twice divorced, lives alone. It was a stucco ranch spread. It lacked tree cover. That didn't matter. Wanda Jean sat on her front porch. She wore a frayed pink shift and chain-smoked Kool filter kings. She tried to read a magazine, it bored her, she tossed it. She had long brown hair. The Sex Creep dug her. He did not exclude brunettes. I dug her. She had that pent-up/caged-tigress look that always gassed me. Hey, Creep—this chick's ring-a-ding!

I split and cruised the Palisades commercial strip. I got a flash. The Sex Creep lives nearby. He walks to his B and E's or walks a dog to appear prosaic. He brings the dog inside his target pads. He's got access to real estate and/or court records and studies his target women. He simmers his lust to a boil. He breaks, enters, and peeps.

It was 10:00 p.m. I cruised the Palisades Village. I saw late sidewalk diners and Pali kids out trolling. I caught a line outside the Bay Theater. It's make-out-date central for Pali High libertines.

I parked on Sunset and strolled. I scanned kid cliques for Lowell Farr and didn't spot her. I saw a sidewalk art show, set up outside the Bay. An old lady hawked amateur stuff. She mimed Left Bank Paris. She featured oil paintings on easels. They were god-awful dreck.

I browsed my way through. I saw seascapes, mountain vistas, Will Rogers Park in bloom. Then jarring colors and a face cut into squares—with the eyeballs, nose, and mouth rearranged.

A woman's face. Marilyn Monroe's face. A companion oil to Lowell Farr's wall art. Note the "L. Farr/'62" daubed in the lower left corner. I peeped the wall art from Natasha Lytess' rooftop. Vandals painted over it. That painting torqued me then. This painting torqued me more.

Monroe's mouth grew out of her forehead. Two husbands and John F. Kennedy were trapped inside. DiMaggio, Arthur Miller, Mattress Jack himself. They screamed. Marilyn's mouth enclosed them. They were recognizable. Lowell did good detail work. Shattered music clefs poured from Marilyn's right ear. Scrabble letters poured from the left. They spelled "a life in discordance." Sharp fangs grew out of her hairline. Lowell scalped her. Nembutal capsules formed a bright yellow wig.

The painting was up for sale. It was a steal at fifty bucks. I gave the cashier a hundred. She almost plotzed.

I was itchy, antsy, adrenalized. The painting torqued me. The rubber-glove match torqued me more. I hit Sunset east and cut north on Benedict Canyon. I wanted to prowl unit 208 at the Tiki-Torch Village apartments.

I brain-screened flashbacks:

Saturday, 5/19/62. I tail Monroe to the Valley. I blow the tail. I scrawl parked-car plate numbers and misplace the tally sheet. I find the sheet belatedly and learn this:

Gwen Perloff parked her car two blocks from the Tiki-Torch. Likewise, Monroe. Back on 5/19/62. At the same time of day.

Cut to:

8/4/62. Monroe dies. Gwen Perloff is kidnapped. She's rescued. At the Tiki-Torch apartments.

I crossed Mulholland and downsloped to the Valley. The heat index spiked. Ranch pads devolved to swinger-pad blocks. I parked outside the Tiki-Torch. The courtyard was lit bright. Shrieks and pool-splash noise carried. The sidewalk reeked of chlorine.

The front gate was unlocked. I ambled on in. I shined on the water sports and the poolside tiki bar. I took side stairs up to unit 208.

I dug the Tiki-Torch. This sin pit aspired to class. The poolside view was a perk. 208 was a boss perv perch.

I peeled off the Sheriff's crime-scene tape and jammed a #4 pick in the door lock. Two twists right, two twists left. The door popped wide.

I stepped inside and shut the door behind me. The living room reeked of carpet-lift solvents. I flipped a wall switch. Recessed track lights threw a glow. The room had been cleaned out. A purple deep-pile carpet remained.

It was blast-oven hot. I flipped an AC switch and circulated cold air. A clipboard in-and-out log was propped by the door. It was big-crime de rigueur. Police personnel signed in and out for the job's duration.

I picked up the clipboard. One notebook sheet was clipped in. One entry was logged. Sergeant Michael J. Bayless signed in and out. He was here from 2:15 to 3:00 p.m./Sunday, 8/5/62.

Anomaly. Inconsistency. I'd read the Sheriff's task list for the snatch. The lab crew and photo crew had been here. The list reflected the pro forma shitwork decreed by kidnap jobs. The job went pfffft then. Here's the big question. Did it go pfffft from dearth of leads or cosmetic design?

More cops should have traipsed through here. Curious patrol cops. Canvass cops beating the heat. Cops hot to scope the chicks and make the scene.

I lit the pad and strolled the pad. It was cheese-luxe, all the way. The walls had been print-wiped. The task list noted that. The snatch men knew their shit. I checked the closet where the geeks stashed Gwen P. Gwen said they stuck an AC hose under the door to keep her cool and refreshed. I saw gouge marks at the bottom of the door frame. The hose would have fit right there.

The closet bit played half credible. It felt almost cop-contrived. I checked the two bedrooms. They were pristine. I checked Bathroom #1. It was pristine. Bathroom #2 was not quite pristine.

In the medicine chest. On the third shelf. There's a small X-Acto knife. There's purple fiber gack stuck to the blade.

The gack matches the purple deep-pile carpet. Additional fibers match a gray carpet pad.

It's an oversight. The toss cops shined the knife on. Somebody's been futzing under the living room rug.

I walked back to the living room. I pulled up the carpet and tossed all four corners to the center of the room. I saw a gouged-in pocket at the dead middle. Somebody fashioned a quickie stash hole.

I reached in. My hand brushed warm metal. I pulled out two padlock keys. They were stamped "208/storage."

We've got pool-courtyard apartments. There's an underground garage. The storage lockers would have to be—

There.

I tried not to run. I relocked the pad and walked to the main stairwell. I took the stairs down three at a time. The stairwell led straight to a fume-choked garage.

It was monsoon hot. The Tiki-ites favored flash rides. Vettes, T-Birds, 409 Chevys with lake pipes and cheater slicks. They vibed repo bait. Leaky pipes dripped dark ooze. They spattered off cherry paint jobs.

There it is. Up against the north wall. A steel door marked STORAGE.

I slid through car rows and dodged dripping ooze. The large key opened the large door. A wall switch lit the space. I clocked four walls with two locker rows per. 101 was just off to my left. Even numbers sat on top, odd numbers sat below. I beelined to the 200s and counted eight lockers over.

The small key fit. The door creaked open. I saw one fat newspaper stack.

That's it. There's nothing else. What the fuck is—

I started at the top. They were all Heralds. The Herald was L.A.'s Hearst rag. It ran threadbare compared to the Times. I pulled out the top three. They were dated Wednesday/Thursday/Friday/—8/1, 8/2, 8/3/62.

It was the ramp-up to the Monroe OD/kidnap convergence. I scanned all three issues. I checked every page. I indulged notions of microdots and dead-letter drops. I got old news and ink-smeared hands.

I dug out the bottom issue. It was dated 5/1/62. That induced hotbox chills. 208 was rented out that day. An obese lady rented it. She also rented the backup pad on 6th and Dunsmuir.

I saw convergence/confluence/conspicuous design. I scanned every page of the 5/1 issue. It was unscrawled and unscribbled. It was void of mail-drop shit.

I pulled Heralds and read my way up to mid-May. Papers were consecutively stacked and unannotated. Yes—but hoarded toward what end?

I read my way up to Saturday, 5/19/62. I tailed Monroe here that day. She blew my tail. She split this location and caught a noon charter flight to New York. Her Madison Square Garden gig was set for that night. She was set to sing "Happy Birthday" to Big Jack.

I flipped to page two. The Herald ran a puff piece on the prez and his birthday girl. I flipped to the next fold and saw this:

A red-lipstick-scrawled heart. A red arrow piercing it. "MM here today!!!" scrawled within. It's an androgynous scrawl. Maybe an arty man/maybe a butch woman. Tiny pinholes pierced the heart. They dripped red-ink, ballpoint-pen blood.

I drove back downtown. I was beat-to-shit depleted and concurrently hopped up. A long day triggered a long flashback roll.

The Beverly Hills 459's. Danforth/Dawes/Dewhurst, partnered up with the Sex Creep. Rubber-glove entries/forensic crossover leads. The divorcées. Unit 208 at the Tiki-Torch. The storage bins. The newspaper scrawls. It proves this:

Monroe worked the kidnap job.

Convergence /confluence/conspiracy.

It was 1:00 a.m. I parked in the PAB lot and elevatored up to the lab. Ray Pinker's work bay was lit up bright-bright. His desk was sixteen-by-sixteen and fluorescent-lamp lit. He displayed the evidence I requested. It was multidiscipline and all Sex Creep.

I scanned left to right. I saw the magazine-letter notes left at the divorcée pads. I saw the note the Creep left at the Monroe pad. Plus glue-sample bottles and binders filled with exemplars of magazine typefaces and paper stock. Plus seven photo blowups of male ejaculate cells.

Ray walked in. He said, "It's all one guy. He's a type-AB secretor, so we've got a line on his blood. It's a rare type, so that should help you eliminate would-be suspects. California driver's licenses displayed blood type and thumbprints up to '56, so you should be able to get some eliminations or confirmations there. The paper backing is '46 to '50, cheap bond, chemically treated to adhere to the binding of the cheap men's magazines of the era. The cutout letters were clipped from He-Man Adventure, Calling All Rogues, The All-Man Danger Digest, and Calling All Rogues Presents Filmland Femme Fatales. The glue utilized in all seven notes is present-day Elmer's Glue-All, which was also widely used back then. The femme fatale rag only ran for two issues, but both featured Carole Landis. The note the Creep left Monroe utilized letters from an issue that featured a spread on poor Carole's suicide."

40

(LOS ANGELES, 10:00 A.M., SATURDAY, 9/1/62)

Morty Bendish delivered. I played paperboy.

The Hats and I staged a coup. We took over the West L.A. DB. The squad lieutenant was out golfing. We bootjacked his office and snatched his desk jug. Sixteen detectives evil-eyed us. They scoped the newspapers I dropped on their desks.

"Sex Creep Stalks Westside!!!" "Tuff Task Force Assigned!!!" "Vixen-Victim Marcia Davenport Resembles Soiled Sexpot Monroe!!!" "Cops Ponder Malevolent Monroe Connection!!!"

The Mirror-News delivered. It's the Chandler dynasty's down-market daily. It's the mongo kid brother of the mighty L.A. Times. Morty's column is tagged "Bendish's Back-Page Beat." It's subtitled "The Lurid Local Lore We Live For." The city editor moved Morty up to page three. Bill Parker pulled strings.

The headlines packed punch. The text tattled Marilyn's "nympho nook" in "bring-the-brisket Brentwood." It portrayed Divorcée #1 as a "lithe look-alike." It laid out B and E #1, sans jack-off and jizzed undies. It employed scare tactics.

"Will the Westside wither and warp into Tijuana North?? Are the Klubb Satan and its deranged donkey show soon to come? Is the Sex Creep the hellhound harbinger of horrid events on the horizon? The Westside has been a warm womb for wounded but still dishy and delectable divorcées. Trouble bodes—but if DA's Lieutenant Freddy Otash and the LAPD's hard-charging Hat Squad nail the Sex Creep, the Westside will remain safe and sane!!!!!"

The squadroom cops read the piece. The squadroom cops snickered and glared our way. Sid Leffler glared, J. T. Meadows glared. Max kicked the office door shut.

"Well, we've got Ray Pinker's call. It's all one guy."

Red said, "Jesus, and the Creep was out pulling 459's with Richie Danforth or whoever he was. This whole deal is a cluster fuck, but Freddy's pulled glove prints from both strings."

I lit a cigarette. “Phil Irwin called me an hour ago. He was up in his surveillance crane, early this morning. He saw Mike Bayless drive up Miller Drive, in his civilian car, straight toward Gwen Perloff’s place. Bayless sees Phil, who’s ex-Sheriff’s, and drives right on past. He’s dirty, and he’s dirty with Perloff on the kidnap caper.”

Max said, “That deal gets stranger and stranger. Witness those newspapers Freddy found last night.”

Eddie said, “I forgot to mention that hairdresser at Fox. We’re buying her lunch at Ships. She did Marilyn’s hair on Got to Give, and she says she’s got the latest and greatest. Also, she said that woman we popped at Bev’s is a puta, and she’s got no truck with her, other than styling her hair.”

The desk jug went around. We all glug-glugged.

Harry said, “Let’s get back to the Creep. We’ve got twenty-seven FI cards to go through, and we need to run reinterviews. Likewise, the registered sex offenders Leffler and Meadows hauled in.”

I said, “I’ve read through the RSOs’ statements, and I’ve checked their rap sheets and mug shots. They all seem too young to me. I’ve got the Creep pegged as older. He had to be—at least—an adolescent back in the late ’40s, when all his sex shit started percolating. The old magazines, his Landis fixation, all of it. And, there’s got to be some Landis paperwork somewhere. I want to see if there’s anything to indicate she was hassled by peepers, breather calls, or psycho fans.”

Red went Nix. “Her PD files have been picked clean. Every cop scrounger on God’s green earth has had his snout in the files and nicked mementoes. Three of our divorcées got breather calls after the break-ins, and they all told Leffler and Meadows that the guy did not sound like some young kid looking to pull his pud.”

I said, “Monroe ran her breather-call number on some friends of hers. I think it was all fabrication.”

Max lit a cigar. “Yeah, of the woe-is-me variety.”

Harry spun the desk jug. It skittered into his lap.

“I’m inclined not to toast the Creep, pro forma. Look what Richie Danforth got us. Look who’s out to nail us for that one.”

Edna Medina was eager to yak. She was forty-five or -six. She wore a floral-print muumuu and white tennys.

Max and I bought lunch. Harry, Red, and Eddie cranked it back at the DB. They were building a new Sex Creep file. The chore should protract. They'd be there all night.

We hogged a corner booth. Traffic boomed on La Cienega. Edna cocked her head and smiled at Max. She craved yak-yak more than lunch.

Max said, "This is a follow-up to that phone chat you had with Officer Benson, ma'am. You told him you did Marilyn Monroe's hair for Something's Got to Give. I'm sure you recall the conversation."

Edna poked a bread basket. "I recall it, too. I told him Miss Monroe was nice, but she was loca. And she talked a blue streak, which was loca mas."

I said, "How so?"

"Well, she's an actress. So, she plays to her audience. She sees that I'm Mexican, so she starts working me. She tells me Mexico's her favorite country. I say, 'Try living there,' and she tells me she's a secret courier for bearer bonds, and she's working with a noted reformer to rebuild the Mexican economy. I told you, loca mas."

Max signaled me: You respond.

I said, "And you replied?"

Edna said, "I told her this bond thing was a shuck, and who's this 'reformer,' he sounds like a dope pusher to me. So, Miss Monroe laughs and says, 'Well, he is.' She says she goes in disguise, and some old Russian lady fakes documents, and so she couriers bonds and sometimes dope, but dope should be legal in Mexico and the United States, so it can enchant people and turn them into revolutionaries who hunt down fascists. I told you, loca mas."

The reformer is José Bolaños. The forger might be Natasha Lytess. She might have lied to me. She said Monroe was out of her life. Gwen Perloff peddles bearer bonds. That's established fact. She's a professional. She's the only one. She's in with deluded amateurs—up to and including Marilyn Monroe.

Max said, "Did Miss Monroe tell you the reformer's name?"

Edna sipped coffee. "José Bolaños. She said he had a big chorizo."

I said, "Okay. You said she's 'loca mas.' I'm betting she fed you crazier stories than that."

Edna poked the bread basket. "She said she had the goods on President Kennedy, and she said she was going to make him divorce Jackie and marry her. She said she and some other woman had a deal in the works to take over Fox, so that they'll make nothing but movies that glorify real people. I said, 'Will I get a raise then?' Miss Monroe said, 'No, but you'll get paid in Mar-Gwen preferred stock, which is more valuable than pure platinum.' Like I said, loca mas."

Mar-Gwen. There you go. The confluence extends.

The swing creaked. The stars twinkled low. The lobster salad wilted. Our easy talk flatlined. We hooked our legs up and plopped them down on the room-service cart.

We sprawled on the swing. Lois and I run telepathic. She spins at my own warp speed. I called the convergence "All Of It." She deciphers my brain-waves.

"I know what you've been doing. People live to confide, you know. And I've developed a source."

I said, "Who?"

"Pat Lawford. Confidante of guess who? You said they tell each other everything. They're brother and sister, so I don't quite consider it unseemly."

The ground dipped. The sky dropped. The lights across Wilshire glared extra bright.

"Where'd you meet Pat?"

"She was sitting on your front porch. I came over to do just that thing. We acknowledged the pathos of it, and introduced ourselves."

I rolled my eyes. "She saw you in Hot Tin Roof. You recognized her. Bobby keeps her updated. I've got no secrets left. Half the world knows my shit."

Lois lit a cigarette. "We're going to Mass and brunch tomorrow."

I mock-groaned and nuzzled her. We laced hands and sideswiped a low star. I saw a Twist Party Stakeout script on a lounge chair. Lois annotated it. She marked up most of the pages.

"Sid Leffler. Have you met him?"

"Two days ago. He's desperate and ingratiating, and not quite as smart as he thinks. He invited me to Palisades High to catch his 'Officer Sid' show. Do you want to go?"

I said, "Yes."

"He told me he knows you."

I smiled. "Talk to your source, or read today's Mirror. It'll put you current on Sid Leffler and me."

Lois said, "I met Pat, and it embarrasses you. It shouldn't, though—given that we're both married, and you're not."

Call sheets were stacked by the scripts. I picked one up. Lois said, "We're shooting on Soundstage Six at Fox, and then we're moving to a house in the Palisades. Maury wants to shoot the party scenes there."

I scanned the sheet. It listed twelve “party dancers.” Party Dancer #4: Georgia Lowell Farr.

41

(LOS ANGELES, 10:00 P.M., SUNDAY, 9/2/62)

The wife-swap party. It's on as of NOW.

We're swappers and worse tonight. We're the new depraved. We're sickniks up for cheap enchantment. We're the fuzz. We're party crashers out to quash the party.

West Hollywood. Havenhurst, south of Sunset. A big Spanish courtyard complex. The party's across the forecourt. 216's a boss duplex. We're up in 423. It was empty and offered up for lease. It's ours for tonight. Bill Parker pulled strings.

There's ten of us. We came to infiltrate, peep, and scrounge leads.

That's Babs Payton and me. Plus Harry Crowder and "wife" Lila Leeds. We're kicked back in 423 and gassing on the wide forecourt view. Phil Irwin's shooting infrared film. He's zeroed in on the 216 doorway. He's notching zoom-lens shots. Daryl Gates has binoculars fixed on the door. He's jotting descriptions of the guests.

Four men worked the outside slot. That's Nat Denkins, Red Stromwall, Eddie Benson, and Max Herman. They're scrawling plate numbers and Minox-snapping the arrivals. It's one big effort geared toward one goal. ID Fox-allied libertines and fast-buck entrepreneurs.

ID them/brace them/squeeze them dry. Monroe/the kidnap job/the Beverly Hills 459's. The Sex Creep and all interconnected linkage.

Lila and Babs smoked and sipped flask juice. They wore their carhop outfits, sans skates. They're Stanislavski-ites. They're proletarian. It's their fashion statement. They're playing themselves. They're ex–film notables reduced to schlepping burgers and malts. Harry and I radiate Fuzz. That's okay. I'm here in my Shit Magnet guise.

I was nerve-knocked. Bill Parker and Pete Pitchess had their monthly lunch today. Daryl Gates slipped a contact mike under their table at Mike Lyman's. I played the tape. Pitchess passed Parker some film that SHIT shot. I'd seen it before.

It's early May, this year. There's a big Muslim protest, outside the PAB. Select officers overreact.

Parker passed Pitchess three thou. Parker popped the question:

“Why would a SHIT supervisor quick-transfer to the West Hollywood squad just in time to crack the Perloff kidnap job, then immediately transfer back, leaving a major felony case untended and unresolved?”

Pitchess said, “I don’t know and I don’t care. The job’s dirty, we both know it, and I don’t want to see Freddy O. and the Hats get nailed for sinking that guy—despite Miller Leavy’s hard-on to slam them. Motel Mike Bayless is a law unto himself, and I figured he transferred to West Hollywood because he had a girlfriend stashed nearby.”

Spot-on, Pete. The girlfriend’s Gwen Perloff. Motel Mike bossed the kidnap job. That’s evident now.

Gates walked up. “You, Harry, and the wives should head out. The Chief wants you to know that you may hit a certain wrinkle, and if you do, he trusts your ability to extemporize.”

I winked. Gates winked back. I grabbed Babs. Harry grabbed Lila. They wore carhop pedal pushers and tight white tops. Plus Naziesque peaked hats with the Stan’s Drive-In logo. It’s trendsetting couture, all the way.

We split 423 and elevatored down. We linked arms four across and strolled toward 216. The front door spilled light. A big guy worked a reservation log and collected money. We beelined on over. I dropped our pseudonyms: Freitag and Crawford, plus two. He scanned his list and went Yup. I passed him four C-notes. He ogled Lila and Babs. He said, “Those outfits really work. Call me weird, but I’ve always dug carhops more than stews.”

It roused some yuks. The girls curtsied. Samba sounds drifted over. Cool school. Music to perv by. We drifted inside and drifted apart.

Your wife or mine? If you don’t swing, don’t ring.

I circulated. I orbed the living room. It was furnished on the come. Cheap butcher-block furniture. Beanbag chairs from the Akron. Hi-fi hookups, upstairs and down. They played synchronous and discordant. Stan Getz and Astrud Gilberto. Gerry Mulligan’s low sax. Music to subsume talk and promote fuckee-suckee.

Cigarette smoke. A wet bar. Two Filipino barmen. A late ’30s/early ’40s crowd. They were half-assed good-looking. They were trim. No porkers allowed!!! Here’s the demographic. I’m in with moderate-affluent squares. Film-biz folk. Executives and overpaid blue-collar. There’s no shitkickers/no white trash/no Valley-tract types.

I made people I'd seen on the Fox lot. I saw two Foxites make me. I saw a switch-hitter cat who packed the pork to Roddy McDowall. And —I saw her.

Gwen Perloff. Alone. Out on a railed-in terrace. Wearing her glasses. Smoking a cigarette. Quaffing a martini. Wearing that black dress Phil Irwin saw her buy.

I walked straight toward her. She turned and saw me. Her heels put her up at my height. She wore no makeup. She eschewed all affect. Her hands were as big as mine and her eyes just as dark brown. She was pale. Her dark brown hair veered to black. Her shag haircut worked. Her random gray streaks worked best.

I felt unprepared and underdressed. I resisted an impulse to crowd her. She spoke first.

"Let's skip the introductions. I know who you are, you know who I am. I know about the raid at Bev's, and I figured you'd show up here. You've been staking out my place, our eyes met once, it wasn't remotely romantic. You tossed a man off a cliff last month, and don't think I'm not grateful. Does that cover the amenities?"

Icebreaker. Go in innocuous. See if she laughs.

"I saw Spawn of the A-Bomb, back in '56. I've enjoyed your work ever since."

She doused the cigarette in her martini. She tossed the glass out in some shrubs.

"You saw Spawn of the A-Bomb at the Wiltern. You were casing me."

She stood very still. I stood very still. We sustained skirmish-line distance. My legs trembled. I flinched first.

"I heard your voice on a wiretap call, a few months ago. You were impersonating a cater waitress named Eleanora. You called Peter Lawford and pumped him for information on a cater waiter named Rick Dawes. You said he might be a fruit hustler or a pad burglar. Marilyn Monroe knew Rick Dawes. I've got his name on a paper scrap, in her handwriting. I pushed a kidnap suspect named Richie Danforth off a cliff the night Marilyn died, and his face matched a BHPD mug shot of a man named Ronnie Dewhurst."

She moved toward me. Her dress rustled. I felt her breath on my face.

"It's like that, is it?"

I said, "Yes."

She said, "I came here to circulate, and to discuss certain things with certain people. We should go somewhere and discuss certain things, and we should feign some sort of rapture as we walk out."

The Glenarms Motor Hotel. Way east in Pasadena. The doorman slipped us the key. He was impressed. We were the first swappers out the door.

We caravanned. I got there first and ran a bug sweep. The suite was pristine. The décor was low-rent medieval. Throne chairs and coats of arms nailed to the walls. I closed off the bedroom. A pay icebox served canned martinis. I popped for two. I poured them into water glasses. Gwen Perloff walked in the door.

I locked it behind her. She grabbed her drink off the TV set and resituated the chairs. She allotted five feet between us. I handed her an ashtray and kept one for myself.

She said, "What are you looking for in all of this?"

"'All Of It' is what I call all of this. It saves time. I'm looking into Marilyn Monroe's activities in the months preceding her death, your kidnap, a string of house burglaries in Beverly Hills, which may be attributed to Ronnie Dewhurst, who you may have known as Rick Dawes. There were some crazy housebreakings in Brentwood and the Palisades between late '61 and early this year. That's 'All Of It.'"

She crossed her legs. Her hemline draped decorous. She didn't vamp me. I didn't stare.

"You'll have to be more specific."

I said, "Cleopatra. Fox in the dirt. Tattle that I picked up on the same wire line I was running when I heard you impersonate 'Eleanora.' Overlapping vice scams, bond trades, and dope deals. Separate factions within a general confluence, only one of which, Foxtone Services—has been identified as of this time. You yourself have been rumored to courier bearer bonds to Mexico, presumably to trade for foreign currency to finance narcotics deals."

She sipped her drink. It was rotgut booze. She did not react.

"Bearer-bonds-for-cash trades are not strictly illegal, but narcotics deals are."

I lit a cigarette. "I think the kidnap deal derives from the general criminal atmosphere at Fox, but as something more contained, more sophisticated, more—"

The door crashed in. It flew flat off the jamb and sheared off all the hinges. It slammed to the floor. It made large noise. Eddie Chacõn ran in. Three Justice cops crowded up behind him. They body-blocked the throne chairs and knocked both of us to the floor.

They muzzled us with handkerchiefs and cuffed us behind our backs. They dragged us outside. Two Fed sleds hot-idled by the doorway. The back doors stood open. They tossed me in the lead sled. They tossed Gwen in the follow car. Code Three lights and sirens kicked on.

They dragged her. I saw blood where her legs scraped the ground.

The Feds gave good cell. Sturdy bunk. With a mattress, pillow, blanket. Entertaining wall graffiti: Chuey Bites the Big One and Mondo y Yolanda por vida. Eddie Chacõn tucked me in and winked.

I was the sole dink in the men's tank. Gwen was up on the women's tier. The bust was a ruse. The bust was a scare tactic. Bill Parker and Ratfuck Bobby dreamed it up. Eddie and the stooge Feds are hard-nosing Gwen right now.

I tried to doze. I ran brain sweeps on All Of It. I unstitched and revised my points of connection. I traveled back to Hollygrove '37 and jumped back up to now. It was all supposition and assumption. I fed Ray Pinker Sex Creep/Monroe leads. I turned the Creep/Rick Dawes/rubber-glove lead. Burglary pervaded all of it. Burglary raged definitive.

Eddie Chacõn walked up. He unlocked my door. He said, "Go home, Señor Freddy." He passed me a telefax sheet.

I read the note. Eddie ambled out. The note read "Continue to extemporize with Miss Perloff. All best, WHP."

I walked off the tier and upstairs. It was 1:00 a.m., Monday. The Fed building was dead. I traipsed office rows and the lobby. A night guard opened the door.

The night was clear. Gwen Perloff stood just outside. She was smoking a cigarette and counting low stars.

She said, "I need a drink. Take me someplace."

Kwan's Chinese Pagoda. Cops rule the roost here. I finagled us a dark back booth.

It was dark. The back booth cocooned us. We drank mai tais. Gwen futzed with her paper umbrella.

I said, "How did they play you? What did you tell them?"

"They asked questions about what you call 'All Of It.' They wanted to know who I know and did the kidnap really occur."

"What did you say?"

Gwen looked at me, through me—

"That's as specific as I'm going to get."

She bought the ruse. It might buy me time.

"Let's start over. 'Gwen, this is Freddy. Freddy, this is Gwen.' Isn't this a swell party? Do they really swap wives here? I like that samba music. Would you like to dance?"

Gwen deadpanned it. "They cut me loose, but they'll come around again. I know why they're buzzing me. I know they're buzzing you on the kidnap deal and what you and the Hats did to Richie Danforth, but I need to know how far you're in on the rest of it."

I said, "I was working a bug-and-tap job on your old Hollygrove chum, Marilyn. That was from April up to her death. I heard things, and I put things together. She had a coin stash, for making pay-phone calls. You've got one in your car. You've got a thing going with Motel Mike Bayless. On a good day, I can tell up from down. To quote you, 'That's as specific as I'm going to get.' "

Gwen stood up. She said, "I'm sure we'll speak again," and walked out.

(LOS ANGELES, 3:10 P.M., MONDAY, 9/3/62)

Here's Pat. We're at my place. We're under the sheets. It's crowded down there. I've got visitors.

Lois rags Pat. She's married, and she doesn't really love you. Kennedys don't love, they use and collect. Gwen Perloff's present but mute. She'll play it just as close the next time we meet.

Pat said, "You're about ten thousand miles away, and you have been since I walked in the door. You saw Lois Saturday night, so I'll allow for a little distraction, but this is just too much."

I stage-yawned. It always ticked Pat off.

"Tell me about Mass and brunch. You and Lois, I still can't believe it."

Pat kicked the sheets off and stretched. I kissed her underarms and made her laugh.

"We went to Saint Michael's, in Santa Monica. We talked more than we prayed, because that's the kind of girls we are. We drank brunch more than we ate it, and we talked about you at some length. No, we failed to come to any conclusions."

I lit a cigarette. "I never know what you're thinking, and what conclusions you've come to. I know that Bobby will drop the hammer, sooner or later. 'Pat, don't you think this has gone far enough?' "

The AC spiked and frostbit the room. Pat ducked back under the sheets.

"I started keeping a journal, right after I met you. It was V-J Day, plus one. Our night together was my impetus, and I wrote down everything that I saw, did, and thought, up until February 19, 1951. It's a read, and you certainly spiced it up, at least for a little while."

I said, "Will you let me read it?"

Pat said, "Maybe."

Her tone bugged me. Ditto the context. We were kids then. I have duties now.

"Bobby's here in L.A. a lot. He's spending more time with me than I warrant, given that he's got Eddie Chacõn to take care of the help."

Pat bristled. "I know most of it, or all of it, so I could see why the attorney general and the president would want to keep track of your progress."

I poked her. "When Bobby's not telling me what to do, or holding subpoenas over my head, he's being too nice to me, like he's patting my head because I'm running through my hoops like a good dog."

Pat poked me back. "For a man who levied extortion against the future president of the United States in 1955, you're not doing so badly in 1962."

I laughed. The poke hurt. She was right. Fuck the Kennedys sideways.

"Go home. It's coming up on rush hour. Tell me you love me, whether you mean it or not, and get back to your brood."

Pat sat up. The sheet slid off her breasts.

"Shit, I just recalled something you should know. I…um…eavesdropped on Bobby calling Eddie Chacõn. They discussed something about 'unloading' bearer bonds, and from the way they talked, I could tell it had something to do with what you're working on."

I shrugged. "It sounds logical. Bearer bonds are all over this deal."

Pat hugged a pillow. "Here's what I just recalled. Peter's always ogling a group of stewardesses who play volleyball on Saturday mornings, two doors up the beach. There's always some stews in uniform, watching them play. Last week, I saw him key on a big blond girl in a Mexicali uniform. He gave her a wad of cash, and she handed him a flat manila envelope. I asked him what it was. He said 'Bearer bonds. They're the new coming thing.' "

Mexicali stew. Big blond. Ingrid Irmgard. She had that tattoo—El Manny and crossed boxing gloves. Mexico, bond schemes, dope. José Bolaños. Edna Medina cites Marilyn's smuggle-in-disguise rant. The Foxtone card in Marilyn's basement. The Bev's raid. "Your wife or mine?" "Investment opportunities."

43

(LOS ANGELES, 11:10 A.M., TUESDAY, 9/4/62)

The Hats snoozed in my cubicle. They deserved a nap. They got paper-blitzed last night. Check my desk, the shelves, the floor. A paper tidal wave just hit.

DMV kickbacks/Teletypes/R&I green sheets. NCIC kickbacks on the dinks from the Bev's Switchboard raid. Paper on the plate checks at the wife-swap bash.

The Hats wore sleep masks. They were flopped-over pages from today's Mirror-News. Morty B. delivered Part 2. Horror headlines popped out:

"Sex Creep in Savage Second Assault!!!" "Sexy Divorcée Monroe Look-alike!!!" "Sex Creep Desecrates Home and Marks Triumph in Animalistic Ritual!!!"

The Mirror-News constrained Morty. He couldn't write jizz, spurt, semen, jack off, squirt. He went with "globulous evidence of his lust." Sid Leffler and J. T. Meadows got big attaboys. They were the original IO's. I told Morty to ballyhoo them. We might need them for clue-clown work.

I was agitated. Albie Aadland's lawyer rebuffed Miller Leavy's interview request. Dorothy Denton Lowell rebuffed Miller's request to interview Lowell. Her kiss-off note temporized: "Maybe, when the fall semester is in full swing, and Lowell's studies have improved."

Agitation/frustration. I terminated Phil's stakeout on Gwen Perloff. She'll contact me before too long. I know that. She'll want to carve an exit deal. She'll want prosecution waivers and money. My grand-jury strategy would cover all that.

I had breakfast with Daryl Gates. He and Eddie Chacõn grilled Gwen at the Fed building. Daryl ran it down.

Gwen held in strong. I know nothing about the kidnap. I was kidnapped. Yes, I knew Marilyn at Hollygrove. Yes, I knew Paul Mitchell Grenier. No, I haven't seen him in a dog's age. Money scams, emanating at Fox? I don't know what you're talking about.

Daryl ran down the ruse. The ruse threatened Gwen Perloff and implied that we know All Of It. It suggested the wide parameters of the All Of It. It stressed their interconnectedness and political import. It implied our lack of concrete proof and a dearth of leads on the Fox folk involved. Gwen heard them out. She flinched once. Eddie mentioned my work on the Jimmy Hoffa op. Gwen flashed an aha! look. She just figured out why a Fed and a city cop braced her. It pertained to the Hoffa/Bobby K. mishigas. It was a very well-known feud.

I watched the Hats sleep. I oozed agitation/frustration. I had to find Paul Mitchell Grenier and beat the truth out of him. Agitation/frustration. I wanted to nail the Sex Creep and jack him up on Pentothal. Perverts always motormouth under dope and duress.

Daryl Gates walked up. I pointed to the Hats and went ssshhh. We walked back into the squadroom. All the Intel cops were reading Morty's latest. Most of them yukked outright.

Gates handed me a sealed envelope. It was marked "General R. F. Kennedy." It felt like six or seven pages.

"The Chief wrote it. It's an extended précis on the Sex Creep investigation, and a detailed report on our efforts to get at the truth of Miss Monroe's death. The Chief goes on to laud your grand-jury strategy, and does a lawyer-to-lawyer bit on its efficacy. The Chief closes with an entreaty. He asks General Kennedy not to seek indictments on you and your men for the Hoffa op, and he asks him to yank Miller Leavy off of you and the Hats. He makes the point that indictments in those matters would taint our grand jury's findings, and he's right. The General is out at the Lawford house. The Chief wants you to hand-deliver the note to him and watch him read it."

William Henry Parker III. Accept no substitutes.

I cut north on PCH. I heard chopper thump off to my left, on the beach side. Sunbathers and lolling surfers pointed up, up, up. Two choppers hovered into view. They hovered low. I saw the U.S. presidential seal. Jack returns to Jack's Shack. His arrival's raising a stir.

People ran down the beach. They chased the choppers. They waved and squealed. Two women doffed their bikini tops and flashed their goods. The choppers pulled ahead and out of view. I heard "We love Jack and Jackie" chants. The volume grew and feathered out.

Three black sedans zipped by me. They were Secret Service, for sure. They cleaved toward the land side of PCH. I saw a ’61 Impala, parked bluffside up ahead. The sedans surrounded it. Agents jumped out and plopped warning cones all around the sled.

Heavy traffic nudged me rightward. The Secret Service cars blew out, northbound. There was no way to cut into the traffic flow. I braked and pulled up behind the Impala.

Eddie Chacõn stepped out. He motioned me over. I squeezed out my passenger door and walked up. Eddie held his door open. I slid into the front seat.

Jack Kennedy said, “Freddy, you cocksucker.”

He wore khakis and a polo shirt, beat-up deck shoes and shades. He lit a cigar and blew smoke in my face.

I said, “Hey, Jack. What’s shaking, baby?”

He said, “So much for decorum. You extorted me, you camel fucker. I should nuke Beirut just to put you in your place. You’re lucky my brother has work for you—because, believe me, it could have gone the other way.”

I lit a cigarette. Jack smiled. His tantrums ran in six-second spurts. I passed him the manila envelope.

“It’s an update on the work we’ve been doing. It’s from Bill Parker to the General.”

Jack hocked and spit out the window. He was too thin, he looked frail, he ran six feet and 145, tops.

“I’ve got a date. Peter set it up. You’ve seen her on TV. She’s been on Perry Mason and Naked City. Eddie suggested the car switch. He’ll take this lemon, and we’ll go somewhere in her car.”

I said, “I wish you luck.”

Jack said, “I don’t need luck. I don’t need more power and more women. I need to get to a safe place where the world can’t crawl up my ass.”

Amen, brother.

Jack blew smoke rings. “I like this guy, the Sex Creep. He reminds me of Eddie Chacõn. Bobby’s drawn to psychopaths. It explains his fondness for you and Eddie. Maybe Bobby will put the Creep through law school and get him a Justice appointment.”

I laughed. Jack was spritzing now. Book him at the Losers—he’ll draw big.

“I like the kidnap girl, Gwen what’s-her-name. I saw a horror picture she was in, back while I was a senator. I asked Harry Cohn to set me up with her. Harry said, ‘I heard she’s trouble with a capital T.”

A woman walked toward the car. Jack was right: I'd seen her. Two agents escorted her. They hugged the bluffside and made straight for the prez.

Jack said, "Mayor Yorty told me a good one. 'A lion is fucking a zebra. The zebra looks over his shoulder and says, Oh, shit, baby—I see my husband! Quick, pretend that you're killing me!' "

44

(LOS ANGELES, 9/5–9/8/62)

I got five minutes with the Kahuna. Big fucking deal. Ratfuck Bobby read Bill Parker's note. Big fucking deal. He said, "Keep up the good work on all fronts." He said, "Yes, Freddy's grand-jury play still looks good." He said, "No—I'm still considering the possibility of prosecuting Freddy and his thugs."

Ratfuck cited my evidential paucity. The wife-swap party was an evidential bust. The paper chase turned up jackshit. Zero per the plate checks. Zero per the green sheets. Zero suspicious phone calls. Zero per employment checks. Nobody worked at Fox. Fox-allied swappers and pervs stayed away. I knew why. My Foxtone-cards-under-the-windshield fuckup warned them off.

The Hats worked the Sex Creep file. They've finished their restructure. Morty Bendish is three divorcées into his Sex Creep sextravaganza. He lays on pulsing prose, scare tactics, pop-off-the-page paranoia. He utilizes numerous euphemisms for semen. He hammers the divorcées' "resemblance" to Marilyn Monroe. I edit Morty. I tell him what to write. Grind the suspense, Morty. It's nothing but a dry hump until the Creep snuffs Marilyn.

The Mirror ran slam-bam photo spreads. Dumped furniture. Slashed heirlooms. Medicine-chest debris. Red devils and yellow jackets dumped on bathroom floors. I edited the pieces, I read through the pieces, I thought through them as I read. I told Morty to crank the divorcée angle. Divorcées connoted desperate sex and ennui. They were nymphos. They lived in upscale nympho nooks. Marilyn lived in a nympho nook. I thought through the nympho-divorcée bit. I conceded hyperbole. I pondered common denominators. Did the women know one another? How did the Sex Creep get hip to those specific women?

The Mirror reported a 16% circulation spurt. The Sex Creep show was hot ink. Creep calls swamped the West L.A. station switchboard. Westside stiffs were outraged and scared. They demanded enhanced police protection. Nat Denkins flogs the Sex Creep on his nightly radio show. Creep-O-Mania scorches L.A. TV/radio ham George Putnam stokes the fear. "Inexorably, the Sex Creep's creepiness moves us ever closer to Marilyn Monroe."

No shit, Sherlock.

The Sex Creep investigation proceeds. It's the pulse of the Monroe/kidnap/BHPD burglary jobs. I work All Of It. It's tail work and brainwork. I search for Paul Mitchell Grenier. He's a night bird. That entails night work. I brainwork in my cubicle. I put in eight-hour days there. I stare at my bulletin boards and file sheets and think. I stare at file photos and think. I plumb theoretical lines, case flank to case flank. I repeatedly reread the BHPD file. I've memorized the Dewhurst/Dawes/Danforth notes slipped inside. BHPD staked out Caviar Catering. They ran R&I checks on dicey young men and women employed there. Ronnie Dewhurst came up clean. Some cop snapped mug shots, regardless.

"Sink him, Freddy." The long drop and big smash. Ronnie Dewhurst as Richie Danforth.

BHPD's burglary string. Five jobs, altogether. Two sets of rubber-glove prints at all locations. One large-finger man, one small-finger man. Near-identical glove seams on prints at the Sex Creep and BHPD jobs.

They're perfect eyeball matches. They're not quite courtroom-valid. Defense lawyers could twist the matches twelve different ways. So what? This job's not going to court.

Link the throughlines. Link the case flanks.

Take the Sex Creep jobs. The spotlight's on glove prints and jizz stains. We know his blood type. He's a type AB-negative secretor. Harry Crowder stiffed a call to the state Adult Authority. He's scrounging data on paroled 459 men, going back five years. Ditto data on freaks with masturbation MO's. Max and I are going over every FI card for the full Creepoid time frame. We'll pounce from there. We'll stretch all late-night prowlers/loiterers/nocturnal riffraff who vibe wrong. We'll read through the PD's apprehended burglar file and see who vibes wrong. We'll recanvass the six Creep locations, with this in mind:

Is the Creep a local Palisades or Brentwood guy? Does he live within his target area and covet women he sees routinely? Is he Palisades/Brentwood affluent? Does he have access to house-deed records/estate-probate records/divorce records? Has he dream-cultivated a sisterhood of solitary women who drive him ever closer to a Creepoid consummation with Marilyn Monroe?

All Of It. All case flanks lead back to Marilyn Monroe.

I had Lowell Farr's Monroe portrait matted and framed. It now hangs on my north cubicle wall. Lowell portrays her pal Marilyn as pure disorder and disjuncture. Marilyn's eyes are her own eyes. They look back at Marilyn and judge her insane. The painting reflects the perv art of Weimar Berlin and Monroe's penchant for urban-grotesque photography. Lowell's perceptive. She sees through Monroe now. I peeped her as she slapped paint on Monroe's living room wall. That portrait was the run-up to this portrait. This portrait drove me back to the Sex Creep's six divorcées.

I'd already peeped divorcées 1, 2, and 3. I swung by the homes of 4, 5, and 6 on full-dark summer nights. The Creep's moving east. He's into Brentwood now. He's planned hot dates with Arden Jane Brownleigh/Lorraine (NMI) Smith/Dorothy Dilys Trent. He's escalating. He broke a glass-enclosed photograph of Brownleigh and her ex-husband. He stuck pins in their faces. He left Lorraine Smith a note: "You're like Cape Canaveral. You're my launching pad to greater things." He left Dorothy Trent a morgue photo of Carole Landis.

I extrapolated. It was 3/12/62. Monroe had just moved into Fifth Helena. Trent was a morgue-photo dry run for Monroe.

I observed Brownleigh, Smith, and Trent. Brownleigh cultivated the vapid Monroe look. Smith and Trent did not. I caught all three women at home alone. They evinced loneliness and agitation. They smoked and drank to excess. They tried to watch TV and read racy books. They tossed the books and flipped from baseball games to sitcoms. The Leffler-Meadows paperwork did not reveal interconnected relationships among the six women. How did the Creep key in on these six women? They were film-star surrogates in his mind. Landis and Monroe bookended his madness. The divorcées were avatars of prosaic sexuality and dashed wedlock. They were more than random and less than essential to him. Their divorcée status struck a chord in him. He saw them and gassed on them. He peeped them over time and developed a lust jones. He didn't ponder the chord they struck. Landis and Monroe were movie stars. They struck everybody. They were safer. The Sex Creep did not know why he did the crazy shit that he did. The divorcées took him deeper. He did not acknowledge this.

I stare at my bulletin boards. I stare at Lowell's portrait of Marilyn. I think. I think about women. The divorcées. Lowell, Pat, and Lois. Gwen Perloff, most of all.

She hasn't contacted me. I want her to read me wrong and sense that I'm all about the money. I want her to tour-guide me through Fox in duress and tell me how All Of It coheres.

I need to interview José Bolaños. He's holed up in Mexico. It might be impossible for now. I need to interview Lowell Farr. I've got a strong hunch here. Where are Marilyn Monroe's stash of everyday letters/love letters/fan letters/further communiqués from the Creep? She didn't bank-vault them. They weren't in her basement. Her lawyer had no idea. They weren't listed in the Coroner's Office inventory of her house. I think she gave them to Lowell Farr.

I need to reinterview Ingrid Irmgard. She lied to me. She sold Peter Lawford bearer bonds. Her boyfriend Juan Manuel Salas has a burglary sheet. He got popped in '54. He was at Chino concurrent with Paul Mitchell Grenier. He had a dumped 459 beef in '57. His PO thinks he's clean. He's an ace TV repairman these days.

I need to reinterview Natasha Lytess. I need to reinterview Del Kinney, Roddy McDowall, and Timmy Berlin. I need to hit them with this:

Tell me what I need to do to find Paul Mitchell Grenier. I want to put the screws to this psycho sack of shit. I want him to set some things straight.

Nat Denkins and Phil Irwin leapfrog-tail Deedee Grenier. She goes to Rancho Park Golf Course, Jeanne Carmen's pill parties, and Linda's Little Log Cabin. She avoids Norm's Nest. She steers clear of Paul Mitchell.

I've haunted the Klondike, the Falcon's Lair, the Jaguar, the Tradesman. Nobody's seen Paul Mitchell. So, I think. So, I read. My new favorite author? It's Paul de River.

I've read The Sexual Criminal eight times. The Doc inspired Monroe's final idiot immersion. I know he's giving a talk at the Wilshire Ebell, three days hence. I'll be there. I'll salt the audience with my boys and bring an Intel camera crew. We'll induce fear and consternation. We'll get the old quack all shook up.

Sid Leffler studied under de River. He's written true-detective rag pieces. He notched walk-through tape recordings at the six divorcée sites. He described the physical details and laid down verbose critiques of the Sex Creep's motivations. Leffler's florid prose style mimes de River's. Leffler: probable de River obsessive. Monroe: certain de River obsessive.

I run out of brain steam around 3:00 a.m. I brain-screen women's faces then. Lois, Pat, Gwen. I imprint details until their features merge and my mind goes blank.

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 P.M., SATURDAY, 9/8/62)

The summer postlude. It's jungle hot in L.A. It's "Saturnalia Saturday" at the Tradesman. That means half-price drinks and much whoop-de-do. The boys screen toga flicks on a wall-pinned bedsheet. Raucous laughs and wolf whistles ensue.

The boys know me now. I'm the chump detective. I dispense ten-spots and pursue Paul Mitchell Grenier. They hate Paul Mitchell. He defames the rough-trade imprimatur. They sniff ten-spots and swarm me at the door.

I dispensed twenties tonight. The boys oohed and aahed. One guy said, "He might be making a movie."

I said, "Where? What studio? What kind of movie?"

One guy said, "Paul Mitchell's got his own studio, but I don't know where it is. He's a live-on-the-fly, catch-as-catch-can sort of guy. And if I know Paul Mitchell, he's making dirty movies there."

They fed me fourth-hand lowdown. I've heard it all before. I split the Tradesman and drove west. I craved Brentwood and the Palisades. It was sea breeze–adjacent. It was the home of dishy divorcées and sex creeps on the hunt.

I'm a sex creep. I peep windows for profit and kicks. I booked west. The temperature dropped. I went by Fifth Helena and the Lytess house. The Monroe place was dark. The Lytess place threw light. Natasha's old Ford clogged up the driveway.

I cut loose for the Palisades. I looped quiet residential streets north and south of Sunset. The Sex Creep prowled here. He knew this turf. He 459'd the Palisades first. He worked up to Brentwood. Monroe was his denouement. The Palisades cradled him. He knew it. He coveted women here. He worked up to 459 PC with malicious intent. It all started right here.

I cruised random streets. I looked for that moderne house. Monroe sketched it in June '48. I cut over to Capri Drive. I cruised the house Carole Landis died in. She died in July '48. It was a big château/ranch job. Landis married a rich man. Hubby #4 owned the spread outright now.

Carole Landis, divorcée. Marilyn Monroe, divorcée. A distant kid marriage. That makes one. Plus Joe DiMaggio and Arthur Miller. That makes three.

Westside L.A. The recurrent number 48. That brain chant drove me batshit. I split east and found a phone booth on Bundy.

A directory dangled on a chain. I looked up Del Kinney. He lived at 1081 South Orlando. That's right off Olympic. I looked up Timmy Berlin. He lived on Charleville in Beverly Hills.

Kinney nudged me more. He was a brooder and a bachelor. He was career L.A. fuzz. He knew everybody. He did favors. He met Gwen Perloff in 1937. That's twenty-five years back.

The address was a peach stucco duplex. Kinney had the low floor. I rang the bell. It was 10:14 Saturday night.

Kinney opened up. He wore faded Sheriff's khakis with the emblems excised. His big cop hands dangled. He'd had a few. I smelled it.

He said, "It's Lieutenant Otash. It's late, and he's got questions. You'll note I didn't besmirch your rank or your expedient appointment."

He said it friendly and gestured me in. The front room was done up with nature prints and movie-set chairs. He pointed to one. I sat down and grabbed an ottoman. Kinney walked to a sideboard and fixed two highballs. I reached for mine. He plopped down facing me. He pulled up his own footrest.

He knew the drill. It's a drop-in chat/interrogation. It veers both ways.

I said, "Bill Parker called me this afternoon. He told me to lay off the Fox lot. That stunt I pulled with the Foxtone cards backfired."

Kinney cracked his knuckles. "By all means, stay off the lot. I know full well that there are cabals perpetrating outrageous schemes in the hopes they can circumvent the Cleopatra disaster, but under no circumstances will I divulge names or details."

I sipped my drink. It was very old/very strong bourbon.

"You should waltz, and resettle somewhere. You've got service pensions up the wazoo, and I'm sure you've got savings."

Kinney sipped sour mash. "I've been offered a very nice job. Could you see me as the sheriff of Monroe County, Wisconsin?"

I said, "Take it. Get out of here. Start over someplace clean."

"Do you think Gwen Perloff could adjust to the move and be happy as a sheriff's wife?"

It sandbagged me. "It's like that, huh?"

"On my end, it is."

I lit a cigarette. "I can't advise you there. She's in the shit, and under no circumstances will I divulge names and details."

Kinney lit a cigarette. "I'll have to accept that, then. I know you're dying to discuss Gwen, so let's get to it."

I said, "I keep thinking of Hollygrove, back when you first knew her. She met Marilyn Monroe and Paul Mitchell Grenier there, around the time her little sister disappeared."

Kinney shut his eyes. I orbed the room. I saw a framed religious print. Prayer hands and "Lord, Thou seest me."

"Well, Marilyn's and Gwen's lives kept crisscrossing. They met at the Grove—and, okay, Grenier was there with them. Then Gwen went back to foster care, and on to Le Conte Junior High and Hollywood High. Marilyn went to live with some nutty relatives, then went on to schools in Westwood and the Valley."

I coughed. I counted to ten. Kinney was a don't-tread-on-me type. He kept his eyes shut. I was half there.

"Nothing you tell me leaves this room, sir. I have it that Gwen and Marilyn reconnected in the late '40s, and worked as call girls together. They fell under the sway of a well-intentioned but dicey psychia—"

"Sheldon Mandel. A long-term Treasury informant, whereabouts unknown. He was a VD doctor. That was how he got next to all sorts of good-looking young women. You recall the postwar VD epidemic? Mandel talked turkey to the girls and saved them from a lot of grief, despite the obvious fact that he was a lecher at heart."

I said, "As in?"

Kinney opened his eyes. He put on wire-rimmed glasses and blinked at me.

"Doc Shelley was a scenester. The way I see it, he figured his good deeds licensed him to indulge his nasty side. He hung out at party pads, jam-session pads, fuck pads, and upscale call pads, and dispensed penicillin and prophylactic kits to the girls. He included intimate physical exams, free of charge. It gave him more time to schmooze up the girls."

I sipped bourbon. It was depth-charge stuff. It ran at least 140 proof.

"Isn't Mandel credited with inventing the so-called 'fuck deck,' and establishing it as an investment opportunity?"

Kinney sipped bourbon. His hairline popped sweat. It was depth-charge stuff. He craved that quick push out of the gate.

"I've heard the rumor, but Gwen would have told me if she and Marilyn had gone the deck route. And I'd rather move on to other topics, if you don't mind."

I said, "Mitzi Perloff. I'd like to get your overview."

Kinney cracked his thumbs. "The whole investigation and search was centered in Hollywood, up near the Immaculate Heart school and Ferndell Park, where the poor little girl liked to pick flowers. We thought of it as a body-dump case at the start. We got one eyewitness lead to the contrary, but it never played out. Mitzi was spotted on a westbound Wilshire bus on the day she disappeared. It's the bus route that commences in Hollywood, cuts south to Wilshire, then goes north through Westwood Village and out to the beach."

The westside jumps again. The westside pervades All Of It.

Kinney said, "Gwen was not quite eleven, but she walked a skirmish line through Ferndell Park, right beside my deputies. I have never seen such courage and composure. She found a little doll that Mitzi dropped or someone else threw away, and she did not falter, not for one instant."

Charleville ran one block south of Wilshire. Timmy Berlin's address put him right off Linden Drive. It was a mini-mosque triplex. Minarets and spires topped with gold-flecked paint.

Berlin had the downstairs unit. It was 11:40 p.m. His lights were on, his shades were up, his French doors were cracked wide.

I knocked twice. A peephole slid back. Somebody undid bolt locks and opened the door.

It was Timmy Berlin. He was fully dressed. Slacks, guayabera shirt, and tire-tread sandals. He held a pair of scissors. A Moviola was clamped to a lowboy table. He was cutting film.

I said, "I know it's late."

Berlin stepped back. I stepped inside. The living room was four-wall Monroe. Posters for Niagara/River of No Return/The Prince and the Showgirl/Bus Stop. Berlin looked mortified.

"I can't escape her, and I don't want to. I enjoy it more than it hurts. Freddy Otash knocks on my door at midnight, so it's got to be about Marilyn. There's coffee in the kitchen, and I was about to take a break."

I followed him back. The kitchen was space-age chromium. I squeezed into a breakfast nook and popped two Dexedrine. Berlin worked a hammered-tin contraption and cranked out two espressos.

He squeezed into the nook. “Okay, it’s about Marilyn. Big surprise. The question is, ‘Marilyn and who else?’ ”

I tossed my espresso back. Let’s level out Del Kinney’s home brew.

“Let’s start with Natasha Lytess. I’m dealing with two versions here. Miss Lytess told me she hadn’t seen Marilyn since ’56. A backup witness said an old Russian woman fixed Marilyn up with forged travel documents, just recently. The backup witness has no reason to lie, while Miss Lytess might well have.”

Berlin said, “Natasha lied. She’s got cancer, and she’s on her way out, so she’s entitled. Also, she was unrequitedly in love with Marilyn, so I give her a pass there out of sheer empathy.”

His spiel said Coax me. I tossed out some bait.

“Darryl Zanuck and Marilyn treated Miss Lytess quite shabbily. They terminated her employment and tossed her off the Fox lot. She rented a house near Marilyn. She was looking for some kind of solace during her last days.”

Berlin said, “Natasha was a clinger. Mr. Z. hates clingers, and Marilyn hated to be clinged on. Believe me, I know. But, to return to your question, she lied. I saw Marilyn and Natasha lunching at Frascati, early in April. I saw them, but I was seated behind a wall fixture, so they couldn’t see me.”

I coaxed him. “And they spoke in stage whispers, as film people tend to do?”

“Yes. Marilyn pressed Natasha for tips on being less attractive, and more anonymous in public. Natasha recommended collagen facial injections to give herself a fleshier appearance. Then they discussed forged documents. Marilyn knew that Natasha utilized forged papers to escape Germany and emigrate in ’38 or ’39. The Aadland brothers smuggled lots of Jews out of Europe then, which tips their karmic balance back to the good side, in my view. Marilyn told Natasha she needed diplomatic papers to allow her to travel, in disguise, in and out of Mexico, without being searched. Natasha said she’d call Hersh Aadland to discuss it. Frankly, I think Natasha was having her on.”

The dexies hit. I zoomed straight to snap judgments.

A “wheezy-voiced woman” called Darryl Zanuck and ratted the kidnap gig. It was Lytess. Natasha, la couturier. Monroe in disguise at civil rights rallies. The autopsy showed collagen deposits under one earlobe. Lytess again. Here’s the big snap judgment. Lytess shaped Monroe’s final immersion.

I lit a cigarette. “Paul de River. His book The Sexual Criminal. Was Marilyn a fan of de River? Was she ever headshrunk by him?”

Berlin went Oh, yes. “She was practically a de River devotee. She read all his books and monographs, and she kept telling me she wanted to hook up with him for some shrink sessions.”

Berlin was clamped tight and dish-frenzied. He was popping his rocks.

“Albie Aadland. Do you know him? If so, what can you tell me about him?”

“Albie? There’s either not much there or lots there, depending on who you talk to. He’s the much-younger, nonhoodlum brother. Everyone agrees on that. He lives alone in a big house in Cheviot Hills, and he’s got no love or sex life. That’s accepted as gospel. There’s a rumor that he dabbles in chemistry, pharmacology, and so-called radical psychology, but I don’t know how accurate it is.”

I’ll buy it. Don’t jive me on the brothers. Fuck their philanthropies. Albie Aadland shares their blood and their taint.

“You’ve got me het up on Albie, Mr. Berlin. What else can you tell me?”

Timmy Berlin screwed up his face. He’s miming deep reflection. He wants to spiel.

“Well, he was briefly in Hollygrove with Marilyn and Paul Mitchell Grenier. And I just read in Variety that Gwen Perloff was there then, as well. You know Gwen, right? Recent kidnap victim and Mr. Z.’s illicit girlfriend?”

Oh, yes. I know Gwen.

“Keep going, please. Your Hollygrove information is all new to me.”

Berlin lit a cigarette. “I’ve been around Fox since ’50, and I’ve picked up a lot of lore. Albie’s parents had died, years before. His brothers raised him and gave him gofer-type jobs. They made him a ‘test pilot’ for dope compounds cooked up by rogue chemists, back in the ’30s. The cops learned of all this, and they had Albie placed in Hollygrove. He got tight with Marilyn, Paul Mitchell Grenier, and a Mexican boy who lived in that crappy part of lower Hollywood near the Grove. The boy belonged to something called the ‘peewee corps’ of the Nite Owl gang, which was primarily a group of boys who pulled house burglaries. Paul Mitchell told me that he and Albie went out on ‘several raids’ with those boys.”

Depth-charge. The brew, the pills, the snitch spiel—

“Also, I only just learned that Gwen had been in the Grove, because

I read that piece on Hard Luck Girl. Marilyn told me that she, Albie, Paul Mitchell, and a Mexican boy who wasn't in the Grove used to climb a high tree on El Centro and watch movies being made on the RKO and Paramount lots. Marilyn said it was the beginning of a 'big actress fixation' for her and the other girl."

Kids together. Monroe. Gwen Perloff. Albie Aadland. Paul Mitchell Grenier. Who's the Mexican boy?

"You know, Freddy—when Marilyn and I escaped you and the other fools during the 'Wrong-Door Raid,' it convinced Marilyn that she could be a criminal as well as any man. That's when she told me that Paul Mitchell wanted to do a smut film about the raid, with Marilyn playing herself."

I chained cigarettes. My bloodstream swelled. I glimpsed Hollygrove and the kid clique as ALL OF IT.

"During your relationship, what did you and Marilyn do for kicks, outside the bedroom?"

Berlin crushed his cigarette. "Mostly, we read her fan mail and psychoanalyzed her fans. She said they were predictable, and that there was always a declension in fan crushes. Weird-o guys started out crushing on Carole Landis, then crushed on Jane Russell, and ended up crushing on her."

Landis preceded Monroe. She hit in the early '40s. Russell and Monroe hit roughly concurrent. Landis suicided in '48. The Sex Creep clipped letters from '40s magazines. He employed '40s bond paper. "Declension of fan crushes." The Creep deployed Landis-era props to bedevil Monroe in '62.

Berlin said, "Penny for your thoughts."

I said, "I'm having a hell of a time trying to locate Paul Mitchell. Do you have any ideas?"

"Well, there's his so-called studio. It's a little apartment on Kerwood, near Fox. Hillcrest caddies live in the building, mostly. I think Paul Mitchell sleeps there, on and off."

I stood up. Timmy Berlin went bereft. He could have snitched all night.

It was 1:12 a.m. I swung left off Olympic and slow-cruised Kerwood. It was a run-down cul-de-sac. Fox and Hillcrest CC were due south. I spotted the Belleview Apartments. It ran two floors and eight units, tops.

It was right at the hook of the cul-de-sac. Country club caddies are lowlifes. They're career boozehounds, hopheads, and track fiends. This must be the place.

I parked six dives north of the Belleview. The cul-de-sac was dark-dark and hushed. It was recessed. Two streetlights burned dim.

I got out my penlight and evidence kit. I pulled out rubber gloves. He might be there. If so, I'll roust him. He might not be there. If so, I'll forensic his crib.

I walked up and flashed the mailbox. It listed seven single men. Plus "PMG Studios, Ltd." in unit six.

I counted the units. It's probably upstairs. 1,2,3,4—down. 5,6,7,8—up. Nothing but dark windows. The Belleview's sleeping it off.

I unbuttoned my coat and freed my belt shit. I lugged my evidence kit upstairs and bit down on the penlight. I counted door plates down to six.

I knocked on the door. Little love taps. Night crawler Grenier. He receives late-night visitors. They'd knock that way.

No response. I waited a full minute and love-tapped again. No response. I got out a #3 pick and popped the door lock. I stepped inside and locked myself in.

The place reeked. I ID'd the musk. Butch male cologne and exertion. I flashed the interior. It was narrow and cramped. I laid down my kit and ran a premises check.

Movie cameras/Moviolas/boom mikes/arc lights. Four boxes stuffed with French ticklers, dildos, and S and M shit. A scuzzy mattress propped against one wall. A corkboard nailed to one wall. One piece of paper pinned to it. Note the legible hand scrawl.

"Wrong-Door Raid!!! A Paul Mitchell Grenier production for discerning and high-class adults. Starring Marilyn Monroe as Herself and Paul Mitchell Grenier as Ace Hollywood Private Eye Freddy Otash. The roles of Frank Sinatra, Joe DiMaggio, Phil Irwin, Timmy Berlin, and the Old Lady to be cast soon. Filming begins October 10, 1962. Invitation-only premiere. The same day that box office dreck Cleopatra is released."

A kitchen adjoined the north wall. I grid-flashed it—a full 360 degrees. It was grimy and double-cramped. I checked the icebox. It was stuffed with vodka short dogs and amyl-nitrite poppers. A toilet sat out in plain view. Ditto an uncurtained showerhead and a medicine chest. I popped the door and saw this:

Four shelves lined with dental prostheses. It's a sex biter's trove. Dracula-fang dentures. Three upper plates with razor-blade teeth. A plate with "PMG" embossed. Dentures with ID tags attached: "Panther," "Jaguar," "Bengal Tiger," "Jackal," "Grizzly Bear."

The Jackal teeth pinned down a paper scrap. I pulled it out and read this:

"No. Ask for more $. This is just our opening salvo. Quit thinking of it as a one-shot deal. Mar-Gwen's future depends on it."

I recognized the scrawl. Marilyn Monroe wrote the note.

My heartbeat red-lined. My tach outrevved seven thousand.

I worked my way back through the dump. I penlight-strafed it, inch by inch. I saw a copy of The Sexual Criminal, crammed behind a film-reel stack. The pages were bitten and gnawed. Prosthetic choppers mauled and thrashed the book.

Grenier pen-marked the dentures he wore: "Jaguar," "Jackal," "Bengal Tiger." He bit through pix of noted sex fiends Harvey Glatman and Stephen Nash. He slipped snapshots of the Wrong-Door Raid building between the pages and bit them with his PMG teeth.

I opened my evidence kit. I got out my hand vacuum and futzed with the brush gears. I ran the nozzle between the dumped cameras and lights and picked up rug grit. The kitchen floor was chipped linoleum. I sucked up nameless gack and floor grit. I dumped the vacuum-bag yield in a plastic bag and dropped it into my kit.

Think evidence. Think latent prints. Hit touch-and-grab surfaces. This film equipment serves your designs. It's all touch-and-grab planes.

I got out my brush and tape-transfer strips. I dusted long arc-light poles and Moviolas. I pulled up smudges/smears/partials and a left-hand latent spread. I tape-transferred the spread and taped the corners to a black cardboard sheet. Red powder, black cardboard. The contrast offset the prints. I shot two Polaroids and dropped them in my kit.

I picked through camera debris and grabbed a long tripod. It was all touch-and-grab. I dusted one leg, two legs, three. I worked close. I saw something by the top bolt housing.

Rubber-glove prints. A full right-hand set. A small-hand set. It seems familiar, it looks familiar, it might be familiar and ring all the bells.

Squint. Naked-eye it. Study loops and whorls. There's that familiar glove seam. There's the applied pressure marks.

Count comparison points. Get your valid courtroom ID.

I counted slow. I hit twenty-four. I nailed loops, whorls, and tented arches. I doubled the required number and then some.

It's a match. The set matches the small-hand sets at the Beverly Hills break-ins. The set matches the sets at the divorcée break-ins. The Sex Creep was in this room. The Sex Creep touched Grenier's film gear.

I trembled. I flushed hot and cold. I stood in the dark and gulped air. I heard a key-in-lock sound. The door swung open. I saw the Biter Beast, backlit.

I attacked him. I pulled my sap and slammed him in the head. He squealed. I kicked his legs out from under him and kicked the door shut. He hit the floor. I stepped on his neck and pinned him there.

He gulped and went mute. I hit a wall switch and lit Grenier full-on. He wore blue jeans and a jean jacket. He wore pointy-toe fruit boots. They were pop-up-switchblade boots. Don't veer too close.

I eased off his neck. He looked up at me. I kicked him into a pile of cameras and lighting stands. I pulled my piece and aimed it at him.

He rubbed his sap-gouged head. He said, "At least you spared my teeth."

I said, "Let's start with some dirty Polaroids I saw. You and Marilyn, before you put your mark on her. I'm thinking they were outtakes from a fuck deck. Tell me if they were or they weren't."

Grenier went Comme ci, comme ça. "Yes and no, daddy. For one thing, the decks were a postwar phenomenon, and Marilyn and me shot those Polaroids sometime in '59. I considered the fuck deck bit, but it was stale bread by that time. Although, I have to say, Marilyn was there at the fuck deck inception."

I said, "With Shelley Mandel?"

Grenier rubbed his neck. I bore down and left heel imprints. They trickled blood.

"Mum's the word, dad."

"The kidnap. Lay out the personnel."

"Not tonight, sahib."

I said, "The Sex Creep. You've seen the Mirror, so you know who he is. He left glove prints in this very room, and he was sending Marilyn crazy notes and pictures, right before she died."

Grenier rubbed his sap wound and licked the blood off his fingers. Grenier stroked his crotch and grew a hard-on.

"I've read the Mirror, but I don't know what you're talking about. And Marilyn is passé. My new bitch du jour is Barbara Bouchet. You know how I know that? Every time I get the urge to rape and kill an actress, she hits the big time."

I said, "Dr. Paul de River?"

Grenier said, "I'm a Buddhist-existentialist. I don't believe in doctors."

"I saw Marilyn's note. 'Just our opening salvo.' 'Quit thinking of this as a one-shot deal.' What did she mean by that? Did the note refer to a ransom demand?"

Grenier said, "Marilyn who?" Grenier pulled out an amyl-nitrite popper. He waved it and popped it and took a huge sniff.

His face went red-red. He jumped up, fast on his feet. He pulled something from his coat pocket and jammed it in his mouth. He growl-roared low in his throat.

Tiger teeth. His spare set. Big fangs and flat lowers to gnaw meat. He growl-roared and lunged at me.

I fired point-blank. I blew his mouth and his neck cords out. A severed ear flew. His tiger teeth exploded. I powder-scorched his eyes down to the sockets. Muzzle flash set his hair aflame.

HOP DREAM

(SEPTEMBER 9, 1962)

46

(LOS ANGELES, 6:40 A.M., SUNDAY, 9/9/62)

Opium.

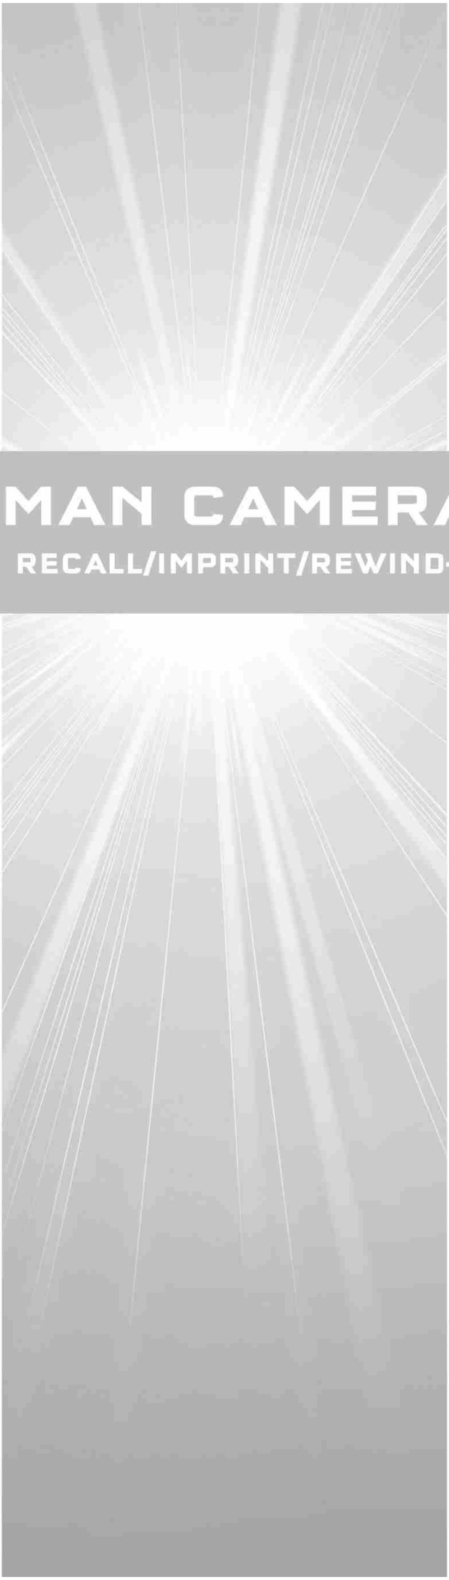
My pallet at Kwan's. The tar, the pipe, the match. I'm a Chinaman. I fell off my camel and landed in Kowloon. There's two long pallet rows. My fellow Chinamen seek enchantment. I'm here to conjure All Of It in a safe dope habitat.

Nobody heard the gunshots. Somebody heard the gunshots. I'm fucked or I'll get away clean. I picked up the ejected shells. I dropped Monroe's note in my evidence kit. I stole the gnawed-on copy of The Sexual Criminal. I stole the smut-film-announcement page pinned to the corkboard. I poured film-cleaning solvents on the rug. They ate through the bloodstains and half-dissolved the foundation boards. I excised a large carpet patch and wrapped Grenier up. I hauled him out to my car and dumped him in the trunk. Nobody saw me, the whole world knows what I did.

I hit the San Diego Freeway and the Ridge Route north. I buried Grenier in a rock pile off U.S. 99. The dump site was a half mile from the roadway. I dropped heavy rocks on Grenier. They hit loud. Bones broke audible. I turned around and drove back to L.A.

The dump job took five hours. I'm safe here now.

Maybe I'll dream.



MAN CAMERA

RECALL/IMPRINT/REWIND—

I saw faces, I saw microphones, I heard denials overlap. Smoked-up committee rooms. Ratfuck Bobby badgers Jimmy Hoffa. Gwen Perloff hucksters Jantzen swimwear. Gwen and Motel Mike exit the Tiki-Torch. There's synchronicity there.

The Sex Creep. Face unknown. He's a shape-shifter in black. He did 459's with Dewhurst/Danforth/Dawes. "Sink him, Freddy." Dear beloved Lord, I repent.

A mail truck dumped letters in my lap. I read illegible inscriptions. Monroe, Bolaños, Ingrid Irmgard. Dope couriers. Natasha Lytess, forged docs conduit.

An envelope fell in my lap. A flashbulb blip lit me. Lowell has Marilyn's fan letters. Imagery equals fact.

I saw Hollygrove. I framed establishing shots of El Centro and Vine. I added '30s cars and period extras. I regressed the key players and saw them as children. Marilyn, Gwen, Albie Aadland. Paul Mitchell Grenier, reborn. Who's the Mexican kid? He's a Nite Owl peewee—

Jump cut. I'm out of my trance. Fucking burglary pervades this whole thing.

I smoked opium. I saw Lois and Pat naked. I saw them at Mass. They prayed for me and lit altar candles. Dear Lord, I repent.

Jump cut. Postwar L.A. street scenes. Hollywood Boulevard by night. I worked the Santa Claus Lane parade. Carole Landis was slated for grand marshal. The parade was in November. She died in July.

C words bombarded me. Conjecture/confluence/coincidence/convergence/conspiracy.

I saw exemplar fuck decks. Merry Christmas. Shelley Mandel's got script-pad stocking stuffers for YOU!!! Marilyn and Gwen work the call-girl circuit. Marilyn sketches a house. Marilyn's got dirt on future Prez Jack. Postwar L.A. runs libertine. VD, be-bop, fuck decks, fuck pads, boomtime, boomtown, something happened right before Carole Landis popped those—

A typewriter fell in my lap. A blank sheet of paper was rolled in. I heard four key taps. I saw 1,9,4,8.

PART 8
RED LENS

(SEPTEMBER 10–16, 1962)

47

(LOS ANGELES, 10:15 A.M., MONDAY, 9/10/62)

It was a good dream. The dream sent me to ’48 and told me Look Here. It was a good snooze. I felt revitalized. It was a good purge. I killed Paul Mitchell Grenier and escaped his horror hutch. Grenier was Satan Incarnate. He just had to go.

I knew I’d waltz on it. I went by West L.A. station and checked occurrence sheets for Saturday-night-into-Sunday-morning rumbles. There were no shots-fired or unknown-trouble squeals for that patrol sector. It felt like a skate, all the way.

I brainworked in my cubicle. I orbed Lowell Farr’s painting every half second. Red Stromwall was right. The Landis file had been raided. I found a folder in the “Suicides/1948” drawer at Homicide. The bio sheet ran threadbare. I knew most of it going in.

Her feature debut: I Wake Up Screaming, 1941. It was cranked out at Fox. Moon Over Miami, ’41 and Fox again. Produced by old man Zanuck. Fox, resurgent. Fox, ubiquitous. She’s in and out of Fox through the war years. She slips to postwar B roles. She wrote a memoir, Four Jills and a Jeep. It rehashed her USO-girl stint. It was serialized in The Saturday Evening Post. Fox filmed it in ’44. It made money. She married four times. The last guy had gelt. He bought that big crib on Capri Drive.

I put the bio sheet down. It was stale news. I sipped coffee and scrawled notes.

Who’s the Mexican kid? He lived near Hollygrove—’36–’37.

Shelley Mandel. Have Bill Parker hard-brace BNDD. Where is this hump?

Brace Albie Aadland. Re-brace Ingrid Irmgard. Devise a strategy. Gain access to Hollygrove today.

Interview Jane Russell. Quiz her on crazy fans, circa ’50.

I segued back to Landis. The bio sheet droned on. It’s 7/5/48. The maid arrives. Hubby’s off on business. “Sexy Rexy” Harrison arrives. He lets himself in and finds the body. Landis left a note. Suicide Attempt #4 succeeds. Rexy's top-lining Cleopatra, right now.

Fox, ever-present. Fox, prosaically repetitive. Fox, under my itchy skin.

I was antsy. Paul Mitchell Grenier intruded. I smelled cleaning solvents and his brain residue. The Hats would say Where Were You? I had to concoct a good lie. Gwen Perloff intruded. I've called her service four times today. I called Nat and told him to double his efforts on the find-Grenier front. It was pure subterfuge.

I called Miller Leavy. He told me Albie Aadland hired Grant Cooper to rep him. Cooper was the best in the biz. There's a meeting tomorrow. 11:00 a.m. at Miller's office.

I sipped coffee and segued back to Landis. I hit a one-page "Known Associates" list.

Names, occupations, and relationships to Landis. There were seventeen names. Most were male. There were "actors," "friends," "ex-husbands." I skimmed down the page. I recognized no names. I hit Name #14. It screeched at me.

Marcia Maria Davenport/WFA/6/12/19. Twice divorced, lives alone. She was Carole Landis's "personal assistant," '47–'48. She's Divorcée Victim #1, 11/18/61. The Sex Creep kicked his string off with her.

I booked out to West L.A. station. The squadroom hummed. The day-watch guys knew me now. I got stray looks and no more. The Hats plus J. T. Meadows worked at partner desks. They shot me Where Were You? looks. I pulled a chair up.

They studied FI cards. J.T. passed me a stack. I went through them. They ran typical. Lone men on foot. Street stop-and-frisks. 10:00 p.m. to 3:00 a.m. Palisades Village to Brentwood Village. Hinky-type men. Loiterers. The unkempt. Guys with downscale westside addresses. Guys with bench warrants out. All jive offenses. Child-support delinquencies, drunk driving, D and D.

They "just felt like a walk." That's the standard peep-and-prowl rationale. They were riffraff. They stood out in the Palisades and Brentwood. Hey, Studley. What are you doing here?

J.T. passed a card around. It was dated 1/19/62. I skimmed it. It clicked with Divorcée Job #4. The victim's Arden Jane Brownleigh/10116 Mandeville Lane, Brentwood. The cardee is:

Preston Winslow Fong/Male Chinese/DOB 8/11/24. Address: the Beachglade Motel, PCH. Caddy at Riviera Country Club. Stopped at 10:49 p.m., Wilshire and Barrington. That's one mile from Arden Jane Brownleigh's. Fong was skunk-drunk. He said he "went strolling for kicks." The patrol cops radioed R&I and quick-ran him. They got no wants, no warrants. The West L.A. drunk tank was full up. The cops told Fong to beat it. Catch the Wilshire bus and go home.

J.T. said, "Sid and I interviewed him the next day. He impressed us as harmless. He had a '54 California license. It gave his blood as O positive, so that exonerated him as a suspect. We deep-dipped him through R&I, and the kickback had him suspected of jewelry store smash-and-grabs, going back to '50. He purportedly clouted high-end wristwatches, which he purportedly laid off on the golfers and caddies at Riviera."

Max said, "We should grind him. Crowd him until he gives something up."

Red said, "FI cards wear me thin. He's got the wrong blood. He's not the Creep, so why bother?"

Harry said, "I'm making time with Lila Leeds. That wife-swap job was good for something."

I said, "Lila swings both ways."

Eddie said, "She's not the Sex Creep, so can it."

J.T. said, "I think he saw something that night, but he denies it. That warrants a reinterview, in my book."

I lit a cigarette. "I turned a KA sheet on Carole Landis at Homicide. Divorcée #1 was her assistant, back in '47–'48."

The boys WHOOPED—

We drew straws for the interview. J.T., Max, and I won. Red, Harry, and Eddie stood back. They're working the phones. They're scrounging leads from Realtors and divorce-court clerks. How did the Creep get creeped on these six women?

Marcia Davenport scored her pad in Divorce #2. It was a boss Hawaiian lanai. It showcased teakwood, little waterfalls, topiary shrubs. We parked and walked up. I rang the bell. Some hula ditty trilled inside.

Marcia Davenport opened up. Her gaze bypassed Max and me and zoomed to J.T. She remembered him. He interviewed her before. J.T. entrapped hookers on the job and entrapped lonely women routinely. Max and I flashed credentials. Miss Davenport waved them off and tossed the door wide.

We walked in. The interior was boffo. Sunken living room, teak furniture, tropical-fish tanks. I noticed a wall photo. Miss Davenport wore golf togs. She posed with three other women. They stood outside the clubhouse at Riviera CC.

She pointed us to lounge chairs. We sat down. Spongy cushions went whoosh. She said something about drinks and bolted the room. J.T. tapped his chest. She digs me/I'll take the lead.

She was gone fourteen seconds. She popped back with a tray crammed with frosty drinks. She carried the tray carhop-style. She hopped cars in her youth. The drinks were already made. She's a juicer. She exemplifies loose ends. I signaled J.T.: Let me go first.

I watched the tropical fish slither and glide. Miss Davenport dispensed drinks. She was inappropriate. She fed cops booze at noon. She was horny. J.T. magnetized her. She ignored Max and me. It was rude. I assumed the Sex Creep's perspective. She's my kind of woman. I'll start my string with her. I'll trash her beautiful home. I'll fuck her up for life.

She sat down beside J.T. I said, "We're not supposed to drink on duty, you know."

Max caught the toss. "But, as it happens, we're corruptible types."

J.T. caught the rebound. "She corrupted Sid and me, the first time we interviewed her. And she told us to call her 'Marcia' at the door."

She said, "I was about to tell your colleagues that very thing." She had a twang. It was Texas, for sure.

J.T. played emcee. "This is Lieutenant Otash and Sergeant Herman, Marcia. We had a few more questions about the break-in, if you don't mind."

"I don't mind. The Mirror-News doesn't seem to mind, either—given the benefit they've accrued from my misfortune. Really, that Mr. Bendish. How could he honestly state that I look like or style myself to resemble Marilyn Monroe?"

We ha-ha'd on cue. She's a southern belle. She played to us. We played straight back to her.

J.T. said, "You've redone your home beautifully, Marcia. It's as if the break-in never occurred."

"Aren't you the kindest to say that. And the handsomest, I might add."

J.T. blushed. Max laughed. I came in, abrupt.

"Marcia, would it be safe to call you a Riviera Country Club habitué? You play golf, play cards, go on symphony outings?"

"Well…I wouldn't say 'habitué.' Riviera's not exactly a dope den, you know."

"I'll concede that I know dope dens better than I know country clubs."

Marcia downed half her drink. "You're a sketch, Lieutenant. You surely are."

Max sipped his drink. "The lieutenant's leading up to a key question, Marcia. The other women who were burglarized. Did you know them from the club?"

Marcia went uh-huh. "Me, Leona, Wanda Jean, Arden, Lorraine, and Dorothy. We're all sisters in devastation, but I didn't know them from the club. They belong to the club, but I don't play golf or cards with them, and they certainly aren't friends that I socialize with. I think Officer J.T. and Officer Sid barked up that selfsame tree the first time they interviewed me."

Riviera. Divorced women. C for constellation. Caddy Preston Fong. The wrong blood type clears him. He may or may not circumstantially click.

I said, "Let's put your initial interview and the scurrilous and invasive Mirror-News series aside for a moment. I'm wondering if you recall an event or an occasion where you and the other five women may have constellated and given this horrible individual a good look at all of you?"

Marcia killed her drink and lit a cigarette. Marcia struck a thinking-cap pose.

"The Gay Divorcée dance at the club. It grew out of some chats a bunch of us unlucky-in-love girls had, and some gripes about how the club management slighted us. Me, Leona, Wanda Jean, Arden, Lorraine, and Dorothy. We all went to the dance and had a whopping good time. I can even tell you the date. It was October 9th, '61. I saved my table-setting card as a souvenir."

Eyeball clicks circulated. Max to me to J.T. and back. The break-ins kicked on the next month.

"Tell me if I've got this straight, please. Divorced women conceived the dance idea, and the word went out. Members—men and women—signed up, and a crew of Riviera waiters, cooks, and kitchen help worked the event. Is that how it went?"

"It sure is. And, I'll tell you, the concept drew quite a crowd."

Signals passed—J.T. to Max to me. Marcia slid something in J.T.'s coat pocket. Oh, shit—it's her phone number. Call me, sweetie pie.

"I noticed the way you slung that drinks tray, Marcia. I'll bet you car-hopped at one time?”

“Right with Eversharp. I hopped at Simon’s drive-in on Wilshire and Fairfax, back during the war.”

“Was that before you went to work for Carole Landis?”

Marcia coughed smoke. My changeup pitch worked.

She crushed her cigarette. “Poor Carole. I haven’t thought of her in a dog’s age.”

J.T. cut in right behind me. “Marcia, we’d like to get your impressions of Miss Landis. It would be a big help.”

Marcia said, “She was friendly to a fault, rather bright, and fixated on men in a surely ditzy way. She surely ignored her wedding vows, and her career was on the skids, and she took pills and went to parties, and she told me she went to a sort of ‘speakeasy place’ where there was always a party going on. She hinted that the place sometimes became obstreperous, but then she was surely obstreperous herself. Oh, and here’s an interesting sidelight to her story. She met two young girls, who were looking for house-sitting work, at that party place. One was Norma Jean Baker, who later became Marilyn Monroe. The other was that actress who got kidnapped a few months ago.”

(LOS ANGELES, 11:05 A.M., TUESDAY, 9/11/62)

Albie Aadland. The nebbish kid brother. Hersh, Ira, and Meyer were beefy and lurchlike. Albie was midsize and slight. He wore a navy blazer and gray slacks. He had that coat-hanger frame.

The DA cut loose his conference room. We sat at a long oak table. We faced off across it. I sat with Miller Leavy. Albie and Grant Cooper faced us.

Leavy kicked it off. “We’re here to discuss the August 4th abduction of an actress named Gwen Perloff, along with a series of perhaps interlocking financial-crime, narcotics-crime, and vice-crime conspiracies emanating from the 20th Century–Fox studio, perhaps collateral to the drug-overdose death of Marilyn Monroe. Lieutenant Otash will serve as my chief interlocutor. The lieutenant, Mr. Cooper, and I have spent time together in court, Mr. Aadland. We play fair, but we play rough. That’s all I have for the prologue.”

Cooper smiled. He was deadly handsome and deadly quick.

“The recently credentialed Lieutenant Otash. Once known as the ‘Hellhound Who Held Hollywood Captive.’ Hi, Freddy.”

I said, “Hello, Grant. Again, good morning, Mr. Aadland.”

Aadland smiled. He directly mimicked Cooper and me. I assumed his perspective. He calculated the smile. He learned male bonhomie from his brothers. This is what brusque men do.

“Hello, Lieutenant. It’s a pleasure to finally meet you.”

Cooper said, “Ask specific questions, please.”

Leavy said, “Let’s move this along.”

I crowded the table. Albie pulled his elbows back.

“Did you participate in the Perloff snatch?”

Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.”

I said, “You, Gwen Perloff, Marilyn Monroe, and Paul Mitchell Grenier met at the Hollygrove home. Who was the Mexican boy—your pal, who lived off-site?”

Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.”

“Are you involved in Mr. Grenier’s pornographic-film racket?”

Albie twitched. Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.”

“Were you acquainted with the late Richard Danforth? Mr. Danforth was also known as ‘Ronald Dewhurst’ and ‘Rick Dawes.’ ”

Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.”

I lit a cigarette. Cooper lit a cigarette. Mimic Albie took the cue. His right hand trembled. He fumbled his cigarette. It took three match strikes to light it.

“Are you involved in the passing of bearer bonds, both real and forged, and the trading of bearer bonds for Mexican heroin and other narcotics, with or without the cooperation of a Mexican man named José Bolaños?”

Albie twitched and laced his hands up. Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.” I glanced sidelong. Miller Leavy studied me.

“The aforementioned criminal enterprises are currently being perpetrated by separate and differentiated cabals employed at 20th Century–Fox. The looming disaster of the film Cleopatra serves as a goad. The cabals are out to provoke a stockbroker revolt and depose the current studio leadership. Have you heard of Mar-Gwen Productions, as in Marilyn and Gwen?”

Albie wrung his hands. He caught himself and placed them flat on the table. Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.” He glared at his client. I read him. He’s thinking There’s some twisted shit going on here.

“Are your known-criminal brothers the guiding influence behind the aforementioned criminal enterprises?”

Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.” He’s giving me free rein. I’m giving him a primer for his presumed courtroom case. Leavy’s giving me free rein. He’s got Albie pegged as a pervert. He hates perverts. Albie’s under the hot lights. Gas Chamber Leavy loves it.

“Are your known-criminal brothers jungled up with Jimmy Hoffa in the aforementioned criminal enterprises?”

Cooper said, “My client declines to answer.”

“What sort of aberrant behavior did you, Mr. Grenier, Miss Monroe, and Miss Perloff indulge during your years at Hollygrove?”

Albie’s wilting. Cooper eyed him and kept it zipped. He’s luring me in.

“Who was the Mexican boy you hung out with? He was allegedly in the peewee corps of the Nite Owl gang. They were primarily a burglary gang, and you and Paul Mitchell Grenier purportedly went on ‘burglary runs’ with them, in your early adolescence. I might add that Danforth/Dewhurst/Dawes was a burglar, as well. What say ye to that, Mr. Aadland?”

Albie pulled his elbows back. Albie dropped his hands in his lap. His jerky knees knocked the table.

“Do you read the Mirror? Have you read about the Sex Creep and his burglaries?”

Shaky knees—Albie’s ashtray skittered.

Get him. Crush him now. He’s had enough/you’ve confirmed enough/Cooper and Leavy will call it off soon/HE knows that YOU know.

“Have you heard of a bent headshrinker named Paul de River? Are you a homosexual? Are you familiar with the fuck-deck craze of the late 1940s? Are you aware that your cousin Shelley Mandel invented the fuck deck? While I have you, will you please offer insight on the abduction and probable murder of Mitzi Perloff in February of ’37?”

Albie stood up. His chair crashed. He’d wrung his hands red. He hate-glared me and twitch-walked to the door. Cooper came up behind him. He’s the lawyer/best pal. He eased Albie out to the hallway.

Leavy rocked his chair back. “You gave Grant a boatload of courtroom ammo. I should have stopped you, but I was too embroiled in the show.”

I said, “It’s not going to court.”

“I’ll pretend I didn’t hear that.”

I undid my necktie and stretched. Leavy said, “He’s dirty all right.”

No shit, Dick Tracy.

Daryl Gates cranked up the juice. I begged immediate favors. He complied. I knew why.

Bill Parker stepped on his dick again. He blasted “civil rights agitators” and “Comsymps within the civil wrongs movement.” He gave a talk at the Jonathan Club. He was half-tanked. An L.A. Times man attended. Whiskey Bill’s tantrum made page three.

The FBI-boss deal was one month and ten days old. Ratfuck Bobby read the newspapers and my summary reports. They were candid. I omitted the killing of Paul Mitchell Grenier and nothing else. Ratfuck understood the levels of my legitimate investigation and Morty Bendish’s newspaper shuck. He was complicit in their perpetration. He understood that the LAPD brought big weight to both the shuck and my investigation. I was out to smother Monroe/Kennedy rumors. The bonus payment was Bill Parker's FBI appointment. Ratfuck could renege in a heartbeat.

I told Gates we should double down. I needed five Intel cops for phone shitwork, now. I needed drift on the Nite Owl gang and their peewee corps, now. Our clue clowns should ditz old Hollywood Division hands and get the what for. I need enhanced drift on the Mitzi Perloff snuff. I need it now. The Mitzi snuff popped at the chronological core of the '37 convergence. Gates said he understood and rounded up the men.

I crashed in my cubicle. The Albie interview drained me. Albie was dirty. But how, when, and who with—and to what degree? He was at Hollygrove in '37. He might have roamed the margins of the '48 convergence. Marcia Davenport's revelations now defined said convergence. Marilyn and Gwen. House sitters for Carole Landis. Here's my vibe: they turned call-girl tricks out of the pad in Carole and hubby's absence. Plus the divorcée dance party. It supplied a new Sex Creep suspect pool:

Riviera Country Club. Perved-out members and/or employees.

Exhaustion slammed me. I dozed in my chair. The clue clowns called and woke me up. They reported near-nil results.

The Nite Owls played obscure. Scant paperwork existed. Their peewee corps spawned none. Juvenile arrest and court records were either sealed or expunged. The clue clowns turned no gang-member names. The Owls bopped from the mid-'30s to the early '40s. Their turf ran from Beverly to Melrose, Vine to Van Ness. Hollygrove stood at the west border. The Owls were suspected of a dozen lower-Hollywood B and E's. They were lower-Hollywood boys, todos.

The clowns delivered on Mitzi. They ran retirement records checks and sideswiped some old ex-cops who worked the case. I got four confirmations of Del Kinney's spiel. Mitzi was spotted on a westbound Wilshire bus, the same day she vanished.

Here's the big new lead:

An enhanced eyewit account of Mitzi on the bus. The unknown eyewit states this:

Two boys seemed to be traveling with Mitzi. They teased her as the bus moved west on Sunset. One boy was about thirteen. One boy was a bit older. There was no further description. I could not track the lead.

Dead children. Los Nite Owls. I caromed back to the key question—who's the Mexican boy?

He lived near Hollygrove—check. He joined the Monroe/Perloff/Grenier/Aadland clique—check. I'm running hot today. I just hatched myself a brainstorm.

Intel kept a reverse-directory library. I raided it and grabbed the '35, '36, and '37 books. I scanned addresses and names in my cubicle. I kept a tally of Latin-type surnames. Martinez, Salazar, Sanchez. Arredondo, Guttierez, García, Abado, Contreras, and more. I matched the names to addresses. I nailed Gower, El Centro, Van Ness, Ridgewood, Wilton, Gramercy, Saint Andrews. I nailed Lemon Grove Avenue—and more.

I dredged twenty-seven names. They were mid- to late '30s names. It was a long time ago and a long long shot. It was pavement-pounder shitwork—

—

I wore my crepe-soled shoes and carried a notebook. I started at El Centro and walked a beat east. Ramon Ramirez on Gower was long gone. Ditto, Gus Mora on Waring. I dipped south. Bobby Gomez and Luis Chasco were long gone. I dipped north to the Orbit Lounge and refreshed myself. I hit a waitress up for her phone number. She told me to fuck off.

I trudged east. I got six straight not-at-homes and six straight jolts of incomprehension. Man, I wasn't born yet. That's the Stone Age, Daddy-O.

My feet hurt. I door-knocked sixteen cribs. I had eleven to go. Add on the not-at-homes. That made seventeen.

I door-knocked a wood-frame house on Lemon Grove and Saint Andrews. A man in bus-driver garb opened up. I noticed a fight poster on the back wall.

March 16, '52. Hollywood Legion Stadium. All local talent. Juan Manuel "El Manny" Salas versus El Tigre Flores—walloping welterweight tiff!!!

I badged the man. He acted bored. I asked how long he'd lived in the house. He said his dad bought the house back in the '20s. His dad was a grip at Paramount. It's right down the street. His dad made good bread.

I pointed to the poster. I dropped the "El Manny" moniker. The man said Manny grew up in this very house. He was a vato loco. He's his cousin Hector's boy.

(LOS ANGELES, 9:34 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 9/12/62)

I went in badge-heavy. The airport cops humored me. My credentials cowed them. They lent me a luggage cart and a stress room on the international concourse. Mexicali flight 291—Guadalajara to L.A.

Hello, Ingrid. Remember me? I soft-played you the first time. I've got corroborative witnesses now.

The airplane taxied up. It was a turboprop job. Festive sombreros were etched on the fuselage. I stood upside my cart, in plain view. Tech men rolled out the off-loading steps. The hatch popped from inside. A dark-haired stew clicked them into place.

Gringo tourists off-loaded. They were sunburned and looked sun-smacked. It was warm in L.A. It was hot in Mexico. The stews kept them lubed and pacified. The mucho mas margarita cart trundled the aisles nonstop.

The off-load took twenty minutes. The turistas weaved and lugged hand luggage toward the Customs-entry door. I pinned my badge to my left lapel and glowered. I'd see her, she'd see me, I'd gauge her reaction. She'd know it's a roust.

She was third down the steps. She shoulder-slung a garment bag and a big black suede purse. I hopped in the cart and wheeled over. I blocked off the steps. I motioned the pilot and copilot around me. I stood square in front of her. She squeezed the purse and planted her feet.

She held up the line. It was backed up into the airplane. I grabbed her arm and pulled her off the steps. Her feet dragged, she squeezed the purse, she tripped up onto the cart. I hung a U-turn and brodied us up to the Customs door.

Inbound turistas gassed the show. Two uniformed Customs men played escort. We bypassed the passport and visa lines and cut right. A Customs lieutenant jogged up and unlocked the door.

I eased Ingrid inside and plopped her down at the table. She squeezed her purse. I pulled it out of her hands and dropped it on the table. I kicked the door shut and hit a fan switch. Cool air blew.

I straddled the spare chair. I lit a cigarette and offered the pack. Ingrid took one. I lit her up.

"You were observed at a beachfront volleyball game. You were selling bearer bonds to your transient lover and Girl Book procurer, Peter Lawford. Your main lover, Manny Salas, appears to have taken part in a kidnapping last month. You told me that a 'queen-bee' cater waitress conceived the Girl Book idea. That was a lie. I asked you if you were running dope in and out of Mexico. You denied it. You denied running bearer bonds. I'm betting you lied there, too."

Ingrid smoked and futzed with her ashtray. I poked her purse and went tee-hee.

I flashed a Ronnie Dewhurst mug shot. Ingrid shook her head. I flashed a Gwen Perloff movie still. Ingrid shook her head. I flashed a Paul Mitchell Grenier mug shot. Ingrid shook her head.

She lies. She's quaking now. That's good. She clutched her purse extra tight.

"Burglary's all over this thing I'm working on. Manny went down for burglary in August '54. He went to Chino. He met a stat-rape man named Paul Mitchell Grenier there. I'd say they got tight. I'd say they stayed tight after they got out. Manny got popped for burglary in '57. You said it was a humbug deal, but I don't think so. I think you're fingering burglary scores for Manny, when you're not running dope and bearer bonds and posing for beaver pix."

Ingrid quaked. Ingrid squeezed her purse. I snatched it and dumped it out on the table.

Cosmetics, wallet, house keys, car keys, cigarettes, matches, loose coins. I poked through the wallet. She carried forty-two dollars. El Manny leered in photo sleeves. Driver's license, Mexicali ID card, a slip of paper stashed behind Manny Pic #4.

I unfolded it. It was blue ink–printed. It listed six addresses and eight-digit numbers, all on one line. "Avenida" and "Calle" meant Mexico. U.S. bearer bonds ran to eight digits. Snap call: Ingrid's got a delivery route.

Ingrid gulped, Ingrid quaked, Ingrid chained cigarettes. I felt the purse, all around. I brushed a lining bulge and pulled my pocketknife. Ingrid mewled and squeaked.

I slashed the lining. I hit an inset stash hole. A glassine bag was stuffed in. It contained white powder. I unfolded the bag and tasted the powder. It was high-grade cocaine.

I rewrapped the bag and tucked it in my back pocket. I pat-patted it. I held up the handwritten list.

"The dope goes with me. That list confirms that you're moving bearer bonds, so I'm honor-bound to inform Customs and the Mexican State Police. I'll give you two hours before I call them. Don't hide out or run, because it will only mess your life up that much more."

Ingrid sniveled. "I know something about burglary. It involves that kidnap girl, Gwen, but it was a long time ago. If the Customs guys think I'm playing ball, they might go easy on me."

I said, "Tell me. If I like it, I'll pass it along."

Ingrid chained cigarettes. "It was a long time ago, but it's got a movie-star angle. The Gwen chick knew Marilyn Monroe, from an orphanage they were in. Later on, they were call girls running wild. They used to do house-sitting jobs for rich people, and they fingered burglary scores."

I smiled. "Did you get that from El Manny?"

"No."

"You just heard it somewhere? You pulled it off the grapevine?"

Ingrid nodded—yes, yes, yes. Ingrid stroked the airplane wings on her chest.

"I like the tip, but I know damn well you got it from Manny."

Ingrid pouted. "What are you going to do with the coca?"

I said, "Sniff it or sell it. I haven't decided yet."

—

Gwen Perloff was due. She chose the restaurant. She called my service three hours back. "Villa Frascati/Beverly Hills/7:00 tonight."

I arrived early. I wore my best chalk-stripe and scored a tête-à-tête booth. Gwen would be prompt.

I sniffed the coca grande. It spurred a work binge. I called Customs and gave them Ingrid's particulars. They scheduled the grab for 5:00 sharp. I called Morty Bendish and laid down a phone edit. He was on to Divorcée #3: Wanda Jean D'Allesio. I told him to lean on the scare tactics, big. Emphasize hot-prowl hunk Donald Keith Bashor. He snuffed two women in '55 and '56. He burned in '57. Raid the Mirror photo morgue. Run shots of Karil Graham, dead. Run a BIG shot of Bashor strapped in the Green Room.

Stress the Monroe connection. Monroe OD'd on yellow jackets. The Sex Creep dumped Wanda Jean's yellow-jacket stash in her off-the-boudoir toilet. Employ a tick, tick, tick motif. We're up to Divorcée #3. There's three more to go. Then it's August 4—and the Creep's hot date with Marilyn Monroe.

Morty pledged quick compliance. Jawohl, Herr Freddy! I rang up Nat and Phil. I dictated their scripts for Doc de River's gig at the Wilshire Ebell, tomorrow. Intel would film it. George Putnam would run it on his TV show, tomorrow night. Putnam was the Chief's favorite right-wing gasbag.

I wrote my daily summary and transmitted it. The Chief/Daryl Gates/the Hats and Ratfuck Bobby received it. The El Manny/Ingrid leads should gas them.

I eyeballed the Customs grab. I parked across the street and down from Ingrid's stewardess flop pad. I saw El Manny's TV-repair truck parked at the curb.

Coca grande stimulated brainflow. I got a significant jolt. I theorized this:

Manny ran his own Monroe listening post. He was the kidnap clique's tech man. I found bug mounts on my 8/4/62 break-in. El Manny installed them and monitored the post. He watchdogged the ditzy Monroe—at Bayless and Gwen P.'s instigation.

I called Bob Kennedy. I begged him to issue a fed warrant on El Manny. El Bobby said, "Maybe." My plan? Serve the warrant and take El Manny someplace secluded. Kick the shit out of him and demand the whole tale.

The grab went down at 5:02. Three Fed sleds/six agents total. They quick-walked down the driveway and quick-walked back with Ingrid cuffed. El Manny followed them out. The Fed sleds laid tread. Manny blew his baby doll a fat kiss.

A maître d' walked Gwen up. She wore a fitted pearl-gray suit. I stood up. The maître d' pulled Gwen's chair out. She entered rooms. She was decorous. She inspired subservience.

I sat down and cut straight in.

"I've put something together. It's a work-up. Feel free to remark on the validity. One—you, Motel Mike, Albie, Paul Mitchell Grenier, and Manny Salas put the kidnap together. Richie Danforth and Buzzy Stein were off to the side. Marilyn was an errand girl, and supplied some je ne sais quoi. Two—you and Marilyn were call girls together. You were fingering burglary scores, back in '48. Some shit happened with you two and Carole Landis—but I don't know what it was."

Gwen lit a cigarette. "Paul Mitchell Grenier loves cats. He has a cat-access flap built into his back door, and he always leaves food and water out for them. I've been calling his service—from pay phones, of course—and leaving messages for the past several days. Paul hasn't called me back. I have my own key, so I went over to feed the cats myself."

I clamped down on my water glass. It shook and almost shattered.

"The place had been tossed. Certain paper items had been stolen. I saw traces of bloodstains where someone had applied solvents to dissolve certain stains. I found a fingerprint brush behind an editing machine, and I had a friend check your LAPD personnel file. You took a college forensic course in 1946, and you know how to lift, preserve, and identify prints. You had been quite pointedly looking for Paul Mitchell. I think he interrupted your toss, and you killed him."

The glass shattered. Water sprayed the table. I pulled a large shard out of my hand.

Gwen stood up. She said, "I'm sure we'll speak again."

She grabbed her purse and walked out. She turned heads all the way out the door.

(LOS ANGELES, 2:00 P.M., THURSDAY, 9/13/62)

The Wilshire Ebell. Home to chamber recitals and prep-school teas. Plus, Moral Rearmament and Ayn Rand study groups.

Eight hundred seats. A raised stage and lectern. The Hancock Park Ladies Guild invites speakers. Paul de River's due today.

His topic: "The Criminal Consciousness of Our Society."

I took an aisle seat. Nat, Phil, and Morty Bendish backstopped me. Nat brought his rowdy kid brother, Kareem. I paid twelve winos to mutter and belch.

It's a put-the-word-out scenario. It may be precipitous. Albie Aadland knows we know. Ingrid Irmgard knows we know. De River will know—if he's sentient and he plays in at all. Gwen Perloff knows we know. She's nullified my knowledge. She knows I killed Paul Mitchell Grenier.

Intel stood ready. Three cameramen and two soundmen rolled film at the back. The AC blew a fuse. The room broiled. Four hundred stiffs squirmed in their seats. They were pensioner age and dead bored. I'm here to furnish distraction.

An old girl walked to the lectern. She introduced "the learned and savvy Dr. de River." She dropped his résumé and ballyhooed his service to the "psychically ravaged" and the "So Cal cognoscenti." De River creaked onstage. I heard his bones pop six rows back. He pledged a fast-paced chat and a Q and A after. He cleared his throat and hocked into a hankie. He needed a haircut. He needed a whisk broom. Scalp gack dusted his suit coat.

De River launched. His faux-French accent dipped in and out. Big words proliferated. The winos sucked T-bird and evinced restlessness. De River wandered off point. The talk went pity-party. The LAPD fired me/the State Med Board censured me/my Jap publisher owes me money. I support sterilization for habitual criminals and mental defectives. Don't look so shocked. I don't mean snip-snip.

The Doc cranked it and lost it. The emcee lady panicked. She held up an APPLAUSE!!! sign. The clap-claps ran lukewarm. An old lady trekked the aisles with a microphone. Morty Bendish called her over.

He grabbed the mike. “Doc, that criminal consciousness rebop lacks panache. Let’s get down to the oooga-booga of crime in L.A. today. By that, I mean the Sex Creep, who’s violated the homes of six luscious westside divorcées. I’ve been writing about it in the Mirror-News, and my series has created a burgeoning sensation here in the southland. I’m proud to mention that my brother-in-law, Officer Sid Leffler, put the Sex Creep case together, and he tags the Creep as the most dangerous psycho since Jack the Ripper. Hey, Doc—you know Sid, right? He took classes from you back in the ’40s. And, you know, Doc—I’m pretty sure the Creep snuffed Marilyn Monroe.”

The audience gasped, tittered, roared. The winos whooped and cheered. De River flushed. He torqued on “Leffler.” Sid lied. He said he took the classes. That was it. He said he did not know de River warm and up close. Morty said they were tight. Morty should know. Now de River’s clenched up, beaucoup tight.

Nat slid down Morty’s aisle. The microphone lady scowled. Morty passed Nat the mike. Nat spieled off my script.

“I heard the Black Muslims put out a contract on the Creep, because they know he’s out perving on Negro women.”

More gasps, hoots, titters, stomps, cheers—

Kareem yelled, “The Creep’s in with the Klan and the Birchers! I predict vigilante action all over the southside!”

Phil slid down Morty’s aisle. The microphone lady plotzed. Phil snatched the mike from Nat. More stomps, whistles, hoots—

“Doc, a very astute cop named Jack Clemmons told me the Creep is 100% good for the Monroe snuff, and that Monroe was into some heavy-duty criminal stuff herself.”

The emcee lady led de River offstage. A backup dowager pressed an oxygen mask to his face.

The caddy lot adjoined the caddy shack. Dirt roads and eucalyptus groves enclosed it. The clubhouse overlooked the course. It was ’20s Spanish de-luxe. Capri Drive dead-ended at Riviera. Plumb line: the Landis spread was six blocks due north.

I parked between caddy junkers. Max and J.T. were due. Preston Fong was out on the course. He’d kick loose soon.

I tried to doze. Max and J.T. were late. I’d braced the dining room/kitchen boss already. He recalled the divorcée dance ball. He didn't know no Sex Creep. The dining room manager hovered. I told him to pull his files on the male slaves who worked the gig. Get me their blood types. Chop, chop on this. He said he'd comply.

I dozed. Some geek knock-knocked my windshield. I opened my eyes. J. T. Meadows scooched into the car.

He just got laid. I know the signs. He grinned, slaphappy. All's right with the world.

"Wipe off that lipstick. Marcia Davenport was wearing the same shade three days ago."

He pulled a handkerchief and scrubbed his face raw. He checked himself in the rearview mirror and cracked a shit-eater grin.

"I picked up some leads, along with the rest of it. Marcia said Monroe and Perloff had no sense of boundaries. They went through the house, trying on Carole's clothes. Some jewelry went missing, or it might have been misplaced. Monroe and Perloff had gourmet taste. They sampled the caviar and the foie gras but ignored the tuna casserole."

Max pulled up. He got out and stretched himself loose. J.T. and I got out. Max said, "Who's this dink again?"

J.T. said, "Preston Fong. He's Chinese, and about thirty-five. His blood type clears him. He's technically clean, but he smash-and-grabs jewelry stores and clouts display watches. There's a bust and a no-file in his jacket, but that's way back in '50. Sid and I interviewed him. I think he saw something that night."

"That night." As in, 1/19/62. Leffler and Meadows braced him on 1/20. Fong was a night bird and a peep-and-prowl artiste. Brother Fong and me. We're Kameraden under the skin.

The dink walked toward us. He wore hand-me-down golf slacks and a pink Banlon shirt. He ran five-nine and 140. He sported a flattop. He looked alert.

We squared up to him. J.T. knew him. He kicked it off.

"Preston, this is Lieutenant Otash and Sergeant Herman."

Fong said, "Where's Sid the comedian? That guy was a sketch."

J.T. smiled. "Preston, you weren't entirely candid when we talked to you back in January."

Fong shrugged. "That was months and months ago. I told you, I was drunk. What's going on? There's all this Sex Creep jive in the Mirror."

Max lit a cigar. "Officer Meadows thinks you were up to no good, but nobody thinks you're the Creep."

J.T. said, “I think you might have seen something you haven’t told us about.”

Max blew smoke in his face. “So, we’re back to run you through it again. You know how this shit works. We hassle you until you tell us what we want to hear.”

Fong rolled his eyes. It was snotty. I stabbed his chest—hard.

“Listen, papa-san—you were a watch clouter way back when, and if you’ve done it since, we don’t care. We’re only interested in the Creep, and what you might have seen that night.”

Fong pawed the ground. His golf cleats kicked up dirt.

“Okay. I was drunk, and I was looking to get back over to San Vicente. There used to be a jewelry store near that church on Bundy, so I thought I’d do some window-shopping. I was drunk, and I took a wrong turn somewhere. I saw a guy trying to slide up a side window on a really spiffed house. It was on Gretna Green, a big ranch style. He was a tall blond guy, and I knew he was looking to score.”

(LOS ANGELES, 10:30 A.M., FRIDAY, 9/14/62)

The heat broke. Fall hit early. Pat shivered under thin sheets.

I tossed her a blanket. She bundled in and snatched her coffee off the nightstand.

"Jack's worried about the congressionals. It's all he talks about."

I stage-yawned. "I'm worried about your brother indicting me. It's all I think about."

"I'm going to Mass and brunch with Lois. The ten at St. Michael's, this Sunday. I'll be sure to fill you in."

The bed sagged. It held Pat, Lois, and me. Plus Gwen Perloff. Forget church. They're my un-Holy Trinity. I should evict Pat and Lois. They stand apart from All Of It. I need Gwen to tell me things.

Pat checked her watch. "The doctor told Jackie she'll have twins next time. She's playing catch-up with Bobby."

"I'm playing catch-up with Bobby. I need a Federal arrest warrant, and the go-ahead to thump a guy."

Pat pillow-thumped me. I squeaked. I mimed a rape suspect spitting teeth.

"Let me read your diary. You can watch me. I'm trying to sustain this thing of ours. It'll give us something to talk about—besides Jack's and Bobby's accomplishments, your shitty marriage, and all the shit I'm in."

Pat laughed. "It's the third time you've asked me. I think you're looking for something specific, and it has to do with some personal agenda you've got going."

She's right. Jack fell in the shit, back in '48. Monroe knew about it. Pat's diary covered that year. I'm in over my head. I'm a clue clown with leads and no conclusion.

Hambone Officer Sid. He puts on a show. He works the show. He kills the auditorium lights and runs slides. Sid crowds the lectern. Morty B.

straddles a chair, close in. He's "my brother-in-law, the newshound." It's borscht-belt shtick.

Pali High. Packed with moms, dads, and kids. I sat with Lois. Lowell Farr sat three rows up, on the side.

She's got Monroe's fan letters. That means Creep letters. We're back in mid-July. Marilyn and Lowell. They mess around in Marilyn's basement. They come out dirty. Lowell sticks something in her handbag. It's those letters. It has to be.

Sid flashed car-crash slides. Multiple dead/tots thrown free/ steering columns punched through chests. The audience gasped. Sid exhorted seat belts and conscientious low-speed driving. Motorcycle decapitation. Eeeks and skreeks reverberate. Sid segues to kids and dope.

I buttonholed Morty before the show. I re-pressed him on Sid and Doc de River. Morty re-stressed: they're tight city. Sid's been feeding the Doc LAPD reports for years.

Sid flashed before-and-after slides. Teenage girls in Kodachrome. Shown predope and in the throes. They were good-looking girls. They wore cut-low bikinis. They were nubile in the former shots, ravaged in the latter. They went glow of health to dissolution. Glazed eyes and shrunken limbs. Slack skin and glossy hair gone in tufts. Bikini girls. Always the bikini girls. Akin to the horror pix in The Sexual Criminal. Akin to the Weimar-era pix that Marilyn Monroe hoarded.

The lights went up. Some Pali lettermen chanted, "Sex Creep! Sex Creep! Sex Creep!"

Sid pointed Morty to the lectern. Morty ambled up. He said, "Here's a preview of the next installment in my series. I've been in serious consultation with an eminent headshrinker here in the City of the Fallen Angels, and he told me the Creep is living through a 'declension of fan crushes,' which is to say that he crushed on the late Carole Landis, then went on to crush on someone like Jane Russell, then went on to the crush object of the era—the late Marilyn Monroe."

Pali cheerleaders chanted, "Two, four, six, eight!! He's the man we love to hate!! Sex Creep! Sex Creep! Sex Creep!"

"Declension of fan crushes." Timmy Berlin said Marilyn coined the concept. She cited Landis and Russell. "Eminent headshrinker" equals Paul de River. The Doc shares the concept with Leffler. The Sidster feeds it to Morty. It affirms one thing. De River counseled Monroe as she trucked with Timmy Berlin. It infers de River's criminal designs.

A Pali boy raised his hand. Morty pointed to him. The kid said, "How often do these pervert B and E guys graduate to murder?"

Morty said, "Take this to the bank, junior. The Creep snuffed Monroe. 'Easy come, easy go'—right, kid? 'That's the way, if love must have its day.' Now, in general, Sex Creep types only murder out of jealousy—if they feel that their crush object has betrayed them with a close friend or lover."

Sid bowed. Morty bowed. The audience erupted. They gave the Sid and Morty Show a big standing O. Fan types stormed the stage and waved today's Mirror. The headline read "Creep-O Mania Hits L.A.!!! Cops Investigate Murder Link!!!"

Lois said, "What a crock of shit."

I scoped the stage. Sid Leffler passed out business cards. Not to adults or male students. To Pali coeds exclusive. He leaned too close as he spoke to them. He brushed their hair every time.

A quickie gig fell on me. The revived Eddie Fisher at the Losers. Four sets, in and out. By invitation only. The club named Eddie "Loser Emeritus." Richard Nixon declined the award.

Nat and Phil worked the rope line and bopped home. I told them to leapfrog El Manny Salas and call in three times a day. Eddie was boffo. He sang his big hits and spritzed his signature self-loathing. Liz gobbles schvantz on the Via Veneto. Liz and Dick hatch a mongoloid love child. The full house cracked up.

It was late. Eddie and I yakked in the greenroom. Bo Belinsky raided the pill jars. He craved a nap. Take a pink one and a green one, Bo. You'll doze for sixteen hours. You'll awake refreshed. Take a red one and a blue one then. You'll revitalize.

Bo took a pink one and a green one. He said, "I've got it bad for Liz. Come on, Eddie. Give me a one-night-only pass."

Eddie popped a red one and a blue one. Eddie chased them with Vat 69.

"That's my wife you're defaming. She's the Whore of Rome, and Cleopatra's the sack of Rome, and when Fox pulls production, the Italian economy will tank."

Liz fan-danced me. I recalled old Roddy McDowall dish. It was Confidential slush-pile skank.

The late '40s. Teen-star Liz. Roddy was older. He squired Liz around L.A.'s low hot spots. Donkey shows and beyond. Black-white sextravaganzas. Young Liz orbs wild shit. Plus, this:

Liz might know wild shit per Fox in duress.

Bo said, “Freddy’s thinking and scheming. He’s in a trance.”

Eddie said, “Freddy’s a schemer. It’s how he’s survived this long.”

Bo dozed off. Eddie dropped his cashmere topcoat on him.

“He’s pitching today. 2:00 p.m.—the Angels versus the Orioles. He’ll sleep right through it.”

I sipped Vat 69. “I need some skank Liz might be privy to. She’s in L.A., on hiatus—and I want to ease her into the sack with Bo. He’ll get me the skank, he’ll get laid, and I’ll shoot infrared film. It’s a mitzvah, Eddie. The film proves adultery. It’ll cut your alimony nut way down.”

Eddie said, “I’m in. The Loser Emeritus has eaten enough shit.”

I pulled up to the Pico gate. It was pushing 2:00 a.m. I wanted to brace Roddy McDowall. Bill Parker had ordered me off the lot. Del Kinney had confirmed it. Roddy haunted the costume bins. He was costuming his Cleo fuck spoof. He’d be here. I had questions. He needed production bread. I paid good gelt for good answers.

Monroe’s fan mail. Riff it for me. Give me Jane Russell’s phone number. “Declension of fan crushes.” Did Monroe talk that shit up to you?

I approached the guard hut. A late-model DeVille dipped in front of me. Three big men got out.

They blinked and covered their eyes. Well, now. It’s the Aadland brothers.

My headlights nailed them. Hersh, Ira, and Meyer. They’re russet-haired and blue-eyed. They’re Albie A. built full scale and mean.

I dimmed my lights and stepped out of the car. The Aadlands stepped close. They wore cut-trim Sy Devore suits. They ran six-three and 260. The Devore look tanked on them.

Meyer said, “You’re working up a derogatory profile on poor Marilyn. It’s not exactly a secret, you know.”

Ira said, “There’s a payoff that our friend Jimmy H. would like to avoid.”

Hersh said, “We like Mr. Hoover. We’d hate to see Bill Parker get his job.”

Meyer said, “Your profile for Parker and the Kennedys sounds just like the profile Jimmy had you prepare.”

Ira said, “Please desist. Please leave Albie alone and stay off the lot —which Bill Parker himself has told you to do.”

They were deep-red sclerotic. They radiated ill health.

Meyer said, “Would a large sum of money persuade you?”

I said, “No.”

Ira said, “May I ask why?”

I said, “I’ve got a bug up my ass. I’m not for sale on this one.”

(LOS ANGELES, 12:30 P.M., SATURDAY, 9/15/62)

Lunch in the Palisades. The Canton King Terrace. Lowell Farr, Lois, and me. I blew off the parental-consent note. Lois and Lowell were film-set pals. Lois cast my role and set up the meet.

I was a DA's lieutenant. That's true for now. My queries pertained to Marilyn Monroe. Lois coaxed Lowell and reeled her in.

We sipped green tea. Lois and Lowell critiqued Twist Party Stakeout. I studied Lowell and fought off All Of It frustration.

She wore a madras shirtdress and Weejuns. The Aadland approach wigged me. Gwen P. was all stalemate. Phil and Nat tailed Manny Salas. He made nine pay-phone calls this morning. Preston Fong scanned mug books at the downtown DB. The blond B and E man was a likely suspect. Lowell towered over Lois. She'll top six feet, easy. The divorcée-dance-lead dipped sideways. Ray Pinker blood-tested the waiters and kitchen help assigned to the gig. Their blood types cleared them. None was blond. They were R&I and NCIC clean. Daryl Gates got me a phone date with Jane Russell. Hey, Jane—what's this "declension of fan crushes" shit?

Our food came. Lois and Lowell dug in. I pushed my plate away.

Lowell said, "My mom thinks I made up the friendship with Marilyn. None of my friends believes that I actually knew her. You two and Officer Sid believe me, but try convincing my mom."

Lois speared a shrimp. "The people at Pali seem to love him."

Lowell studied Lois and me. She buzz-bombed most everybody. Monroe was like that.

"He grovels for love. I think it's unseemly. He's a stage ham, but he's very insecure."

I said, "Would you call him 'handsy'? Would you say he has a bent for underage girls?"

Lowell twirled her soup spoon. "I'd say he verges on inappropriate. He asks girls their bra size and when they started to develop. A twelfth-grade girl I know says he probably masturbates to excess."

Lois gagged on her soup. She grabbed her napkin and staved off a hurl. I laughed, Lowell laughed. Lois leaned into me. Lowell caught the move. I read her. She thinks we're doing it.

I said, "Lowell, did Marilyn give you a stack of her fan letters, that day you were digging around in the basement?"

She was gobsmacked. She did a broad double take.

"Well, yes she did. How did you know about—"

"And who did you tell about it?"

"Just Officer Sid. He was the only one. I said I hadn't read them—and he seemed to be relieved about that. Then he said I should consign the letters to him, which I did."

Lois said, "What did he intend—"

"He said he intended to sell them, and he said he'd use the money to start a research fund to help out kids with cancer."

Lois rolled her eyes. I said, "Did he tell you who he intended to sell the letters to?"

"No—but he told me he knew a 'rogue psychiatrist,' who was his mentor, and that the man might find them valuable as a research tool."

Rogue shrink de River/Sid, you perved-out piece of—

Lowell said, "There's one other thing. I heard Officer Sid talking to Mr. Bendish at the aud call. Mr. Bendish called his Sex Creep series a 'moneymaker,' especially if he brings in Jack Clemmons to put a 'political spin' on it. Does that make any sense to you?"

Morty knows from opportunity. So do I. I coined the phrase "Opportunity is love."

Bo lived at the Ravenswood. Rossmore, right off Melrose. His digs showcased a wide view. Vine Street by night bedazzled. The pad bedazzled. Living room, two bedrooms, two baths. Black leather furniture and purple-flocked wallpaper. Lava lamps and kooky Kandinsky prints.

We got lucky. Bernie found an interior wall crawl. It bordered the living room and master bedroom. A hinged panel opened on a hallway. The space was twelve feet long and three feet wide. It was crammed with bunched wires and AC-DC outlets. The bedroom wall was flocked velour. Bo shot us a work sample. We could mount the peephole and sustain a mid-shot of the bed.

It was a four-man/all-day job. Bernie disconnected the wire clumps. We bought off the manager and hogged a freight elevator. Eight trash-cart runs got our gear up. Bernie discovered the wire clumps. Nat and Phil shot Polaroids of the reconnection points. Bernie rewired the crawl space. We wore masks to squelch sawdust inhalation. I installed mikes under bedside lamp shades and Day-Glo wall tapestry. Nat and Phil built a camera box with a floor swivel. I drilled and gouged a hole through the bedroom wall straight through to the crawl space.

We mounted the camera and loaded in infrared film. The floor swivel gave us wiggle room within the static frame. We cocooned the crawl space. We tacked on acoustical baffling as a sound muffler. I fixed a two-way mirror to the interior-bedroom wall. The camera lens peeped straight through to the bed. Specially tinted glass served to magnify the action. Liz and Bo would expand in big-screen Fuck-O-Scope.

We worked. I shitworked and brainworked. I talked to Jane Russell this morning. I laid out the Sex Creep deal and Monroe's "declension of fan crushes" theory. Miss Russell said this:

Something like that happened to her. It was '51. She was on The Las Vegas Story in Vegas. Somebody tossed her suite at the Flamingo. The furniture was dumped and rearranged. She got a mash note in the mail. The dink pasted magazine letters to coarse paper backing. It expressed his deep love. It admonished her not to go the Carole Landis route.

Jane Russell indicts the Sex Creep. It's a good lead. Here's my backup revelation:

"Declension of fan crushes." Purportedly Marilyn Monroe's concept. She shared it with Timmy Berlin, circa '54.

Marilyn Monroe wasn't smart enough to concoct it. She wasn't prescient. She lacked the brain cells to ascribe the concept to Landis and Russell. The Sex Creep did not creep Monroe's divorcée surrogates until 1961. He did not creep Monroe's new digs until 1962. "Declension of fan crushes" is pure de River–speak. That means this:

Monroe bopped with and gassed on de River. The initial relationship was brief or sustained. It commenced in 1954 and resurrected this year.

Natasha Lytess. She's jungled up with Doctor Paul. The Doc palsied when I mentioned her name. She injected Monroe with collagen. It augmented her big-girl immersions. She abetted the kidnap gang. Marilyn debuted her obese self at political demonstrations. LAPD footage exists. "Declension of fan crushes." It was Paul de River's mid-'50s construction. It might mean that he knew or knew of the Sex Creep years before the Creep's divorcée break-ins and Marilyn Monroe's late-in-life transit of criminal behavior.

We finished up the hot-wire job. We cleaned up and spot-checked our mess. We packed up our gear and showered in Bo's bathrooms. We put on clean clothes.

The haul-debris-out job took two hours. Monroe/Lytess/de River. I was still shaking inside.

I drove back to Intel. I wanted to screen more Monroe surveillance film. Her immersions. Let's track them backward. The collagen injections. Let's ascribe a time frame to the Monroe–de River bond.

The squadroom bustled. Preston Fong scanned mug books. The Hats and J. T. Meadows chatted up false confessors. The Mirror series drew creepy crawlers. The West L.A. squad interviewed the first wave. The second wave engulfed them. Intel caught the overflow. I scanned faces. None of these guys was tall and blond. None fit the thirty-to-forty age profile.

I ducked into the film vault/projection room. I pulled Nat and Phil off their Manny Salas stakeout and told them to poll high school coeds. Make the rounds. Hit Pali High, Santa Monica High, University and Hamilton High. Secure the gist of Officer Sid Leffler. Nat called me an hour back. Dig: Sid was pawing half the girls on the SaMo pep squad.

I hit the AC switch and cooled the room off. I troubleshot the projector and scoped the reels and feeder housing. I checked wall clipboards. Monroe had her own dated index. I caught something, straight off.

The film-can list. Always thirty-two single-spaced pages. It's down to fourteen now. The Monroe shelves were half-depleted.

I saw a penciled-in addition. "Muslim protest footage/outside PAB/4/30/62." It was the Hoffa-op time frame. That tweaked me. I recalled my daily work sheets. Monroe was not spot-tailed that day.

I orbed shelves and found the film can. I removed the reel and coiled it on the spool. I secured the splice and doused the room lights. Let there be film.

It was black and white. There's Los Angeles Street and the PAB, full-on. The shot fed me the approximate numbers. That's two hundred picket punks on the sidewalk. There's no sound. The geeks jab picket signs. The camera zooms in. They shout and gesticulate. It's uncanny. Wide-open mouths make no noise.

The camera scanned, north to south. I read signs: FREEDOM NOW!/ F——— THE FUZZ!/BLUE FASCISM MUST GO! I read faces. Beatniks, colored priests and nuns, college kids on a lark. I squinted. I trolled for obese shapes. I saw three porky men and—

I recognized a floral muumuu. I'd seen it in her bedroom closet. It's her. She's done up Big-Girl-Plus. She's jabbing a F——— THE FUZZ placard. She's been injected. Her face shows it, plain.

She's walking toward a man. He's tall. He's wearing biz attire. He's not a protest type. He's got no grievance and no sign. He's limping. It's a slight hitch-and-walk limp. It's a left-leg limp. Marilyn hugs the man and talks to the man. It's Motel Mike Bayless.

Man Camera. Boomerang cut. We're back at 8/4/62.

Marilyn's dead. I enter her house. I note the mashed-down carpet impressions and photograph them. Ray Pinker does a walking portrait. The man's 6'1"/190/big feet/slight left-leg limp. That's Motel Mike, definitive. He's chatting up Marilyn, 4/30/62. He's in her pad the night she died, 8/4/62.

Kwan's was cave-dweller cool and underlit. I killed two hours there. I sipped ginger ale and doodled. I scrawled names and drew connecting arrows. I drew question marks beside them. I did not extrapolate, assume, or surmise. I got out and walked back to the PAB. I saw a Fed sedan parked at the curb.

Eddie Chacõn stood beside it. He waved me over and cracked the back door. I slid inside. Ratfuck Bobby passed me an envelope.

"It's a Federal grand-jury subpoena for Juan Manuel Salas. I'm going forth with your brainstorm, but I'm not ready to impanel the jury yet."

I sniffed the envelope. It smelled good. Opportunity is love.

"Max Herman and I will pick up Salas, within the next few days. We'll lean on him and debrief him."

Ratfuck rolled a cigar. "I would expect no less of you."

I said, "The Aadland brothers crowded me last night. They told me to desist, offered me money, warned me off the lot, and said Jimmy would very much appreciate my compliance. I told them no."

Ratfuck lit the cigar. "You have my word that I will not seek indictments on you and your men for the Hoffa op. I'm setting other traps for Jimmy, and they do not include his Monroe incursion. Additionally, I've told Miller Leavy not to take action on you and the Hats for your misadventure with Richard Danforth."

I said, "Thank you, sir."

The AG passed me a cigar. "What else do you need, as of right now?"

"I need Eddie for a black-bag job on Paul de River. He's eyeball-deep in this whole thing."

"How close are you, as of right now?"

"You and Jack are squeaky-clean. The Sex Creep killed Marilyn Monroe. That's the official version. The American public will eat it up. Piddling versions of desperate phone calls and White House adultery don't stand a chance."

Ratfuck blew smoke in my face. I stepped out of the car.

The missing Monroe footage gored me. I walked straight to Daryl Gates' office. Gates pointed to a chair. I sat down and eased the door shut.

"The Monroe film-can index has been reduced, at least 50%. I need to know what you know."

Gates moved his in-tray and dropped his feet on his desk. He dipped his chair and laced his hands behind his back.

"It's a cash trade with the Sheriff's. Pete Pitchess wants his department covered if this whole Monroe publicity craze extends, and if Morty Bendish's series fizzles out, and the public starts getting an itch for new answers. Pete wants his department to be the one to leak the word on Monroe as a Commie, so that he can buff his anti-Red credentials and look like he was wise to Marilyn's subversive shit from the gate."

I said, "I get it—but there's more."

Gates said, "There is, but let me start with a disclaimer. I will not in any way seek to circumvent the Chief's FBI-boss deal, or the PD's suborning of your Monroe-Kennedy incursion. That said, I'm backing Pitchess for the FBI-boss job."

I flinched. For one half second. The gestalt hit me then.

Gates sighed. "Bill Parker is losing it. I don't think he'll last much longer. The booze, the bum ticker, the way he blew the Muslim deal, the way he keeps shooting his mouth off. I don't think he'll live until Jack Kennedy's reelection. To top it off, Sam Yorty's gunning for him now. The Chief ordered Intel to shoot surveillance footage of Mayor Sam in plain sight. He'll step on his dick once too often, and Sam's promised me his job if the Chief dies, or gets the FBI nod, or does something so egregious that the City Council votes to can him."

I crossed myself. Bill Parker, double-dealt. Bill Parker, self-complicit. Bill Parker—I owed him and honored him—which Gates damn well fucking knew.

"I want you to keep quiet about this."

Gates said, "Okay."

"The Hats and me. We need to put the boots to Sid Leffler. He's dirty up the ying-yang."

Gates said, "Okay."

"When the time's right, I want Pete Pitchess to deliver Mike Bayless into LAPD custody."

Gates said, "Okay—but what do we get out of all this?"

I lit a cigarette. "Bobby K. pledged a no-file on my Hoffa op. He told Miller Leavy to desist on Richie Danforth. He's going with my grand-jury proposal. The sealed testimony, the whole deal. We're going to bury all of it."

Gates clap-clapped. "That's nothing but good news. But it rather implies that Jack and Bobby are dirty within the All Of It, because the Kennedys only look after themselves."

53

(LOS ANGELES, 10:03 P.M., SUNDAY, 9/16/62)

The crawl space broiled. Bernie and I worked in our skivvies. Bo and Liz dined at La Scala. Bo dialed his home phone ten minutes back. It rang three times. That meant We're on our way.

He memorized his script. He knows what to dig for. We're filming it in Fuck-O-Scope. The camera's packed with infrared and aimed at the bed. The two-way mirror enhances the picture. We've checked the mike feeds five times. We're on go, go, go.

It's fifteen minutes to blastoff. The kids are en route. Beverly Hills to Hollywood. Thin Sunday-night traffic. Beverly to Rossmore and north. Bo drives fast—he's got a '61 Vette.

Bernie said, "Oy." We couldn't smoke. We dripped sweat on the camera box and tripod.

I heard the front door creak. I heard keys jiggle. I heard clump, clump, clump, clump. They've kicked off their shoes. The microphones magnified sound. A hallway light hit the bedroom doorway. I checked the viewfinder. The camera field glowed pink-red.

Bo: "I can't believe this is happening."

Liz: "Relax, doll. It's Camelot, or haven't you heard? We've got a license to swing."

They entered the bedroom. Zippers skreeked. Foot scuffs approached the bed. They've entered the frame. Bo turned on a nightstand light. It clarified the pink-red. Bernie adjusted the zoom lens. Their star faces popped—identifiable-plus.

They full-body clinched. They stood by the bed and peeled. They're in the buff. They tumble. Bedsprings creak-creak.

Bernie dethrottled the lens. He framed a full-bed shot. They foreplayed on a tufted duvet. They moaned and said stupid shit like "Fuck" and "Oh, baby." The foreplay protracted. It was all pink-red legs, backs, breasts, and asses. Bernie jiggled the lens upward. He nailed key facial footage.

The Oh, baby's escalated. There's the missionary capture. The *Fuck*s and Oh, baby's garbled, pitched, and went monotone. The mattress creaked in sync. I timed the ride off my wristwatch. It ran seventeen minutes and fourteen seconds.

Silence. Liz lights a cigarette. The smoke plumes pink-red. They're supine now. They mime the French Nouvelle Vague. It's the postfuck languor shot.

Liz re-sparks. She motormouths. It's defamatory small talk. Richard Burton's hung like a light switch. He never washes it. Joe Mankiewicz is a crypto fag. Lassie's replacing her in the role of Cleopatra. Really, cupcake—it's that big a dog.

Grab the opening, numbnuts—she just tossed you one.

Bo: "I know Fox is in the shit, and that there's rumors floating around. Fox has turned into a real hornet's nest, what with all the vice and money-crime stuff that's supposedly happening. See, the people there are trying to protect themselves and build nest eggs in case Fox goes in the tank."

Liz: "Yep, and 'vice' doesn't even begin to describe it. How's this sound? Two-week wife-swap parties in Jamaica, with cheap charter flights piloted by unlicensed pilots. It's called 'Fox Tail Airlines,' because you've got all-nude stewardesses who wear these fake fox tails, so you can pull them when you want more cocktails or more peanuts. If that's not your scene, how about boy's-night-out weekends in Tijuana, with visits to the Chicago Club to catch the donkey show, plus all the pills you can gobble, and Mexican State Police escorts all the way. Also, you've got to gas this. The guy who put all this together is a hunky Mexican cat named José Bolaños, who is not only a Communist but was the late Marilyn Monroe's lover."

Bo: "Wow. Marilyn Monroe's lover, huh?"

Liz: "Es la verdad, cupcake. José's a piece of work. He's allegedly mob-connected, here in the States. As in, Jimmy Hoffa and the Aadland brothers, who still have some clout at Fox."

Bo: "Wow. Marilyn Monroe, huh? She had a thing with this beaner, José?"

Liz: "Roddy McDowall spilled the dish to me. Marilyn was José's slave. She ran heroin in and out of Mexico for him, in disguise yet—with fake passports, the whole megillah."

Bo: "I've always heard Marilyn wasn't that bright. She must have had help with the documents and disguises."

Go, Bo, go! You've got Motormouth Liz primed to talk!

Liz: "You hit it on the head, doll. Marilyn always had a coterie of sycophants, brown-nosers, and quacks calling the shots for her, and telling her she was a genius. She was hooked on this quack shrink, who palled with this dyke drama coach of hers, and they shot her up with collagen, to pudge her up in the face. She moved into a house near Marilyn, to coach her. I swear it's all true! Marilyn told Roddy, and Roddy told me!"

It's confirmed. Doc de River and Natasha Lytess—all jungled up.

Bo: "Wow. This Roddy guy sounds like a sketch."

Liz: "I love Roddy. We were kiddie stars together, way back when. He got shafted on Cleopatra, but now he's getting his revenge. The A brothers are financing a series of gay smut films that Roddy's directing. And, dig—they're all Cleopatra-themed, with costumes from the actual film!"

Bo: "Wow. All this studio-scam stuff sure is interesting."

Liz: "How's this? This accountant at Fox—he's actually an Aadland—is planning guided sex tours to Haiti and the Dominican Republic. The A boys have got connections with the dictators down there, so everything is safe, and chaperoned by the Tonton Macoute and Dominican State Police goons."

Bo: "Wow. What about this bearer-bond racket I've been hearing about?"

Liz: "It's all true! This hack actress, Gwen something, knows forgers who concoct consecutive-number bonds that look like the real thing, and they don't get found out until later, when the stupes try to cash them in. It's crazy! I bought two bonds, just for kicks."

Bo: "Wow. These guys the A brothers have supposedly deep roots at Fox. I'm an East Coast guy, so hoods have always intrigued me."

Liz: "They go back to the '30s at Fox. If it's illegal, they're entrenched in it."

Bo: "They've got a cousin who's legit, though. He used to be my Uncle Sol's doctor, back in the '40s. Shelley Mandel. My dad said he was a mensch."

Liz: "Dr. Shel was as bent as bent gets. The Fed Narcotics Bureau has been monitoring him since the late '40s, for supposedly peddling illegal penicillin, when, in fact, he was giving it away to all these call girls he was obsessed with, and to these hard-nosed Israeli guys. He did his bit during the big VD epidemic, and, boy, did he ever overprescribe! I got my first Benzedrine and Demerol from Shel."

Bo: "He sounds like a swinger. What's he doing now?"

Liz: "He's a recluse. He's hiding out at some sort of chemical lab at the beach. The BNDD keeps track of him, sort of halfheartedly."

Bo: "He must have swung too hard for too long."

Liz: “Shel was a Renaissance cat, and he was tight with the A boys. They owned a string of fuck pads back in the ’30s, and Shel bought the one in West L.A. off of them after the war. Here’s something wild. Roddy took me to it, when I was something like sixteen. Anything goes, cupcake. I couldn’t believe my young virgin eyes. It must have been the summer of ’48, because Carole Landis was seen at the place right before she suicided.”

Tilt/bingo/three-cherry jack—

Bo: “You and Roddy were both pretty young then, and that fuck pad sounds like a pretty rough place. I hope you had someone who knew the ropes showing you around.”

Liz: “We had two storm troopers for escorts. Real Gestapo types. A motorcycle cop named Norm Krause, and a younger guy named Jack Clemmons, who’d applied to the LAPD. You want to hear something ironic? He was the cop who caught the dead-body call on Marilyn Monroe!”

Bo: “Wow. That is some ironic shit.”

PART 9

BLACK BAG

(SEPTEMBER 17–28, 1962)

54

(LOS ANGELES, 1:06 A.M., MONDAY, 9/17/62)

Late stakeout.

I was banned. I had no Fox-lot access. I parked outside the north parking slots and peeped in.

It was late. Roddy worked late. His ’54 Skylark stood by itself. He worked in Soundstage #22. Wide-open doors let light out and cool air in.

Roddy had all-lot access. The A boys pulled strings. Roddy worked for them now. Roddy, the smut-film kingpin.

Roddy knew the score. I paid hot bread for hot tattle. We’ve trekked that road before. I knew his MO. The bars closed at 2:00. He’d leave soon or work all night.

He rolled at 1:12. He padlocked Stage 22 and remote-controlled the north gate. I rolled right behind him. He shagged the Skylark. He cut to Olympic eastbound and north on Crescent Heights. I was right behind. Roddy’s got a yen. It’s the Jaguar or the Tradesman tonight.

I drop-tailed him. I laid back and kept my headlights short of his back bumper. He cut east on Santa Monica and U-turned up to the Jag.

The Jag was rough trade. Roddy jumped out of his sled and into the perv pit. I ticked seconds off my wristwatch and followed him in.

It was old movie night. A bedsheet served as a screen. The projector ran off track. Grainy footage and German voices revealed the plot. It’s a Nazi bunkhouse flick. Fritzie types strutted in jockstraps and peeled from there.

The boys wore pajamas and lounged on sleeping bags. Slumber party—the humps would ogle and hoot until noon.

Roddy stood at the bar. He saw me and three-syllable groaned. He rubbed his fingers and went So? I said, “Lots.” He hooked my front belt loops and bitch-led me out to the alley.

The temperature dropped. We leaned against an old VDub and lit cigarettes.

"I want to invest in your Cleo-spoof series. If the Aadland brothers are investing, it must be a high-yield deal."

Roddy sighed. "Who told you? Which hunky centurion did you extort the information from?"

I said, "Liz Taylor told me."

"That fat twat. I rue the time I've put into her, lo these many years."

I pulled out my flash roll. I peeled off twenty C-notes and fanned them. Roddy crunched my hands and pried the bills loose.

He said, "For starters, you realize. I'm taking Dirty Cleo Productions public, but I'm giving you this early investment opportunity, in light of our long and collegial relationship."

I tossed my cigarette. "Lay it out. You were showing Liz around some local hot spots, circa '48. I need to know how Carole Landis and Shelley Mandel might fit in. Follow my lead here. Fuck pads, fuck decks, two cop escorts named Norm Krause and Jack Clemmons, and two call girls named Monroe and Perloff in the vicinity, house-sitting for Carole Landis, who's in some sort of final tailspin."

Dirty Roddy. He stuck a hand in my pants pocket and removed my cigarettes. He lit up and blew high smoke rings.

"Carole was desperate, sad, and wild to the core. How many times can one marry without glimpsing the essential emptiness of the act? She posed for a deck with the prodigious 'Captain Hook.' He was a smut legend of the postwar era. It was shot at Shelley's fuck pad on the Palisades-Brentwood border, although I can't recall the look of the house, or the address. Orson Welles manned the camera. There's one for cinéastes, worldwide. I retained a copy of the deck, for my investment portfolio."

I said, "More on Landis. Chop, chop—you're stringing this out."

"Reminiscence is an art, and I refuse to be rushed. But I will work toward brevity here."

"Roddy…"

"All right. Carole was on her fourth husband, and concurrently in love with Rex Harrison, and a Junior League type. She was always falling in love and always trying to live straight—but she always went for the momentary thrill every time she got bored, like so many of us. Krause and Clemmons? They chaperoned studio biggies and visiting-L.A. notables on junkets to gay bars, drag balls, black-and-white tryst spots, fuck pads, dope dens, and the live-sex pits down in T.J. Krause had an in with Chief Worton—the interim man between C. B. Horrall and your pal Bill Parker."

I rolled one finger. Come on/I'm paying you/pick up the pace.

"All right. Yes, I knew Marilyn and Gwen house-sat for Carole. Yes, but you have to consider the fact that Gwen was and is nothing but a criminal—so if she was working a house-sit gig, there had to be a money angle somewhere."

A '57 Chrysler rock-rock-rocked on its struts. Four male feet poked out a back window.

I said, "Shelley Mandel."

Roddy shrugged. "I always liked him. I think he got too far embroiled with the Aadlands, and it unnerved him a bit. The last I heard, he had retired to Terry Lux's dry-out farm. He's got his own lab there, and he screws around with microscopes and blood cells."

The Chrysler rocked on overdrive. The bare feet flailed. The S and M flick blared Wagner. The Jaguar boys had taste.

55

(LOS ANGELES, 4:00 P.M., MONDAY, 9/17/62)

Terry Lux. Noted plastic surgeon. His farm had legs. His farm hid out and dried out Nazis on the run and big film folk. Terry cut rich Japanese to look Chinese and saved them from the World War II internment. Terry treated rare diseases and soaked rich stiffs dry. Folks lived at the farm. Terry catered to xenophobes/remittance men/fugitives from government committees.

The farm was gated and patrolled by goons in golf carts. Evil mastiffs abetted them. I turned east off PCH and climbed the Malibu bluffs. A gate guard met me. I'd called ahead. I dropped my name and Hersh Aadland's. It worked. The guard told me to park. It was cart turf the rest of the way.

He wheeled me through a bulb-lit tunnel. We went under PCH. Car traffic hummed four feet above us. We exited on the beach side. We hit a paved road and passed two guard huts. I saw bungalows up ahead.

We passed them. I was antsy. Lois gave me a reel of Twist Party Stakeout. "Second-unit director" Sid Leffler shot it. I projector-screened it at Intel.

It was sound-dubbed. Pali High girls gyrated to the beat of the "Twist Subversives." They wore low-slung bikinis. They dirty-dogged it through the "Sexaholic Twist." Lois said Sid wrote the song. Lowell Farr twisted among them. Her bikini top dipped half off.

It gored me. It stutter-looped through my head. It left me unhinged.

Then Gwen called my service. She was peremptory. "Frascati at 8:00."

We blew past the bungalows. We turned down a frontage road shrouded by date palms. I smelled brewed chemicals. I saw two small stucco buildings. Residence and lab. Skulls and crossbones were stenciled on both.

I hopped out. Dr. Shel stood on his porch. He was fifty-five. He was tall, lanky, and sunburned. He wore a lab coat and Bermuda shorts.

I stepped up on the porch. The cart U-turned and brodied off. Dr. Shel said, “Federal or local? I get visitors sometimes.”

I said, “Local.”

“With questions pertaining to?”

“No sore subjects. I know you never sold black-market penicillin. You gave it away to lovely young women, which I laud you for.”

“Don’t forget Israel. I gave most of it to Israel. I’m a son of the diaspora, and my humanitarian efforts for Israel more than compensate for my efforts to woo those ‘lovely young women.’ ”

I smiled. “Israel and women. You’re preaching to the choir here.”

Dr. Shel steered me inside. His front room was beach-motel kitsch. A wood-paneled den opened up behind it.

“You’re not Vice? You’re not going to roust me for conceiving a certain kind of playing card? For once owning a property rather indecorously known as a ‘fuck pad’?”

I torqued him. “No, but I’d like you to give me the address of the place.”

Dr. Shel said, “11868 Pavia Place. It’s an upscale address where some admittedly downscale activities took place.”

Pavia Place crosses Capri Drive. Carole Landis lived on Capri. Riviera CC adjoins Capri. The Landis house and the fuck pad sit one third of a mile apart.

“Hell, Doctor. You were a young buck then. Your good deeds have more than compensated for your indiscretions.”

Dr. Shel showed me into the den. It parodied all dens. The knotty-pine walls. The black-and-white fan glossies. All signed to “Dear Dr. Shelley.” All ascribed thus:

“Thank you for your good work in helping me to overcome the malady too embarrassing to name.”

Identical inscriptions. Familiar faces. Local politicos, film stars and athletes. Many good-looking and anonymous young women.

Along with:

Jeanne Carmen, Lila Leeds, Barbara Payton, Deedee Grenier. No Carole Landis and no Marilyn Monroe.

Dr. Shel laughed. “I told them all to write the same disingenuous and innocuous thing. I hate to see people incriminate themselves.”

I said, “I don’t see Marilyn Monroe or Carole Landis.”

“That’s because they weren’t similarly afflicted.”

I turned and stepped toward the front room. I saw two uninscribed photos. They sat atop a TV set. They were pride-of-place/off-by-themselves.

Robert F. Kennedy and Gwen Perloff. They were in their early twenties then.

"Well. There's our new attorney general, and a very lovely woman. I'm guessing they weren't afflicted, either."

Dr. Shel deadpanned me. I felt All Of It contract and expand.

I slow-cruised Pavia Place and found the house. It was a '20s-vintage Spanish Colonial. It was a hell-bent fuck pad in 1948. It's a square-ass-family home now.

Jungle gyms and water slides cluttered up the lawn. A sign was staked in the frontyard grass. It announced the location shoot of Twist Party Stakeout.

11868 Pavia Place.

Marilyn Monroe sketched this house. She signed the sketch and dated it: 6/22/48.

I arrived at Frascati early. I sat in our booth. In our private nook. I brain-screened the two photographs. I did not ascribe meaning. It would blow all prior meaning sky-high.

I was fried. I worked my cubicle phone for three hours straight. I called Lois and asked her who picked Pavia Place for the Stakeout location. Lois said, "Sid Leffler." I called Morty Bendish and buzzed him per Sid, sotto voce. Morty restressed:

Doc de River feeds Sid all his highbrow cop perceptions. De River fed Sid all his highbrow Sex Creep riffs. Sid and the Doc talk at least once a day.

I called Red Stromwall. Red beefed the fake confessors swarming the PAB. Morty's Mirror series set off an avalanche. Preston Fong's still scanning mug books. The downtown DB logs forty-six books, total.

Harry and Eddie are re-bracing registered sex offenders. J.T.'s steering them through. It's a thankless job. They've cleared these geeks already. It's major-case shitwork at its worst.

I called Del Kinney. I told him to buzz his old pals at the ABC. I want to raid Norm's Nest. It's ultradirty. The Grenier sibs are running badger games out of there. Norm Krause and Jack Clemmons are dirty. They're embroiled in a right-wing-nut group called the White Dog Bund. Del was skeptical. I pulled out the stops and punched him in the heart.

“I’m working angles to pull Gwen out of the shit on the kidnap job, and crunching Krause and Clemmons is one of them.”

Del said, “Okay, Freddy. I’ll try.”

She wore a gray twill suit tonight. Plus new gray hair and new tortoiseshell glasses. I memorized her DMV stats. I was four years, two months, and five days older than her.

I stood up. Our waiter pulled her chair out. He signaled a drinks waiter. He brought the martinis.

We sipped them. We lit cigarettes. I conjured Doc Shel’s photographs.

Gwen said, “I talked to Del a few hours ago. He told me there might be a chance for certain people involved in what you call ‘All Of It’ to walk away clean.”

“I’ll get to it. I had a question first.”

“As to?”

“Your criminal career.”

Gwen crushed her cigarette. “It’s blunt, but I’ll play. I keep a list of criminal offenses, and calculate the exact day the statute of limitations elapses.”

I said, “For instance?”

“For instance, I fingered a house burglary on June 11, 1948. The statute expired on that day, seven years later.”

Landis. The house-sitting job. She indirectly tweaked me.

“Don’t stop there.”

“I set up a payroll heist on February 9, 1950. That’s it for now.”

I leaned close. Our arms brushed. Gwen did not flinch.

“You could waltz on the kidnap job and everything else you’re involved in. That goes for your partners, too—as long as they haven’t crossed some lines that the Feds and Bill Parker can’t live with.”

Gwen leaned close. Our fingers brushed. I stifled a flinch.

“You’re the one who’s crossed the line. With Richard Danforth and Paul Mitchell. I can live with Danforth, but Paul Mitchell’s something else.”

“Why Danforth? What’s your grievance there?”

Gwen said, “I’m not telling you.”

I coughed. “I’ll lay the deal out for you. There’ll be no loopholes and no surprises.”

“Tell me. And tell me why you specified the Feds when you first mentioned it.”

I said, “You were right, at the gate. It’s a buyback deal initiated by Bob Kennedy and Bill Parker—and that includes the Sex Creep buzz in the Mirror. It's all about squelching Marilyn-and-Jack rumors, and your kidnap fiasco, and all the scams at Fox got crammed in, along with my Danforth blunder. The initial plan was to bury all of it with a Federal grand-jury play, secret testimony, blanket immunity, and heavy punitive measures for any and all public exposure of sworn testimony. But—as of right now—I'm thinking the AG will let all the would-be testifiers off with sworn and sealed testimony, and no courtroom appearances."

She did not blink. Not at "Federal." Not at "Bob Kennedy."

Gwen said, "I'll think about it."

I said, "I know a woman. I keep asking her if she loves me. She always says, 'I'll think about it.' "

Gwen not quite smiled. I leaned close.

"I read your sister's file, at Hollywood station. I found a corroborative eyewit statement, and I doubt if Del Kinney's seen it."

"Tell me."

"Two boys were with Mitzi on the bus. They were teasing her. One was about thirteen, the other a bit older."

Gwen stood up. She said, "I'm sure we'll speak again," and walked out.

56

(LOS ANGELES, 9:10 P.M., TUESDAY, 9/18/62)

Leffler was due. Max called him and set up the meet. Phil and Nat submitted briefs. Sid stands accused. We had him for stat rape and coerced oral cop. Nat and Phil turned nineteen complainants. They posited a hundred felony counts. Sid had skeeved westside girls since ’50-something.

The downtown May Company. 10th and Broadway. The rear parking lot. Harry and Eddie picked the spot. Red set up the space.

An abandoned storeroom. Located just inside. One chair and one bright lightbulb. We have some questions, Sid.

We packed palm-weighted sap gloves. Stitched-in buckshot jacked the heft. J. T. Meadows was home with his wife and kids. Or out poking Marcia Davenport. J.T. and Divorcée #1. They got a thang going on.

Leffler showed. He cut in off Broadway and hit his brights. Red yanked the service door up. Leffler idled up. We walked into his lights.

That’s right. It’s five guys. You thought Max came alone.

Red and I worked the door. Leffler went all doe-in-the-headlights. Red pulled him out of his sled. I snatched his belt gun and dumped the shells. He thrashed. I arm-barred him and frog-marched him inside.

Harry kicked the door shut. Eddie cuffed him to the chair. I said, “You’ve got suspect relationships. We’re here to discuss them. You had a long run with the girls, Sid. That’s why we’re going this route.”

Leffler popped sweat. His glasses slid down his nose. We stood over him. Max and Eddie kicked the chair slats. We pulled on our gloves. Leffler pissed his pants. Note the lap lake.

I love-tapped him. Leffler’s head snapped. He bit his lips and drew blood. I double-stuffed my gloves. Buckshot and ball bearings. They doubled the heft.

Max said, “We’re going to run some names by you. You hear the name, you acknowledge it, you tell us what you know. That’s the drill here. Prompt answers will serve to spare you pain.”

I said, “Marilyn Monroe.”

Leffler said, “Dead movie star. Killed by the Sex Creep, if I’m any judge of my brother-in-law’s dramatic designs.”

I cuffed him. His head snapped. The thump induced reverb. Leffler yelped and popped tears.

“No smart answers. You hear a name, you answer one of two ways. You say, ‘I don’t know any more than you do,’ or you say, ‘I have information.’ ”

Leffler went Yes yes yes. “I don’t know anything you don’t know. Come on, she’s Marilyn Monroe.”

I said, “Gwen Perloff?”

Leffler went Yes. “I don’t know any more than you do. I’ve never met her, I’ve never dealt with her on the job, I’ve read about her, and that’s it.”

Red said, “Richard Danforth. Aka ‘Ronnie Dewhurst’ and ‘Rick Dawes.’ ”

“The same answer, you fucking sadists. You’re beating on a brother officer here—and guys like you always pay in the long run.”

I cracked him. Leffler yelped loud. I ripped an eyebrow loose. Blood dripped in his eyes.

Leffler shrieked. “No, no, no. I don’t know.”

Eddie said, “Juan Manuel Salas? Aka ‘El Manny’?”

“I don’t know him. I don’t know any more than you do.”

He blubbered it. He gnawed his lips and stained his mouth red.

I said, “Paul Mitchell Grenier.”

Leffler went Yes yes yes. “Him, I know. But he’s just a punk I’ve seen around the Fox lot. His kid sister Deedee filed a missing-person report on him yesterday. He’s a faigelah, and some sort of fly-by-night.”

Harry said, “Albie Aadland?”

Leffler spit blood and squirmed in his chair. He was tight-cuffed. Cuff ratchets gouged his wrists raw.

“Albie’s a jock-sniffer. He collects tough guys like regular guys collect baseball cards. His idea of kicks is visitor’s day at Chino.”

I said, “You worked guard gigs for the Aadlands in the ’30s and after the war. You were a fuck-pad habitué. Give us something there.”

“What’s to give? It was an ‘anything goes’ scenario. I kept my eyes shut and my head down most of the time.”

Max lit a cigar. “Carole Landis, Shelley Mandel, Norm Krause, and Jack Clemmons. Plus a rackets surge at Fox, right now.”

Leffler coughed. “You dumb bunnies dumped a kidnap suspect, and now there's hell to pay. I can spell buyback as well as the next guy. How long do you think Morty can keep up his jive series before people get bored? Does Der Führer Parker honestly think his deal with Bob Kennedy is anything less than an open secret? He's too old, he's too drunk, his health's in the shit—"

I bitch-slapped him. I split his lips and tore a nostril loose. My glove stitches popped. Buckshot and ball bearings blew wide.

Leffler screeched. That one hurt. He bucked his chair. His legs spasmed.

Eddie said, "High school girls. We've got nineteen complainants. They'll swear out perv-one warrants."

I said, "Lois Nettleton and Lowell Farr told me you've got a type. Lowell said you cherry-picked the cast of your twist-party flick."

Leffler bleat-laughed. A loose tooth dropped in his lap.

"I don't need to grovel for young cooze, and I don't need to break the law. I'm in the Industry, bubi. I've got carte blanche. I always make them crack out some ID. Show me you're legal, kid. I'm a policeman, and I know the law."

I lit a cigarette. "That house on Pavia Place. Why'd you choose it for the film location?"

"It was a fuck pad back in the ice age, but I knew the new owners rented it out for shoots. I'm an auteur. I know my shit. I'm a pro in a world full of amateurs, so—"

Harry cut in. "Paul de River. Give us the drill on that quack."

Leffler spit blood. It hit Harry's shoes. Leffler played kamikaze. He called up punk bravado.

"He's ten times the man, with twenty times the intellect, of all you fascist slugs. We've been tight since before the PD canned him. I feed him all my best file dirt. He pays me twice my salary, and he reveres me."

I gut-punched him. I heard ribs crack. Leffler shrieked.

"This is straight from Lowell Farr. Monroe gave her her fan mail for safekeeping, but you talked her out of it. You said you intended to sell it—so who did you sell it to?"

Leffler coughed. He upchucked two teeth and a slice of his tongue.

"I sold it to her shrink, Ralph Greenson. I didn't even read the letters. My pal Dr. Paul's her radical shrink. He said he didn't even want them. He already knew this Sex Creep guy, and he figured half of the fucking letters were from him."

Sheared ribs pierced his shirt. Dark blood bubbled out.

Looks traveled. The Hats to me and back. He can't take much more.

Let's dump him at Georgia Street.

Max uncuffed him. Harry and Eddie stood him up on his feet. He weaved and puked gastric bile.

Red said, "You're fired. That's straight from Der Führer, himself."

57

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 9/19/62)

The grand jury's impaneled. They're strictly rubber-stamp. They want Manny Salas NOW.

They want "All tools and electrical articles, paraphernalia and electrical devices, as obtained from Mr. Salas' workplace. Plus all articles of electrical gear that might prove efficacious in the practice of illegal surveillance."

Witness warrant/search warrant. Max and I worked for Ratfuck now. Manny always clocked in at 9:15. We sprawled in a prowl sled and skunk-eyed the back door.

The Repair King shop. Brentwood's one and only. San Vicente, right off Bundy. It's a half mile from Fifth Helena. Manny ran the listening post. It's a valid presumption. Manny was the man to squeeze now. He linked Hollygrove '37 to Brentwood now. He was a burglar. Gwen fingered a 459 on 6/11/48. I think Manny did the job.

We surveilled the alley and back door. We covered Manny's parking slot. We were dead-ass exhausted. We cleaned Sid Leffler up and hauled him to Queen of Angels. We fed the intake docs a line of shit per his wounds. I called Customs and the Mex State Police. Ingrid Irmgard remained in custody. Customs agents studied her delivery list and popped six Mex nationals with forged bearer bonds. The Staties APB'd José Bolaños. They ran an all-Baja dragnet. José vaporized. The Staties doubled down and kept looking.

Max dozed. I dozed. Something Leffler said ditzed me awake. Leffler, on Albie Aadland: "His idea of kicks is visitor's day at Chino."

Manny pulled in. He parked two slots down from us. We got out slow and jumped quick. He sensed heat and whirled around. We sandbagged him. I banged his head on the roof ledge. He slumped, knees-first. Max kicked him in the balls and cuffed his hands behind his back. I ran into the shop.

I went through the back door. I crashed the workshop. I ID'd Manny's workspace, easy. He'd tacked Ingrid Irmgard nudie shots above his bench.

A salesman ran up to me. I shoved the warrant at him and shoved him away. I pulled drawers, I dumped drawers, I dumped a tool kit. There's the shit, right—

There.

Bug mounts/condenser mikes/bundled bug loops. Manny hot-wired Fifth Helena. This gear replicates the Monroe house gear. It's a courtroom-valid grab. Ratfuck would cream his jeans.

—

The table, the chairs, the standard see-thru mirror. The Fed setup mimed the LAPD's.

Manny's a federal witness now. He's hanging insouciant. He should evince more fear.

I kicked his toolbox. "It's evidence, Manny. You ran a listening post out of the Repair King basement. You had Marilyn Monroe hot-wired, and I'm wondering why."

Manny scratched his right-arm tattoo: Manny y Ingrid por Vida.

"Everybody wants to get next to Marilyn, right? I was planning to offer her a part in my next picture. It's about my days as a stumblebum welterweight, before I went to TV-repair school and learned a trade."

Max lit a cigar. "Well, you certainly share a history with Marilyn, given that you grew up less than a mile away from Hollygrove. You, Marilyn, Albie, and Paul Mitchell Grenier. You were a tight little clique."

Manny made the jerk-off sign. "So you say. But I say I learned a trade. If I felt like calling Marilyn, I would have done it. I wouldn't have to hot-wire her crib."

I lit a cigarette. "You were in Chino with Grenier. That was in '54 to '56. You were in for 459, and he was in for stat rape. Albie Aadland loved a good Chino visit. I'm guessing he visited you and Paul Mitchell. Can you think of anyone else he visited there?"

"He visited me and Paul Mitchell. That's all I know."

Max drummed the table. "The Monroe wire job. Give us some details."

Manny said, "No comment, and don't think you can phone-book me, because there's that Cubano Fed standing outside the door."

I went tut-tut. "Your girlfriend Ingrid, José Bolaños, bond scams, dope, Mexican runs up the wazoo."

Manny combed his hair. He had killer hair. It was thick and combed straight back. He pulled out a hairnet and tugged it in place. Max haw-haw-hawed.

“Chino. You and Paul Mitchell intersect. Albie comes to visit. Give us a few tidbits.”

Manny patted his pompadour. He wore khakis and a Sir Guy shirt. He dressed classic vato loco.

“Chino was kicks. Me and Paul Mitchell drank pruno and poked sissies. Albie visited us, and soaked up the atmosphere. He got his rocks off talking to psychos and hoods. He was a chickenshit, you dig? He wasn’t evil and committed to wild shit, like his brothers. That’s all you’re getting from me, so don’t bother me with any kidnap shit, Marilyn shit, or Fox-rackets shit, because I don’t know shit, and I wouldn’t roll if I did.”

I sighed. I’m forbearing Uncle Freddy. You’re in a jam, son. I want to help.

“Here’s what we’re dealing with. You, Gwen, Paul Mitchell, Albie, and Motel Mike could waltz. As in, you present sealed testimony before a Federal grand jury, or you depose in writing. You receive total immunity. We’re dealing with a certain level of official embarrassment, and some guys with clout would rather not be embarrassed. But, here’s a rub. There’s burglary all over this thing, and you’re a reformed burglar. So, I’d like you to stretch your memory way back, to before the statute of limitations on some 459’s expired. Comprende? Give us an oldie, so we can tell the jury foreman, ‘See, El Manny knows at least some of the personnel in this mess.’ ”

El Manny combed his eyebrows. Fluorescent lights toasted his hairdo. It melted his Brylcreem.

“Remember that other blondie cooze who killed herself? Carole Landis? It must have been ’48, sometime. Marilyn and Gwen were house-sitting the Carole cooze’s place, and Gwen tipped me to a jewel stash in a wall safe. Okay, I found the combination in a desk drawer, and I clouted the jewels. The cooze never reported the theft, because she was schizzy, and then she killed herself. The punch line is that I found a fuck deck in the safe, but I left it there. It was Carole and this big-dick guy, Captain Hook, doing it in fifty-two variations. Marilyn and Gwen were there, and Marilyn had this enchanted look on her face. She said something like ‘Wow, what a nifty blackmail tool. If you’re willing to pose yourself, if you find the right mark, if you’re willing to wait.’ ”

58

(LOS ANGELES, 1:30 P.M., THURSDAY, 9/20/62)

Greenson met me at his office. I sent a note and requested an interview. I explained why. He responded at once.

I sat in the waiting room. Jack and Jackie beamed up from Vogue. They laid out their summer vacation. Jackie called Biarritz yummy. They had suntans. The grapefruit/amphetamine diet kept them thin. They wore resort clothes c'est bon.

The receptionist buzzed me back. I knew the way. Greenson stood behind his desk. He said "Lieutenant" and gestured to a Saarinen chair. I sat down. He set the clock. The fifty-minute hour clicks in.

"Yes, I did purchase Marilyn's letters. I was tempted to read them, but I resisted the urge. The provenance rather intrigued me—Marilyn to young Lowell to Officer Leffler. But the officer impressed me as an unstable man with an agenda, so I thought it best to burn the letters and be done with it."

I believed him. "Unstable" nails Leffler. Desperate nails him best. He was a big name-dropper. He rivaled Monroe there. He dropped Paul de River's name the most.

I said, "I've spent considerable time on this now, and I've concluded that Marilyn met Paul de River, and that he sought to mold her in the manner of the many psychopaths in his charge."

Greenson tugged at his cuff links. "They met in the early '50s, I believe. Marilyn's orphanage chum, 'Gwen'—a criminal, frankly—introduced her to de River. Over the years—intermittently, at first, and far more pointedly as she unknowingly entered the last stage of her life—Marilyn came to believe that she could take her native acting skills and develop an entirely differentiated persona—in the manner of Gwen, who was very much stronger than she was, and whom Marilyn flat-out idolized. Marilyn divulged very little information as to her new 'criminal metamorphosis,' but she spent great portions of our sessions analyzing Gwen's character, and marveling at how Gwen—who had suffered the same neglect and privations as she had—had emerged as someone resolute, clear-minded, and able to live in the real world with far greater grace than she ever had. And Gwen went after what she wanted with deadly resolve—which Marilyn admired more than anything else.”

The Gwen-Marilyn riff took me back. Dope fiend Marilyn sideswiped me. ’48 to ’62. Fourteen years. Marilyn’s pill habit. She crossed “Norma Jean Baker” off a barb vial in ’48. She crossed “Marilyn Monroe” off a barb vial in ’62. All Of It constellated in ’48. The dumped-pill aspect torqued me. Fourteen years elapsed. Marilyn does now what she did then.

I said, “Doctor, where did Marilyn get the pills that killed her?”

“I don’t know. She took the pills I prescribed her, or she dumped them, as she did with the pills her internist prescribed. She told me that she received pills from her friend Jeanne Carmen, and she followed the same pattern there.”

I kicked it around. My brain gears click, clicked.

59

(LOS ANGELES, 10:20 A.M., FRIDAY, 9/21/62)

Jeanne Carmen. She peddled pills to the L.A. underground and always dealt fair and square. Greenson's office to Jeanne's place—just a ten-minute hop.

I took Wilshire to Doheny and cut north. I replayed the mobile stakeout on Manny Salas.

Red laid it out. The stakeout kicked on last night. The Feds cut Manny loose. He caught a cab. Harry and Eddie tailed him to Albie Aadland's house. They held down surveillance. Albie and Manny burned paper stacks in the backyard bar-b-q pit.

I was restless last night. I perched by the phone and willed Gwen to call. She didn't call. I drove to Frascati and sat in our booth. Gwen did not show.

I talked to Max, an hour back. He said the Creep job slogs on. The RSO's have been cleared. The fake confessors, likewise. Preston Fong's still scanning mug books. Morty's up to part 5 in his series. He awaits Freddy's next phone edit. The record checks have fizzled out, dead.

I parked on Elevado and hopped out. I leapfrogged the stairs and rang Jeanne's bell. She yelled, "It's open!" I let myself in. The living room doubled as a practice tee. Jeanne putted golf balls toward a coffee cup.

"Hi, Freddy. What's shakin', love?"

I said, "Who's got the most extensive collection of fuck decks that you know of?"

Jeanne sunk a long one. "Either Roddy McDowall or Sam Yorty."

"Put aside Greenson and the various doctors that Marilyn might have been blowing. Who can you think of that might have been supplying her with pills?"

Jeanne said, "Santa Claus."

I said, "What?"

Jeanne leaned on her putter. "Some anonymous fan of hers. He leaves her yellow jackets, wherever she's living. That's on New Year's, Easter, Thanksgiving, and her birthday. Marilyn buries them in her garden, wherever she happens to be living, and only digs them up when she's desperate."

I went out the door. Jeanne yelled, "It was too brief, baby!"

I made Fifth Helena in near-record time. I parked behind the house and vaulted the backyard fence. I went straight to the garden and pawed through loose dirt. I pulled out two empty pill vials. They were unmarked. It surprised me. I thought this:

She moved in in March. That's pre-Easter. Her birthday was on 6/1/62.

I dug further. I found six yellow capsules. They resembled Nembutal. They were not manufacturer-marked. I pulled a capsule apart and tasted the medicine. It played off-kilter. I examined the plastic coating. It was hand-stamped "TCS Pharmacy." That played phony.

Trust your instincts. Make the leap. You're on to something here.

The Sex Creep. He's got a lab. He brews his own dope. He's a crazy autodidact. He's a rogue chemist—wild-ass and self-taught.

(NEAR LOS ANGELES, 9:20 A.M., SATURDAY, 9/22/62)

Chino. The soft joint. It housed first-time felons and career deadbeat dads. It's forty miles southeast of L.A. That's out in the scrub hills and gimcrack subdivisions. Dorms replace cellblocks. Wired enclosures replace The Walls. WPA-style buildings flank the grounds.

Admin Building #2 housed a file room. I cut past some picnic tables and found it. I set up the trip yesterday. I talked to a deputy warden and ran down my request. He said he'd pull the Grenier and Salas files.

He checked a visitors index. He said Paul de River never came to Chino. Albert Aadland did. He came with the Friends Service Committee. His visits began in '49. They stopped a heartbeat after Salas and Grenier were granted parole.

I parked beside the building and walked in. A trusty pointed me to the file room. The deputy warden delivered. He fixed me up with a table and chair. It was stacked with folders, pencils, and scratch pads. Plus a thermos/coffee setup.

Files were stacked floor to rafters. They bulged up wall-to-wall shelves. The basement was steam-heated. I took off my suit coat and dug in.

I skimmed visitors logs back to '50. I brought my FI card/RSO list with me. I ran it through the logs and got no matches. Albie visited Chino seventeen times with the Friends Service Committee. Those visits ran from fall '49 to spring '54. Salas arrived in June of '54. Grenier arrived in August. Albie visited them as a "personal friend." His visits ran through to their late '56 paroles.

Albie was here. Salas and Grenier were here. Did the Sex Creep pass through here? Was he locked down here? Did Salas and Grenier know him? Did Albie visit him here?

Nine hundred burglars and sex fiends passed through Chino from the late '40s to '56. The names started with Aquino and ended with Ziegler. The Creep's rare blood type was a now-useless ID device. I'd have to skim nine hundred infirmary files. It would take at least two fucking weeks.

I read through Salas' and Grenier's complaint files. Manny guzzled pruno and beat up hapless inmates. Paul Mitchell bit a dorm queen and made him his bitch.

An old-hand guard drifted by. I poured him a cup of coffee. He said, "Are you the lieutenant that's got that big interest in that strange one Albie A.?"

I nodded. I had paperwork eyestrain. I saw three of everything.

"Well, I've worked Visitors since the war, and I can't name anybody specific that Albie visited, except his pals Grenier and Salas, but I do remember how he was always lugging psych texts around with him, giving the cons little quizzes and taking notes, and acting not at all like the other Quakers did. He was always name-dropping some headshrink named de River. He was sure enthralled by that guy."

I extrapolated. I surmised.

De River. Albie cultivated prospects for de River. HE RECRUITED for de River. He sought out prospects to send on perverted practice runs—

The guard said, "There's one other thing."

"What?"

"I always had Albie pegged for a short eyes. You know, we've got outdoor visiting here, and I'd always see Albie giving little girls these weird looks."

61

(LOS ANGELES, 10:30 P.M., SUNDAY, 9/23/62)

The raid's on.

We mobilized outside Norm's Nest. Del Kinney yanked chains and made the deal GO. Three ABC men packed shotguns. Max and I went with sidearms and saps. Del stood with us. He packed my Ithaca pump. Red, Harry, and Eddie crouched by the back door. Two Sheriff's matrons hunkered in the rear parking lot.

The preraid stakeout concluded. We know who's inside. It's Norm Krause, Jack Clemmons, and Deedee Grenier. That's our target group and no more. Del cued the intrusion. He squawked on a duck-call gizmo—quack, quack, quack.

Let's roll.

Del blew the front door off. He triggered a spread at the center mass and took it down in one go. It slammed hard. It outslammed the shitkicker music on the jukebox. It stunned Norm, Jack, and Deedee. They spilled drinks and toppled their stools at the bar.

We ran in. The matrons grabbed Deedee. She pulled a rat-tail comb and stabbed at their eyes. They kicked her legs and proned her full on the floor. Max and Red grabbed Norm Krause. He played it taciturn and eschewed resistance. I grabbed Jack Clemmons. He carried a belt gun and a flat sap. I frisked him and tossed them behind the bar. Jack feared me. He complied, meek-meek.

It went quick. It was all blunt force and loud affect. Deedee looked straight at me. She said, "I know what you did."

The ABC ran a branch office in Burbank. Muster room/squadroom/sweatboxes/jail.

I sweatboxed Jack Clemmons. Max and Red took Norm Krause. Harry and Eddie handled Deedee Grenier. The matrons hovered and measured Deedee for a strip search.

Jack and I sucked flask juice. I spiked it up. 151/hashish chunks/coca grande from Ingrid I's stash.

"Your relationship with Mike Bayless predated Marilyn Monroe's death. He put you in the sack with Gwen Perloff and extorted you out of the Sheriff's race. Here's my question. Did he tell you to expect an auspicious station call on the night of August 4?"

Jack was a Georgia boy. He knew from home brew. My shit sandbagged him.

"I figured it pertained to the kidnap. Something like a callout. You know, a big roundup to beat the bushes for the girl."

The room was hot. I flicked the AC switch. Cold air flowed.

"The raid was a shuck. It was nothing but your wake-up call. You and Norm get a walk on any stunts you might have pulled recently. I'm only interested in you and Norm, back in '48. You were shepherding bigwigs and film people through the westside dive circuit."

Clemmons sucked jungle juice. "It was Norm's gig, more than mine. I didn't come on the PD until '50. Norm and me had similar political interests, so we became pals. Somebody—maybe on the PD or in the DA's Office, something like that—was worried about naïve movie-biz kids getting in trouble at homo bars, dope dens, fuck pads, and the like, so Norm and me got paid to be escorts."

I sipped juice. My scalp prickled. I reprised Deedee: "I know what you did."

"Were there any other policemen working this sort of gig?"

Clemmons belched. He wore a short-sleeved shirt. His White Dog Bund tattoos gassed me. Evil bull terriers snarled.

"Just Sid Leffler. He'd stop by this fuck pad on Pavia Place, and I knew that he had a history with the place, going back maybe ten or eleven years, because the A brothers and this fool Dr. Shel owned the place, and he always said this particular pad was haunted, but he never said why."

I got chills. They were jungle-juice indigenous. They felt good. You got sweat pops and ice jabs inside one second.

"Tell me about the bigwigs and movie folks you escorted."

Clemmons said, "Well, Orson Welles. He was always taking dirty pictures and shooting dirty movies, and you had Sam Yorty, back when he was a congressman. He collected these smutty decks of playing cards, and I think Welles was the guy who took the pictures."

I lit a cigarette. "Roddy McDowall and Elizabeth Taylor?"

Clemmons shrugged. "I'm not sure. I was usually zonked, so a lot of that time was a blur. Ask Norm. He's got a better memory than me."

Clemmons waltzed. Krause replaced him. He knew from jungle juice. He took measured pops and licked his lips.

“Jack said you asked him about Liz Taylor and Roddy McDowall. Okay, we showed them around. So what? Why are you so hipped on all this ancient history?”

“You caught the state comptroller, Tom Kuchel, blowing a young kid. That was in ’49. You tried to extort Kuchel, after the station captain kicked the beef. Somehow, you walked on Extortion One. I think you must have had a favor on the books, with a ranking PD man or a heavy politician. Why don’t you elaborate on that?”

Krause wiped his face. He sweated up his handkerchief. He had cold blue eyes. They put out fifty thousand volts.

“I did favors for Chief Horrall, before the grand jury sacked him. I did some favors when Bill Worton came in. I pulled a couple of wheels out of the shit in the summer of ’48, and Worton remembered that when I stepped in the shit with Kuchel. And that’s all I’m giving you, you A-rab piece of shit.”

—

The raid was a bust. Krause was intransigent. Clemmons was addled and aphasic. Deedee got kicked out early. She ambled off somewhere.

I walked through the ABC lot. I was fried. It was 2:16 a.m.

Something jumped out behind me. Something pounded my back. Somebody jabbed a lit cigarette in my face. I heard “You killed my brother”/“It has to be you”/“Your goons tailed me”/“Who else could it be”/“You killed my—”

It was Deedee. She jabbed the cigarette. She missed my eyes and scorched my neck. She clawed my back. She raked through my shirt and drew blood. I tried to grab her, she pulled away, I caught her hair and slammed her against a parked car. She cracked then. She just sat there and sobbed.

62

Frascati.

Gwen didn't call me. I'm here anyway. I got dressed up to eat alone. People used to run from me here. They thought I bugged the tables. Illicit lovers saw me here. They split in opposite directions.

I messed with the bread basket and chained cigarettes. I teethed on Pat's diary and her now-empty house.

Her '45 to '51 diary. That means summer '48. She surely mentions her siblings. The Kennedys are tight-knit.

The house is empty. Pat, Peter, and the help are down in Laguna. It's an easy B and E. I've done it before.

Gwen walked up. She dodged the headwaiter and made tracks to me. She wore a russet-flecked suit.

"I forgot to call. I just assumed you'd be here."

I smiled. A waiter brought two martinis. I tried for a comeback and faltered.

"You've been frightening some friends of mine."

I said, "It's a walk-away for all of you—unless Parker, Leavy, and the AG learn something about you kids they can't live with."

I dropped "AG" to tweak her. She did not tweak.

"I'm more circumspect than the 'other kids.' And I can't vouch for their criminal activities as far back as you seem to be probing. And I still have a hard time picturing you as a front man for such powerful figures."

I said, "We're united in common cause. I'm out to dodge indictments and spare them embarrassment. Buyback deals always play out along these lines."

Gwen sipped her drink. "Without admitting any sort of active complicity or complicitous knowledge, how will the alleged vice and financial crimes allegedly conceived at Fox be legally dealt with?"

I lit a cigarette. "Through cease-and-desist orders, issued by local, state, and Federal agencies, under threat of a studio-wide internal audit, and individual IRS audits on all the conspirators involved."

Gwen lit a cigarette. "It unnerves me that you're looking into my sister's death."

"We're dealing with convergences. 1937. Your sister disappears, and you meet the kids at Hollygrove. And I've learned some things that I kick around while I wait for you to get off the dime and tell me what they all mean."

Gwen said, "Not just yet."

I said, "Tell me about Hard Luck Girl."

"There's nothing to tell. I wrote a crummy script, I'm a crummy actress, and I broke it off with Darryl, so he pulled the plug on it. I'm really just a bait girl emeritus who's considering her options, so if you have any ideas, please let me know."

I touched her arm. "Sit still and let me put some things together."

The house smelled different. Her suite smelled different. Her closet smelled like cedar blocks rescented or replaced. The diaries were here. Pat said they were. I didn't see them out in plain sight. B and E is tactile and olfactory. Scent enhances color. It spurs my efforts to work in the dark.

Seven volumes. 1945 to 1951. Red leather-bound. She kept our V-J Day photo here. Why aren't the diaries here?

I smelled boot polish. I smelled it on the floor and on the boot mats. That particular scent belonged. I tweaked and caught a subscent. An antiqued polish scent. I reached behind the boot mats and pulled volume one out.

There it is. The red leather has been polished and buffed. Pat spine-marked it: "P.K., 1945."

I penlight-flashed pages. January 1 to August 15 were totally blank. She began the diary the day she met me. She drew a circle around "Marine MSGT F.O." She's an aging bubblegummer with a pricey Mont Blanc pen. Twelve lines of X's and O's followed. They indicated our two days. They stopped at my LAPD Academy address and the recruit-line phone number.

I flashed more blank pages. I put volume one aside. I reached blind and pulled out volume four. It was spine-marked "P.K., 1948."

I bit down on my penlight. I skim-read one hundred pages on Jack's second congressional run. January, February, March, April, May. "Jack seems to be spending a good deal of time in L.A." We're into late June ’48 now. Pat writes: “Where’s Jack? Mother and Dad are worried.”

I flashed into July. I hit 7/3/48. Pat writes, “Bobby. Abrupt flight to L.A.” 7/3/48, again. Pat writes, “Reserve airport car.” I hit 7/5 and 7/6/48. Pat writes, “Chief Worton helpful with escorts” and “Bobby says considerable pain.”

I wasn’t shocked or surprised. I’d seen Shelley Mandel’s Wall of Shame.

63

(LOS ANGELES, 11:10 A.M., TUESDAY, 9/25/62)

Ratfuck Bobby said, “Good morning, Lieutenant.”

I stood up. “Good morning, sir.”

Eddie Chacõn called me in, impromptu. He said the boss needs ten minutes. Go to the U.S. Attorney’s Office. Camelot beckons. You must be punctual. The Kennedys demand that.

Bobby went Sit. I perched on a schoolboy chair. Bobby sprawled in the U.S. Attorney’s recliner.

I notched phone time this morning. I badgered airline and rent-a-car drones. They gave up their summer ’48 flights and airport rentals. I’m 76.8% sure now.

Ratfuck said, “I’ve given it a good deal of thought. I’ve read through your summaries, and I’ve decided to go with sealed depositions and sworn-secrecy documents.”

I’m 83.4% sure now.

“Yes, sir. I think that’s prudent.”

“Eddie’s wondering if you’ve picked a date to get your black bags together.”

I said, “Tomorrow night, sir.”

“Good. I’ll tell Eddie. Oh, and while I have you. I’m hosting a dinner for some State Assembly people. I need to reserve a nicely cloistered room in a restaurant. I’m thinking of Beverly Hills, say at 7:30. Can you recommend a place?”

I said, “You can’t beat Frascati, on Wilshire. I know a guy there. He’ll set it up.”

It was a dumb kid play. Their paths won’t cross. I sat in Frascati anyway. Gwen did not propose a meet with me. She might or might not show. The AG runs punctual. It’s kismet or it’s not.

I eyeballed the front door. I sipped Old Crow and snarfed Dexedrine. I spent the afternoon sacked out with Lois. She asked me who burned my neck. I said, "An angry lesbian golf pro."

Lois said, "Why?"

I said, "She thought I killed her brother."

Lois said, "Did you?"

I said, "Yes."

Lois went whoops. Lois recovered quick.

"Bobby told Pat to dump you, and she told me. He said people have started talking. Your expiration date has come and gone, and now's the time to cut it off."

I said, "I'm sure you'll stay friends with her. And, for what it's worth, she was never you."

Lois squeezed my hand. "Do you love me?"

I said, "I'll think about it."

Pat, Lois, Gwen. They're my un-Holy Trinity.

I watched the door. The headwaiter inked the reservation for 7:30 sharp. It was 7:28 now.

The front door opened and closed. The AG walked in. He slouched and tried to appear anonymous. People checked him out sidelong and tried not to stare.

I saw him. He didn't see me. I planned it that way.

Gwen walked in.

She saw Bobby. He saw her. They held This Look. Their hands reached out and brushed. It was brief but emphatic. I saw it. Nobody else did.

64

(LOS ANGELES, 11:30 P.M., WEDNESDAY, 9/26/62)

Black-bag job.

We crouched in a Fed surveillance van. We deployed sign language and ran checklists.

Ten days presurveillance. Check. De River leaves his office at six sharp. Check. There's no on-premises guard. Check. The address is not silent alarm–rigged. It does not plug to Hollywood Station. Phil Irwin confirmed it five times.

Nat and Phil are out cruising the neighborhood. They're two-way radio–equipped. There's no hinky broadcast traffic. They're running wide perimeters. Oakwood to Fountain/La Brea to Fairfax and back.

We parked across the street from de River's building. The downstairs neighbors were off in Saint-Tropez. We ran inventory checks:

Power drills. Crowbars. Dissolving solvent. Wheel-fitted hand trucks. Flashlights. Penlights. Lock picks. Rolls of acoustical padding. Check—eight times over.

Our gear is stashed in reinforced duffel bags. Double-check that.

De River's living room adjoins his file trove. A reinforced door provides access. The file trove is there. His files might be coded. They will be boxed. This will take time.

Eddie brought powdered nitro. He knew how to rig controlled blowouts. De River kept a narco safe. We decided to blow it and split the contents. He planned to donate his cut to the Free Cuba Committee. I planned to stick my cut up my nose.

We hauled the duffel bags out of the van. We quick-marched them across the street and up the steps. We reconnoitered on the second-floor landing. Eddie fumbled picks at the door lock. Shit—none of them fit.

I removed a power drill and jammed in a steel-cutter bit. I bored the keyhole and derailed the inner-lock mechanism. The front door popped open. We blew our undetected-entry shot.

We got in fast. We shut the door. The bore noise ran minimal. We bit down on our penlights. We walked to the steel-plate door and quadrant-flashed it.

It looks impregnable. That's tough fucking shit.

It's two-side milled. On both sides. It pushes in off two fulcrums. There's a left-side hinge and a right-side hinge. It requires two firm shoves.

I took the left. Eddie took the right. We created a noise-deflection shield. We cut strips of acoustical padding and taped them to the flanking walls. We slapped on four full layers. We mummified the file-room enclosure. We went in with power drills and crowbars and took the door down.

It took twenty-seven minutes and twelve left-side and right-side bores. I did not posit an internal alarm system. The files were surely all criminal. De River would never risk police or security-company scrutiny.

The door wiggled.

The door shimmied.

The door caved.

It listed backward. We got behind it and put all our weight up against it. We slow-slow-slow eased it down to the floor.

We're inside the file trove. It's eight feet deep. There's shelves filled with manuscript boxes. They line the walls shoulder-high.

I caught my breath. I said, "Look for a simple number-substitution code." Eddie went Sí—yo comprende.

We hauled down boxes. I checked three for prototype distinctions. The boxes were marked by eight-letter or fourteen-letter designations. That meant "Sessions" or "Correspondence." That meant tape boxes for "Sessions" and envelopes or folders for "Correspondence." Substitution-code numbers would be scrawled above that. They marked the patients' names.

I confirmed my theory. "Sessions" meant tape reels inside. "Correspondence" meant letters or printed matter inside. The boxes were heedlessly marked and stacked. As in "Box 1 of 3, 4, 19, 12" et al.

We hauled down boxes. I looked for seven-number first names and six-number surnames. They would designate "Marilyn Monroe." The M's should be supplanted with two number thirteens. M was the thirteenth letter of the alphabet. Eddie worked the same motif for "Albert Aadland." Six letters, seven letters, two number ones to capitalize.

We hauled down boxes. We went at it. Hours crawled by. I scored four hours and seven minutes in:

"Marilyn Monroe/Sessions/Box 1 of 3." Eddie scored nine minutes later:

"Albert Aadland/Correspondence/Box 1 of 4."

We rounded up our seven-box swag and placed them on hand trucks. We packed our duffel bags. We scoured the apartment. The narcotics safe was tucked behind a sliding wall panel.

Eddie dragged it out. We donned face masks and worked in asbestos gloves. We daubed and brushed liquid nitro at the hinge points and dial backings. We quadruple-wrapped the safe in acoustical baffling and tapped the charge flush against the dial mount. We set the charge and stood back. The door popped. The box lurched. We filled four paper bags with the best shit on earth.

We off-loaded our gear and the file boxes. We made three trips out to the van. We were stone gone at 6:04 a.m.

65

(LOS ANGELES, 8:05 A.M., THURSDAY, 9/27/62)

I worked at home.

Code work vexes me. I studied it in the Marine Corps. It confused me then and confuses me now. I tapped my safe stash and mixed a powdered Demerol and bourbon cocktail. It juked my brain cells and helped me concentrate.

I tried word-replacement and Bible codes and failed to link scriptural texts. There were no live tapes in the Monroe boxes. They were all copied transcriptions. I scanned text pages. I quick-skimmed the Monroe and Aadland boxes. I could not decipher one simple word.

I worked on my living room floor. I compiled proper-noun lists and plucked words that might pop phonetic. It was all word gobbledygook. I could not locate one single name.

We hid the van and our gear in Phil's garage. Nat and Phil were staking out the de River place. They'll be there when Pops spots the chaos. They'll gas on the old geek's response.

I worked up a Bible-verse code. It backfired. Every Old and New Testament verse raked me. They excoriated my sinfulness. They called me to repentance. They prophesied my eternal rot in hell.

The doorbell rang. I got up and cracked the door. It was Max Herman and J. T. Meadows. They were shaky and pale. J.T. weaved on his feet.

Max said, "Lowell Farr's dead. Two patrol guys found her in some bushes. She was dumped in a pocket park, north of Palisades Village. She'd been shot four times."

We took Sunset straight out. I don't remember the drive. I saw gargoyles and heard tape spools of Old Testament injunctions. I saw the living Lowell and Lowell's Monroe painting. They stutter-looped nonstop.

Traffic bottlenecked at the village line. Max pulled up on the north sidewalk and tooted pedestrians off the bricks. We hooked north at the corner and around to the right.

We hit Linda Place. Little benches lined the sidewalk. Shrub mounds pressed up behind them. Cops huddled. Polaroids popped. Overlapped arc lights burned bright. The street was all jammed-up prowl cars. They ran their gumball lights full.

The lights were up, the rope was up, four patrol cops moved looky-loos out. Max and I pushed our way into it. We lodged our first peep. It was close-up and in tight.

Lowell lay supine. She wore a green paisley dress and brown flats. A brown leather handbag was off to one side. Big-bore entrance wounds scorched the green fabric and soaked it black-red.

Twenty cops hovered. J.T. huddled up a canvass crew. Max and I crowded close and studied the scene.

The setting was too quaint. Linda Place was a pocket park and pastoral cut-by. Benches, leaves, eucalyptus trees. A faint sea breeze.

Two patrol guys jabbered. The girl's bag had been tossed. They found a ticket stub for last night's show at the Bay. They ran Sayonara and No Time for Sergeants. Mom and dad were off downtown. They went to Mike Lyman's and the Philharmonic. They got home at 1:00 a.m. Lowell's bedroom door was shut. They figured she was asleep.

Max and I swapped looks. We knew from make-out dates. Pali boys and girls hid out and made out at the Bay. Lowell told Marilyn. I picked it up on my tap feeds. The Bay was "a motel room for nice kids."

Preset make-out dates. Lowell described the scene. She indulged the practice. She confided in Monroe. I eavesdropped on my feed lines.

The Sex Creep killed her. It has to be him. It wasn't Sid Leffler. He's beat-to-shit at Queen of Angels.

Max cleared a space. We stood by the body and bootjacked the job then and there. I dug through Lowell's handbag. I found her car keys. They sat atop a neat pile of purse junk—cosmetics, comb, wallet, hairbrush. The house keys were jammed at the bottom of the bag. The house keys played anomalous. I thought this:

Lowell strolls by Linda Place. The Creep confronts her and shoots her. He dumps her in the bushes. He grabs her house keys and goes to the Farr house. He lets himself in. He wants Monroe's fan letters. He thinks Lowell has them. He doesn't know that Lowell sold the letters to Sid Leffler. He tosses Lowell's bedroom. He doesn't find the letters. He walks back to the dump site and jams the keys back in her handbag.

I caught a glint on Lowell's skirt front. I knelt and up-closed it. I ID'd the glint:

They were spent silencer threads. That meant this. The piece was suppressor-equipped.

I flashed back. I cut to Sid's Pali gig. Morty Bendish costars. The Q and A spawns a Sex Creep brouhaha. Sid and Morty reference a Doc de River paraphrase:

Passive pervs sometimes escalate and kill. IF the crush object develops a real-life love interest or deep friendship. The Creep glimpsed the burgeoning Lowell-Marilyn bond. It sent him batshit.

I said, "All the crazy shit this fucker has pulled, and now he kills a young woman. It's got to be him."

Max said, "Leffler sold Monroe's letters to Doc Greenson, instead of de River. If de River already knew this Sex Creep guy, and if he figured that half of Monroe's letters already came from him, then why buy a stack of pricey letters for no new information?"

—

The squadroom lieutenant showed. He gathered up clue clowns and described his stint at the Farr house. He talked to Lowell's parents. He'd went through Lowell's address book. It was packed with Pali boys' names. Some were marked with hearts and arrows. Lowell's mother ran down the Bay Theater/"make-out date" custom. A neighbor woman fed her the gist. Lowell would never do such a thing.

I shook my head. The lieutenant motormouthed.

"We've set up a command post in the Pali auditorium. Lowell had eleven make-out dates marked in her address book, including the one last night. We need two-man teams to round up those boys and bring them to Pali. We're going to interview them consecutively, in the boys' gym. We'll be working all day and most of the night."

Max said, "It's the Creep. All this horny-boy shit is futile."

I said, "I agree."

Max said, "What do we do now?"

I said, "We go back to what we were doing. We try to ID the Creep."

The canvass cops and squadroom guys dispersed. Morgue jockeys sheet-draped Lowell's gurney. I stood by Lowell and bumped the wheels, accidental-on-purpose. I studied the crime scene. I saw work-boot tracks. I saw mud and blood caught in the heel cleats. The boots were non-LAPD.

The cleat prints tracked off, northbound. They hit clean cement and cut away from Linda Place and the crime scene. They moved due north. They tracked toward Will Rogers Park and the Santa Monica hills.

I saw Bible typeface. I saw my code doodles. I tasted Demerol and bourbon. I saw Lowell shot four times. Homemade suppressors popped and leaked threads. I saw her blood douse the heel prints. It glowed weird colors. It bubbled. It blasphemed Lowell and me. It contradicted the Bible. That meant it was wrong.

I reached into a prowl sled and grabbed a 12-gauge pump. I tracked the boot prints away from the crime scene.

It was easy. I sighted down. Lowell's blood sluiced into more weird colors.

I tracked the prints up a commercial block. I entered the park. The temperature dropped. Trees grew out of nowhere. They looked wrong and smelled wrong. A breeze fluttered branches. The sound echoed shrill. It brought Lowell back to me. I smelled her blood merged with parkland scents.

I jacked a round in the chamber and aimed at the sound. I blasted through the sound, shredded limbs, and mulched tree trunks. Somebody screamed behind me. I whirled and triggered a spread. A man yelled, "Hey!" A man yelled, "What the hell—"

Rustles and foot scuffs came at me. I shotgunned them. Seedling trees vaporized. Four big men slammed into me and hoisted me. They tossed me and carried me over their heads. They went through my pockets. They shoved yellow jackets into my mouth and made me gag them down. I saw Lowell in a paint-smeared smock.

I came to standing up. The Hats crowded around me. Harry and Eddie arm-clamped me. I was weavy and zorched. I thought I saw Lowell. I saw a snapshot of Marilyn and Lowell, propped on an end table.

It was Lowell's bedroom. Print techs dusted scattered envelopes on the floor.

Max said, "It's the Creep. Ray Pinker found ripped glove seams in Lowell's correspondence drawer. That places him at the BHPD 459 scenes, the divorcée scenes, and here. That means he's good for the snuff."

My belt line felt light. The boys snatched my piece, my sap, my knucks. Max said, “You gave us a scare, son.”

I pulled my coat wide. Max replaced my shit. Harry and Eddie walked into the living room and soft-braced the Farrs. Dorothy Farr harped on Lowell’s pretend friendship with Marilyn Monroe. Eddie soft-rebuked her. Lowell was surely Miss Monroe’s best friend during her last months alive.

Dorothy Farr sobbed. I scanned the bedroom. Marilyn sketches covered the walls. I clocked the provenance of the painting that I now owned.

A wall mural depicted President Monroe’s inauguration. It was a cut-and-paste job. Lowell scissored up a big Life spread. She decapitated JFK and glued Monroe’s face atop his. Speech squibs played the mock prez for laughs.

It was sicknik humor. President Monroe lets it all hang out.

She announced her new cabinet. Big Dick Dave will tend to her carnal needs and run the Supreme Court. Peter Lawford will be secretary of poontang. Lois Nettleton will run the National Endowment for the Arts.

Red Stromwall walked in. “We’re due at Pali. Daryl Gates is running the interviews with the make-out boys.”

I was still half-zorched and weavy. Max and Red arm-clamped me and led me outside. They tossed me in the back of their prowl sled. I felt a weeper fit coming on.

The run up Temescal Canyon took five minutes. Eleven boys cluttered up the bleachers off the basketball court. Daryl Gates walked boy to boy and asked polite questions. He knew it was a humbug deal. It was geared to mollify mom and dad.

I sat on a courtside bench and watched. The boys gave me some last moments with Lowell. They extolled her wild-but-good character. She was “kooky,” “wiggy,” and “out of sight.” But she’d always take your paper route at a moment’s notice. “I was afraid to ask her to the prom, because she was so much taller than me.” “She told me all these lies about Marilyn Monroe. I said, ‘Lowell, you’re the world’s worst fibber,’ but I loved her anyway.”

I couldn’t take any more. I bolted the gym and sat up against the back wall. A cold breeze raked me. I shivered. Lowell ran through the parkland with me. I knew she was up in heaven. She came down to make sure I was okay.

I shivered and sobbed. Somebody tossed a handkerchief in my face.

I looked up. Max Herman said, “Stop that shit. Let’s go find him and kill him."

—

I stuck to my pad. I laid off the narco stash. I messed with letter codes, book codes, and word-substitution codes. Lois called me. I ignored the call.

I went back to the Bible. I read through the Old and New Testaments. I looked for code-breaker clues and discovered prayers for Lowell instead.

I screened dance outtakes from Twist Party Stakeout. I did it just to see Lowell alive. I saw Lowell half-clad. It racked me. God censured me. I hurled the projector at the wall.

66

(LOS ANGELES, 11:00 A.M., FRIDAY, 9/28/62)

The Hats plus Freddy O. We indulged a show-the-flag run. It was all out in the open now. We decided to finalize it.

We scheduled a find-the-Creep session at Intel. Gates knew some pro code breakers. I told him to give me one more shot. Give me a last crack at it. I'll jump back to pure brainwork then.

We crammed into a prowl sled. We hit El Manny's pad in Echo Park first. Manny was out. We cut west and drove by Albie Aadland's spread in Cheviot Hills. Albie's boss Mercedes was parked in the driveway.

We got out and posed. Max ran the two-way radio. I goosed the volume. It raised a staticky roar.

Albie walked out. He carried a briefcase. He walked past us and got in his Mercedes. I said, "Albie, it's over."

Motel Mike ate lunch at Kwan's every day. He always dines with good-looking women. Motel Mike and a boss brunette sipped soup at a dining room table. We pulled chairs up. Their nice-lunch vibe crashed. I said, "Mike, it's over."

Mike stood up. He cranked a hard right hand and launched it. Red sidestepped the punch and grabbed Mike's neck. He smashed Mike's face into his soup bowl and held it there. Mike glugged for breath. The brunette snatched her purse and vamoosed.

We waltzed out to the parking lot. Max said, "Let's brace Gwen Perloff."

I said, "I'd rather not."

Harry said, "She's the linchpin of the whole deal."

I hemmed and shuffled my feet. Eddie said, "Freddy's in love."

The Hats plus Freddy O. We shitworked at Intel. J. T. Meadows wedged an extra desk in. The Creep escalates to Murder One. It mandates a reassessment. That means we reread and rediscuss everything.

We were backlogged. Forty nut confessors clogged the hallways. Morty's Creep series soared. The Mirror ballyhooed a new sales spike. "Sex Creep Slays Pali Coed!!! He's Public Menace #1!!!" Nat Denkins was hosting a Creep-O-Rama show on KKXZ tonight.

We huddled up. We shitworked.

J.T. was grouchy. Marcia Davenport was feeding him grief. She wanted J.T. to divorce his wife and marry her. The Hats and I ran a fever. We couldn't see past it. We read informant sheets and double-checked our ordnance. We loaded shotguns with triple-aught buckshot and slugs.

Daryl Gates stepped into my cubicle. He waved a Telex sheet.

"The dining room boss at Riviera just called me. He said he made a mistake about the men he had working the divorcée dance, and he said he realized that he brought this guy in from a temp agency. He's a Charles Douglas Schoendienst, DOB 6/12/23, blond, six-two, and 190. I ran him, and he's got a perv jacket. There's two burglary falls in Utah, a dismissed rape beef up in Santa Clara, and he's AB negative."

I stood up. "Preston's got a motel-room flop on PCH. Let's run this by him and try for a match."

Max, J.T., and I rolled. The beach run took an hour. Sunset was bumper-locked with surf wagons and hitchhiking freaks. They saw the fuzzmobile stuffed with big shorthairs and flipped us off covert.

The Beachglade was up on the land side. It was a horseshoe-shaped auto court, circa '35. Preston bunked in 121. We parked and door-knocked him. He opened up quick.

It went fast then.

I saw the shelves. I saw the watches and the table. I saw the vats and the beakers. I saw the measuring scale and spilled powder. I saw the mock yellow jackets. I saw headlines:

Calling All Rogues Presents Filmland Femme—

I saw Manny Salas. He stepped out of a backroom pissoir.

I pulled my piece. Preston pulled his piece. We stood in tight and felt the air buzz. Max pulled his piece. Preston shot J. T. Meadows. He double-tapped two gut shots and blew out his ribs. I shot Preston in the face and neck. Manny Salas pulled a piece and fired wide of the doorway. Wood chips exploded. Max shot him three times. I shot him four times. We severed his right arm and blew him straight through the rear wall.

PART 10

FUCK DECK

(SEPTEMBER 29–OCTOBER 12, 1962)

67

(LOS ANGELES, 9/29–10/2/62)

Max and me. We did it. We blew up Sex Creep Preston Fong and Manny Salas. Fong killed J. T. Meadows. "THERE'S THREE DEAD IN BEACHFRONT-MOTEL SHOOT-OUT!!!!"

The papers had at it. The Mirror soared out front. Bill Parker fed Morty Bendish prime dirt. The story scorched local and national TV. Adjunct police agencies took it from there.

U.S. and Mexican Customs squads formed a task force. They wrung it dry. They enhanced the breadth of All Of It. They worked off my theories. They supplied the verification that I failed to get.

Preston Fong was not Preston Fong. He was a Chinese-Filipino man named Terry Jay Aquino. I recalled the name Terry Jay Aquino. He was on a paroled-burglar list I saw at Chino. Aquino served time concurrent with Paul Mitchell Grenier and Manny Salas. The guard I talked to at Chino saw Aquino's photo in the Herald. He called me and said, "Albie Aadland visited that guy, as well as Grenier and Salas. Albie visited him most of all."

Aquino split the Philippines in 1943. He was nineteen. He booked to Mexico. He had already earned a chem degree at Polytechnic Institute. Ray Pinker forensic'd Aquino's room at the Beachglade. Ray compared his Nembutal compounds with the "Santa Claus" compounds I dug up in Marilyn Monroe's yard. The bond-componentry was identical.

Terry Jay Aquino committed the Beverly Hills 459's. He partnered up with Rick Dawes/Ronnie Dewhurst/Richard Danforth. The Hats and I killed Dawes/Dewhurst/Danforth. Ray found the ripped-seam rubber gloves that Aquino wore at the Beverly Hills jobs and at all six of the divorcée break-ins. They perfectly matched the print manifests from those crimes. They perfectly matched the ripped-seam prints from Lowell Farr's bedroom and the Bev's Switchboard mailbox.

I read the LAPD file on Manny's dismissed burglary charge in '57. Identical ripped-seam rubber-glove prints were found at the house

Manny was accused of B and E'ing. That meant this:

Terry Jay and El Manny were old B and E partners. It explained Manny's presence at the Beachglade Motel.

Mexican Customs agents state this:

Terry's mother divorced Terry's father in 1945. Terry's father sent Terry's mother obscene notes clipped from magazine pages. Terry watched his father prepare the notes. Terry's father urged him to ejaculate into his mother's lingerie and put a Sex Hex on her. The Sex Hex would assure that Terry and his dad got lots of sex and that Terry's unfaithful mama would die from VD.

Terry purchased "Preston Fong" identification in T.J. It was 1947. He bought the fake ID from Hersh Aadland. That fact strongly suggests this:

Terry Jay Aquino knew Albie Aadland well before his Chino jolt. And well before Albie's prison-visitor work with the Friends Service Committee.

Terry's forged ID included a Mexican passport, driver's license, and Federal ID card. Terry altered his true AB blood type to the far more common O.

"Preston Fong" entered America in late '47. He gravitated to West L.A. and the beach. He caddied at the Hillcrest, Bel Air, and Riviera Country Clubs. He found a permanent caddy home at Riviera, early in '48. Riviera adjoined the home of Carole Landis and the Pavia Place fuck pad.

Preston perved on fine wristwatches. He snatched them from jewelry store windows. He was "suspected" of the jewelry store jobs, and was popped on suspicion in the spring of 1950. He was never arrested or convicted. He carried his old Aquino ID on the odd pad-prowl-just-to-be-there-and-look-around jobs. He got popped in the summer of '54. He was sent to Chino as Terry Jay Aquino. He'd just acquired a California driver's license. It listed his blood type as O positive.

That's Terry Jay Aquino. It's the official cop version. There's also the Albie Aadland-to-Paul de River version. I'm marking it accessible now.

I cracked de River's code and concluded my stint of code transcription. It wasn't difficult. I made it difficult. I castigated myself with biblical screeds. I stepped aside from that self-laceration. I detected a simple number-replacement code and took it from there.

"Albie Aadland Correspondence"/"Marilyn Monroe Sessions." I read the Albie shit first. It was one-way correspondence. The file did not include de River's coded replies.

Albie's letters revealed this:

De River was Albie's intellectual big brother and deranged confessor. De River saw all and condoned all. They shared an urgent curiosity for all things sexual and criminal. Albie was a volitional celibate and a drug-dabbling voluptuary. His brothers got him hooked on rare compounds synthesized and manufactured in Mexico. Hersh knew a Filipino youth, now masquerading as Chinese, under false credentials. The boy had an outré childhood not unlike Albie's own. He compounded drugs. He test-piloted them—just as Albie test-piloted dope for his brothers and for Doctor Paul himself.

Albie's letters were undated. I think de River's Albie file was chronologically arrayed. One letter arrived in the spring of '48. I'm sure of it. In it, Albie asks de River this:

"Is your Filipino-cum-Chinaman a golf caddy? My brothers retain an interest in a fuck pad—and the newly credentialed Chinaman shows up quite a bit. The FP is near the Riviera Club, so I wonder. And, he accurately laid out the synthesis of an amphetamine/opioid pill he popped on the premises. I'm sure he didn't compound the formula, because I know who did. In other words, I find Le Chinois very interesting."

The next run of letters ran banal. Albie gasbagged on the Leopold-Loeb case and the Albert Dyer child murders. He asked, "Are volitional celibates who resist adult female advances more likely to become child molester–killers than other men?"

Two more banal letters followed. Albie was a camp follower. He extolled sex slasher Otto Stephen Wilson and wondered who killed the Black Dahlia. Then, Albie wrote this:

A highly rambling letter about the "Haunted House" his brothers and their doctor cousin shared a percentage of. It started up as a prohibition speakeasy. It catered to the "westside crowd." Albie called the place a "precursor" fuck pad. The place tanked in '38, and resurrected after the war, on the "exact same" westside lot. It drew a "slumming celebrity crowd," "Negro hepcats," "jazz cats," and "anyone with a lively wit, a good line of patter, and the common sense not to stare at the famous faces engaged in what the squarejohn world considers to be contemptible acts."

The letters went banal again. They remained banal for several years. They were all prurient psych ponder and babble. Red Light Bandit Caryl Chessman: "He keeps beating the Green Room." That places the letter in '53 or '54. Aquino/Fong's in Chino now. Now, Albie asks de River terse little questions:

They pertain to "Our Charge." They pertain to "J.R." As in Jane

Russell. They pertain to M.M. As in Guess Who?

The terse questions extend. Albie fawns and queries de River, per:

459 PC/hot and soft prowls. "Our" monitoring process and "your" monitoring process. Albie's BIG question: "Can inner-outer directed psychopaths also be third-party directed?"

I think this:

They got cautious then. They committed nothing to paper. They went to untappable pay-phone communiqués. Just like Marilyn and Gwen. Just like Who Else in '62?

I completed my Albie file read-through. One question tweaked me. How and when did Aquino/Fong meet Dawes/Dewhurst/Danforth—his future B and E partner?

I decided I should start with Gwen Perloff. Thus, it's '37 again. Gwen's almost eleven. She's acting up at her foster home on De Longpre and Wilton. She's shoplifting clothes out of Hollywood shops and selling the threads to Le Conte Junior High kids. It was just a hunch, BUT—

I drove to Le Conte and badged the principal. The man let me peruse the '37–'38 Le Conte yearbooks. And—there he was, at age thirteen.

Roger Alan Denfrey. He's a B-9 Class member. He's one of those good-looking-with-a-mean-streak boys. He'd grow up to be a burglar and a fake-kidnap man.

I killed him. I killed him on a cop-sanctioned whim.

I checked R&I. I checked nationwide police files up the ying-yang. Roger Alan Denfrey. No wants, no warrants, no criminal record. Did Gwen Perloff meet him in 1937? The odds rate overwhelmingly YES.

On to Marilyn. Her coded sessions file delivered. I got verbatim-transcribed Q and A here. The sessions had been tape-recorded and code-transcribed by de River himself. Marilyn consulted him from '52 to mid-'54. De River coined the phrase "declension of fan crushes" at that time. It preceded her coupling with Timmy Berlin and her own attribution of the phrase. De River used Carole Landis as an example of a "neophyte crusher's crush." Marilyn said, "Oh, I knew Carole all right. There's stories I could tell you."

De River bloviated. He cited the great courage it took for creative people to engage the world on its own cruel terms and overcome the self-pampering of the artist. He discussed the importance of disguise, of deliberately denuding one's good looks, of establishing covert means of communication. He cited the Russian theater masters who lived their own versions of cult and criminality under the threat of Stalin's show trials and the head Red's capricious will to slaughter. The perpetration of revisionist art led to official censure, torture, and death. American artists had it soft. Cultivated criminality could work for them—but only if they committed properly bold crimes.

De River excoriated MM. He considered her to be shallow, vain, impetuous, peremptory, whimsical, usurious, and driven by infantile exhibitionism. The only way that she could successfully revise and shape an all-new persona would be for her to go anonymous and cultivate risk in the real world. And revel in the risk of exposure and punishment. Marilyn cited her "bit actress" friend Gwen. She had accomplished just that.

Gwen was Marilyn's age. They shared a room at Hollygrove. Gwen had taken on The Life. They played girl sleuth games at the Grove. Gwen said The Life meant going native. She set up burglary scores and scored bitch-seductress film roles. She comported with burglars, armed robbers, and flimflam men. She started stealing young. Her kid sister had been abducted and certainly snuffed. It induced her to go native.

De River told Marilyn that he already knew Gwen. She had been referred to his Sex Offense Bureau at LAPD. She engaged in group therapy under his direction.

De River was starting to bore Marilyn. De River fixated on the bold Gwen at the expense of the grasping "dim bulb" Marilyn. Marilyn talked up Gwen. She was her alter ego, doppelgänger, and amanuensis. Gwen carried the symbolic and metaphysical weight that Marilyn could not hoist to her own frail shoulders. Why mince words? De River packed a torch for Gwen and wrote off Marilyn as "stale goods." She emitted a stale stench of desperate fear and put her own artistic success above all moral considerations. She could not inhabit any role other than the role of herself, at the risk of grave psychic peril. Marilyn's first shot at radical therapy pooped out. She reconvened with de River earlier this year. She said she'd re-clicked with old friends. They'd planned a caper. She needed to develop impersonation and survival skills. She needed makeup and wardrobe. De River recommended their mutual friend, Natasha Lytess. Marilyn responded, "Oooohhhh—I just love Natasha!!!"

That was it. De River stopped recording his Marilyn sessions. He was dispensing hard criminal advice now. He went from shrink to gang lord. He had to be Preston Fong/Terry Jay Aquino's old mentor. Albie Aadland hooked up with old pal Marilyn and old pals Manny, Paul Mitchell, and La Gwen herself. They formed their fake kidnap cabal.

Then Jimmy Hoffa appeared and started some shit rolling. Jimmy, and his pals the A boys. They had deep and crazy roots with the Mar-Gwen gang. Then I tossed a man off a cliff.

The services ran back-to-back. Sam Yorty planned it that way. It lubed the press and kept things moving. James Thornton Meadows and Georgia Lowell Farr. 1929 and ’45, up to right now. It was all too brief, kids.

Protestant ceremonies. Adjoining hillsides at Forest Lawn Glendale. The Meadows’ show ran first. It was a big PD send-off. It featured bagpipers and Navy choppers scattering mums. J.T. was line-of-duty and mandated the splurge. Lois stood with me both times. She refused to touch me or look at me. She told me why walking in.

“This is on you, Freddy. J.T. and Lowell. You thought you could score, so you cooked something up. You put together a group of your playmates, and this is how it panned out.”

Bill Parker showed up for Meadows. Ditto, Daryl Gates. The full Intel Division showed. Miller Leavy showed. Ranking cops wore their dress blues. The LAPD rolled out one thousand plus. Parker consoled Meadows’ widow and three children. I consoled a half-crocked Marcia Davenport. The service attenuated. The sun bore down. Parker gave the cutoff sign at an hour and fifteen minutes. His glad-hand line ran twice as long as the ceremony.

The Farr gig was nearby. It was an easy stroll for those inclined. The mourning circle was intimate. Family, friends, a few classmates. The Hat Squad, Nat and Phil. Speakers cranked Lowell’s favorite jazz chart—the Gerry Mulligan Quartet with “My Funny Valentine.” The pastor read from the Old Testament.

“I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though this body be destroyed, yet shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not as a stranger.”

Lois ditched me at the moment of interment. I nicked a memory card. Lowell wore her red beret. She wore it the night she painted Marilyn Monroe, while I watched.

68

(LOS ANGELES, 3:14 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 10/3/62)

I woke up scared. Something pressed upside me. I guzzled cold coffee and reached for the phone.

I called Gwen. Her service took the call. I left a "Call me" message.

I called Lois at her hotel. The desk man said she checked out last night. I called Maury Dexter on the Twist Party set. Maury said Lois bailed on the picture. The Farr girl messed with her head.

Gwen didn't call. Gwen hadn't called. I ate alone at Frascati, four nights straight. The depositions are prepped to go. Morty Bendish concluded his Sex Creep series. All Of It runs long on theory and falls short of resolution.

I called the night nurse at Queen of Angels. She debriefed me on Sid Leffler. He's heavily medicated. The pain is bad. He talks in his sleep. He rants about a haunted house.

I called Del Kinney. Del picked up, one ring in. I said, "It's Otash. I've been thinking about something."

Del went Aw-oh. I said, "Ollie Hammond's in an hour. Come on. We're both awake."

"I'll be there, but you're buying me breakfast."

Ollie's was deadsville. Service was quick. We noshed T-bones and hash browns.

I lit a cigarette. "I'm teething on Mitzi. I found some old paperwork, and I turned a second eyewit to Mitzi on the bus."

Del sipped coffee. "I know about that lead. Gwen told me you told her. Mitzi's on the bus, and this eyewit says she was being teased by two boys. One was about thirteen, the second boy was a bit older."

"That's correct. And the big question is, 'Have you got a name on that eyewit?' "

"No. And the lead is twenty-five and a half years old."

Del eyeballed my steak. "Well, there you are. The original IO's out of Hollywood station were all old guys in ’37, so I’m fairly sure they’re all gone now. I do know that the West L.A. squadroom guys ran bus-route checks on that Hollywood-to-the-beach run for a good two weeks, after they got that first lead. You know how this works. They buzzed the regular riders on Mitzi and who she might have been with, and what stop she might have got off at. Nothing came of it, or I would have heard. If there’s file notations anywhere, they’ll be in the sludge room at the West L.A. station.”

“Who ran it for the West L.A. dicks? Can you give me a name and a pedigree?”

Del said, “Arthur McCall. He died on Guadalcanal, but he was sure as shit a fine detective while he served. His widow’s still with us. She lives out in Glendale, and I’ve got her address. You never know. She might have kept some of Arthur’s old pocket notebooks.”

I shut my eyes. I craved more sleep. It was 4:00 a.m. Shitwork runs loomed.

“ ‘Teething on Mitzi’ means ‘teething on Gwen.’ Don’t fall in love with her, Freddy. If she’s anybody’s, she’s mine.”

The sludge room. Old files, dead files, nonfiles. Non sequitur paper slips. Petrified rat turds. Old cardboard boxes, banged up for years.

’40 back to ’16. No ’37 box. That box was missing. I triple-combed the sludge room. A conclusion slammed me. The ’37 box had been snatched.

An early bird patrol cop watched me. He was a nib-snout type. I said, “I’m looking for the ’37 box. I can’t find it anywhere.”

The guy picked his teeth. “Mr. Clean went on a kick, about a month ago. He said, ‘We’re looking at twenty-five years now, so I’m giving these old chestnuts the heave-ho.’ ”

I said, “Who’s Mr. Clean?”

He said, “Sid Leffler. I know you know him, and I know you and the Hats put him down for the count.”

I tossed an empty box at him. He laughed and flipped me off.

—

Mrs. McCall trimmed hedges by the driveway. I parked at the curb and walked up. She saw the box of candy I brought and fluffed out her hair.

She was sixty-something. She was fit. She read me in one glance.

"I don't need a road map, if that's what you're thinking. You've got better manners than most, and you're too young to have worked with Arthur. I'm sure it's either old case files or Arthur's old pocket notebooks. Please don't tell me I'm too far off."

I passed her the candy. She popped the lid and plucked a nougat concoction. I grabbed a plain chocolate and snarfed it.

"It's the old notebooks, isn't it? Let's walk over to the garage. Arthur was meticulous in everything that he did. He kept everything in boxes marked by date and year."

We ambled over. The boxes were clumped on a shelf above some pruning shears.

They were grease pencil–marked. I eyeball-trolled the shelf. There it is: "1936–'37."

I hauled it down and balanced it on one knee. Mrs. McCall popped chocolates and observed me. The box was packed with file folders. Meticulous McCall. He arranged his boxes by month. I finger-walked straight to "2/17/37, Perloff, Mitzi." I dug out a pocket-size notebook.

It was marked:

"Bus-route canvass, 3/4 to 3/7/37."

I flipped pages. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8—penciled-in names, addresses, and cross-outs. I hit Page #9 and saw this:

"Mrs. Bernice Rhoden/WFA/DOB 11/2/92. 11892 Temescal Canyon/GL-8992. States she can't recall date, but girl (assumed to be MP) got off at Mandeville Canyon stop. Confirmed that boys were teasing MP and that they alighted from bus at same stop. Did not overhear teasing but sensed it. Boys were desc. as 12 to 14, one tall, one short. Taller boy had 'lighter hair.' Shorter boy, possibly younger, had Harold Lloyd–type round eyeglasses."

I sensed it. I looped Le Conte Junior High to Intel and back west again. I checked old phone directories and the new white pages. Mrs. Rhoden was sixty-nine now. She still lived in Temescal Canyon. I called her and ID'd myself. I said I'd like to drop by and show her some pictures. They pertained to that missing girl and those two boys on the bus. Mrs. Rhoden recalled the incident. She told me to come out.

Hollygrove was close by Le Conte. Some Grove kids went to school at the Grove, some kids went to Le Conte. They knew me at Le Conte now. I ID'd Dawes/Danforth/Dewhurst as Roger Alan Denfrey. I worked off a Grove-to-Le Conte hunch.

The principal humored me one more time. He let me desecrate a run of ’35 to ’37 yearbooks. I ripped out pictures of Roger Denfrey and a boy with Harold Lloyd glasses.

I drove to the PAB and hit the Intel squadroom. I raided a stack of juvie mug books. I plucked six Roger Denfrey–look-alike mugs and six shots resembling the glasses kid. I pasted them to a shirt cardboard and added the yearbook pix. I concocted a twelve-boy mug run. Mrs. Rhoden would scan it and go yea or nay.

The mug shots and yearbook pix covered two shirt cardboards. I broomed back to Temescal Canyon. Mrs. Rhoden lived in a neat Craftsman house. She perched on her porch.

I jammed to the curb. I leaped steps up to her. Mrs. Rhoden eyeballed the mug shots and pix. She did not equivocate. She did not stall or hem and haw. She pointed straight to Roger Denfrey and Albie Aadland.

69

(LOS ANGELES, 10:30 A.M., THURSDAY, 10/4/62)

Miller Leavy called me in. He sat me down. He said, “Open your briefcase.” Miller’s flying high. Bill Parker told me why.

I popped my briefcase. Miller displayed four grand-jury subpoenas. They were Federal. They dunned Natasha Lytess, Sidney Leffler, Michael J. Bayless, and Gwen Perloff. I went Load me up.

Leavy dropped the papers in. He hooked his thumbs in his vest. He did a cock-of-the-walk routine.

“The AG anointed me. I’m officially ‘Kitchen Cabinet’ now. It may have been your original brainstorm, but I’m the one charged with its implementation.”

“Congratulations, boss. You’re the perfect man for the job.”

Leavy hopped in his desk chair. He plopped his feet on the desk and wiggled them at me.

“Bill Parker wants you to serve and debrief Mike Bayless in LAPD custody. He’s paying Pete Pitchess off in Intel files for the privilege. Max and Red are escorting him from the Sheriff’s DB to the foyer of the PAB. The press will be there. Mayor Yorty plans to be there.”

I laughed. “Tell true, boss. You’re getting a Federal judgeship out of this.”

“And you and the Hats are getting a skate on Murder One or Manslaughter Two, or whatever else I could have wangled. Don’t play me blithe, junior. I’m out of your league.”

I said, “There’s no subpoena for Albie Aadland.”

Leavy coughed. “Well—he’s an Aadland—and Grant Cooper’s representing him. That merits consideration.”

I adjusted my necktie and shot my cuffs. I indulged a quick primp. It ate five seconds up.

“I’ve been thinking, boss. You haven’t had a good murder case in a dog’s age. I mean a real gas-chamber bounce.”

Leavy harumphed. “Don’t I know it. And I don’t mind telling you that I’m salivating for one.”

I lit a cigarette. “I’m working on something. It’s a juvie sex snuff, and it’s twenty-five years old. It’s a no-body deal, like your Ewing Scott case.”

“I’m salivating already. Female victim? Tell me we got lucky. Females engender the most sympathy.”

I winked. “I’ll tell you more, once we’ve got these depositions out of the way. It’s a headline banger.”

They put Motel Mike through it. They manhandled him. They subjected him to ridicule. They strolled him through downtown L.A.

Here’s the route: the Hall of Justice to the PAB. East on Temple and south on L.A. Street. It’s about a half mile. He’s handcuffed behind his back. He’s hard-clamped by Max Herman and Red Stromwall. They’re moving him out. He’s half off his feet.

They’re three men on a stroll. Newshounds and TV camera trucks track them. Flashbulb pops plague them. Looky-loos tag along. They razz Motel Mike. They dispense jabbery contempt.

I bird-dogged it. Foot traffic veered into the street. Max and Red came on resolute. Motel Mike wilted and weaved between them. They hit the PAB lobby. Flashbulbs popped exponential. The lobby was quadruple-packed. Max and Red stiff-armed politicos and cops off to one side. The jail elevator cranked wide. They shoved Motel Mike in.

I saw Sam Yorty. He waved me over. We hobknobbed by the cigar stand. Crowd noise engulfed us. We had to shout.

Mayor Sam went in close. “Parker’s got a mean streak. Putting a jazzy guy like Mike through something like this is unkosher.”

I shoulder-draped him. “He’s got the true skank on Mike—trust me on that.”

“When Mike sorts all this grief out, he’ll need work. I’m going to hire him on as my bodyguard.”

I laughed. The lobby roar abated. I tossed a wild pitch, in tight.

“Mr. Mayor—who do you think has the best fuck-deck collection, you or Roddy McDowall?”

Mayor Sam went oooh-la-la. “Roddy’s got me licked on sheer volume, but I’ve got the king deck, the one with the provenance and the resale potential. You can’t beat the participants, and Orson Welles took the pictures. Fifty-two ‘poses,’ with the ace of spades triple-signed.”

“Who’d you buy it from?”

“A bent motor cop named Norm Krause. He was a dirty trickster for old Chief Worton, back when men were men and sheep were scared.”

I yocked. Mayor Sam saw DA McKesson and beelined on over. I walked to the jail stairs and jogged down a flight.

Newsmen swamped the check-in desk. I ducked down to attorney-room row. Room #B was preprepped to go.

I stepped inside. Mike, you’ve earned it. You won’t be here long. You know I work for effect.

The jailers laid out a small table. Plus two slat-wood chairs. The centerpiece worked. They plopped down a fifth of Old Crow and two shot glasses. Mike, I’ve got no gripe with you.

Max and Red walked him in and uncuffed him. They about-faced and walked straight back out. Motel Mike rubbed his wrists. I cracked the jug and poured two shots. I dropped the subpoena on the table.

“No testimony. All records sealed. You attest to me and a few others. You’re enjoined to secrecy, under threat of prosecution. You’re immune from this moment on. No state, municipal, or rogue local agency can touch you. You walk on all your misdeeds.”

Motel Mike flipped his chair and straddled the slats. Motel Mike downed Shot #1.

“Gwen told me something like this was in the works, so who am I to scoff? You know Gwen, right? You’re the man who knows everything and everyone, so I’d be surprised if you didn’t know her.”

I downed Shot #1. “Parker’s kicking you loose in two hours. You’re off the Sheriff’s, but you keep your pension. You’ll attest in a private room at Ollie Hammond’s. It’ll be me, Daryl Gates, Parker, and Miller Leavy.”

“You’re the Welcome Wagon, right? I get the show of force, and Mr. Shakedown himself smoothes my feathers.”

I downed Shot #2. “You were in Marilyn Monroe’s house on the night she died. It’s an OD, and I’m not trying to prove anything else. The lab made you off a walking portrait. I’ve got one question here. What were you there for, that night?”

Motel Mike twirled the jug. “The snatch had gone down. Natasha Lytess, Marilyn’s wardrobe mistress, got antsy when the first radio reports hit. She knew where Richie Danforth and Buzzy Stein were holed up, and she called her pal Darryl Zanuck, who was about to get tapped for two hundred grand. She ratted the deal, and Zanuck called Bill Parker. So here come you and the Hats to fuck it all up.”

I said, “And?”

“And the snatch team was the late Manny Salas, the missing and perhaps late Paul Mitchell Grenier, and the ever-diffident and wimpy Albie Aadland. Manny was running the listening post on the Monroe-home feed. Marilyn was stone batshit crazy, and she was mouthing off all sorts of injudicious shit to her new sidekick, Lowell Farr. Marilyn required surveillance, and Manny provided it. He ran the post out of that TV shop where he worked. He was on the wire that night, and he heard Marilyn playing a radio report on the snatch, and how you and the Hats bumped Richie Danforth. She got on her horn to the Farr girl, out of her mind and about half coherent, and pitched all this shit about this man whose death she caused. Manny was listening, and he called me and told me to get over to Marilyn's place and calm her down. Brentwood to Pacific Palisades calls are no toll, so you never got to review any calls to the girl on Marilyn's phone bills. Okay, I drove over to Marilyn's place. I broke in, and I was about to start pulling bug mounts, when I found Marilyn dead. Then Peter Lawford showed up, and I shimmied back out the window. Then you showed up, while I was half a block away, watching you lug an evidence kit and pull your pud."

Man Camera. Instant flashback. I recalled this moment that night.

"The radio was right by the bed. I turned it on. It was fine-tuned to an all-news station. An announcer mentioned an earlier report. Marilyn must have heard that one. It stressed the dead suspect, by name. It laid out the Hats and me, by name. Then, she called Lowell, then she took the pills."

Motel Mike leaned in. He smiled gleeful. He tapped my head twice. Mr. Shakedown. Nobody ever said you're not quick.

"There you have it. You killed a man, and Marilyn got all weepy. The Lowell girl failed to console her. Marilyn got weepy on her best of days, but this was too fucking much. So, who's the one packing the guilt here? You tell me."

(LOS ANGELES, 8:40 A.M., FRIDAY, 10/5/62)

Summons server. Errand boy. Factotum.

I drove to Brentwood. I brought Natasha Lytess a three-dollar bouquet. Motel Mike's indictment banged through my head.

Phone work. I spent last night shagging calls. I stared at news pix of Lowell Farr and Mitzi Perloff. Nat and Phil reported in. Nat said a carting truck arrived at Doc de River's place. Four workmen removed the Doc's file boxes and dumped them in the back. Phil tailed the truck to an incinerator landfill. A workman passed the landfill boss a wad of Doc de River's money. The workmen off-loaded the boxes and dumped them in the on-site pyre. Phil watched them ignite.

That meant this:

No de River evidence. No further Albie Aadland drift.

I've got my Albie-to-de River correspondence. I hoard it with deadly intent. I want Miller Leavy to utilize it. I want him to deploy it as only he knows how. I want him to put Albie down.

I've developed a plan. It's a two-hand play. I'll sweatbox Albie and Miller. The mirror walls and sound speakers will broadcast the show. I'll stand there with Gwen Perloff.

Eddie Chacõn called me. He reported this:

José Bolaños vanished in Mexico. The pendejos on Ingrid Irmgard's bearer-bond list declined to press charges. Customs cut Ingrid loose. She's back in L.A. "Hey, Señor Freddy—you and Max blew up her puto boyfriend!"

Max and Red are serving backup subpoenas. They're hitting Norm Krause and Jack Clemmons today. They might or might not be deposed. Harry Crowder and Eddie Benson lockstep Albie Aadland. The surveillance serves one purpose. They're out to make Albie squirm.

Ratfuck Bob Teletyped me. He told me to do this:

Craft a final summary. It should supplant and enhance the issued subpoenas and backup paperwork. Lay out your actions from 4/9/62 up to this moment. I expect and demand complete candor. This document will survive in the vacuum of just you and me.

I Teletyped a reply. I stressed my compliance and pledged prompt delivery. I pledged full candor. I said I'd include detailed notes on the '37 and '48 combustions that triggered the full chain of events.

I pulled up behind Natasha's old Ford. I heard her coughing—way back in the yard. I took the driveway back, slow. I coughed myself. It preannounced me and gave her time to compose.

She sat in her chair. She caught some good morning rays. I coughed again. I worked for kicks and grins. She said, "Don't you start doing it."

Her eyes were pinned. She'd lost more weight. She sipped tea and pointed to her spare chair. I dragged it over. She snatched the depo and bouquet.

"Gwen called me. She told me to expect you, and played to my vanity. She said the oral deposition will occur in a private room at a nice restaurant. What more could someone as stage-addled as I ask for?"

I said, "Give me a sneak peek. Tell me how you met Paul de River, and how the two of you directed Marilyn's performance."

It was a vividly theatrical performance and a peerless feat of breath control and stage savvy. She anticipated my one question and memorized her lines in advance. She was determined not to exceed her stage manager's brief and spoke to the point at all times. The point was not her feckless love for Marilyn Monroe. It was something altogether more sinister.

The Fox lot, '49 into '50. De River was a tech consultant on Otto Preminger's crime lox, Where the Sidewalk Ends. He riffed motivation to auteur Otto and star Dana Andrews. She was a dialogue coach on the film. They were both hipped on Russian theater and criminal psychopathy. De River considered actors to be a morally deficient species. She agreed, in full. She audited a few group therapy sessions at de River's Sex Offense Bureau at LAPD. Marilyn's old friend and amanuensis Gwen Perloff was in the group. Her participation spared her a jail knock for soliciting. Miss Lytess learned that Miss Perloff was an orphanage confrère of the emergent actress Marilyn Monroe. Miss Lytess knew Marilyn from The Asphalt Jungle. Miss Perloff was a dangerous criminal. Miss Perloff wanted to be an actress. Marilyn Monroe possessed a broad, if rudimentary, talent. Miss Perloff possessed no talent. Marilyn was craven to her core. Miss Perloff was strong to her core. And Marilyn wanted to be a criminal.

’51 into ’52. Marilyn began spewing outlandish criminal fantasies. She entered therapy with Dr. Paul, ’53 to ’54. She left therapy abruptly. It was too rigorous. She was too diffuse. She had succumbed to the idiot notion of being Marilyn Monroe, movie star and worldwide sensation. She sustained her friendship with Gwen Perloff. Their métier was the impromptu late-night phone call. Marilyn went publicly crazy for all the world to see. Gwen Perloff did not seem to mind. She told Marilyn real-life criminal stories. Marilyn dished ripe criminal fantasies in return. Marilyn held her fantasies to be real and brooked no contradiction. She believed that she owned the world but was not of the world and comported within this perilous schism. Criminal fantasy consumed her. She sought professional criminal counsel and reentered therapy with Dr. Paul early this year. He suggested that she spend yet more phone time with Gwen Perloff. Dr. Paul contacted Miss Lytess. He told her that Marilyn needed their help in crafting a real-life criminal persona—and that there would be a good weekly paycheck for the work.

Thus:

Miss Lytess met Motel Mike Bayless, Manny Salas, Paul Mitchell Grenier, and Albie Aadland. She remet the astoundingly self-possessed Gwen Perloff and transferred the full force of her tortuous crush on Marilyn to Gwen.

The cabal decided to stage a publicity kidnap. And perhaps invest a small portion of the money in the racket schemes percolating on the Fox lot.

Marilyn’s lunacy kept pace with her Fox-in-duress fears. She remade herself as a criminal mastermind. She concocted scheme upon scheme—each more ridiculous—up to and including a studio takeover by Mar-Gwen Productions.

Gwen Perloff was a part-time bond courier. She ran real bonds and forged bonds, crafted by consorts of Albie Aadland’s elder brothers. Gwen set Marilyn up with a man named José Bolaños. The Fox Rackets Conspiracy burst to life and imploded all at once.

It shouldn’t have. Marilyn’s grandiosity made it all happen. It was supposed to be a fake kidnap score. They’d be in and out. With a reasonable ransom demand and an equitable cash split. Gwen wanted a stake. She wanted to blow off her acting career and split L.A. forever. Motel Mike wanted a stake. He wanted to set up college funds for his kids. Albie wanted to wax bold and impress his big brothers. Manny wanted a stake. He wanted to set himself up in his own TV-repair shop. Paul Mitchell wanted a stake. He wanted to set himself up as a director of high-class smut films starring Marilyn Monroe. The straight kidnap gig might have worked—but Marilyn wanted MORE.

Gwen tried to control Marilyn. Miss Lytess and Doc de River crafted her zaftig-girl-hide-in-plain-sight persona. Marilyn performed adroitly. She couriered bonds and dope bravely and successfully. She lived within her disguise. She redressed the deranged-movie-star role that was killing her.

This cabal enjoyed the surcease. It was short-lived. Fox dumped Marilyn off Got to Give. Marilyn went on an anti-Kennedy kick. She said she planned to blackmail the president. He would divorce Jackie and marry her. Marilyn blew her mind. It was permanent. Miss Lytess knew it. Manny and Paul Mitchell blew their minds. Paul Mitchell bit Manny once. Miss Lytess feared for Marilyn's safety. She called Darryl Zanuck and ratted the kidnap gig off.

She paused and coughed. She sipped tea and popped two pain pills.

"We all loved drama, at the cost of our souls. Even Paul Mitchell and Manny were crazy for movies. Gwen described it as an 'idiot enchantment.' Why is it that the more sentient of us could fail to see how wrong it was? We were all so jejune. All our artful notions were pure ignorance and arrogance. That's what appalls me the most."

(LOS ANGELES, 1:40 A.M., SATURDAY, 10/6/62)

The postmidnight oil. I'm burning it, white-hot.

Ratfuck Bob demands a summary. I'm 214 pages in now. I've put a lens to my crazy summer of 1962. I've confessed to the murder of Roger Denfrey and shifted the blame off the Hats. I've confessed the murder of Paul Mitchell Grenier and directed the Feds to the dump site.

I've been at it for nine hours straight. I've taken breaks to call L.A.-area drugstores and check their summer '48 sales records. I located two penicillin scripts filled by Dr. Shelley Mandel. It confirmed my key summer '48 throughlines.

I concentrated on Sid Leffler then. Daryl Gates served Leffler's subpoena at Queen of Angels last night. I dug up Sex Offense Bureau records in a Headquarters Vice storeroom this morning. I pulled group-therapy attendance sheets from '49 to '52. Leffler audited two dozen sessions that Gwen Perloff also attended. The sessions were conducted by Sid's close pal, Paul de River.

Leffler. Sid, the linchpin. Sid, the old-timer. Sid knew the Aadland brothers in the mid- to late '30s. He ran errands and tossed stink bombs for them. He's been mumbling "haunted house" in his sleep. Four duty nurses have confirmed it. The haunted house is most likely the Pavia Place fuck pad. It shut down in '37 or '38 and resurrected after the war. The Aadland brothers and cousin Shelley Mandel held profit points.

Leffler worked chump jobs at the '30s fuck pad. Why did it shut down? Leffler was a doormat-stooge at the postwar pad. Leffler lied about Albie Aadland. He said he only glimpsed the young Albie during picket-line dustups on the Fox lot. Leffler dumped the '37 file box at the West L.A. station.

Leffler cracked under duress. He said he tried to sell Marilyn Monroe's letters to Paul de River. De River nixed the offer. De River told Leffler that he already knew the Sex Creep and stated that half of the letters surely came from him. Leffler revealed this before I read the coded Albie letters to de River. The Sex Creep was a postwar fuck-pad habitué. Leffler surely sideswiped him at that hot spot.

I'm going to predepose Leffler at 9:00 a.m. I'll type out a prepared list of questions and insert spaces for his handwritten replies. His signature will certify his plea bargain with Miller Leavy. Leffler stands accused of a hundred-plus counts of stat rape and forced oral cop. The nineteen complainants are all westside high school coeds.

I watched the fucker sleep. I nicked a get-well card at the nurses' station and stuck my query sheet inside it. I left it beside Leffler's water cup.

The guest chair gouged my ass. I chain-smoked and scratched my balls raw. Late-sleeper Leffler—it was 9:29 a.m.

I saw him stir. He couldn't see me. I set the window drapes just so.

He stirred and stretched. He reached for his cup. He saw the get-well card and pulled out the query sheet.

I said, "Hey, there. You're a sleepyhead."

Sid Leffler screamed.

Miller Leavy established a protocol. Leffler would rat Albie Aadland within precise legal guidelines. His 3-to-5 sex crime sentence would be suspended. He would instead receive a jive-public-service slap on the wrist. Lieutenant Freddy O. would tape-record a precise Q and A. Leffler would respond to my queries and write in his replies. We would both initial the responses. Only two individuals would read the rat sheet. They were Leavy and Gwen Perloff.

Leffler was malingering at Queen of Angels. He was milking his rest cure before a return to his fucked-up life. He withstood a good shitkicking. The kicking did not justify this indolent cure. We didn't thump him to oblivion. He got off easy.

He worked in bed. I sat in my ass-gouging chair. He spoke and then inked his answers to my questions. The room was quiet. A window cooling unit hummed. My portable recorder spooled tape. We hand-annotated the typescript after each Q and A. The finished document reads like this:

FO/Q: "When and where did you meet Gwen Perloff?"

SL/A: "In 1950, at the Sex Offense Bureau at LAPD."

FO/Q: “In what specific context?”

SL/A: “Group therapy. Gwen got popped for soliciting, and she had to attend these sessions, to dodge jail time. Doc de River ran the groups. He gassed on Gwen, I could tell.”

FO/Q: “What personal business did Miss Perloff most frequently bring up at these sessions?”

SL/A: “The disappearance of her kid sister, Mitzi, in February of ’37. Everybody figured some kiddie slasher did her in. Gwen was convinced that a Le Conte Junior High boy named Roger did it. He was a mean kid, and he bragged about killing little girls.”

FO/Q: “Where were you working in February of ’37?”

SL/A: “At…well…the Aadland brothers owned a party house, on Pavia Place, in the Palisades. I served drinks and ran errands.”

FO/Q: “Did a Le Conte boy named Roger Denfrey, and Albie Aadland—the much younger Aadland brother—habituate this establishment?”

SL/A: “Yes.”

FO/Q: “And on a particular February night, did Roger Denfrey relay some disturbing news with regards to Albie Aadland to you?”

SL/A: “Yes. He said that Albie had been fondling Mitzi under the Le Conte bleachers, back in Hollywood, and that he talked her into taking a bus ride to the beach with them…and…they were teasing her on the bus, and they brought her there to the party house, and he disappeared with her into an upstairs bedroom, and Roger went up to see what was going on, and he saw them naked, and Albie was strangling Mitzi and shoving a washcloth in her mouth.”

FO/Q: “What did you do then?”

SL/A: “I went up and saw the body, and then I called Hersh Aadland and told him what happened.”

FO/Q: “What did Hersh Aadland do?”

SL/A: “What do you think, asshole? He bundled up the body and dumped it someplace.”

FO/Q: “Did Roger Denfrey participate in the murder?”

SL/A: “No. He was listening to a radio show downstairs when it happened.”

I eyeballed Gwen’s building. I sat in my car and kept precise track of the time.

It was 9:34 p.m. Gwen was at home. She’s burning her living room lights. I saw her car tucked in her parking slot. I slid the Q and A under her front door. It was 8:34 p.m. then. I included a personal note:

“Consider all of this. Tell me how you’d like me to proceed.”

Her shades were yanked tight. Living room lights burned behind them. The front door did not budge. Time decohered. I waited for Gwen to call me in.

I talked to Miller Leavy, four hours back. He read the Q and A and revoked Albie’s immunity deal. He said he did not intend to inform Ratdog Bobby of the Leffler/Mitzi offshoot of our cases. He said he intends to file Murder One on Albie and try him as an adult. February 17, 1937, is twenty-five years, seven months, and nineteen days ago.

Time decohered. I sat in my car and plain yearned. I kept my windows down. The night was near warm. I couldn’t will sound into sight or—

I heard a high-pitched sound. It came from upstairs and off-right. It went from whine to woman’s shriek. I heard crash and thud sounds off-right. I saw cloaked window-curtains shimmy and heard glass break.

I piled out and ran. I heard all the sounds all at once and all with the sound increased. I ran upstairs and paused. I saw loose doorjamb mounts and shoulder-punched the door in. I tripped inside and saw this:

Gwen. She’s throwing things at the south wall. Straight-back chairs, soft chairs, glass shelves, and bric-a-brac. They’re piled up at the foot of the wall. She’s gouged the wall past the paint and foundation boards, and still with that shriek—

I tripped again. I got to her and behind her and threw myself at her. I got my arms around her and wrestled her loose. We bumped heads and tripped sideways and clipped shelves and kicked rugs up and fell into a leather couch as she flailed.

We got our heads turned around. Her face was dry and dark red–blotted. There were no tears.

We paused. We caught some breath. She didn’t tremble. She didn’t sob. She gnawed at her lips. We paused again—so I kissed her.

We fell into it and stayed with it. I kept my watch facedown on the nightstand. We kept our clothes off. Nobody called in a noise beef. No deputies rolled out and banged at the door. Time went someplace. We stayed close. We said things. We didn't want to lose the fit. Gwen said, "I should tell you first. I don't want to tell it in a roomful of men and stenographers, and lose it because we didn't walk through it first."

She stated it. She didn't ask me. She walked into the living room and walked back with a tape rig. She plugged it into the wall and laid it down on the sheets.

All right, then. Tell me.

It was the Grove, first and always. It was Gwen and Norma Jean Baker, the incipient Marilyn. It was the gang. Gwen and Marilyn lorded it over Albie, Paul Mitchell, and their pal from outside—Manny Salas. They were movie-mad kids. Little kids—eleven, twelve, thirteen. There were long days up in that tree on El Centro. The Grove offered long views. They had a big view of Paramount and RKO. There were extras in costume and movie stars on parade.

They were little kids with big imaginations. Gwen and Mitzi lived in a foster home at De Longpre and Wilton at first. You could see the kid versions of who they'd all become. Paul Mitchell was mean. He liked to bite and fight. El Manny was a house burglar and amateur boxer. He was a Nite Owl peewee and loved to futz around with electrical things. Albie was studious and withdrawn. He hoarded dirty pictures. His big brothers forced him to commit minor crimes and test-pilot dope. Marilyn was ambitious and sweet-natured, up to a point. Gwen was not that way. She was calculating to the nth degree.

Mitzi vanished. The Sheriff's and L.A. police investigated. Gwen ran wild. She boosted threads from Hollywood shops and peddled them to kids at Le Conte Junior High. Albie went to Le Conte and came back home to the Grove. Gwen met a Le Conte boy named Roger Denfrey. Roger strutted tall in the ensembles that Gwen stole for him.

The foster home expelled Gwen. The girl was just too wild. She got lucky and got sent to the Grove. Gwen and Marilyn played girl-sleuth games. They fantasy-solved Mitzi's murder a thousand times over. Gwen suspected Roger Denfrey. He told Le Conte kids that he wanted to become a pimp and sex-slash little girls. He harped on this. He told all who would listen.

The late '30s. The early war years. The gang comes of age.

Manny Salas goes off to high school and trade school. Manny fights professional. Paul Mitchell fights and bites and becomes a boss jocker at Georgia Street Juvenile. Albie attends Occidental College. Marilyn tears through foster homes. She endures boarding stints with distant relatives and endures a kid marriage. Gwen becomes a semipro shoplifter and late-teen lingerie model. She's kept up with Manny. She sucks up to rich men and sleeps with them on occasion. She targets their homes for El Manny's 459 prowls.

The war ends. The swinging postwar-L.A. era kicks on. El Manny's a pad burglar. Paul Mitchell's a grip, bit actor, and part-time fruit hustler. Marilyn and Gwen are starlet manqués and fledgling call girls. They haunt studio casting offices and scrounge bit parts.

It's now '48. Marilyn and Gwen reconnect on the L.A. nightlife circuit. Gwen's heard of a wild joint on Pavia Place. It's way out in the Palisades. It's a party house. Such places are commonly known as "fuck pads."

You've got men and women—all good-looking. There's nifty film folk and inspired squarejohn types out to HOWL. You've got booze and dope. Oooh-la-la—there's private compounds and the best prescription shit of the era. You have Dr. Shelley Mandel. With his script-writing largesse and his cautionary VD spiels and free-flowing penicillin.

Orson Welles habituates the fuck pad. Visiting celebs pass through. Gwen sees Roddy McDowall and Liz Taylor on several occasions. Marilyn and Gwen become fuck-pad regulars. Dr. Shelley becomes Marilyn's personal physician. Random rich boys pass through the fuck pad. Plus noted politicians. They're often escorted by an L.A. cop named Norm and an almost-cop named Jack.

The fuck pad swings HARD. Local weird-o's pass through. An unknown trumpet virtuoso. This weird Chinaman who steals watches and may or may not cook dope. A cop named Sid Leffler provides security. He's a longtime Aadland stooge.

There's jazz combos. There's jam sessions and impromptu smut-foto sessions. Orson Welles is quite the shutterbug. There's orgy action in plain sight. And there's Doc Shelley's invention—the fuck deck.

Dig:

Get your jollies in the moment. Pose fifty-two times over. Orson's a fuck-deck enthusiast. So's the Queen of the Fuck Pad:

Carole Landis. Real star/perhaps fading star/on her fourth marriage. She has a big house four blocks off on Capri Drive.

Carole did a fuck deck with a jazz horn called "Captain Hook." He possessed a foot-long curved schlong. Carole's married. So what? Carole's got a thing going with Brit heartthrob Rex Harrison. Carole's got her eye on rookie congressman John F. Kennedy. He digs passing through L.A. and scrounging strange woof-woof.

Marilyn digs Jack Kennedy. Gwen observes it, plainly. Marilyn hates Carole. She possesses everything that Marilyn does not.

It's now late June '48. Gwen, Carole, Marilyn, and Jack Kennedy are on the premises. A girl named Marcia Davenport works as Carole's assistant. She hires Gwen and Marilyn to house-sit Carole's place when Carole and hubby dip out of town. Gwen and Marilyn enjoy momentary luxury. Gwen tips Manny Salas to a safe full of jewels. He 459's Carole's house and gives Gwen a cut of the fence money.

It's June 28, '48. Carole's out of town. Marilyn and Jack Kennedy are ensconced at the fuck pad. They're zonked on opium and cocaine. They take the plunge and go the fuck-deck route. Orson Welles shoots them in fifty-two sizzling positions. Orson, Jack, and Marilyn sign the back of the developed fotos. Doc Shelley does the technical work and gets the pix turned into a prototype deck.

Who got the deck then? Nobody knows.

It's now coming up on Independence Day, '48. Jack K.'s on a fuck-pad toot. He's comatose in a back bedroom. Carole's back in town. She's heard the rumors: Jack and Marilyn went the fuck-deck route. Carole's distraught. Rex Harrison won't leave his wife. Her career's in the tank. Her fourth husband's a dud. Jack Kennedy's a heartless no-goodnik.

Gwen and Marilyn walk Carole back to her house. It's just a few blocks away. That weird-o Chinaman seems to be tailing them. He's eavesdropping on the riff that Marilyn's laying on Carole:

No man is worth the trouble that you're putting yourself through. I've got red devils and yellow jackets. Go home, have a snooze, and call your shrink in the morning.

Carole went home. She took Marilyn's pills and killed herself. Jack K. remained conked at the fuck pad. Norm the cop and Jack the almost-cop are waltzing a bigwig pol through the pad. They get spooked by Jack K.'s condition.

Norm called Chief Worton. Chief Worton called Robert Kennedy in Boston. Young Robert was twenty-two. He had pressing travel plans. He wanted to scope out postwar Europe and soak up bebop and existentialism. He flew out to L.A. instead.

Chief Worton had Norm the cop and Jack the almost-cop rescue Congressman John F. Kennedy from the fuck pad. Bobby K. backstopped the rescue operation. Bobby met Gwen Perloff at a little park down Pavia Place. He was rubbed raw by brother Jack's suicidal tomcat ways. Gwen was rubbed raw by Carole's suicide and Marilyn's take-a-nap-sweetie riff. The attraction went heart-deep for six days. Bobby and Gwen. Six days in July ’48. Gwen gave Bobby the clap. Doc Shelley prescribed penicillin. Pharmacy records existed. Travel records existed. The Jack-Marilyn fuck deck still exists somewhere.

Bobby and Gwen broke it off. It was terminal at the gate. They both knew it. Gwen passed a dose to Robert F. Kennedy. Bobby said he forgave her. Gwen didn’t believe him. Bobby took Jack back to Washington. Gwen and Bobby? Cole Porter said it best: “It was just one of those things.”

Time schizzed. Marilyn became MARILYN MONROE. Gwen jumped into The Life. She fingered scores and got popped for soliciting in ’50. A judge sentenced her to a stint with Paul de River’s Sex Offense Bureau. She attended group therapy sessions. All the crime talk torqued her. She teethed on Roger Denfrey as Mitzi’s killer. She remet Sid Leffler at the group gigs. It was “Hi, Sid,” “Hi, Gwen,” and no more. She met a young Sheriff’s cop named Mike Bayless. He was auditing group sessions. Gwen became his longtime lover and informant. Motel Mike began a longtime search for Roger Denfrey.

Denfrey had no criminal record. Not anywhere. Mike saw him as a fringe figure. He was possibly quite dangerous. Mike did not make him for specific sex offenses. Gwen said she knew. She was stronger than Mike. She told Mike to find him and let her kill him. Mike said he would.

Time schizzed. Gwen went to the Pasadena Playhouse. She did swimwear ads and got contracts at Universal and Fox. Marilyn became that much more Marilyn Monroe. Marilyn began to deteriorate and decohere. Gwen got costar roles in horror flicks. She ran into Paul Mitchell and Albie at Fox. They had Manny in tow sometimes. She ran into Marilyn at Fox. She had dinner with Marilyn, Paul Mitchell, Manny, and Albie two or three times a year. She introduced them to Mike Bayless. He was still searching for Roger Denfrey. Mike and Marilyn had an affair. Mike grokked her crime fixation and tattled it to Gwen. Paul Mitchell and Manny were Chino ex-cons. Scholarly Albie was crime-fixated. Gwen began and sustained an affair with Darryl F. Zanuck. Gwen acted in B flicks and schlepped bearer bonds for Zanuck, Hersh Aadland, and other big studio guys. Mike chased Roger Denfrey. Marilyn started pressing for a publicity kidnap. Marilyn bewitched Mike Bayless. She had him out looking for the MM/JFK fuck deck. No real leads ever surfaced or popped.

Marilyn remet Senator Jack in 1954. He didn't connect her to his old fuck-deck pal. Really. Was she that unmemorable? Marilyn and Jack had once-a-year quickies, up and through his inauguration as prez. Marilyn wanted to own that deck. It might prove useful. She might decide to replace that lockjawed stiff Jackie as First Lady.

Marilyn is losing it. She's boozing more. She's gobbling more pills and jumping more gas-station jockeys and pizza-delivery boys. She's plotting a takeover of 20th Century–Fox. The studio is besieged by money woes engendered by King Lox Cleopatra. Albie Aadland tattles Marilyn's takeover shit to his brothers and Jimmy Hoffa. They like the idea and tell Albie to stay in touch as this Cleopatra grief evolves. Mike Bayless tells Gwen that he's tracked Roger Denfrey to the name Rick Dawes. "Rick Dawes" is a sometime cater waiter and possible Beverly Hills house burglar. Gwen gets a cater-waitress gig and starts tracking Dawes/Denfrey herself. Manny's got his swinging stewardess girlfriend, Ingrid Irmgard. She's moving bonds for the A boys. The boys want to co-opt Marilyn's takeover plan. Gwen spots Manny and the weird-o Chinaman from the fuck pad. They're going over floor plans for a burglary job. She spots them at a diner near Fox. Gwen and Mike hatch a plan. They'll lure Roger Denfrey into their kidnap gang. They'll lull him down and set him up so that Gwen can kill him. Analysand Marilyn is tattling her criminal plans to Paul de River. He brings Natasha Lytess into play. She signs on as drama coach and wardrobe mistress. Marilyn wants to courier dope and bonds? Natasha will provide appropriate disguises and motivation. Mike finds Roger Denfrey and suborns him into the gang. Mike tells Gwen what Roger told him. He's committed a string of Beverly Hills 459's with a Chink named Preston Fong. Crazy moneymaking schemes proliferate at Fox. Jimmy Hoffa hires Freddy O. for his Marilyn/Jack the K bug-tap extravaganza.

Gwen pushed the rig Off switch. Tape hiss stopped short. She went So? I said, "Tell me what you want to do."

She touched my leg. She said, "Let me think about it."

72

(LOS ANGELES, 10/7–10/9/62)

I worked at home. I sat at the living room table and waited for Gwen to call. I typed up my concluding summary to Robert F. Kennedy. Carbon copies would go out to Bill Parker, Daryl Gates, Miller Leavy, and the Hats.

I would delete Gwen's account of the fuck-deck shenanigans. It would not sully the carbon copies. Ratfuck Bobby was there at the start. Only he got the full lurid ride.

He earned it. I earned it. Gwen earned it. Nobody else did.

I underscored Sid Leffler's account of the Mitzi Perloff murder. I went back and underscored my account of Paul Mitchell Grenier's death. Now you know where I dumped him. He just had to go. All justification stops there.

I took breaks and sipped coffee on the porch. Gwen buzz-bombed me. She might call, she might not. We left our end point unestablished. I woke up and found her gone. She'd cleaned up her living room. It was spick-and-span. I slept through it all.

She's got me thinking. I thought of the prez and the AG and the spring of '55. I pulled Jack out of some shit with a call girl. I presented the bill. Jack high-hatted me. Fifty grand might have been grandiose. Twenty grand would have been swell. The K boys are cheap. That's my final perspective on the brothers Kennedy.

My summary topped out at 421 pages. I ran the carbons downtown. I told Eddie Chacõn to telefax the AG. I dropped off copies at the PAB and the DA's Office. I drove home and went to sleep.

Gwen didn't call. Parker and Gates called. I lobbied them on Gwen's behalf. Don't make her depose. Let her play the tape instead. They agreed. We argued endgames and conceived this:

Leavy files on Albie for Murder One. It's not a gas-chamber bounce. Albie was a juvie back in '37. It's a no-body job. All we've got are the admissions of a rapist ex-cop. Let Miller have at Albie instead.

Bust him and delay his lawyer's phone call. Put Albie in a sweatbox with Miller. Maybe Miller can shake loose a confession or induce a psychic collapse. Maybe he can rig Life Plus 99 Years or something equally harsh.

Parker and Gates liked it. Parker said he's run it by Miller. Gates said he'd invite the Hats. I said I'd invite Gwen.

Miller called me two hours later. He said it's on. Max and Red were set to haul Albie in. Buff the look-see mirror and fine-tune the hallway speakers. Albie's overmatched.

The deposition gigs went down. We scheduled them, one per night. We deposed Natasha Lytess in a private room at Kwan's Chinese Pagoda. Natasha played Belle of the Ball and charmed the shit out of Parker, Leavy, and Gates. She was sickly and dying. Her last Monroe stint ran felonious. She inspired admiration in four vindictive men. We dined and boozed until 3:00 a.m. We had a blast.

Motel Mike Bayless deposed in a private room at Ollie Hammond's Steakhouse. He held forth candidly and confirmed Gwen's recorded statement 100%. He expressed surprise per one thing. Terry Jay Aquino/aka Preston Fong/aka Sex Creep. That fucker as a 459 accomplice of Manny Salas and Roger Denfrey?

I said, "It all goes back to Albie and the three convergences. The fuck pad in '37 and '48, and Chino in '54. Albie cinches up the whole deal."

We deposed Sid Leffler in his hospital room. It was loathsome work. Miller Leavy's eyes? You've never seen such contempt.

The Leffler depo induced an aftertaste. I drove home and conjured Lowell Farr and Mitzi Perloff, alive and grown-up. I got restless and called Roddy McDowall.

We shot the breeze for ten seconds. Roddy invited me to a sneak peek at Jeanne Carmen's place. I asked him if he had the Monroe/JFK fuck deck. He said no—the best he could do was Carole Landis and Captain Hook. He was strapped for bread and sold the King Deck to Sam Yorty.

That's not bad. Mayor Sam's always liked me.

Gwen called at 4:00 the next morning. She said, "Yes," and hung up the phone.

73

(LOS ANGELES, 10:20 A.M., WEDNESDAY, 10/10/62)

The wall mirror projected a blur. It framed Leavy and Albie off-kilter. It distorted colors. Miller's suit and Albie's hair beamed out garish shades.

The hall speakers worked A-OK. Miller cleared his throat to announce the launch. Gwen jerked and brushed against me. Bill Parker went Whoa. Daryl Gates and the Hats twitched.

Gwen. I knew her clothes now. She'd worn the dark gray suit before. It complemented new gray hair. Her black-frame glasses offset her face in bold contrast.

She'd been respectfully brusque. We went through the introductions in six seconds. Max and Red picked Albie up and drove him downtown in his own Mercedes. A lab crew was tossing his sled in the basement garage. A second crew was tossing his house. They won't find jack shit. Albie and El Manny torched all his paper.

Miller coughed and launched. Gwen stood close and brushed my fingers.

"Your fellow kidnap conspirators have been granted immunity, Mr. Aadland. Yours has been revoked. You facilitated the criminal actions of Terry Jay Aquino, also known as Preston Fong, also known as the Sex Creep. You met Aquino at Chino in 1954, and went on to coach him in felonious endeavors, abetted by Dr. Paul de River. The Creep went on to kill a girl named Georgia Lowell Farr, and a policeman named J.T. Meadows. I intend to see you indicted as a coconspirator."

Albie smoked and fretted his cuff links. Max thinks he popped tranquilizers back at his house. Albie said, "This is a humbug deal." His voice was gravel-raw.

Miller said, "Additionally, you murdered a minor child named Mitzi Perloff in February 1937. You were a child yourself at that time. The one eyewitness, Roger Denfrey, is now dead. My one living witness, Sid Leffler, is a thoroughly disgraced ex-cop. A paucity of witnesses and a lack of physical evidence will not impede the actions of the L.A. County grand jury. They will issue a true bill for first-degree murder. At trial, I will call your three brothers and Paul de River. They will vividly describe your boyhood perversions and related criminal activities, in an effort to dodge suborning indictments themselves."

Albie said, "So? I've got Grant Cooper. He's better than you. He'll get a phone call sometime in the next hour. 'Grant, this is Albie. They've got me at the Detective Bureau. They haven't hosed me yet—but they might. Get down here, all right?' "

Miller feigned a yuk. Here comes the leap. Miller laid it out before the pickup. Sidelong looks traveled. They ran Parker to Gates to the Hats and me.

Gwen stared straight ahead. Her jaw flexed some new way. I wanted her to touch me. She gripped the window ledge.

Miller said, "I will now ask you a series of hypothetical questions, which will not be courtroom admissible. My hope is that I might gain theoretical knowledge of the one known homicide that you have committed, and that such knowledge will serve to mitigate my absolutist stance in court."

Albie said, "You're a ham. Always the big words, but you're headed for a trouncing."

Miller said, "Yes or no, Mr. Aadland? I know you're anxious to call Mr. Cooper."

Albie sighed. "I was raised to be accommodating, so I'll play along until I get bored."

JML/Q: "If you were to have killed Mitzi Perloff, what would your motive have been?"

AA/A: "Sex, I guess. She was little, and she wasn't a dish like her big sister. She had something, though, and who can account for taste? Also, I'm the altruistic type. If I did what you said I did, I'd be breaking her in for the unlucky guy she'd marry some dark day."

Gwen squeezed my hand and pressed it into her leg. The Hats passed a flask.

JML/Q: "Did you get what you wanted, in that upstairs bedroom—if, hypothetically, you got anything at all?"

AA/A: "If I did it, if I was looking for anything, it was a measure of relief from my status as an Aadland who couldn't hack The Life, and had to eat shit and test-pilot dope that scrambled my brain. As in rape clear's a man's pipes and allows him to compete in this shitty competitive world we live in."

JML/Q: “Was the act itself pleasurable?”

AA/A: “Not really. It was more a case of any old port in a storm. I’m squeamish, and all the blood and ooze put me in a state of postcoital regret. You know, like those Frenchy films where the lovers lay around, smoke cigarettes, and discuss how life’s this doomed proposition.”

It went telepathic. Albie paused and lit a cigarette. It gave the gallery a pause to drift and breathe clean air. Parker/Gates/the Hats. They walked away from Gwen and me. They walked toward the Homicide squadroom.

Gwen. With the tears now. Pooling up behind her glasses.

I took her arm and walked her toward a stairway landing. We went through the door. We stood on metal stairs that nobody used. To our left: sweatbox row. To our right: the connecting door to the elevator bank.

We stood there. Here’s the wait. I stuck my handkerchief in the outlooking door crack. The door looked out on Sweatbox #3. I held Gwen and pulled off her glasses. She rubbed her face on my shirtfront and blotted her tears.

Time schizzed. I held her up against the stairway wall. She spasmed as the wait dragged. It went almost an hour. The door crack fed us the view.

Miller and Albie walked out the #3 door. They walked away from us and toward the squadroom.

Gwen knew the drill. She pushed herself off the wall and walked ahead of me. We went through the elevator-bank door.

The lift down was shut. Red arrows lit up. I pushed the down button. The door slid open. We stepped inside. I pushed the basement button. The lift lurched straight down. We stepped into the PD’s garage.

Albie’s Mercedes. It was two car rows back. The lab guys were gone. I pointed to a wall stanchion. Gwen walked ahead of me. I flipped a blower-fan switch at eye level. A noise wave hit the basement.

Gwen pulled on cloth gloves. I 459’d Albie’s house last night. I stole a .357 Magnum revolver. Albie is left-handed. He’ll start the car with his right hand. He’ll rest his left arm on the door sill. It’s a natural posture for a—

The freight-lift door clanked open. A little sound device dinged. Gwen and I stood behind the stanchion. Albie walked to the Mercedes and opened the driver’s door. His left arm is right where it should be.

Gwen walked up to the car. She pulled the Magnum from her handbag and gave Albie a beat.

He saw it and knew it. I know that. Gwen put the gun to his head and pulled the trigger. Albie convulsed. The wad-cutter load blew through him. It took out half his skull and tore out the passenger-door panel.

Gwen dropped the piece on the ground. I know suicide blowback. I told her just where to drop it. The blower fan covered the noise.

Gwen walked back over to me.

(LOS ANGELES, 8:00 A.M., THURSDAY, 10/11/62)

I stared down my phone. Nobody called last night. It wasn't on the TV or radio news. It didn't make the p.m. papers yesterday or the a.m. rags today.

I drove Gwen home yesterday. She told me she was shucking L.A. for good tomorrow night. Del Kinney took the sheriff's job in Wisconsin. They were going to get married. She might drop by Jeanne Carmen's place and say hi.

That stood as our good-byes. We did it. We didn't discuss it. We'd know the price sometime today.

We did it. Parker and Gates knew we did it. Miller Leavy knew we did it. They might nail us. They might indulge us and let us waltz. They might kick it up to Bob Kennedy and let him decide. It could play out twenty ways. We risked that. We'd know the price sometime today.

I stared down my phone. Gwen didn't call. She was packing up to ditch L.A. for good. Leavy didn't call. Likewise Parker and Gates. No cops door-knocked me. I was shit-sheared. I was bughouse/no-shit scared.

I stared down my phone. I willed it to ring and got no response. I smoked thirty cigarettes. Eddie Chacõn called at 4:20. He fed me an update.

"It has fallen on Señor Bob to make the call on you and Miss Perloff. He hasn't decided yet."

Eddie hung up. I forced myself to eat half a sandwich. I puked it back up ten minutes later. I gargled Old Crow and put the plug in the jug.

Gwen didn't call. No reporters called. No TV crews assembled outside. No cops knocked on my door.

Eddie called back at 5:19. I jumped on the phone.

"Señor Bob is letting it slide. Señor Leavy was outraged, but Señor Bob beat him down. Puto Leavy wants to file Manslaughter Two on you for La Gran Puta Grenier. Once more, Señor Bob prevailed."

—

I went to a party. Something was racking up inside of me. It was big and ugly, dirty and strange. I wanted to divert myself. I wanted to get blitzed and hold it down.

Del Kinney broke the word at Fox. It was his last official duty. He did an all-lot mail drop.

All this criminal shit stops now. The City Attorney's set to run a studio-wide audit and personal audits on all your bank accounts. The IRS is now auditing your Federal tax returns. Cease and desist immediately. You're nullified, as of now.

Roddy McDowall got an exemption. One of Del's guys leaked Roddy the word early. Roddy could shoot his Cleopatra-spoof fuck film. Hence, the party tonight.

Jeanne's living room was jam-packed. It was a film-biz demimonde scene. You've got Babs Payton, Lila Leeds, and Jeanne's bit player/call girl neighbors. Nat and Phil showed. Some Sheriff's squadroom guys made the scene. Eddie Fisher and Bo Belinsky made quite an entrance. Eddie spritzed unleavened joy. Liz cut his kid-support nut in half. He squeezed Liz with the Liz/Bo smut reel.

Gwen wasn't there.

The night was borderline balmy. I wedged the door open for sight lines on Gwen or No Gwen. I ate two pizza slices and kept them down. I recognized the delivery boy. It was Monroe's old squeeze, "Big Dick Dave."

Jeanne owned a cheap-o projector and pull-down screen. Roddy had redubbed real Cleopatra footage with gag dialogue. I grabbed a chair and set it to keep a bead on the door. A Sheriff's guy doused the room lights. Roddy did a Roll 'em bit. Jeanne rolled film.

It was sound film. Roddy intoned a camp prologue:

"All hail the demise of a once-proud motion picture studio!!! Because this flick is the Dog of Dogs and Lox of Loxes!!!"

The kids roared. Roddy cut to dreary shots of Roman processionals. The camera swooped wide of the set. It panned a '60-vintage shopping center, outside of Rome. Bambinos licked ice-cream cones. Bedraggled moms lugged shopping bags.

The kids hooted and cheered. Roddy cut to a series of shots in Cleo's throne room. The shots reduced to close-ups. Redubbed Richard Burton and Liz Taylor traded Roddyesque quips.

Redubbed Richard said, “Give me some pussy, you fine Egyptian motherfucker!”

Redubbed Liz said, “You better be a good muff diver, because I heard you’re hung like a light switch!”

The kids re-roared. It was funny shit. I faded out of it, fast. I looked out the door. People passed on the walkway. Nobody was her.

The reel rolled on. The projector spool glitched and killed the show halfway in. The kids threw out stage groans. Lila Leeds turned on the room lights. The brightness burned my eyes.

That racking thing took me over. It doubled me over and made my eyes burn. I wiped my face and nailed the source. It was a brutal wave of love for Robert F. Kennedy.

The party dragged on. I sat in my chair and talked to people. I looked out the door. The party slogged on. My wait felt like an all-night surveillance. It was my last shot at something. I couldn’t forfeit the look-see.

I didn’t mark the time.

Then she was there.

The doorway framed her, the walkway lights backlit her.

She winked and blew me a kiss. She lip-synched I love you and stepped out of the frame.

75

(LOS ANGELES, 9:00 A.M., FRIDAY, 10/12/62)

Mayor Sam allotted me ten minutes. We crashed in green wing chairs. His secretary served eye-openers. She built 100-proof vodka mimosas. They were revered by the City Hall set.

Mayor Sam said, "Motel Mike signed on as my bodyguard. What's a little kidnap caper between friends?"

I laughed and cut to it. Let's not prolong this. Mayor Sam could get brusque.

"Fuck decks. I know you've got the big one, and I'm willing to pay."

Mayor Sam did not blink. He rubbed his fingers together and went for the gist.

"Twenty grand. That's the number. Anything less—sayonara, baby."

I said, "Ten grand and a wall-peek film of Liz Taylor and Bo Belinsky. It's high-resolution infrared, with good sound quality."

Mayor Sam said, "Shit, that's a good deal."

The beach displayed all the signs. Cars were triple-parked on PCH southbound. Numbskulls jumped on their hoods to sneak views. Fans jammed up the sand, street to wave line. I heard "They're here!" and "He's here!" and "Maybe we'll see Jackie!"

Eddie Chacõn called my service. He told me to be prompt and park in Mrs. Lawford's garage slot. The door was up and Pat's Bonneville was missing. I drove straight in.

I got out and hooked down the north pathway. I smelled his cigar smoke. He was out by the pool. I pulled a lounge chair up beside his.

He wore sunglasses. That slayed me. He traveled incognito. I stifled a laugh.

"Hello, Mr. Kennedy."

He doffed his shades. Bright sunlight made him blink.

"Hi, Freddy. Eddie said you've got something for me."

I passed him Mayor Sam's fuck deck. It came brown paper–wrapped. This ghastly object. I did not strip the paper and peek.

He tossed me a paper bag. It was heavy. Heads popped over the fence line. "Oh, gawwd—I saw Bobby!"

"Fifty grand. Jack says thanks. He concedes that he stiffed you in '55, but he's compensating you now."

I said, "That means it's over."

"That's right."

"And it was nothing but a cover-up from the gate."

He tossed me a cigar. It bounced off my chest and skittered close to the pool.

"I knew you'd take it all the way. '48 would have sufficed, but you took it back to Gwen's little sister, and did some good there. I told Jack, and that's why he kicked out the bread."

I said, "Loose ends out in the world. You wanted me to identify and curtail them. Jack's the big guy, and you'll move in when he's done."

He said, "Well put, if blunt. I also wanted to see who else you'd reel in and how much you'd find out."

"Hoffa? The Aadlands?"

He blew smoke rings. Two old girls jumped above the fence line and waved. He waved right back.

"Hoffa's deal with you was another cover-up. That's why he folded so quick when Marilyn died. He put you out as bait at Fox, to see what you could detect about the scams he and the Aadlands were putting money into. You're a whizbang detective, and Jimmy's a numbnuts. He bought all of Marilyn's crazy notions and thought they were moneymakers. Star power. He was up for some enchantment, and fell for it. Eddie's bracing the Aadlands tomorrow. He's turning them as informants. They'll testify against Hoffa in my jury-tampering case in Tennessee."

I laughed. "Bill Parker. Does he get the FBI gig?"

"No. He's too intemperate and juiced up. Pete Pitchess is only marginally better. Jack and I are looking at John Doar. He's a Justice lawyer, and a civil rights man. He's got a New Frontier look to him."

I grabbed my brown bag and stood up. Kennedy stood up. We exchanged bone crushers. He winced first.

"You're not as bad as you used to be, Freddy. You can take some pride in that."

—

I plumbed a line due east. There was nothing to do and no place to go. There was nobody to extort or intimidate. There were no opportunities disguised as love.

Loose ends.

That plumb line due east.

I U-turned onto Sunset. I saw Pali High—home of the Dolphins. I saw the Farr house and the Bay Theater. A jog north took me by Fifth Helena. A jog south took me back to Sunset and east to the Strip. Gwen's place stood empty. The living room had sustained damage. The dutiful Sheriff's wife will forward a check. I cruised by the Chapman Park Hotel and reversed course. I drove by Hollygrove and scoped that big tree.

I drove to the run-down house on Dunoon. Natasha's junker Ford was gone. She's off at the drugstore or the market. She doesn't roll anywhere else.

I'm an eideteker. I see things and imprint things that no one else sees. Natasha's front door has a built-in mail chute. It's long and wide. I brain-screened the dimensions the first time I was here.

A light rain kicked on. I walked up to the porch. I dropped Jack's fifty grand and a get-well card down the chute.

Cell 2607
Penance Penitentiary
Reckless-Wrecker-of-Lives Block
Pervert Purgatory
6/16/2012

I've spent twenty years in this fucking hellhole. Now they tell me I can memoir-map my misadventures and write my way out.

All that religious shit I disdained as a kid is true. There's heaven for the good folks, hell for the beastfully baaaaaad. There's purgatory for guys like me—caustic cads that capitalized on a sick system and caused catastrophe. I've pondered my sins for two decades. I've relived my earthly transit in dystopian detail. My cunning keepers are currently dangling a deal:

Record your jaundiced journey, and you may hit heaven on a high note. Baby, it's time to CONFESS.

Purgatory is Shitsville. You're stuck with the body you had on earth when you died. You eat nothing but coach-class airplane food. There's no booze, no jazzy intrigue, no women. My earthly victims visit my cell unpredictably. They remind me of my misdeeds and jab me in the ass with red-hot pokers. Fags flit down from heaven and scold me for outing them back in the fag-fragging '50s. Fuck—there's that limp-wristed lisper Johnnie Ray. The prongs of his pitchfork are white-hot. Johnnie had a righteous run from '53 to '56. His record "Cry" sold mega-millions. Confidential cornholed him. The piece was titled "Men's Room Mishegas: Jittery Johnnie Strikes Again!" Johnnie threatened to sue the magazine. I kicked his ass as a deterrent.

Fuck, Johnnie—those prongs are hot!!!!! How many times do I have to tell you I'm sorry?

Dig this, earthlings: You pay for your sins in the afterlife. I am telling it like it is.

My ass is always sore. Ava Gardner jabbed me last week. Ava was a noxious nympho with a delirious devotion to dark meat. I set her up with a Jungle Johnny packing studly steel. My boys kicked the door in and snapped photos. Confidential ran insidious ink.

April '54: "Ava Gardner: Mud Shark Mama!"

It was wrong. I'm ashamed. I've stewed in my evil shit for twenty years. Earthlings, I'm sorry.

My keepers have supplied me with pen and paper and a complete run of Confidential. My synapses are sizzling with a million malignant memories. Fred Otash, 1922–1992: rogue cop, private eye, shakedown artist. Soldier of fortune and demonic deus ex machina. The hellhound who held Hollywood captive. The man with all the sicko secrets you irksome earthlings want to hear.

Confidential presaged the infantile Internet. Our gobs of gossip were repugnantly real. Today's blowhard bloggers and their tattle texts? Pussyfooting punks all. We stung the studios and popped the politicians. We voyeur-vamped America and got her hooked on the devilish dish. We created today's tell-all media culture.

Yeah, I'm sorry. Yeah, I want to get paroled to that cloud bank upstairs. But—I more urgently want to groove my wild ride once again.

My keepers have given me back my 1950s-vintage body. It's a Machiavellian move to make me recall. They want to prime my prose and mold my moral vision. They've put me in telepathic touch with an earthling writer named James Ellroy.

Ellroy's a dipshit. I knew him in my waning months alive. I've been granted tell-all telepathy. I will know that cocksucker cold.

He ripped off my persona for a character in his overhyped novel L.A. Confidential. The book and major movie chewed Chihuahua dicks. I met Ellroy in the summer of '92. He wanted to turn my life story into a boffo TV series. He paid me some gelt for my FBI file—but I kicked off before he could glom it from me. I don't trust the motherfucker. He's a right-wing religious nut and a backer of Mitt Romney's current White House bid. I'm an Obama man—I dig the notion of a coon president. My keepers are setting up a purgatory-to-L.A. telepathy call. My most fitful fear so far? That Ellroy located my secret diaries. Man, did I dish the dirt on myself! I'm afraid that Ellroy is still beating the dead horse of an Otash TV show.

Fuck—I need to get upstairs. Montgomery Clift pitchforked me yesterday. Confidential lampooned the lavender Lilliputian as "Princess Tiny Meat." JFK followed Monty. He had Jackie in tow. It was a 1953 stink. I circulated a tape of Jack bringing the brisket to Ingrid Bergman. Frank Sinatra played the tape to Jackie and created some surging tsuris. Aaaaaaaargh—those pitchfork pokes hurt!!! Marilyn Monroe was the next penance poker. Baby, you did blow half the pharmacists in Beverly Hills in trade for Nembutal and Dilaudid! Maybe I shouldn't have spilled the beans, but I was within my First Amendment rights!

Brain blip—dipshit Ellroy's in my head. Reciprocal re-blip—now I'm in his.

It's my story, not his. He's only here to negate my nihilism and noodle my narrative.

Let this mind-bending march down memory lane begin …

Nate & Al's Deli
Beverly Hills
8/12/92

"I was working Central Vice in '51. We got word on a nigger whorehouse operating out of a pad at the Villa Elaine. I hotfooted it over there."

My booth at the deli. My audience: four showbiz hebes in worse shape than me. Walkers, canes, and oxygen tanks clogging the aisles to the kitchen. Fractious Freddy O., holding court.

It's summer '92. I'm 70 and in bad fucking shape. I've consumed a fifth of Scotch and three packs a day since kindergarten. I've got emphysema and a bum pump. I'm counting on my native panache to get me to 80. I know it's a lunar-looped long shot.

Sol Sidell said, "Get to it, Freddy. You roll to the pad and then what?"

Sinful Sol: a jailbaiter from jump street. He produced beach-blanket flicks in the '60s. I pulled him out of the shit in '57. He was smoking Mary Jane and poking two underage twists.

I said, "Okay, I roll to the crib and peep a side window. Shit—there's Sam Spiegel, the cat that produced Lawrence of Arabia and The Bridge on the River Kwai. He's muff-diving a black chick on the rag. That was a boss beef, back in '51. I told Sambo that it's dues time. A morals bust or a monthly donation to the Fred Otash Retirement Fund."

My pals yuk-yukked. I took a big bite of my Rueben sandwich and felt a twinge in my chest. I chased a Digitalis tablet with coffee and watched Jules Slotnick suck on his oxygen mask. Julie produced socially conscious turkeys about wetback farmworkers and oppressed schvartzes. It was pure atonement. He made all his live-in maids blow him. He held their green cards as a hedge against their refusal to bestow daily head.

Sid Resnick said, "Give us another one, Freddy."

The Sidster was Mr. Holocaust Heartache. He produced schlock-umentaries for the B'nai B'rith. Soulman Sid: A chubby chaser/shine shtupper combo. Currently captivated by a Congo cutie weighing 285.

I plumbed my brain stash for a tale my pals hadn't heard. Two elderly fruits sashayed by the booth and evil-eyed me. That gave me my cue.

I pointed to them. "I got tipped to an all-male pajama party in '56. I paid some LAPD hard boys a yard apiece to bust it and brought my camera along. Those cats were piled up in a five-way with Rock Hudson, Sal Mineo, and a dude with giant acne cysts. Confidential wrote it up. Universal paid me ten G's to keep the Rockster's name out of the story."

The whole booth roared. Julie Slotnick gasped for breath and oxygenized. Al Wexler yukked out a bagel chunk and said, "Tell us your motto again, Freddy. Man, it's a gasser."

Alky Al owned six porno bookstores, fourteen fag bars, and a nose-job clinic. He plowed a truck full of migrant Mexican workers and left six dead. I got it mashed down to a Mickey Mouse misdemeanor. Al owed me.

I killed my sandwich. Here it is, Freddy O.'s credo, intoned like the Gettysburg Address:

"I'll work for anyone but Communists. I'll do anything short of murder."

Boffo: My boys clapped and guffawed. Heads turned one booth over. An older guy flashed an LAPD retirement badge. I made him: Lieutenant Mike Matthews, a pious aide to my old foe, Chief William H. Parker, a.k.a. Whiskey Bill.

He stepped out of the booth. He said, "Freddy shot an unarmed man in cold blood. Has he told you that one?"

The cocksucker nailed me.

The cocksucker winked at my pals and ambled out to the street.

Sol said, "Come on, Freddy."

Julie said, "Give, boychik."

Sid said, "Give it up, living legend. Don't be a CT."

Al said, "You've been holding back, Freddy. You know that's not nice."

Another twinge hit my heart. I dipped a fistful of French fries in gravy and snarfed them. I popped another Digitalis and stared down my pals. Woooooo—that Fred Otash don't-fuck-with-me glare.

They twitched, flinched, and looked down. I waited a moment and let their submission simmer. I said, “I’m meeting a cat named James Ellroy here in half an hour. He wrote some shitty novels, and he wants to turn my life story into a TV show. If his money’s green, I’ll play along. I’ve requested my Freedom of Information Act file from the feds. It’s full of good dirt the putz will cream for.”

Sol looked up first. “It’s 1992. The ’50s are stale bread.”

Al looked up next. “The ’50s are a drug on the market. You can’t sell that shit to anyone but white stiffs in Des Moines.”

Sid looked up third. “Your story’s too ugly. It’s the Age of Aquarius, bubi. The wetback dishwashers are unionized, and the fruits want their rights. I predict a jig president one day. The only way Ellroy’s story will fly is to indict your evil, camel-fucker ass.”

Julie said, “Fuck your life story. How about a show about a movie producer who extorts blow jobs on a daily basis? It’s got pizzazz and social significance. You call it Head Man and run it on one of those cable channels that feature immoral content.”

I laffed. It built into howls and roars. I felt my corned beef and sauerkraut on the rise. I got floaty. I popped a bread crust out on my plate. Fuck—this again.

The booth tumbled. My pals vaporized. My vision went black. Ruffling calendar pages flew backwards. Decades disappeared and devolved. Please stop somewhere—I don’t know if I’m dead or in a dream—

Robbery Division Squad Room
LAPD Detective Bureau
6th Floor, City Hall
2/4/49

There I am. I’m primping in front of a hallway mirror in full uniform. Fred Otash at 27: beefcake, boss, and bangin’ them bonaroo bitches.

I exemplify greasy good looks. I’m full-blooded Lebanese—a camel cad from the get-go. I was a Marine Corps DI during the Big War. I joined the LAPD in late ’45. I went on the grift faaaaaast. I put together an ex-jarhead burglary ring. My downtown footbeat provided me with a road map of exploitable biz fronts. My gang hit pawnshops that fenced contraband, pharmacies that pushed narcotics, bookie joints behind storefront churches. I fingered the jobs. My gang clouted cash and merchandise. They were 2 a.m. creepers. I knew when the graveyard-shift prowl cars were elsewhere and passed the word along.

I've always been corruptible and tempted by the take. I don't know where it came from. I had a squaresville home life in Bumfuck, Massachusetts. My mom and dad loved me. Nobody buttfucked me in my crib. The tree limb bent early in my case. I've got a sketchy semblance of a code. There's shit I'll do, there's shit I won't do. The line wavered on that cold day back in '49.

I combed my hair and adjusted my necktie. The squad room buzzed heavy all around me. A shootout just went down at 9th and Figueroa. A traffic cop traded shots with a heist man. The cop was hit baaaaad and was not expected to live. The heist man was grazed and was expected to live. Both men were at Georgia Street Receiving right now.

The squad room buzzed. The squad-room phones rang incessant. I thought about the business cards I carried and handed out to women. They were understated and oozed high class. My name and phone number were printed in the middle. Right below: "Mr. Nine Inches."

I heard heavy footsteps. I got bombed by booze breath.

"If you're through looking at yourself, I've got something."

I turned around. It was a Robbery bull named Harry Fremont. Harry had a vivid rep. He allegedly stomped two pachucos to death during the Zoot Suit Riots. He allegedly pimped transvestite whores out of a he-she bar. He was non-allegedly shitfaced drunk at noon.

"Yeah, Harry?"

"Be useful, kid. There's a cop killer at Georgia Street. Chief Horrall thinks you should take care of it."

I said, "Take care of what? The cop isn't dead."

Harry dropped a key fob in my hand. "4-A-32. It's in the watch commander's space. Look under the backseat."

I steadied myself on the wall and lurched back to the bullpen. I zombie-walked downstairs. I couldn't feel my feet find the pavement. I swear this is true.

A K-car was parked in that space. The key fit the ignition. I couldn't feel my hands on the steering wheel. The garage was dark. Overhead pipes leaked. Water drops turned into sharp-toothed goblins.

I recall pulling out onto Spring Street. I recall driving slow. I might have prayed for nothing to be under the backseat.

The heist man was being held in the jail ward. He had to be fit for a transfer to the city lockup soon. It was 43 years ago. It's still etched in Sin-emascope and Surround Sound. I can still see the faces of passersby on the street.

There—Georgia Street Receiving.

The jail ward was on the north side. The ward for square-john folks was to the south. A narrow pathway separated the buildings. It hit me then:

They know you'll do it. They've sized you up as that kind of guy.

I reached under the backseat. Right there: transfer papers for one Ralph Mitchell Horvath and a .32 snub-nose.

I put the gun in my front pocket and grabbed the papers. I walked down the pathway and went through the jail-ward door. The deskman was LAPD. His eyes drifted to a punk handcuffed to a drainpipe. The punk wore a loafer jacket and slit-bottomed khakis. One arm was bandaged. His lips were covered with chancre sores. He looked insolent.

The deskman did the knife-across-throat thing on the QT. I handed him the papers and uncuffed and recuffed the punk. The deskman said, "Bon voyage, sweetheart."

I shoved the punk outside and pointed him up the pathway.

He walked ahead of me.

I couldn't feel my feet.

I couldn't feel my legs.

I felt my heart pump blood on overdrive and wondered why I couldn't feel my own limbs.

No windows on the north and south buildings. No pedestrians on Georgia Street.

No witnesses.

I pulled the gun from my pocket and fired over my own head. The gun kicked and lashed life back into my arms. The noise pounded a pulse to my legs.

The punk wheeled around. He moved his lips. A word came out as a squeak. I pulled my service revolver and shot him in the mouth. His teeth exploded as he fell. I placed the throw-down piece in his right hand.

He was trying to say "Please." That's what always gets me—every time I have this dream.

* * *

The cop lived. He’d sustained a through-and-through wound. He was back on duty in a week.

Vicious vengeance. Wrathfully wrong in retrospect. A crack in the crypt of my soul.

Harry Fremont passed the word: The Otash kid is kosher. Chief C. B. Horrall sent me a bottle of Old Crow. The grand jury sacked him a few months later. He was jungled up in a call-girl racket and much more. An interim chief was brought in.

Reform boded. I knew that. I didn’t know that future chief Bill Parker had a target pinned to my chest.

Ralph Mitchell Horvath: 1918–1949.

Ralphie: car thief, stickup man, weenie wagger. Hooked on yellow jackets and muscatel.

He left a widow. I started sending her a C-note a month, anonymously.

Calendar pages started ruffling. It’s where my dreams always get scary. They might go backwards and bypass my birth. They might go forward and announce my death. I’m fucked both ways. I’m no longer the freewheeling Fred O.

There’s a familiar thudding noise. It sounds like magazines slapping the pavement. We’re still in ’49. It can’t be Confidential—the rag didn’t hit the stands until ’53.

There’s that kid. There’s that wagon. He’s a newsboy. He’s off-loading magazines.

My eyelids rolled back. Time recalibrated. 43 years went poof! The thuds were a tall guy hitting the table. He wore a loud Hawaiian shirt and wheat jeans. He vibed GEEK.

He snarfed the remains of my Reuben sandwich. He said, “Mr. Otash, I’m James Ellroy.” The vibe solidified. Add “opportunist” to the cocksucker’s résumé.

I told him to sit down. He did it. I looked out to the street. My pals were hassling with their oxygen tanks and walkers. The sight spooked me. I reflex-popped a Digitalis and two Valium.

Ellroy slurped Julie Slotnick’s coffee. “It’s a pleasure, sir.”

I said, “Run it all by me again. Don’t be surprised when I mention money.”

Ellroy whipped out a checkbook and pen. “I’m calling the show Shakedown. It’s your life, times, and moral journey. You were a sack of shit. I'm a zealous Lutheran out to indict your sleazy misconduct and place it within the larger context of scandal-rag journalism and America in the '50s. Moreover, the actor who portrays you will have scalding-hot love scenes with the greatest actresses of this era."

I tapped the checkbook. "I fucked Jackie Kennedy in '53. She was engaged to Jack then. She said I was the biggest and the best."

Ellroy said, "I fucked Jackie Kennedy in '54. I was six years old. She said I was bigger and better than you."

I laffed, I roared, I howled. My gut bounced and banged the table. Ellroy wrote a check and dropped it on my plate. Ten G's—va-va-va-voom!

He said, "I want to see your FBI file."

I caught my breath. "It's on the way."

"I want to see the diaries that you've kept since the late '40s."

I went hot-hot and cold-cold. Freon Freddy, Frigid Freddy—make it sound good.

"It's a fucking myth, kid. I was never much good at writing shit down."

Ellroy shook his head. "Nix, boss. I spent some time with Harry Fremont the week before he died. He told me you whacked a hood named Ralph Mitchell Horvath in '49 and started writing the diary then. He said that you wrote it on bookies' flash paper, in case you had to burn it quick."

I palpitated and palsied. Old age fucks with your ability to lie.

"Like I said, kid. The diaries don't exist."

Ellroy fondled his checkbook. "I'll let it slide for now. And I'll come up green if you ever want to reconsider."

The Valium hit more—I started to go loosey-goosey.

"I want something written into my contract."

"Tell me."

"I want a boss guy to play me. Think of Clark Gable crossed with porno cat John Holmes."

Ellroy yukked. We shook hands. I pocketed the check and signaled Abe Rosen at the counter.

It's our regular deal. I grease Abe with double sawbucks. I get faux-paged for calls from big machers.

Abe hit the intercom. "Mr. Otash! President Bush is on the line!"

* * *

Memory Lane. It's the destination for old guys.

Ellroy's check cleared. I holed up at my pad through Labor Day. My diaries were packed in flame-retardant boxes. They were stashed with some piquant porno pics. Ellroy was back in Connecticut. We talked most nights. I went through my scrapbooks and dished the dirt on my loved ones, lewd ones, and lost ones.

The old photos had my gears going. I'm there with Frank, Dino, and Sammy. I broke legs for them. Why do they seem to be cringing at my touch? There's pics of my bed at my old Sunset Strip penthouse. I called it the "Landing Strip." The name derived from my three-ways with stewardesses, starlets, and stars. Liz Taylor and I swung with a stew named "Barb" on many groin-grabbing occasions. There's pics of my true love, Joi Lansing. We had some goooooooooooood years together. She treated me gooooooooood. I treated her gooooooooood until I treated her baaaaaaaaad. I don't know why I flip-flopped. My diaries describe that meshuggener metaphysic.

There's my dictionary and thesaurus. They were teaching tools for the writers at Confidential. Utilize alliteration and inventive slurs. Homos are "licentious lispers." Dykes are "beefcake butches." Drunks are "bibulous bottle hounds" and "dyspeptic dipsos." Vulgarize and vitalize and crazily create a popular parlance. Make it sinfully siiiiiing.

Ellroy's noxious novels—stamped with my style. Ellroy's pious putz personality—an odious one to me.

My pals came over on Labor Day. We grilled burgers and hot dogs and killed three quarts of Jim Beam. They left at 2 a.m. A male nurse corps wheeled them down to their limos. The process took half an hour. It was akin to the Berlin Airlift. Walkers crashed, oxygen tanks toppled and rolled. It was fucking hard to endure.

I settled in to watch a Dragnet rerun. I bought the judge in four of Jack Webb's drunk-driving beefs. I shtupped Jack's ex-wife, soaring songstress Julie London.

A dozen Famous Amos cookies comprised my late-night snack. I'd seen the episode before. Sergeant Joe Friday busts a hippie punk on a snootful of LSD. I missed Jack. We had some yuks together. He kicked off back in—

A sledgehammer hit my heart. A steel croquet mallet followed. A monster loomed in front of me. He's Johnnie Ray, he's Monty Clift, he's politicians pounded and movie stars mauled—a kaleidoscope of condemnation.

They railed at me. J'accuse, j'accuse, j'accuse!!!!! They hurled ingots at my chest. I gasped. My left arm exploded. I hit the medical-emergency button on my phone.

Then some pinpoint fades to black. Then my pad turns topsy-turvy. Then a big crash and my door shattered like my left arm. Then the mask on my mouth and a fraction of my sight back. Then the gurney, the white-coat men, and the swoop aloft.

One coat guy looked like James Ellroy—but I knew it couldn't be. An image came to me. It was bright, vivid, old. I saw a little red wagon. I saw words on a strip of red paint. Everything started to fade then. The white-coat man morphed into Ellroy. I still knew it couldn't be.

Ellroy said, "Hey, Freddy. What's shaking?"

My breath rasped. I knew I only had two words left.

I said, "Red Ryder."

2

James Ellroy's journal
7/12/92

Freddy, I hardly knew ye.

I dug you—but didn't respect you. There's a distinction. How's the afterlife, fuckhead? Repent, you reptile. Yeah, I ripped off your raucous way with words. But I'm not you—you homo hater, dyke defamer, and racist raconteur.

The obits ran tripartite. The prime gist: ex-cop Otash hires on with Confidential. He runs an intelligence network and gathers information on celebrity hijinks. Part two was more pithy: Freddy was a longtime extortionist. His intelligence network supplied the dirt for his shakedown racket. Part three jazzed me. The scandal-rag era bellied up in '59. Confidential—kaput. Desperate Freddy pulled a racetrack caper. He doped a nag named Wonder Boy and lost his PI's license. He became a mob lapdog. Jimmy Hoffa hired him to get the goods on JFK shtupping Marilyn Monroe. His aging Marine Corps goons spilled the tale to reporters. Freddy bugged Peter Lawford's beachfront fuck pad and caught Jack in the sack. Ooooooooooooh, daddy-o: my pulsatingly possible TV show could run indefinitely!!!!!

I got the word on Freddy's death and flew back to L.A. quicksville. The papers were full of Otash lore. Yawn: his adversarial relationship with LAPD chief William H. Parker. His '57 interview with TV ham Mike Wallace. His relationship with Confidential's pervo publisher, Bondage Bob Harrison. Snore: "Fred Otash was the founding father of the tabloid-TV era." Snooze: "Otash defined the paranoiac horrors of the Red-Scare Decade." An ex-Liberace bun boy dropped a pearl in with the dross: "I know that Freddy got Lee out of a jam in the early '50s, but he damn well got paid for it."

Freddy owned a condo off the Sunset Strip. My first task:

intercept his FBI Freedom of Information Act file. I talked to Freddy on the day he died. The file hadn't arrived. I've called the building's manager every day since. I impersonated Freddy's lawyer and said I was expecting some files from the feds. The man called me as I left for the airport. Sir, that box just arrived.

I rented a car at LAX. I drove to Chez Otash and snatched the file posthaste. A small UPS box held all the material. I carried the box to my car and tore into it.

Every page was heavily ink-redacted. Odd lines were untouched. Sixteen pages of blacked-out lines and this:

"Accused of extortion," "accused of bribery," "accused of harassment," "accused of suborning perjury," "accused of jury tampering."

Please—give me some shit I don't know.

A photo ID sheet was included. I recognized pics of Freddy's squeeze, Joi Lansing, and Freddy's snitch-pal, '50s-cool James Dean. Bob Harrison—mucho snapshots. Liberace—of course. Liz Taylor—sure. Her ex-hubby Michael Wilding? Yeah, I get it. Ward Wardell, Race Rockwell, Donkey Don Eversall? Freddy mentioned them. They were fruit hustlers in his stable.

The file was a bust.

That left Freddy's secret diaries.

Freddy said they did not exist.

They might be locked in a bank vault and thus out of reach. They might be packed in a box in that condo across the street.

Do it, dipshit. Life itself is the Big Shakedown, and you can't let this one go.

* * *

I broke in that night.

It wasn't hard. I threw my weight at a loose stretch of the door-doorjamb juncture. The door popped easy. I carried a penlight and prowled in the dark.

I tossed the cabinets. I eyeballed the shelves. I displaced 10,000 leisure sweatsuits. Freddy's scrapbooks were useless. His gold Rolex was a fake. I found a Nazi Luger in the sock drawer. I found a stack of porn vids under the sink. I hit pay dirt in a hall closet.

Photos: plastic-sheathed and lovingly preserved.

Marlon Brando with a dick in his mouth.

Lena Horne muff-diving Lady Bird Johnson.

And—

A box full of bookies' flash paper.

I skimmed a few pages. Freddy block-printed legibly. He deployed a calendar-page motif to encapsulate anecdotes. It was lurid lightning in a bottle. It was the Hellacious Holy Grail and the Demonic Dead Sea Scrolls.

The entire TV series and a corresponding run of novellas came to me rápidamente.

A photo fell out of the box. Holy shit—Rin Tin Tin fucking Katharine Hepburn.

I grabbed the box and put the photo in my pocket. My wife Helen was a big Hepburn fan.

Downtown L.A.
10/4/52

Calendar sheets ruffled. Paper wilted and blew. I recalled that hot summer and those fall storms. I was working the Central day watch. I'd disbanded my burglary gang. Two of my men got hooked on Big H. They were decidedly desperate and snitch-prone. I'd gambled away all my gelt. I was living on a schmuck cop's pay and was suffused with the blues. William H. Parker became chief in '50. He instituted righteous reforms and riddled the ranks with a phalanx of finks to sniff out miscreants and misconduct. I drove a Lin-coon Coon-tinental coon-vertible. I won it in a niggertown card game. It was a "suspect expenditure." Parker's boys tattled to the hellhound jefe. I got called in and grindingly grilled. Parker warned me not to be a Bolshevik and said, "I've got my four eyes on you."

The rain was a mad monsoon. Wild winds whipped me on my footbeat. I stopped at a Gamewell phone and called the station. The deskman told me to hotfoot to 668 South Olive. They were shooting a Racket Squad episode in the lobby. They needed a hard boy to shoo off autograph hounds.

I headed over there. I caught a taut tailwind and slalomed most of the way. It was a medical building with a pharmacy and adjoining lobby. I caught a frazzled fracas on the set right off.

Lights, cameras, boom mikes—and action.

A jug-eared cat was hassling a boss blonde. He wore pegged chinos and a gone jacket. She was built from the ground up.

The cast and crew eyeballed the scene. Jug-ears grabbed the blonde's arm and applied abrasions. It gored my gonads and hit my heartstrings. I walked up behind him. He saw my shadow and swiveled. I broke his nose with a palm shot. I looped a left to his larynx. I kneed his nuts as he dropped.

The blonde's jaw dropped. I tipped my hat to her.

Jug-ears cradled his busted beak and moaned for his mama. The cast and crew clapped.

The blonde said, “He’s my ex-husband. He stiffed me for three months’ alimony.”

I kicked him in the head and lifted his wallet. He mama-moaned anew. The cast and crew wolf-whistled.

The wallet weighed in heavy. I fanned the cash compartment and counted a sea of C-notes. I handed them to the blonde. She dropped them in her purse and dropped a dollar on her ex-hubby. She said, “For old times. He was good in the sack.”

I laffed. I reached in my pocket and handed her a card. Understated class: my name, phone number, and “Mr. Nine Inches.”

She dropped the card in with her cash stash. A guy yelled, “You’re up, Joi! Scene 16-B!”

She winked and walked away from me. I handcuffed Jug-ears behind his back and pay-phone-called the station. Holly-weird: they filmed the scene with the ex coma-conked and cuffed on the floor.

I walked outside and smoked a cigarette. A black-and-white cruised by and hauled the ex to Georgia Street Receiving. I thought of Ralph Mitchell Horvath. A kid brought me a cup of coffee and returned my calling card. She’d written on the back:

“Joi Lansing. 39-25-38. Googie’s, tonight at 8:30.”

* * *

I had a wolf’s lair above the Strip. It was furnished with Jap flags and shadow-boxed Lugers. I never made it overseas. I spent the war at Parris Island, South Carolina. There’s a periscope affixed to my back porch. I use it to spy on neighbor women.

I’ve always voyeurized.

I’ve always studied people.

I’ve always wanted to know their secret shit.

My bedroom featured a walk-in closet. I blew my burglary stash on Sy Devore suits. My dresser drawer was full of lacy lingerie. My lynx-like lovers left me magnificent mementoes.

I’ve got a file on Ralph Mitchell Horvath. I culled it from PDs and penitentiaries statewide. I knew all Ralphie’s secrets.

He poked a Mexican sissy in reform school. He fathered two half-wit kids. He pimped his wife to cover his poker debts. He scored prescription goofballs from a Chink pharmacist.

It bought me some distance on Ralphie. The more you know about people, the less they get to you. I've known that godless gospel since my crib.

I dressed sharp for Joi Lansing. I wore my crocodile loafers and slipped my heater into a shoulder rig. A spritz of Lucky Tiger—and a two-minute stroll to the meet.

Googie's was a coffee cave on Sunset and Crescent Heights. The Space Age aesthetic rubbed me raw. Fluorescent lights, Naugahyde, chrome. A hopping hive for showbiz shitheels headed for hell.

I walked in and watched Joi Lansing table-hop. She wore a too-tight gown and a mink stole with a pawnshop tag attached. The joint was bustling about a sneak peek in Glendale. A Googie's regular had an on-screen love scene with Bob Mitchum. Bad Boy Bob kept slipping her tongue. They shared a reefer in the RKO backlot. She blew him in Howard Hughes's limousine.

A hubbub juked the joint—I knew I radiated FUZZ. I crashed into a booth and unbuttoned my jacket. A fag flamed by and ogled my piece. He joined a hen party one booth over. More dirt spilled: the barman at the Cockpit Lounge ran an all-boy slave auction. Adlai Stevenson got enthralled and embroiled. The hens hooted—ha, ha, ha!

Joi sat down. I pointed to the pawnshop tag. She pulled it off and dropped it in the ashtray.

I said, "Thanks for the invitation."

Joi said, "Thanks for the revenge. That guy fractured my left wrist on Saint Patrick's Day '49."

"You're too young to have an ex-husband."

"Yeah, and I'm estranged from number two. I'd head to Reno for a quickie, but it might not work. We got hitched in TJ, so the paperwork could get dicey."

"Is there anything I can do?"

"Well, you're a policeman."

I lit a cigarette and held the pack out. Joi shook her head.

"He's on parole, and he's a grasshopper. You could call Narco."

I shook my head. "Give me his address. I'll think of something."

"He'll be here at 9:30. He's been living at the Y since I kicked him out, and the fry cook takes his phone calls. He's a non-union grip. I stiffed him a fake message after I met you. You're a producer at Fox with a job for him. You're meeting him in the parking lot."

I laffed. "You just assumed that I'd do it?"

Joi laffed. "Come on, Freddy. That stunt you pulled downtown and ‘Mr. Nine Inches’? What won’t you do for money or gash?”

A Mex busboy sidled by. I grabbed a belt loop and stopped him. He saw my roscoe and got the wigged-out wetback shakes.

I stuffed a twenty in his shirt pocket. “Go to the kitchen and get me a bag of weed. You’ll be on the night train to Culiacán if you don’t deliver.”

Pancho genuflected and took off. Joi laffed and bummed a cigarette. I blew a high smoke ring. She blew a higher one. It hit the ceiling and mushroomed.

The Mex came back with the goods. I told him to scram. The hen party squawked a new nugget: Ava Gardner dumped Sinatra for a heavy-hung shine.

I said, “What’s your real name?”

Joi said, “Joyce Wassmansdorff.”

“Give me the fill-in.”

“I’m from Salt Lake City. I’m 24. I went to the MGM school and went nowhere.”

“But now you’re up and coming?”

Joi stubbed out her cigarette. “I’m uncredited in six pictures and credited in four. I’ve got Racket Squad, Gangbusters, and a comedy with Jane Russell in the can.”

“Give me some dirt on Russell.”

“What’s to give? She’s a goody two-shoes married to that quarterback for the Rams.”

My stomach growled. I noshed a breadstick and eyeballed the room. Easy make: the two crew cuts by the takeout stand were Parker boys. Harry Fremont pointed them out to me last month. They were purse-lipped Puritans out to bag bent cops.

Joi said, “You’ll need money to enjoy my company.”

I smiled and re-eyeballed the room. A punk I popped for flim-flam made me and beat feet. Joi said, “It’s 9:30. Look for a little guy with a big pompadour.”

I walked back to the parking lot. Pompadour lounged on a ’51 Merc. I got close to him. He orbed my shoulder rig and went Oh, shit. He wore light-colored slacks. Piss coursed and covered his cuffs. I deferred to diplomacy.

“Don’t contest the divorce. I’ll negotiate your alimony payments. Send the check directly to me. I’ll take my cut and deliver the rest to Miss Lansing.”

Pompadour held up his hands—Don’t hit me, hoss. I pulled out the bag of weed and caught his left mitt in one motion. I pressed hard to ensure a full fingerprint spread.

It started drizzling. I gestured toward the street. Joi Lansing's second ex-hubby took off running.

"Hollywood could use a guy like you."

I turned around. "You mean I could use Hollywood."

Joi gave me a big kiss.

It all started just like that.

4

I heisted a bookie room a week later.

A Hitler mask concealed my identity. I entered with an empty grocery sack and exited with four grand. I spent half the swag on Joi and bankrolled my biz with the remainder. A Beverly Hills pharmacist fronted me a pill pusher's Parthenon. Harry Fremont sold me eight ice-cold roscoes. Joi hipped me to a discreet scrape doctor. I gave him a signing bonus and told him I'd be out seeking nice-girls-in-a-jam. Guns, dope, and a felonious physician. My girlfriend as conduit to a corrupt culture.

Joi hit Hollywood in '42. She was 14. She matriculated at MGM and met everybody. She was both low-rent and confoundingly connected. She knew everything. She was a one-babe Baedeker. She knew bartenders, bellhops, busboys, call girls, casting directors, and cads. She knew pornographers, pushers, and pimps. She knew troves of tramps in trouble. She knew that this soiled city lacked a single fix-it man. That was my role.

Joi greased Holly-weird with my handouts. Scores of scurrilous scamsters licked up my largesse. We were buying potentially profitable dirt.

I worked LAPD. I got an off-duty gig as security boss at the Hollywood Ranch Market. It was licentiously legendary and open-all-nite. I bagged shoplifters and check kiters. I lived within my means and never gave Bill Parker's goons a hook to entrap me. I took Joi to Ciro's and the Mocambo. I saw intelligence-squad cops dead-eying the scene. I braced them as a brother and ballyhooed my big nights financed by big days at the track.

I sold guns, I sold pills, I brokered abortions. I mail-order-hawked a filthy film called Mae West's Menagerie. Shack jobs were verboten for LAPD men. Joi and I trysted at her mom's pad in Redondo Beach. She said the word was moving out and metastasizing: Fred O.'s the man to see.

Assignments rolled in. I pounded a perv who'd whipped out his whang on Duke Wayne's wife. Duke paid me five yards and gave me the skinny on Red Hollywood. Dino Martin called me. That's amore: he knocked up his Mex maid with soon-to-hatch triplets. I bribed a customs official and got Dolorous Dolores deported to Mexico. Dino paid me two G's and dished the dirt on a stunning string of starlets. They bounced on my bed two at a time and dug up dirt on my regular retainer. Want C-notes and riotous ruts in the hay? Call Mr. Nine Inches.

I got Lana Turner a scrape. She banged an alto sax named Art Pepper in a bout of bebop abandon. Putzy Pepper wanted her to keep the kid and threatened exposure. I planted two reefers in his sax case and got him six months at Wayside Honor Rancho.

Joi knew a classy clique of Hancock Park housewives. They were unbearably unbodied and entrenched in ennui. They needed furtive fucking. She saw money in it.

Franchot Tone's girlfriend was banging a boogie. It was something out of Ramar of the Jungle. I covered the Congo and caught the cat in a gassed-hair joint on Slauson. I kicked his black ass back to Biloxi.

That Fred Otash—he baaaaaaaaaaad!

Joi said Liberace had a job for me. We were in the sack at her mom's place. Her eyes twinkled and twirled me some all-new way. She drew dollar signs in the air.

The moment vibrates in VistaVision and fabulous Fag-O-Scope. There's calendar pages and sheet music. A piano noodles a nocturne and pounds a polonaise.

Liberace's Swank Swish Pad
Coldwater Canyon
4/29/53

A fairy factotum met me. The yard was tropically tricked out and football-field size.

Flamingos flitted. Toucans tooled and bit at bugs. A path cut through ten-foot-high fronds and floral explosions. Everything was green, purple, and pink.

We hit a clearing. It was paved with stones embossed with musical clefs. The pool was shaped like a piano. Liberace sat in a deck chair. A leopard with a mink collar was snoozing at his feet.

The factotum sashayed off. I pulled up a deck chair. The leopard stirred and snarled at me. I scratched his neck. He went back to sleep.

Liberace said, “You’re fearless. You’re the kind of man I need.”

“I’m here to help you out, sir. Joi said you’ve got a guy bugging you.”

The factotum sashayed back with cocktails. Two highball glasses emitted nuclear pink foam. The guy served us and skedaddled. My drink tasted like high-test bubble gum.

Liberace said, “Bottoms up.” Pederast patter—yuk, yuk.

“A kid’s putting the boots to you, right? Pay up or he’ll rat you to the Legion of Decency. All those dago mob guys that book your act in Vegas will hightail it. Your TV show will be canceled if word gets out you go Greek.”

Liberace sighed. “Inimitably candid, and so, so true. He’s a dishwasher at Perino’s. What was I thinking?”

I sipped my pink drink. “Pictures?”

“Of course, dear heart. He lured me to a motel with a wall peek.”

A hi-fi speaker by the pool kicked on. Judy Garland belted, “Someday he’ll come along, the man I love.” The leopard woke up and licked his balls. Liberace goo-goo-talked him.

“Five thou, sir. You get the pictures and negatives, along with my assurance that it won’t happen again.”

Liberace pouted. His chest heaved. Sequins popped off his toga, caught the light, and shined. The leopard ambled to the pool and hung his ass over the edge. A giant shit ensued.

The factotum ran up with a scoop device. Liberace reached under his chair and pulled out a scrapbook.

“Ex-convicts are a weakness of mine, I’m chagrined to say. I’ve got mug shots of him and quite a few other rough-trade conquests. It’s my new hobby. I paste pictures when I’m not wowing my fans or practicing Chopin.”

I grabbed the book and leafed through it. It was the fucking lavender lodestone. I counted 26 KY cowboys wearing neck boards. Names, dates, penal-code numbers. A smutty smorgasbord of malignant maleness. Parole holds and prosty beefs galore.

Liberace jabbed a pic of one Manolo Sanchez. The guy was a Filipino flathead.

“He broke my heart while his evil lezzie sister took snapshots. Feel free to get tough.”

I nodded and flipped ahead. Three glum glamour boys beamed baleful off the page. Ward Wardell, Race Rockwell, Donkey Don Eversall. All booked for possession of pornography.

I pointed to the pics. “Blue movie actors, right? They peddle it on the side. You see the movies, you get a yen, you make a phone call.”

“That’s correct. I went to a screening at Michael Wilding and Liz Taylor’s house. Michael screened Locker Room Lust and Jailhouse Heat and supplied the referral.”

“Referral” buzz-bombed me. “Could these guys get it up for women?”

Liberace whooped. “Could, can, and do, sweetheart. And Donkey Don is the eighth wonder of the world, if you follow my drift.”

I tingled. I thought parlay. I saw dollar signs and movie-star movement on my Landing Strip.

“So, Michael Wilding’s a gay caballero?”

“In spades, love. His house is known as the ‘Fruit Stand,’ which perturbs lovely Liz no end.”

I yukked. “And Liz wants a divorce so she can move on to her next husband and break the all-time world record?”

Liberace slapped his knees. “Yes, and she’s pulling ahead of your girlfriend in that department.”

I cracked my knuckles. Liberace swooned. The fey fucker almost creamed in his jeans.

“Tell Liz to meet me at the Beverly Hills Hotel tomorrow night. Fill her in on my résumé.”

Liberace re-swooned. The leopard snarled and shooed a toucan up a tree.

Perino’s was high swank and old money. It catered to sterile stiffs and dotty dowagers who lived with 45 cats. I drove over at close-up time and parked by the back kitchen door. It was propped open. Manolo Sanchez and a fat beaner were scrubbing pots.

I got out of the car and hunkered low. I noted a row of lockers by a walk-in freezer. Fats opened his locker, grabbed a coat, and hit the road. I had the filthy Filipino alone.

He minced to his locker and primped. A mirror covered the inside door and threw his image back at me. I cop-read him: vicious little prick.

I squinted. Aaaaaaaah, the top locker shelf. A stack of photo sheaths.

He picked his teeth, he squeezed blackheads, he de-waxed his ears. I walked in. I crept up behind him. I pulled my beavertail sap. I saw his neck hairs bristle. He wheeled and pulled a shiv.

Flick—the blade sliced my Sy Devore blazer. He shrieked insults in Tagalog. They assuredly pertained to my mother.

He pirouetted and parried. We were in knife-fight tight. I risked a ripe stab wound and roundhoused him to the head. My sap hit him full force.

The seams ripped his face. The business end tore an eyebrow loose and smashed in his nose. He dropped the knife. I kicked it away. I grabbed his neck and squelched a scream. The deep-fry dipper was a few feet away. It was spitting hot grease and spuds Lyonnaise.

I dragged him over. I stuck his knife hand in the grease and French-fried it. I thought of all the Japs I would have killed if I hadn't spent the war stateside.

He screamed. It was brigades of torched Japs on Saipan. I held his hand in the grease and burned it to the bone. Spatters hit my London Shop shirt.

I dropped his hand. I walked to the locker, grabbed the pictures, and flipped through them. Liberace Goes Greek—Kodacolor prints and negatives.

Sanchez screamed and careened through the kitchen. He overturned a dish rack and spastic-bounced off the walls. His hand was charbroiled. I saw flesh fall off the fingers.

* * *

The night was young. I was five thou to the good and hopped up on blood and aggression. Revelation ripped me. I knew I could mix my own fruit shakes. I decided to keep two of the negatives.

A call to R&I delivered the dish on the smut-film troika. The boys shared a pad in Silver Lake and a bent for things sex-soiled and seditious. Semper fi—they met in the Marine Corps and ran rackets out of a bondage bar down in Dago. They sold forged green cards, peddled Spanish fly, led Rotary groups to TJ for the mule act. Their bestselling item: dildo replicas of Donkey Don's 16-inch whanger.

They fell in the shit in ’50. They sold Spanish fly to a high-school nympho and promised her a date with Donkey Don. The Donkster reneged. The nympho impaled herself on the gearshift of a ’46 Buick and hemorrhaged. San Diego PD filed assault one. The judge tossed the case. A ripe rumor: he was one of Race Rockwell’s regular tricks.

Their pad was a little wood-frame job overrun by bougainvillea. I rang the bell at 23:00 and got no answer. A loose window screen gave me quick access. I crept flashlight-first and inventoried.

The boys possessed Nazi armbands, Mickey Spillane novels, and combat-pinned Marine blues. Barbells, camera and lighting gear, nudist-colony mags going back to ’36. Souvenir snapshots from the Klub Satan, Tijuana, New Year’s ’48. Ticket stubs from the Manuel Ortiz–Harold Dade fight. A promotional contract for a nigger stumblebum named Junior “Knockout” Wilkins.

I walked out to the porch. I brought a pint of the boys’ Old Crow with me. I recognized the ribbons on their uniforms. I was training troops in Parris Island while they stormed Guadalcanal.

I sipped bourbon. I got a light load on. A jalopy pulled up at 1 a.m. The boys piled out and made for the door.

I whipped out my badge and held my flashlight beam on it. It was très dark out. I couldn’t see them cringe and capitulate. I imagined it, ghoul-like.

“My name’s Fred Otash. You’re going into business with me.”

* * *

Exuberant extortionist, enterprising entrepreneur. A round-the-clock roundelay as I licked my lips for Liz.

I got half-gassed with the lads and laid down the law: 20 percent of your smut biz in trade for police protection. And—you’re now the naughty nucleus of Fred O.’s stud farm. Get ready to bring the brisket to some housewives in heat.

Donkey Don laid a ladle of bennies on me. I buzzed through a tour of duty downtown. I broke up a fistfight at the Jesus Saves Mission. I chased a raft of Red agitators out of Pershing Square. I popped a whip-out man at the Mayan Theater. I busted a high-spirited kid setting winos on fire with a blowtorch.

My tour of duty tapped down. I went by the criminal-courts building and read up on divorce law. I reserved a bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel and scrounged refreshments off local merchants. Lou's Liquor Locker supplied champagne. Hank's Hofbrau coughed up cold cuts. Fast delivery was assured.

I swooped by my pad and traded my cop suit for a Cary Grant ensemble. Oh, yeah—it's your ardent arriviste poised to pounce!

The bungalow was big and boss, flouncy and flamboyant. The bellman sneered at the baloney and cheese backlit by spotlights. He rolled his eyes and split. I paced and smoked myself hoarse. The bell rang at 8 o'clock on the dot.

There she is—Elizabeth Taylor at twenty.

She stood in the doorway. I fumbled for an opener. She wore a tight white dress that caressed her curves and clamored up her cleavage. She said, "If I move too fast, I'll split a seam. Help me over to that couch."

I grabbed an elbow and steered her. She felt my hand tremble and smiled. I sat her down and poured two glasses of '53 domestic. We perched on the couch and offered up a toast.

Liz raised her arm. A dress seam split down to her hemline. She said, "Shit. I didn't have to wear this. You're just the bird dog for my divorce."

I yukked. Liz said, "Don't marry me, okay? I can't keep doing this for the rest of my life."

"Have I got a chance?"

"More than you think. Hotel heirs and queer actors haven't worked out, so who's to say a cop wouldn't?"

I smiled and sipped champagne. Liz reached around, snagged a slice of baloney, and snarfed it. The dress was still constricting her. She looked plainly plaintive.

I unzipped the back and gave her some breath room. She sighed —Aaaaah, that's good.

The shoulder straps went slack and fell down her arms. She deadpanned it. Our knees brushed on the couch. Liz retained the contact.

"How do I cut loose of Michael? I can't cite mental cruelty, because he's a sweetheart, and I don't want to hurt him. I know you have to show just cause in order to sue."

I refilled her glass. "I'll bug your house. You get Wilding looped and get him to admit he digs boys. I levy the threat in a civilized manner, and he consents to an uncontested divorce."

Liz beamed. "It's that easy?"

"We're all civilized white folks. You probably earn more money than him, but he's older and has substantial holdings. You broker the property split and the alimony along those lines."

"And how are you compensated?"

"I get 10 percent of your alimony payments, in perpetuity. You keep me in mind and refer me to people who might require my services."

Liz laid an arm across the couch cushions. Her dress collapsed past her brassiere. Our eyes found a fit. The rest of the room vaporized.

"And how will I keep you in mind? There's lots of people vying for my attention."

"I'll do my best to make this a memorable evening."

* * *

It was, for me.

Liz passed away a few years ago.

If I get to heaven, I'll grill her per that first time.

It started out clumsy and sweet. My punch line cued the first kiss. Liz was already victimized by too-tight attire. She shrugged her dress off down to her waist. Our kisses multiplied.

I carried her into the bedroom. She popped off three buttons on my shirt. They zinged across the room. We laffed. I heard the radio a bungalow over. Rosemary Clooney sang, "Hey, there—you with the stars in your eyes."

We got naked. State it stark: we were built boss, stratosphere stacked and hung homewrecker heavy. We were the boffo best of L.A., circa '53.

We made love all night. We drank champagne with Drambuie chasers. We smoked two packs of cigarettes and spritzed gossip. We put on robes and climbed to the roof of the bungalow at dawn.

An A-bomb test was scheduled in Nevada. The newspapers predicted some dazzling fireworks. Other bungalow dwellers were up on their roofs. There's Bob Mitchum and a young quail smoking a reefer, there's Marilyn Monroe and Lee Strasberg, there's Ingrid Bergman and Roberto Rossellini. Everybody looks fuck-struck and happy. Everybody's got a jug for the toast.

Everybody laffed and waved hello. Mitchum brought a portable radio for the countdown. He turned it on. I heard static and "… 8, 7, 6, 5, 4, 3, 2, 1.”

The world went WHOOSH. The ground shook. The sky lit up mauve and pink. We all raised our bottles and applauded. The colors receded into bright white light. I had my arm around Elizabeth Taylor. I looked Ingrid Bergman straight in the eyes.

5

L.A. ’53 was my ground zero. That A-bomb blast still shoots shock waves through me. My calendar pages are radioactively roasted. You can’t read the dates as they swirl.

There was smog in the air then. People coughed and gasped citywide. I never noticed it. The bomb-blast colors stayed with me. My L.A. was always mauve and pink.

I worked LAPD. I walked a downtown footbeat. I rousted Reds during the “Free the Rosenbergs!” fracas. I pinched pervs, purse snatchers, and pickpockets in Pershing Square. My smut-film biz laid in loot. Donkey Don Eversall plied his python all over Hancock Park. Joi was Donkey Don’s dispatcher. She coffee-klatched with horny housewives and set up the dates. Liberace gave me girl-talk gossip. Liz Taylor and Michael Wilding went to Splitsville. I got 10 percent of Liz’s alimony. Joi, Liz, and I threeskied on my Landing Strip. Liz knew a Pan Am stew named Barb Bonvillain. She flew the L.A.–to–Mexico City route and had half of Hollywood hooked on Dilaudid and morphine suppositories. Bad Barb was 6'3", 180, 40-24-36. She scored high in the women’s decathlon, Helsinki ’52. All four of us locked loins. The Landing Strip lurched. We murdered the mattress and banged the box springs down to the floor.

L.A. ’53—ring-a-ding-ding!

Joi and I hit the Crescendo and the Largo most nights. Cocktail waitresses fed me slander slurs in exchange for my titanic tips. It was my kid-voyeur days, rabidly redux.

A fragmenting frustration set in. I had the dirt. It would take an armada of shakedown shills and photo fiends to deploy it. I racked my brain. I knocked my noggin against the bruising brick wall of unknowing. Extortion as existential dilemma. A confounding conundrum worthy of those French philosopher cats.

My cop life could not compete with the lush life. I was a double agent akin to that Commie cad Alger Hiss. Liz Taylor drove me to Central Station and signed autographs for the blues. I knew that word would leak to Chief William H. Parker. I was full of a finger-stabbing Fuck you.

Ralph Mitchell Horvath still haunted me. Nightmares nabbed me as I slid into sleep. Joi and Liz nursed me with yellow jackets and booze. My bedtime mantra was He Deserved to Die. It was beastly bullshit. I couldn't convince myself that what I did was right.

The Rosenbergs fried at Sing Sing. That was justified. They sold A-bomb secrets to Russia. They got what they paid for.

I developed my personal credo: "I'll work for anyone but Communists. I'll do anything short of murder."

Morally sound in L.A., circa '53. Equally sound in purgatory today.

I spent nuke-bomb nights at the Hollywood Ranch Market. My office was two-way-mirrored and overlooked the aisles. I scanned for boosters and looked down at legions of the lost.

Their pathos pounded me. Bit actors buying stale bread and Tokay. Six-foot-two drag queens shopping for extra-long nylons. Cough-syrup hopheads reading labels for the codeine content. Teenage boys sneaking girlie mags to the can to jerk off.

I watched, I peeped, I lost myself in the losers. A goofy ghost came and went with them.

He was about 23. He slouched in windbreakers and wore cigarettes as props. He breezed through the aisles at 3 a.m. He always looked ecstatic. He talked to people. He cultivated people. He studied people the way I looked in windows as a kid. I saw him out on the sidewalk once. He played the bongos for a clique of fags and junkies. A girl called him "Jimmy."

The fucker appeared intermittent. I made him for an actor living off chump change and aging fruits. I saw him kiss a girl by the bread bin. I saw him kiss a boy in the soup aisle. He moved with a weirdo grace. He wasn't froufrou or masculine. He was in on some exalted joke.

I saw him boost a carton of Pall Malls. I cornered him, cuffed him, and hauled him upstairs. His name was James Dean. He was from Bumfuck, Indiana. He was an actor and a bohemian you-name-it. He explained that Pall Mall cigarettes were queer code. The In hoc signo vinces on the pack meant "In this sign you shall conquer." Homos flashed Pall Malls and ID'd each other. It was all-new shit to me.

I let Jimmy off with a warning. We started hanging out in the office. We tipped Old Crow, looked down on the floor, and gassed on the humanoids. Jimmy habituated the leather bars in East Hollywood. He ratted off pushers and celebrity quiffs and filled a whole side of my dirt bin. I told him about my smut-film and male-prosty gigs. I promised him a date with Donkey Don Eversall in exchange for hot dirt.

We'd hit silent stretches. I'd scan the floor. Jimmy would read scandal rags.

They were just popping up. Peep, Transom, Whisper, Tattle, Lowdown. Titillation texts. Lurid language marred by mitigation. Insipid innuendo.

Politicos got slurred as Red—but never nailed past implication. Jimmy loved the rags but said they weren't sufficiently sordid or precise in their prose. He called them "timid tipster texts." He said, "You've got better skank than this, Freddy. I could give you three issues' worth from one night at the Cockpit Lounge."

A bell bonged—faint and far-off. Memory is revised retrospection. Oh, yeah—fate fungooed me that night.

A newsboy pulled a red wagon into the market. It was stacked with magazines. He began filling the racks.

A cover caught my eye. Primary colors and big headlines screamed.

The magazine was called Confidential.

Beverly Hills Hotel
8/14/53

Joi woke me up. I was nudging off a nightmare. Double dip: Ralph Mitchell Horvath shot in the mouth, Manolo Sanchez with skeleton claws.

I looked across the bed. Shit—Liz was gone.

Joi read my mind. "She had an early call. She said to remind you that Arthur Crowley wants that phone date."

I lit a cigarette. I chased three bennies with Old Crow. Aaaaaaah, breakfast of champions!

"Remind me again. Who's Arthur Crowley?"

"That divorce lawyer who needs your help."

"I'll call him when I go off-duty."

Joi stepped into a skirt and pulled her shoes on. She dressed as fast as most men.

"No more girls for a while, okay, Freddy? Liz is great, but Barb is like Helga, She Wolf of the SS. Really, that stunt with the armband and the garters? That and she hogs the whole bed."

I laffed loud and lewd. My wake-up whipped through me and canceled cobwebs. Summer in L.A.—ring-a-ding-ding!!

Joi kissed me and bopped out of the bungalow. I shit, shaved, showered, and put on my uniform.

The bedroom phone rang. I snagged it. A man said, "Mr. Otash, this is Arthur Crowley."

I buffed my badge with my necktie. A mirror magnetized me. Man, oh Manischewitz, I looked good!

"Mr. Crowley, it's a pleasure."

Crowley said, "Sir, I'll be blunt. I'm swamped with pissed-off husbands and wives looking to take each other to the cleaners. Legal statutes are in flux, and divorce-court judges are demanding proof of adultery. Liz Taylor told me you might have some ideas."

I lit a cigarette. Benzedrine arched through my arteries and piqued my pizzazz.

"I do have ideas. If you have flexible scruples, I think we can do biz."

Crowley laffed. "I'm listening."

I said, "I know some Marines stationed down at Camp Pendleton. I was their DI in '43 and '44, and now they're back from Korea and looking for kicks. It's a parlay. Hot rods, good-looking shills, walkie-talkies, phone drops, and Speed Graphic cameras."

Crowley hooted. "Semper fi, sir. You're a white man in my book."

"Semper fi, boss. We'll work out the details at your convenience, and I'll round up my boys."

"And in the meantime? Is there anything you need?"

Benzedrine was a groin groper. One thing came to mind.

"My Landing Strip's got two empty runways tonight. Liz told me you're conversant with the concept."

I heard voices outside the bungalow—male and brazenly brusque. I thought I heard foot scrapes and coughs.

Crowley said, "Liz explained the concept, so I called you prepared. I'll send two stenos over."

"Mr. Crowley, you're a pisser."

"It takes one to know one, sir."

We hung up. I heard the voices again. A key-in-lock noise followed. I walked into the living room. The door opened wide.

William H. Parker.

Two plainclothes bulls. Maladroit mastiffs on a mission to maul for their master.

"Send not to know for whom the bell tolls, it tolls for thee."

I unpinned my badge and tossed it at Parker. It hit his chest and dropped on the floor. The mastiffs moved. Parker gestured Get back. The mastiffs pawed the carpeting.

I unhooked my gun belt and dropped it on a chair. I called up some cool. Freon Freddy, the Shaman of Shakedown.

"Hit me, Bill. Shack jobs, living above my means, bending the rules here and there. My head's on the chopping block, baby. Guillotine me."

The mastiffs smirked smug. Pious Parker parsed out a grin.

"You are currently engaged in an intimate relationship with a Pan American stewardess named Barbara Jane Bonvillain, now in federal custody for possession of narcotics procured in Mexico. I must inform you that the outsized Miss Bonvillain is a Communist agent and a personal emissary of Marshal Tito, the Red boss of Yugoslavia. As if that weren't enough, Miss Bonvillain is really a man. She underwent a sex-change operation in Malmö, Sweden, in late 1951, before her stellar efforts impersonating a woman at the '52 Olympics. You fucked a man, Freddy. You're a homo. Get the hell off my police force."

* * *

"You're a homo."

"You're a homo."

"You fucked a man."

"You fucked a man."

"You're a homo, you're a homo, you're a homo."

I drank myself into a stunned stupor. I passed out on the floor. I got intimate with insects inhabiting the rug. They were dung desperadoes. They were my filthy fellow travelers, lower than lice.

"You're a homo, you're a homo, you're a homo."

I drank, I passed out, I woke up. I went eye to eye with a big beetle. We discussed the man-bug metaphysic, infused with frissons from that freaky frog Camus. The beetle explained that life was horrifically happenstance and that we were all fucked by fate. Bugs were bid by biology to live off larvae and leaves. Men were massacred by lascivious lust and bumbled into bed with he-shes. You didn't know that she was a he. Hit your bennie stash and find your way out of this funk.

I obeyed the beetle. The Benzedrine outrevved the booze. I talked shit with the beetle for hours. We went feeler to feeler on the floor.

I called Abe Adelman at the State License Bureau. I promised him two G's for PI's ducat, quicksville. I bid the beetle adieu and climbed back into my civvies. I drove straight to the Hollywood Ranch Market.

L.A. looked like Pompeii, post-earthquake. The summer sun skimmed the sky and scattered death rays. Hes were shes and shes were hes and the most gorgeous girls were gargoyles. I got to the market and ran up to my office. Jimmy was scanning the August Lowdown.

He said, "You're wigged out, Freddy."

I said, "I've been talking to a bug."

"What did he tell you?"

“Some shit you wouldn’t believe.”

“I would. It’s the basis of our friendship. We tell each other shit the world wouldn’t believe.”

I smiled. “Tell me something typical. I’ve had a jolt. I need to get my feet back under me.”

“The barman at the Manhole is pushing horse.”

“I’ll file it away in case I need him.”

Jimmy said, “I’ve got a picture of Marlon Brando with a dick in his mouth.”

“I’ll give you a C-note.”

Jimmy passed me the Old Crow. I took a pull and felt the floor meet my feet.

“How was your date with Donkey Don?”

Jimmy held his hands two feet apart. Jimmy said, “Ouch.”

I roared. We passed the jug back and forth. Jimmy lit a Pall Mall.

“I’m up for a role on GE Theater, but this Paul Newman punk will probably get it.”

“I’ll plant a bag of weed on him and lay on the fear. You’ll get the gig.”

“Thanks, Freddy.”

I thought about the talking bug. I looked down at the floor. I saw the kid with the wagon, unloading magazines.

“I’ve got all this good dirt and no place to put it. It’s driving me fucking crazy.”

* * *

Semper fi.

I assembled my ex-Marine cadre. My porno-prosty boys proceeded priapically apace. My Camp Pendleton pals came up to L.A. and joined Operation Divorce. The two crews crossed over. I had six certified psychos culled for my command. My Pendleton pit dogs were blood-blitzed from killing Commies in Korea. They were out for chaotic kicks and required tight tugs on their chains. Our marks were adulterous wives and husbands. Donkey Don lured ladies to hot-sheet hotels and instigated insertion. Flashbulbs flared as I kicked in doors, camera cocked. My Pendleton pits were adroit and adept at rolling surveillance. They tailed wayward wives and whorehound hubbies to hotels and walkie-talkied me. Joi was the mouthwatering man bait. She worked off Arthur Crowley’s craaazy crib sheets on his hubbies' habits. Joi was sinful seductress and cold cock tease. I always kicked the doors in just as zippers dropped.

Operation Divorce was a Marine Corps maneuver and a mad moneymaker. Operation Otash was the ultimate umbrella command. I had an army of snarky snitches on my payroll. My PI's license arrived in the mail and served to cinch my sinful sanction. I did not much mourn my severed service with the LAPD. I paid vulture vice cops for tips on quivering queers, jittery junkies, dipsos deep in the DTs. I built fat files on celebrity secrets and hoarded the horrors hard in my heart. Knowledge is power—the Beverly Hills Hotel bug reminded me of that. The one puzzle piece still missing: how to systematically carve cash from all of it.

Jimmy joined in. I kicked putzy Paul Newman's ass and held a bag of Mary Jane primed with his prints. Jimmy got the GE Theater role and groveled with gratitude. I hired him to hump the husband of a divorce-seeking dowager sick of hubby's hijinks. Jimmy was a swift switcherooer—if it mamboed, he'd move on it. He boffed five babes in one week—topping Donkey Don's extant record. I camera-caught the wives as Jimmy shot them the schvantz.

L.A. '53—rampant ring-a-ding-ding! Calendar pages ruffling toward that date with destiny.

I was on the Landing Strip with Liz and a waitress from Biff's Charbroil. I heard the mail slot open and an envelope hit the floor.

It was a Western Union telegram. I opened it and read:

> Dear Mr. Otash,
>
> We here at Confidential Magazine are looking for a man conversant in the celebrity secrets of present-day Los Angeles, preferably a man with prior police experience. Would you be willing to meet me in a week's time, to discuss a possible collaboration?
>
> Sincerely,
> Robert Harrison, Publisher and Editor-In-Chief

“Ava Gardner’s Dusky Dee-lite.”

“Johnnie Ray’s Men’s Room Misadventure.”

“Bad Boy Bob Mitchum: Back in Reeferland AGAIN?”

I wired Harrison and confirmed the meet. I booked a boss bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel. I borrowed textbooks from Arthur Crowley’s library and studied libel, slander, and defamation of character. I learned to think and talk like a language-lucid lawyer.

Jimmy bagged back issues of Peep, Lowdown, Whisper, Tattle, and Confidential itself. I studied linguistic loopholes and cultivated codes of mitigation, equivocation, ambiguity. Innuendo, inference, implication. So many wicked ways to scandal-skin a cat.

I alter-egoed myself in a week’s time. I discovered sin-uendo and scanda-language. I moved into the bungalow a day early. That talking bug and I conferenced and concurred: Confidential was the grooved-out grail of this shook-up generation. Disillusionment is enlightenment. Confidential trafficked truth and harpooned hypocrisy. It was a devoutly decorous document. It was the meshuggener Magna Carta of our hopped-up and fucked-up age.

It’s now 9/21/53. It’s now precisely 10 a.m. The doorbell rings.

Caviar, canapés—check. Martinis mixed magnifico—check. My dossier on Bondage Bob—malignantly memorized.

I opened the door. The Sultan of Sin-uendo: a nervous nebbish in a dreary drip-dry suit.

He said, “Mr. Otash.”

I said, “Mr. Harrison.”

He walked in and went Ooh-la-la. I poured two mighty martinis and pointed to the couch. We raised our glasses. I said, “To freedom of speech.”

“The First Amendment. What it hath wrought.”

We clicked glasses. I sat facing Bondage Bob. He made the you-and-me sign. He said, “Strange bedfellows.”

You're stranger, dipshit. You wear women's lingerie and love the lash. You published Honeys in Heels, pre-Confidential.

"Get my attention, Mr. Otash. Open strong, baby. I've got a storefront called the 'Hollywood Research Bureau.' It's been my primary source since we launched. We've floated the magazine on the few nuggets it's panned, plus imagination. It's been thin gruel, by and large. Hit me, sweetheart. Show me why the cognoscenti says, 'Fred Otash is the man to see.' "

I pulled out my Marlon Brando snapshot. I passed it to Bondage Bob. He gasped and sprayed me with a mouthful of martini.

I let it drip-dry on my suit coat. Bondage Bob coughed and called up composure. He said, "Holy fucking shit."

"May I give you a candid assessment of your situation and explain how I might best serve you?"

"Hit me, doll. I didn't fly 3,000 miles for some namby-pamby chitchat."

I shot my cuffs and showed off my Rolex. I buzz-bombed Bondage Bob with the Freon Fred stare.

"You publish what is rapidly becoming the premier scandal magazine in a very crowded field. You compete with Whisper, Tattle, Peep, On the Q.T., Lowdown, and others. Your competitors rely largely on true-crime exposés, reports of miracle cures for various diseases, and rehashes of your own articles on celebrity misbehavior. The specific strengths of your magazine are its staunch anti-Communist stance and sex. Frankly, I find your articles that play on the greed of your readers are both unbelievable and devoid of the heat that people turn to Confidential for. There are no emerald mines in Colorado and no Uruguayan herbs that triple the size of the male member in two weeks' time. You're lying, sir. You're hoping that bilking your readers with stories like that will both boost your sales and help defray the costs of the libel suits that are being filed against you with greater and greater frequency in circuit courts all over America. My good friend, the esteemed jurist Arthur Cowley, has informed me that magazines that publish filler pieces chock-full of bold-faced lies create what he calls a 'gap in credibility and verisimilitude.' This calls into question the veracity of all the articles published in said magazines over time, leaving said magazines vulnerable to both individual lawsuits and the looming specter of what Mr. Crowley calls the 'lynch-mob-like and Communistic specter of the emerging class action suit,' wherein aggrieved parties band together under the aegis of left-wing Jewish lawyers in order to posit a common beef and destroy the First Amendment right of free speech that we hold so sacred here in America. The mitigating, equivocating, and temporizing language that runs through your groundbreaking articles on celebrity misconduct will not save you. You may use 'alleged,' 'purported,' and 'rumored' as much as you like, but they will not legally extricate you in the end. My first two salient points are these: you must dramatically boost your sexual content, and everything you publish in Confidential must be entirely true and verifiable."

Wooooooooo! Bravura breath control and artful articulation! Bondage Bob: flabbergasted and flushed behind Beefeater's gin.

He fidgeted. He licked his lips. He crossed his legs like a submissive sissy. I saw restraint-rope scars on his soft and sockless ankles.

"Nuisance suits are costing us 25 thou a month. Those Commie lawyers are coming out of the sewers like rats."

I sailed into my second soliloquy:

"Informants must be both credible and coercible, as well as vulnerable to exposure of their own misdeeds. I served as an officer of the Los Angeles Police Department for close to a decade. I have access to every crooked cop in this town, and they will rat out any celebrity, socialite, Communist, miscegenist, or alluring lowlife that they know of for a simple retainer. The scum that they rat out will rat out six others to stay out of your magazine, and the mathematical equation that I am positing will extend indefinitely. I can tell that you're thinking, Informants alone will not suffice, and that assumption is correct. You may know that we are entering a bold new era of electronic surveillance. I propose that we install standing, full-time bugs in every high-class hotel in Los Angeles. I will bribe the managers and desk clerks of said hotels to steer celebrity adulterers and queers to specific rooms, where their sexual activities and conversation will be captured on tape. The best bug man on earth is a hebe named Bernie Spindel. I will meet with him soon. Mr. Spindel would love to enter your employ and has a gift for you. He bugged a bungalow at the Miramar Hotel in Santa Monica last week. The manager of the hotel is a masochistic child molester with a quite understandable urge to be punished for his aberrant behavior. I will physically chastise him on a monthly basis, which will deter him from hurting children as well as keep him under my thumb. He will have strict orders to place all celebs in bungalow number 9. Bernie's gift is a tape of Senator John F. Kennedy fucking Ingrid Bergman and detailing his preposterous plans to run for president of the United States to her, while she yawns and prattles on about her kids. Be forewarned: the fucking is short-lived. I'll be frank: Senator Kennedy is a two-minute man."

Bondage Bob: Ga-ga, goo-goo-eyed, gone.

"So, we—"

I cut him off. "So we also bug all the fag bathhouses. So I have extortion wedges on the informants who supply the dirt for our most explosive pieces. So I polygraph-test them to assure their veracity. So I create a climate of fear in Hollywood, which is the most gorgeously perverted and cosmetically moralistic place on God's green fucking earth. Because I have an unerring nose for human weakness and have sensed for some time that we have entered an era where the gilded and famous all secretly harbor a desire to be exposed. Because I am willing to burglarize any psychiatrist's office in order to get the dirt on their celebrity patients. Because I am willing to quash lawsuits through the threat and application of physical force."

Bondage Bob guuuuuuuulped. "What won't you do?"

I saw Ralph Mitchell Horvath. I said, "Commit murder or work for Communists."

Hold now. Hear that pin-drop silence. Let it linger loooooong.

"Would you consent to an audition? To test your inside knowledge?"

I nodded. Harrison hit me. I bopped to his beat, beatific.

"Senator Estes Kefauver?"

"Whorehound. Shacks with Filipino prosties at the downtown Statler when he visits L.A."

"Sinatra. Give me the latest."

"Caught his new girlfriend muff-diving Lana Turner at the Beverly Wilshire, went on a six-day bender with Jackie Gleason, and wound up with the DTs at Queen of Angels."

"Otto Preminger?"

"Mud shark. Currently enthralled with a sepia seductress named Dorothy Dandridge."

"Lawrence Tierney?"

"Brawling, psychopathic brother of noted grasshopper Scott Brady. Digs the boys at the Cockpit Lounge and the occasional girl who looks like a boy."

"John Wayne?"

"Quasi drag queen. Fucks women and looks stunning in a size 52-long muumuu."

"Johnny Weissmuller?"

"King Schlong. Well known to have fathered nine kids out of wedlock with nine different women. Current holder of the White Man's World Record."

"Duke Ellington?"

"Current holder of the Jigaboo World Record."

"Van Johnson?"

"The Semen Demon. Sucks dick at the glory hole at the Wilshire May Company men's room."

"Burt Lancaster?"

"Sadist. Has a well-appointed torture den at his pad in Beverly Hills. Pays call girls top dollar to inflict pain on them."

"Fritz Lang?"

"Known to film Burt's torture sessions and screen them for a select clientele."

"The Misty June Christy?"

"Nympho size-queen. My shakedown bait Donkey Don Eversall gives her the big one on a regular basis. Donkey Don's got a wall peek at his crib. My pal Jimmy Dean made an avant-garde film of their last assignation. It's called The Stacked and the Hung. The premiere is Friday night, in my living room. You're cordially invited."

"Alfred Hitchcock?"

"Peeper."

"Natalie Wood?"

"Child actress in transition. Rumored to be ensconced at a dyke slave den near Hollywood High."

"Alan Ladd?"

"Dramatically underhung cunt hound. A man on the horns of an existential dilemma worthy of those Communistic philosopher chumps."

He's ga-ga, goo-goo, pulled into putty. He's martini-mangled and mine.

"Mr. Otash, the job is yours."

"Fifty grand a year and expenses. My operating costs will go at least double that."

Now he's green at the gills. Now he knows there's No Exit. It's a felicitous fait accompli.

"Yes, Mr. Otash. We have a deal."

We shook hands.

Bondage Bob said, "Jean-Paul Sartre's a pal of mine. He'll love The Stacked and the Hung."

That talking bug rocked across the rug and waved at me. I swear this is true.

8

Jimmy timed the fuck: 1:46. The fuckers: future prez and mick martyr JFK, Swedish sweetie Ingrid Bergman.

Pillow patter tapped the tape. Jack coughed and said, “Aaaaah, that was good.” Ingrid yawned and said, “Vell, for vun of us, perhaps.”

I roared. Jimmy howled. The market was 3 a.m. quiet. We passed the Old Crow back and forth.

Jimmy said, “We wrapped GE Theater. I invited Ronnie Reagan to the premiere.”

I said, “He hates the Reds. I’ll hit him up for some snitch-outs.”

The tape groaned and ground to squelch. Jimmy turned it off. I looked out the mirror. The kid with the red wagon was unloading Confidential. The wagon was white-print-emblazoned. I couldn’t quite read the words.

Jimmy said, “The kid gets to you.”

“He shouldn’t be out this late.”

“You’ve got the same employer now.”

“I know.”

“When I’m famous, keep me out of the magazine.”

“When you’re in it, you know you’ve arrived.”

* * *

The first check arrived. I retained Bernie “the Bug King” Spindel. He was an Orthodox Jew with eight kids and six schvartze girlfriends. We discussed the mud-shark metaphysic. Bernie said, “Once you’ve had black, you can’t go back.”

We spent a week whipping wires to wainscoting and laying mike mounts into mattresses. I bribed hotel honchos up the yammering ying-yang. We drilled, bored, spackled, threaded, planted, and wired all the high-end hotels. Regular retainers would result in records of sicko celebs sacking up in those rooms. Bondage Bob had bountiful bucks. We wire-whipped full-time listening posts at the Beverly Hills Hotel, the Bel-Air Hotel, the Beverly Wilshire, the Miramar, the Biltmore, the downtown Statler. A Biltmore bellboy tipped us right off: Gary Cooper and a jailbait jill jumped into that bugged bedroom. BAM!—our system socks in sync. Bedsprings bounce, voices vibrate, mikes pick up tattle text and lay it to the listening post. BAM!—my Marine Corps mastiff retrieves the tape. BAM!—the babe is 16 and a Belmont High coed. Coop says, “You’re built, honey. Tell me your name again.” The girl gasps, “I’ve always loved your pictures, Mr. Cooper. And, wow, you’re really big.”

The dirt, the dish, the scandal skank, the lewd libels revealed as real. It was all starting to come to me and to Confidential.

Jimmy edited his movie and dubbed in a sizzling soundtrack. The priapic premiere was the L.A. moment of fall ’53. I served pizza, booze, and pills from a felonious pharmacy. My pad was packed with movie machers and Marines, stupid starlets, stars, and studs. Dig: Liz, Joi, Ward Wardell, Race Rockwell, Donkey Don. Ronnie Reagan, Harry Fremont, Arthur Crowley, Bondage Bob, and Jean-Paul Sartre—existentially seeking the scene. A six-foot-six drag queen, Rock Hudson, ex–U.S. senator Helen Gahagan Douglas. Charlie “Yardbird” Parker, nodding on Big H.

It’s the egalitarian epicenter of postwar America. It’s a colossal convergence of the gilded and gorgeous, the defiled and demented, the expatriots of exultant extremity. This seedy summit set the tone for the frazzled and fractured society that is our nation today.

I dimmed the lights. Race Rockwell ran the projector. The soundtrack hit: Bartók, Beethoven, bebop by way of Bird. There’s the opening titles: “The Stacked and the Hung, starring Donkey Don Eversall and June Christy.” “Photographed, Edited, Produced and Directed by James Dean.”

The applause was apoplectic. There’s the establishing shot—a coontown motel room, shot surreptitiously through a hole-in-the-wall peek.

June Christy enters the room and drops her purse on the bed. She looks apprehensive. She lights a cigarette, she checks her watch, she taps her toes and paces. It’s soundless cinema. The camera stays static—the lens is lashed to that wall peek.

There—June hears something. She smiles, she walks offscreen, she walks back on with Donkey Don. Donkey winks at the wall peek—he’s in on it. June sits on the bed. Donkey Don whips it out and wags it. My pad shakes and shimmies. There's gasps, wolf whistles, shrill shrieks.

I looked around for Jimmy. June devoured Donkey Don, tonsil-deep. Where's Jimmy? Fuck—he's jacking off by the pizza buffet!

* * *

Calendar pages flicked, flew, sheared, and shape-shifted. They're sales graphs now.

'53 into '54. Vertical lines in escalation. Confidential hits a million a month. Confidential makes a million and a half in rabid record time.

It's all ME. I'm awash in the sicko secrets I've cruelly craved my whole life. I've got L.A. hot-wired. My city teems with tattle tipsters on my payroll. Hotel rooms are hot-sheet hives hooked up to my headset. I know everything sinful, sex-soiled, deeply dirty, and religiously wrong. It's wrong, it's real, and it's MINE.

My Marines lived in listening posts. They caught Corrine Calvet cavorting with a car-park cat at the Crescendo. They caught Paul Robeson, ripped to the gills at a Red rally. They caught Jumping Johnnie Ray again. I verified all of it and fed it to Confidential. Gary Cooper and Miss Belmont High? Quashed for ten grand.

'53, '54. A-bomb blast parties on Liz Taylor's rooftop. Those cavalcades of color against the dim dawn. The camaraderie and opportunity. The sense that this march of magnificent moments would never stop.

Calendar pages, sales graphs, Confidential covers. Dipsos, nymphos, junkies, Commies, feckless fools all. That cover I regret, that ball I dropped, that malignant moment. That page in purgatory as I pause my pen.

May 16, 1954. I'm at my pad. I'm booking a threeski for the Landing Strip. I quashed a story on Marilyn Monroe's secret Mexican marriage. Marilyn grovels, grateful. She knows a sapphic sister with a sometimes yen for men.

The phone rang. I picked up. Arthur Crowley said, "There's trouble, Freddy."

I said, "Hit me."

"I got a tip. Johnnie Ray's been to a libel lawyer. He's suing the magazine. I know that you verified the story, but he's going forward anyway. I strongly suggest that you nip this in the bud."

Men's Room Mishegas*: Jittery Johnnie Strikes Again.*

I verified the story. Confidential ran it. This was unprecedented grief.

"My Marines are on maneuvers, Arthur. There's no one to handle it."

"You handle it, Freddy. Take care of it before that tip gets back to Bob Harrison."

I hung up. My nerves were nuked. I took three quick pops of Old Crow. Joi was tight with Johnnie. They girl-talked regular. I liked Johnnie. Jimmy screened The Stacked and the Hung for him personally.

I dropped three yellow jackets and obliterated the day. I woke up at midnight. Johnnie always hit Googie's after his closing set. He always parked in the same spot.

A short stroll, spring heat, a brisk breeze. I walked over and leaned on Johnnie's Packard Caribbean. Johnnie swished out at 1:15.

He saw me. He got the gestalt. He said, "Hi, Freddy."

I said, "Don't make me, kid. I'll keep you out from now on, but you've got to stop it here."

Johnnie said, "You're a parasite, Freddy. You feed off the weak. I'm not backing off. I don't see any of your goons around, so you'll have to do it yourself."

Parasite, parasite, parasite—

"Let it go, Johnnie. You can't win this one."

"You're the weak one, Freddy. Joi told me that you cry out for your mother in your sleep."

I trembled. "One more time. No lawsuit."

"You're a mama's boy, Freddy. Joi told me you fucked a tranny, which makes you more queer than me."

I saw red and black-red. I hit him. My signet ring slashed his cheek. He went down on his knees. I picked him up and tossed him into his car. I heard bones crack and teeth shear. The bumper ledge gouged his head at the hairline. I kicked him and tore a chunk of his scalp free.

He said, "Okay, okay, okay." No whimper—strong.

I said, "I'm sorry, kid."

Johnnie spit blood and twirled a fuck-you finger at me.

The market was 2 a.m. quiet. Jimmy and I quaffed Old Crow. I was spritzed with Johnnie Ray's blood.

Jimmy said, "I'm up for the lead in East of Eden. Elia Kazan's waffling. It could go either way."

"I'll lean on Kazan. He's susceptible. There's some pinkos he didn't rat to HUAC."

Jimmy walked to the mirror and pointed down at the floor. My hands hurt. My signet ring was missing stones.

"That kid's down there, Freddy. You know, the one with the wagon."

I got up and looked. The kid off-loaded magazines. The wagon was positioned sideways. RED RYDER was painted on it.

"Jimmy, do you know why you're a freak?"

"I don't know, Freddy. Do you know why you are?"

I thought about it.

I said, "I don't know."

I'm perched in purgatory. I've purged the most perverted part of my hellacious history. My brain waves broiled in seditious sync with James Ellroy's. It was a carcinogenic collaboration. We collided over commas, colons, and alluring alliteration. Ellroy finally dumped his Otash TV show on a cable network. He'll get more rich and famous. Did he do a deal with the devil? Has my heartfelt hope of heaven gone pffft?

It has.

My keepers have convened a kangaroo court. My transfer to heaven has been stamped "still pending."

I'm deep in the dumps. They took my old body back. I'm perpetually 70 years old and dead.

My ass hurts. Johnnie Ray pitchforked me an hour ago. Kate Hepburn was next. Sweetie, you did do Rex the Rottweiler—all I wanted was ten grand for the pics!

Aaaaaah—I've got third-degree burns!!!!

I've petitioned my head keeper for a heaven day pass. A conjugal visit with Liz Taylor would put me up on my paws. More malignant memories are crawling through my cranium. I'm jumping Joan Crawford and socking it to Simone Signoret. Jerk-off James Ellroy would be digging this shit.

Where's Ellroy when I really need him? Fuck—my ass hurts!

My head keeper just passed on the word: no heaven day pass. Consolation prize: I'll have an hour in my cell with an earthly "old flame."

I put on a spiffy sweat suit. I spritzed on Lucky Tiger cologne. I prepped some withering one-liners—L.A. in the '50s, ring-a-ding-ding!!!!!

A tall woman approached the bars. Ooooooh—blasphemous-blond and boss-built! She got closer. She boded biiiig and seemed fatalistically familiar. She wore stewardess blues, replete with pillbox hat. She smiled. What's that bulge in her skirt? Holy Homo

Hannah—it’s Barb Bonvillain, pre–sex change!

I screeched and screamed.

I cringed and crapped my pants.

I cried out for my keepers.

Am I hurtling to hell? Did this memoir make the prince of darkness send up for me?

Barb’s outside my cell now. Call it karmic comeuppance. You get what you pay for. I sure as shit learned it late.

The bay trees in our country are all withered,
and meteors fright the fixed stars of heaven;
the pale face moon looks bloody on the earth,
and lean look’d prophets whisper fearful change.

First Tastes of Blood

1

Friday, June 10th, 1964 was the start of a KRLA golden oldie weekend. The two conspirators scouting the territory where the "kidnaping" would take place blasted their portable radio at full volume to drown out the sound of power saws, hammers and crowbars–the noise of the third floor classroom renovation and the music of the Fleetwoods battling for audial supremacy.

Larry "Birdman" Craigie, the radio held close to his head, marveled at the irony of this construction work taking place a scant week before school was to close for the summer. Just then, Gary U. S. Bonds came over the airwaves, singing: "School is out at last, and I'm so glad I passed," and Larry fell to the sawdust covered linoleum floor, convulsed with laughter. School was maybe gonna be out, but he wasn't gonna pass, and his name was Chuck and he didn't give a fuck. He rolled on the floor, heedless of his recently swiped purple fuzzy Sir Guy shirt.

Delbert "Whitey" Haines started to get disgusted and mad. The Birdman was either psycho or faking it, which meant that his long time stooge was smarter than him, which meant that he was laughing at him. Whitey waited until Larry's laughter wound down and he propped himself into push-up position. He knew what was coming next: A series of lurid remarks about doing push-ups on Ruthie Rosenberg, how Larry was going to make her blow him while he hung from the rings in the girls' gym.

Larry's laughter trailed off, and he opened his mouth to speak. Whitey didn't let him get that far; he liked Ruthie and hated to hear nice girls blasphemed. He nuzzled the toe of his boot into Larry's shoulder blades, right where he knew the zits were really bad. Larry screeched and hopped to his feet, cradling the radio into his chest.

"You didn't have to do that."

"No," Whitey said, "but I did. I can read your mind, psycho. Phony psycho. So don't say no nasty things about nice girls. We got the punk to deal with, not nice girls."

Larry nodded; that he was included in such important plans took the sting out of the attack. He walked to the nearest window and looked out and thought of the punk in his saddle shoes and his argyle sweaters and his pretty boy looks and his poetry review that he printed up in the camera shop on Aluarado where he lived, sweeping up the store in exchange for room and board.

The Marshall High Poetry Review–punk, sissy poems; gooey love stuff that everyone knew was dedicated to that stuck-up Irish parochial school transfer girl and the stuck-up snooty bitches in her poet crowd, and vicious fucking attacks on him and Whitey and all the righteous homeboys at Marshall. When Larry had gotten zonked on glue and cherry bombed the Folk Song Club, the Review had commemorated the occasion with line drawings of him in a storm trooper's outfit and maiming prose: "We now have a brownshirt named Birdman–illiterate, not much of a wordman. His weapons are stealth, and poor mental health; he's really much more like a turdman."

Whitey had fared even worse: after kicking Big John Kafesjian's ass in a fair fight in the Rotunda Court, the punk had devoted an entire copy of the Review to an "epic" poem detailing the event, calling Whitey a "white trash loser provocateur" and ending with a prediction of his fate, phrased like an epitaph:

> "No autopsy can e'er reveal, what his darkest heart did most conceal; that shallow muscleman void, defined by terror and hate–Let that be the requiem for this light-weight."

Larry had volunteered to give Whitey a swift revenge, doing himself a favor in the process: The Boys' V.P. had said that he would be expelled for one more fight or cherry bomb episode, and the idea of no more school nearly made him cream in his jeans. But Whitey had nixed the notion of quick retribution, saying, "No, it's too easy. The punk has got to suffer like we did. He made us laughing stocks. We're gonna return the compliment, and then some."

So their plan of disrobing, beating, genital painting, and shaving was hatched. Now, if it all worked out, was the time. Larry watched Whitey trace swastikas in the sawdust with a two by four. The Del-Viking's rendition of "Come Go With Me" ended and the news came on, meaning it was three o'clock. Larry heard the whoops a moment later, then watched as the workmen gathered up their handtools and power equipment and bustled off down the main staircase, leaving them alone to wait for the poet.

Larry swallowed and nudged Whitey, afraid of upsetting his silent artwork.

"Are you sure he'll come? What if he figures out the note's a phony?"

Whitey looked up and kicked out at a half-opened wall locker door, snapping it off at its hinges. "He'll be here. A note from that Irish cunt? He'll think it's some kind of fucking lovers' rendezvous. Just relax. My sister wrote the note. Pink stationery, a girl's handwriting. Only it ain't gonna be no lovers' rendezvous. You know what I mean, homeboy?"

Larry nodded; he knew.

The conspirators waited in silence, Larry daydreaming, Whitey rummaging through the abandoned lockers, looking for left-behinds. When they heard footsteps on the second floor corridor below them, Larry grabbed a pair of jockey shorts from a brown paper bag and pulled a tube of acetate airplane glue from his pocket. He squeezed the tube's entire contents onto the shorts, then flattened himself against the row of lockers nearest to the stairwell. Whitey crouched beside him, homemade knuckle dusters coiled in his right fist.

"Sweetheart?"

The endearment, whispered hesitantly, preceded the sound of footsteps that seemed to grow bolder as they neared the third story landing. Whitey counted to himself, and when he calculated that the poet was within grabbing range he pushed Larry out of the way and stationed himself next to the edge of the stairs.

"Darling?"

Larry started to laugh, and the poet froze in mid-step, his hand on the stair rail. Whitey grabbed the hand and jerked upwards, sending the poet sprawling over the last two steps. He yanked again, relieving the pressure at just the right angle to twist the poet into a kneeling position. When his adversary was staring up at him with impotent, beseeching eyes, Whitey kicked him in the stomach, then pulled him to his feet as he trembled uncontrollably.

"Now, Birdman!" Whitey screeched.

Larry wrapped the glue-streaked jockey shorts around the poet's mouth and nostrils and pushed until his tremors became gurgling sounds and the skin around his temples went from pink to red to blue and he started to gasp for breath.

Larry relinquished his grip and backed away, the jockey shorts falling to the floor. The poet writhed on his feet, then fell backward, crashing into a half open locker door. Whitey stood his ground, both fists cocked, watching the poet retch for breath, whispering, "We killed him. We honest to fucking god killed him."

Larry was on his knees, praying and making the sign of the cross, when the poet's gasps finally caught oxygen and he expelled a huge ball of glue covered phlegm, followed by a screeching syllable, "sc-sc-sc."

"Scum!"

He got the word out in a rush of new breath, the color in his face returning to normal as he drew himself slowly to his knees. "Scum! Dirty white trash, low-life scum! Stupid, mean, ugly, wanton!"

Whitey Haines started to laugh as relief flooded through him. Larry Craigie began to dry-sob in relief and molded his prayer forming hands into fists. Whitey's laughter became hysterical, and the poet, on his feet now, turned his fury on him: "Muscle-bound auto mechanic pecker-wood trash! No woman would ever touch you! The girls I know all laugh at you and your two inch dick! No dick, no sex fool. No—"

Whitey went red, and started to shake. He pulled his foot back and sent it full-force into the poet's genitals. The poet screamed and fell to his knees. Whitey yelled, "Turn the radio on, full blast!"

Larry obeyed, and the Beachboys flooded the corridor as Whitey kicked and pummeled the poet, who drew himself into a fetal ball, muttering, "scum, scum" as the blows rained into him.

When the poet's face and bare arms were covered with blood, Whitey stepped back to savor his revenge. He pulled down his fly to deliver a warm liquid coup de grace, and discovered he was hard. Larry noticed this, and looked to his leader for some clue to what was supposed to happen. Suddenly Whitey was terrified. He looked down at the poet, who moaned "scum," and spat out a stream of blood onto the steel-toed paratrooper boots. Now Whitey knew what his hardness meant, and he knelt beside the poet and pulled off his Levi cords and boxer shorts and spread his legs and blunderingly plunged himself into him. The poet screamed once as he entered; then his breathing settled into something strangely like ironic laughter. Whitey finished, withdrew and looked to his shock-stilled underling for support. To make it easy for him, he turned up the volume on the radio until Elvis Presley wailed into a garbled screech; then he watched as Larry delivered his ultimate acquiescence.

They left him there, bereft of tears or the will to feel anything beyond the hollowness of his devastation. As they walked away, "Cathy's Clown," by the Everly Brothers, came on the radio. They had both laughed, and Whitey had kicked him one last time.

He lay there until he was certain the quad would be deserted. He thought of his true love and imagined that she was with him, her head resting on his chest, telling him how much she loved the sonnets he composed for her.

Finally, he got to his feet. It was hard to walk; each step shot a rending pain through his bowels up into his chest. He felt at his face; it was covered with dried matter that had to be blood. He scrubbed his face furiously with his sleeve until the abrasions ran with fresh trickles of blood over smooth skin. This made him feel better, and the fact that he hadn't betrayed tears made him feel better still.

Except for a few odd groups of kids hanging out and playing catch, the quad was deserted, and the poet made his way across it in slow, painful steps. Gradually, he became aware of a warm liquid running down his legs. He pulled up his right trouser leg and saw that his sock was soaked in blood laced with white matter. Taking off his socks, he hobbled toward the "Arch of Fame," a marble inlaid walkway that commemorated the school's previous graduating classes. The poet wiped the bloody handfuls of cotton over mascots depicting the Athenians of '63 all the way back through the Delphians of '31, then strode barefoot, gaining strength and purpose with each step, out the school's south gate and onto Griffith Park Boulevard, his mind bursting with odd bits of poetry and sentimental rhymes; all for her.

When he saw the florist's shop at the corner of Griffith Park and Hyperion, he knew that this was his destination. He steeled himself for human contact and went in and purchased a dozen red roses, to be sent to an address he knew by heart but had never visited. He selected a blank card to go with them, and scribbled on the back some musings about love being etched in blood. He paid the florist, who smiled and assured him that the flowers would be delivered within the hour.

The poet walked outside, realizing that there were still two hours of daylight left, and that he had no place to go. This frightened him, and he tried composing an ode to waning daylight to keep his fear at bay. He tried, and tried, but his mind wouldn't click in and his fear became terror and he fell to his knees, sobbing for a word or phrase to make it right again.

2

When Watts burst into flames on August 23, 1965, Lloyd Hopkins was building sand castles on the beach at Malibu and inhabiting them with members of his family and fictional characters out of his own brilliant imagination.

A crowd of children had gathered around the gangly twenty-three year old, eager to be entertained, yet somehow deferential to the great mind that they sensed in the big young man whose hands so deftly molded drawbridges, moats, and parapets. Lloyd was at one with the children and with his own mind, which he viewed as a separate entity. The children watched, and he sensed their eagerness and desire to be with him and knew instinctively when to gift them with a smile or waggle his eyebrows so that they would be satisfied and he could return to his real play.

His Irish Protestant ancestors were fighting with his lunatic brother Tom for control of the castle. It was a battle between the good loyalists of the past and Tom and his rabblerousing paramilitary cohorts who thought that Negroes should be shipped back to Africa and that all roadways should be privately owned. The loonies had the upper hand temporarily–Tom and his backyard arsenal of hand grenades and automatic weaponry were formidable–but the good loyalists were staunch-hearted where Tom and his band were craven, and led by about-to-be police officer Lloyd, the Irish band had surmounted technology and was now raining flaming arrows into the midst of Tom's hardware, causing it to explode. Lloyd envisioned flames in the sand in front of him, and wondered for the eight thousandth time that day what the Academy would be like. Tougher than basic training? It would have to be, or the city of Los Angeles was in deep trouble.

Lloyd sighed. He and his loyalists had won the battle and his parents, inexplicably lucid, had come to praise the victorious son and heap scorn on the loser.

"You can't beat brains, Doris," his father told his mother. "I wish it weren't true, but they rule the world. Learn another language, Lloydy; Tom can commune with those low-lifes in that phone sales racket, but you solve puzzles and rule the world." His mother nodded mutely; the stroke had destroyed her ability to talk.

Tom just glowered in defeat.

Out of nowhere, Lloyd heard the music and very slowly, very consciously forced himself to turn in the direction from which the raucous sound was coming.

A little girl was holding a radio, cradled preciously into herself, attempting to sing along. When Lloyd saw the little girl, his heart melted. She didn't know how he hated music, how it undercut his thought processes. He would have to be gentle with her, as he was with women of all ages. He caught the little girl's attention, speaking softly, even as his headache grew: "Do you like my castle, sweetheart?"

"Y… Yes," the little girl said.

"It's for you. The Good Loyalists fought the battle for a fair damsel, and that damsel is you."

The music was growing deafening; Lloyd thought briefly that the whole world could hear it. The little girl shook her head coquettishly, and Lloyd said, "Can you turn the radio off, sweetie? Then I'll take you on a tour of your castle." The child complied, and fumbled the volume switch the wrong way just as the music stopped and a stern-voiced announcer intoned: "And Governor Edmund G. Brown has just announced that the National Guard has been ordered into South Central Los Angeles in force to stop the two day reign of looting and terror that has already left four dead. All members of the following units are to report immediately…"

The little girl fiddled the radio off just as Lloyd's headache metamorphosed into a perfect stillness. "You ever read Alice in Wonderland, sweetheart?" he asked.

"My mommy read me from the picture book," the little girl said.

"Good. Then you know what it means to follow the rabbit down the hole?"

“Does it mean what Alice did when she went into Wonderland?”

“That’s right; and that’s what old Lloyd has to do now–the radio just said so.”

“Are you ‘Old Lloyd’?”

“Yes.”

“Then what’s going to happen to your castle?”

“You inherit it, fair damsel–it’s yours to do with as you please.”

“Really?”

“Really.”

The little girl hopped into the air and came down square on top of the castle, obliterating it. Lloyd ran for his car and what he hoped would be his baptism by fire.

In the Armory, Staff Sergeant Beller took his prize cadre aside and told them that for a few bucks they could appreciably cut down the odds of getting eaten alive in niggerland and maybe have a few laughs, besides.

He motioned Lloyd Hopkins and two other P.F.C.s into the lavatory and displayed his wares and elaborated: “.45 automatic. Your classic officer’s sidearm. Guaranteed to drop any firebreathing nigger at thirty yards, regardless of where it hits him. Strictly illegal for E.M., and a valuable asset in its own right–but these babies are fully automatic–machine pistols, with my specially devised elephant clip–twenty shots, reload in five seconds flat, The piece overheats, but I throw in a glove. The piece, two elephant clips and the glove–an even C-note. Takers?” He proffered the sidearms around. The two motor pool P.F.C.s eyed them longingly and hefted them with love, but declined.

“I’m broke, Sarge,” the first P.F.C. said.

“I’m staying behind at the command post with the halftracks, Sergeant,” the second P.F.C. said.

Beller sighed, and looked up at Lloyd Hopkins, who gave him the creeps. “The Brain,” the guys in the company called him. “Hoppy, what about you?”

“I’ll take them both,” Lloyd said.

Dressed in Class C fatigues, leggings, full bandoliers and helmet liners, Co. A of the 2nd Battalion, 46th Division, California National Guard stood at parade rest in the main meeting hall of the Glendale Armory, waiting to be briefed. Their battalion commander, a forty-four year old Pasadena dentist who held the reserve rank of Lieutenant Colonel, formulated his thoughts and orders into what he hoped would be considered a fierce brevity and spoke into the microphone. “Gentlemen, we are going into the firestorm. The Los Angeles police have just informed us that a forty-eight square mile portion of South Central Los Angeles is engulfed in flames, and that entire commercial blocks have been pillaged and then set on fire. We are being sent in to protect the lives of the firemen battling those fires and to divert through our presence the looting and other criminal activity taking place. This is the sole regular infantry company in an otherwise armored division. You men, I’m sure, will be the spearhead of this peace-keeping force of civilian soldiers. You will be briefed further when we reach our objective. Good day, and God be with you!”

Nobody mentioned God as the convoy of armored half tracks and personnel carriers rolled out of Glendale toward the Golden State Freeway southbound. The main topics of conversation were guns, sex, and Negroes, until P.F.C. Lloyd

Hopkins, sweltering in the canvas covered halftrack, took off his fatigue jacket and introduced fear and immortality:

"First of all, you have to say it to yourselves, get it out in the air, say it–'I'm afraid. I don't wanna die!' You got that? No, don't say it out loud, that takes the power out of it. Say it to yourselves. There. Two, say this, too–I'm a nice white boy going to college who joined the fucking National Guard to get out of two years active duty, right?"

The civilian soldiers, whose average age was twenty, started to drift in to Lloyd's drift, and a few of them muttered, "Right."

"I can't hear you!" Lloyd bellowed, imitating Sergeant Beller.

"Right!" the guardsmen yelled in unison.

Lloyd laughed, and the others, relieved at the break in the tension, followed suit. Lloyd breathed out, letting his big frame go slack in an imitation of a Negro's shuffle."And you all be afraid of de colored man?" he said in broad dialect.

Silence greeted the question, followed by a general breakout of hushed conversations. This angered Lloyd; he felt his momentum was drifting away, destroying this transcendent moment of his life.

He banged the butt end of his M-14 into the metal floorboard of the half-track. "Right!" he screamed. "Right, you dumb-fuck, pussy-whipped, nigger-scared, chicken-shit motherfuckers! Right?" He banged his rifle again. "Right? Right? Right? Right?"

"Right!!!" The half-track exploded with the word, the feeling, the new pride in candor, and the laughter that followed grew deafening in its freedom and bravado.

Lloyd slammed his rifle butt one last time, to call the group to order. "Then they can't hurt us. Do you know that?" He waited until he was rewarded by a nod of the head from every man present, then pulled his bayonet from its scabbard and cut a large hole in the canvas top of the half-track. Being tall, he was able to peer out the top with ease. In the distance he could see the flatlands of his beloved L.A. Basin awash in smog. Spirals of flame and smoke covered its southern perimeter. Lloyd thought it was the most beautiful thing he had ever seen.

The division bivouacked at McCallum Park on Florence and 90th Street, a mile from the heart of the firestorm. Trees were downed to provide space for the hundred-odd military vehicles that would cruise the streets of Watts that night, filled with men armed to the teeth, and C-rations were distributed from the back of a five ton truck while platoon leaders briefed their men on their assignments.

Rumors abounded, fed by a cadre of L.A.P.D. and Sheriff's liaison officers: The Black Muslims were coming out in force, in whiteface, bent on hitting the profusion of discount appliance stores near Vermont and Slauson; scores of Negro youth gangs on pep pills were stealing cars and forming "kamikaze" squads and heading for Beverly Hills and Bel-Air; Rob "Magawambi" Jones and his Afro-Americans for Goldwater had taken a distinct left turn and were demanding that Mayor Yorty grant them eight commercial blocks on Wilshire Boulevard as reparation for "L.A.P.D. Crimes Against Humanity." If their terms were not met within twenty-four hours, those eight blocks would be incinerated by firebombs hidden deep within the bowels of the LaBrea Tar Pits.

Lloyd Hopkins didn't believe a word of it. He understood the hyperbole of fear and understood further that his fellow civilian soldiers and cops were hyping themselves up to kill and that a lot of poor black bastards out to grab themselves a color TV and a case of booze were going to die.

Lloyd gobbled his C-rations and listened to his platoon leader, Lt. Campion, the night manager of a Bob's Big Boy Restaurant, explain orders that had come down to him from several other higher echelon civilian soldiers: "Being infantry, we will provide foot patrol, walking point for the armored guys–checking out doorways, alleys, letting our presence be known; bayonets fixed, combat stance, that kind of shit. Look tough. The armored platoon we trained with last summer at camp will be the platoon we hang with tonight. Questions? Everyone know who their squad leader is? Any new men with questions?"

Sergeant Beller, stretched out on the grass at the back of the platoon, raised his hand and said: "Loot, you know that the platoon is hanging in at four men over strength? Fifty-four men?"

Campion cleared his throat. "Yes…uh…yes, Sergeant, I do."

"Sir, do you also know that we got three men who got special M.O.S.s? Three men who ain't regular grunts?"

"You mean…"

"I mean, sir, that myself, Hopkins, and Jensen are infantry scouts, and I'm sure you'll agree we could be of more value to this operation by running far point ahead of the armor. Right, sir?"

Lloyd saw the Lieutenant start to waver, and suddenly realized that he wanted it as bad as Beller did. Raising his hand, he said, "Sir, Sergeant Beller is right; we can walk far point and protect the platoon better and make it more autonomous. The platoon is over strength, and…"

The Lieutenant capitulated. "All right then," he said, "Beller, Hopkins and Jensen, you walk point two hundred yards ahead of the convoy. Be careful–stay sharp. No more questions? Platoon dismissed."

Lloyd and Beller found each other just as the tanks and half-tracks were starting their engines, flooding the twilight air with the sound of volatile combustion. Beller smiled; Lloyd smiled back in silent complicity.

"Far point, Sergeant?"

"Far, far point, Hoppy."

"What about Jensen?"

"He's just a kid. I'll tell him to hang back with the armor. We're covered. We've got carte blanche; that's the important thing."

"Opposite sides of the street?"

"Sounds right to me. Whistle twice if it gets hairy. Why do they call you 'The Brain'?"

"Because I'm very intelligent."

"Intelligent enough to know that the niggers are destroying the whole fucking country?"

"No, too intelligent for that shit. Anyone with half a brain knows that this is just a temporary blow-out and that when it's over it'll be business as usual. I'm here to see about saving innocent lives."

Beller said scornfully, "That's a crock. It just proves brains are over-rated.

Guts are what counts."

"Brains rule the world."

"But the world's all fucked up."

"I don't know. Let's see what it's like out there."

"Yeah, let's do that." Beller began to worry about his ass. Hoppy was starting to sound like a nigger lover.

They ditched the division completely, walking south towards where the flames rose the highest and the gunfire sounded its loudest echoes.

Lloyd took the north side of 93rd Street and Beller the south, rifles at high port with bayonets fixed and sharpened, eyes scanning row after row of cheap white clapboard houses where Negro families peered from lighted windows and sat on porches, drinking, smoking, chattering and waiting for something to happen.

They hit Central. Lloyd gulped and felt a trickle of sweat run down into his skivvies, which hung below his hipbones, weighted down by the two specially constructed automatics jammed into his waistband.

Beller whistled from across the street and pointed forward. Lloyd nodded as he felt a whiff of smoke hit his nostrils. They walked south, and it took long moments for Lloyd's head to click into place and assimilate the epiphanies, the perfect logic of the self-destruction he was viewing:

Liquor stores, night clubs, process parlors and storefront churches interspersed with vacant lots covered with abandoned cars burned out from the inside. Gutted storefront after gutted storefront spilling profusions of broken liquor bottles; broken glass everywhere; the gutters filled with cheap electric ware–non-hockable items obviously looted in haste and discarded when the looters realized they were valueless.

Lloyd poked his M-14 into smashed-in windows, squinting into the darkness, cocking his ears the way he had seen dogs do it, listening for the slightest sound or presence of movement. There was nothing–only the wail of sirens and the crack of gunshots in the distance.

Beller trotted across the street just as an L.A.P.D. black-and-white turned onto Central from 94th. Two flak-coated officers jumped out, the driver running up to Lloyd and demanding: "What the fuck are you doing here?"

Beller answered, startling the cops, who swiveled to face him, reaching for their .38s. "Far point, officer! My buddy and I been assigned to run ahead of our company and search out snipers. We're infantry scouts."

Lloyd knew that the cops didn't buy it and that he had to pursue the violent wonder of Watts without his low-life partner. He sent a sharp look Beller's way and said, "I think we're lost. We were only supposed to go out three blocks ahead, but we took a wrong turn somewhere. All the houses on these numbered streets look alike." He hesitated, trying to look bewildered.

Beller caught the drift and said, "Yeah. All these houses look alike. All these niggers on their steps sloppin' up juice look alike, too."

The older of the two cops nodded, then pointed south and said, "You guys with that artillery down near 102nd? The heavy-duty coon hunting?"

Lloyd and Beller looked at each other. Beller licked his lips to try to keep from laughing. "Yes," they said in unison.

“Then get in the car. You ain’t lost no more.”

As they highballed it southbound without lights or siren, Lloyd told the cops he was flagged for the October class at the academy and that he wanted the riot to be his solo training ground. The younger cop whooped and said, “Then this riot is a preordained training ground for you. How tall are you, six-four? Six-five? With your size, you’re gonna get sent straight to 77th Street Division, Watts, these self-same fucking streets we’re cruising right now. After the smoke clears and the fucking liberals run off at the mouth about the niggers being victims of poverty, there’s gonna be the job of maintaining order over some very agitated bad-ass niggers who’ve had a distinct taste of blood. What’s your name, kid?”

“Hopkins.”

“You ever kill anyone, Hopkins?”

“No, sir.”

“Don’t call me ‘sir.’ You ain’t a cop yet, and I’m a plain old patrolman. Well, I killed lots of guys in Korea. Lots and lots, and it changed me. Things look different now. Real different. I’ve talked about it to other guys who’ve lost their cherry, and we all agree: You appreciate different things. You see innocent people, like little kids, and you want them to stay that way because you got no innocence yourself. Little things like little kids and their toys and pets get to you, ’cause you know they’re heading straight into this big fucking shitstorm and you don’t want them to. Then you see people who got no regard for gentle things, for decent things, and you gotta come down hard on them. You gotta protect what two cents worth of innocence there is in the world. That’s why I’m a cop. You look cherry to me, Hopkins. You look eager, too. You understand what I’m saying?”

Lloyd nodded, tingling with a pins and needles sensation. He smelled smoke through the open patrol car window, and the feeling began to numb as he realized the cop was talking instinctively about Lloyd’s Irish Protestant ethos. “I understand exactly what you’re saying,” he said.

“Good, kid. Then it starts tonight. Pull over, partner.”

The older cop braked and drew up to the curb.

“It’s all yours, kid,” the younger cop said, reaching over and banging Lloyd’s helmet. “We’ll take your buddy back to your outfit. You see if you can stir up anything on your own.”

Lloyd tumbled out of the patrol car so fast that he never got to thank his mentor. They hit the siren by way of farewell.

102nd and Central was a chaos of smoldering ruins, the hiss of fire hoses, the squeal of tires on the now wet pavement, all modulated by police helicopters that hovered overhead, casting broad searchlights into storefronts to give the firemen light to work by.

Lloyd walked into the maelstrom, grinning broadly, still suffused with the eloquent recapitulation of his philosophy. He watched an armored half-track move slowly down the street, a fifty caliber machine gun mounted in its bed. A guardsman in the cab barked into a powerful bullhorn: “Curfew in five minutes! This area is under martial law! Anyone found on the streets after nine o’clock will be arrested. Anyone attempting to cross official police barriers will be shot. Repeat, curfew in five minutes!”

The words, clearly enunciated with force and malice, echoed loudly down the street, resulting in a flurry of activity. Within seconds Lloyd saw dozens of young men dart from burnt-out buildings, running full speed in any direction not caught by the searchlights. He rubbed his eyes and squinted to see if the men were carrying pilfered merchandise, only to discover they had disappeared before he could yell out or train his M-14 on them.

Lloyd shook his head and walked past a group of firemen milling around in front of a ravaged liquor store. They all noticed him, but no one seemed puzzled by the anomaly of a lone guardsman on foot patrol. Emboldened, Lloyd decided to check out life indoors.

He liked it. The darkness inside the burned-out store was soothing and Lloyd sensed that the shadow-shrouded silence was there to inform him with essential knowledge. He stopped and took a roll of friction tape from his fatigue jacket pocket and fixed his flashlight to the bottom edge of his bayonet. He swung his rifle in a figure eight arc and admired the results: wherever the M-14 pointed, there would be light.

Mounds of charred wood; piles of insulation stuffing; crushed booze bottles. Used condoms everywhere. Lloyd chuckled at the thought of subterranean liquor store coupling, then felt himself go dead cold as his chuckle was returned, followed by a hideous low moan.

He moved his M-14 around in a three hundred sixty degree arc, the muzzle at waist level. Once, then twice. On the third time around he was rewarded: an old man lay crumpled atop a mound of wadded up insulation fiber. Lloyd's heart melted. The old bastard was withered to prune dimensions and was obviously a threat to no one. He walked to the old man and handed him his canteen. The old man grasped it with shaking hands, raised it to his lips, then threw it to the ground, screeching:

"That not be what I need! I needs my Lucy! I gots to have my Lucy!"

Lloyd was befuddled. Was the old geezer crying out for his wife or some long lost love?

He removed the flashlight from his bayonet housing and shined it in the old man's face, then winced; the mouth and chin of that face were covered with congealed blood, from which glass shards stuck out like crystalline porcupine quills. Lloyd recoiled, then pointed his light into the old man's lap and recoiled further: the withered hands were cut to the bone, and three fingers of the right hand had been ground down to bloody stubs. The gnarled left hand held the shattered remnants of a bottle of Thunderbird wine.

"My Lucy! Gimme my Lucy!" the old man wailed, spitting globules of blood out with each word.

Lloyd took his flashlight and went crashing through the glass strewn ruins, brushing tears from his eyes, searching for an intact bottle of liquid salvation. Finally he found one, partially hidden by an overturned ceiling beam–a pint of six-year-old Seagram's 7.

Lloyd carried the bottle over and fed the old man, holding his head by the short nap of his grey hair, keeping the bottle a few inches from his bloody lips lest he try to ingest the entire thing. Thoughts of going for medical attention crossed his mind, but he pushed them away. He knew that the old man wanted to die, that he deserved to die drunk and that this service he was performing was the wartime equivalent of the many hours he had spent talking to his mute, brain-damaged mother.

The old man made slurping sounds, sucking convulsively at the bottle each time it touched his lips. After a few minutes had passed and half the pint was consumed, his tremors subsided and he pushed Lloyd’s hand away.

“Dis be de start of World War Three,” he said.

Lloyd ignored the comment and said, “I’m P.F.C. Hopkins, California National Guard. Do you want medical attention?”

The old man laughed, coughing up huge wads of blood-streaked sputum.

“I think you’re bleeding internally,” Lloyd said. “I can get you to an ambulance. Do you think you can walk?”

“I can do anything I wants to,” the old man shrieked, “but I wants to die! Ain’t no place for me in this war–I gots to make the scene on de other side!”

The bloodshot, filmy old brown eyes importuned Lloyd as if he were an idiot child. He fed the old man again, watching some kind of liquid acceptance course through the ancient body. When the bottle was finished the old man said, “You gots to do me a favor, white boy.”

“Name it,” Lloyd said.

“I’m gonna die. You gots to go over to my room and get my books and maps and things out and sell dem so I can have a decent burial. Christian like, you dig?”

“Where’s your room?”

“It in Long Beach.”

“I can go there when the riot is over. Not until then.”

The old man shook his head furiously, until his body shook with it, rag-doll like, all the way down to his toes. “You gots to! They gonna lock me out tomorrow ’cause I behind on the rent! Then de po-lice gonna throw me in de sewer with the rats! You gots to!”

“Hush,” Lloyd said. “I can’t go that far. Not now. Don’t you have any friends here I can talk to? Someone who can go to Long Beach for you?”

The old man considered the offer. Lloyd watched his wheels turn slowly. “You goes to de mission on Avalon an’ one hundred and sixth. De African church. You talk to Sister Sylvia. You tell her she got to go to Famous Johnson’s crib and get his shit and sell it. She gots my birthday in de church records. I wants a nice headstone. You tells her I loves Jesus, but I loves sweet Lucy more.”

Lloyd stood up. “How bad do you want to die?” he asked.

“Bad, man, bad.”

“Why?”

“Ain’t no place for me in dis war, man.”

“What war?”

“World War Three, you dumb motherfucker!”

Lloyd thought of his mother and reached for his rifle, but couldn’t do it.

Lloyd ran all the way to 106th and Avalon, composing epitaphs for Famous Johnson en route. His chest was heaving and his arms and shoulders ached from holding his rifle at high port, and when he saw the neon sign proclaiming the “United African Episcopal Methodist Church” he took in last gulps of air to bring his raging heartbeat down to a low ebb; he wanted to be the very picture of armed dignity on a mission of mercy.

The church was storefront, two stories high, with lights shining in violation of the curfew. Lloyd walked in, to be confronted by a pandemonium that was part prayer meeting, part coffee klatch. Large tables had been set up lengthwise between rows of wooden pews, and middle aged and elderly Negroes were kneeling in prayer and helping themselves to coffee and donuts.

Lloyd moved slowly along with walls, which were festooned with paintings of a black Christ, weeping, blood dripping from his crown of thorns. He started looking to the faces of the kneelers for signs of holiness or compassion. All he saw was fear.

Until he noticed a fat black woman in a white robe who seemed to be smiling inwardly as she dispensed shoulder taps to the people who knelt by the pews nearest the aisle. When the woman noticed Lloyd she shouted, “Welcome, soldier,” above the other hubbub and walked up to him, hand extended.

Startled, Lloyd shook the hand and said, “I’m P.F.C. Hopkins. I’m here on a mission of mercy for one of your parishioners.”

The woman dropped Lloyd’s hand and said, “I’m Sister Sylvia. This church is strictly for the Afro-American folk, but tonight is sort of special. Did you come to pray for the victims of this Armageddon? Do that be your mission?”

Lloyd shook his head. “No, I came to ask a favor. Famous Johnson is dead. Before he died, he asked me to come here and tell you to sell his belongings so he can have a proper burial. He told me you know the address of his place in Long Beach and his birthdate. He wants a nice headstone. He told me to tell you he loves Jesus.” Lloyd was startled to see Sister Sylvia shaking her head ironically, a grin starting to form at the corners of her mouth. “I don’t think it’s funny,” he said.

“You don’t!” Sister Sylvia bellowed. “Well, I does! Famous Johnson was trash, young white man! He deserved to be called what he was–a nigger! And that room in Long Beach? That nothing but fantasy! Famous Johnson lived out of his car, with his sin things in the back seat! He used to come by this church for the donuts and coffee, but that all! Famous Johnson didn’t have nothin’ to sell!”

“But I…”

“You comes with me, young man. I shows you, so you forget all about In-famous Johnson with a clean conscience.”

Lloyd decided not to protest; he wanted to see the fat woman’s definition of sin.

It was a high-finned, chopped and lowered 1947 Cadillac, what Crazy Tom would have called a “Coon-Mobile.”

Lloyd flashed his light into the back seat as Sister Sylvia stood triumphantly next to him, legs spread stolidly, her arms wrapped around her midsection in an “I told you so” attitude. He swung the door open. The tuck and roll upholstered seats were covered with empty soda pop bottles and pornographic photographs, most of them depicting Negro couples engaged in fellatio. Lloyd felt a sudden wave of pity; the sucker and suckee were overweight and middle-aged, and the tawdriness of the photos was a far cry from the Playboy magazines he had collected since high school. He didn’t want it to be; it was too rotten a legacy for any human being.

“I told you so!” Sister Sylvia barked. “This is In-famous Johnson’s house! You gonna sell them pictures and return them empties, and get you a fast dollar ninety-eight, which ain't gonna get you nothin' but two bottles o' T-Bird to pour over In-famous's pauper grave!"

Lloyd shook his head. Radio noise from a block away pounded him, causing the whole ugly moment to sway in his vision. "But you don't understand, ma'am," he said. "Famous entrusted this job to me. It's my job. It's my duty. It's my…"

"I don't wanna hear nothin' 'bout that sinner! You hears me? I wouldn't bury that trash in our cemetery for all the tea in China. You hears me?" Sister Sylvia didn't wait for an answer; she strode angrily back in the direction of her church, leaving Lloyd alone on the sidewalk, wishing the gunshots in the distance would escalate to the point where they drowned out the radio noise.

He sat down on the curb and thought of the two wretched people in the photographs, and of Janice who wouldn't blow him, but who did the final deed on their first date two weeks before high school graduation, leaving Lloyd Hopkins, Marshall High Class of '59, aglow with wonder at the love in his future. Now, six years later, Lloyd Hopkins, summa cum laude graduate of Stanford University, graduate of the Fort Polk Infantry School and the Evelyn Wood Speed Reading Class and six year lover of Janice Marie Rice, sat on a curb in Watts wondering why he couldn't get what a fat Negro slob probably got all the time. Lloyd shined his light in the back seat window again. It was as he suspected; the guy's dick was at least two inches bigger than his. He decided it was God and commitment. The jerk in the photo had a low I.Q. and a bad build, so God threw him a big wang to slide through life on. It all worked out.

Janice would take him orally when he graduated the academy and they got married. The last thought made him sex-flushed and sad. Janice made him sad. Then he thought of the daughters they would create. Janice, five foot eleven barefoot, slender, but with a robust set to her hips, was made for bearing exceptional children. Daughters. They would have to be daughters, made to be nurtured by the love in his Irish Protestant credo…

Lloyd took his Janice-daughter fantasies to ends of fulfillment both good and bad, then shifted his mind to women in general–women pure, wanton, vulnerable, needy, strong; all the ambivalences of his mother, now silent in her strength, rendered dumb by years of giving shelter to her lunatic male brood, from which only he emerged sane and capable of providing solace himself.

Lloyd heard a burst of gunshots in the near distance. Automatic weapon fire. At first he thought it was the radio or TV, but it was too real, too right, and it was coming from the direction of the African Church. He picked up his M-14 and ran to the corner. As he rounded it he heard screams, and turned to look in the shattered storefront window. When he saw the devastation inside, he screamed himself. Sister Sylvia and three male parishioners lay on the linoleum floor in a mass of tangled flesh, melded together in a river of blood. From somewhere within the twisted mound of bodies a severed artery shot up a red geyser. Lloyd, transfixed, watched it die and felt his scream metamorphose into the single word, "What! What! What!"

He screeched it until he was able to will his eyes from the bodies to the rest of the cordite-reeking church. The tops of dark heads peered above pews. Dimly, Lloyd perceived that the people were terrified of him. Tears streaming down his face, he dropped his rifle to the pavement and screamed, “What? What? What?”, only to be answered by a score of voices hurling, “Killer, killer, murderer!” in horror and outrage.

It was then that he heard it, faintly but plainly, back off to his left, clicking in so succinctly that he knew it was real, not electronic: “Auf weidersehen, niggers. Auf weidersehen, jungle bunnies. See ya in hell.”

It was Beller.

Lloyd knew what he had to do. He tossed the Negroes huddled behind their pews his sternest resolve and went after him, leaving his rifle behind on the pavement, crouching his long frame low behind parked cars as he made his way toward the destroyer of innocence.

Beller was running slowly north, unaware that he was being followed. Lloyd could see him framed plainly in the glow of those streetlights not destroyed, turning every few moments to look back and savor his triumph. He checked the second hand on his watch and calculated. It was obvious: Belter’s unconscious was telling him to turn around and scan his blind side every twenty seconds.

Lloyd sprinted full out, counting to himself, and hit the pavement prone just as Beller would turn and peer backwards. He was within fifty yards of the killer when Beller ducked into an alleyway and started screaming, “Freeze, nigger, freeze!” A burst of shots followed, fully automatic. Lloyd knew it was the elephant clip .45.

He reached the alley and halted, catching his breath. There was a dark shape near the end of the cul-de-sac. Lloyd squinted and discerned that it was clad in fatigue green. He heard Beller’s voice a moment later, spitting out garbled epithets.

Lloyd entered the alley, inching his way along a brick wall. He pulled one of his .45s from his waistband and flipped off the safety. He was almost within firing distance when his foot hit a tin can, the sound reverberating like hollow thunder.

He fired just as Beller did, and the flash from their gun barrels lit up the alley blindingly, illuminating Beller, crouched over a dead Negro man, the man headless, blown apart at the shoulders, his neck a massive cavity of bloody, charred tissue. Lloyd screamed as the recoil from his .45 lifted him into the air and slammed him back to the ground. A dozen shots tore into the wall above him, and he rolled frantically on the glass strewn pavement as Beller fired another burst at the ground, causing glass and blacktop shrapnel to explode before his eyes.

Lloyd started to sob. He flung his arm over his eyes and prayed for courage and the chance to be a good husband to Janice. His prayers were interrupted by the sound of footsteps running away from him. His mind clicked in: Beller was out of ammo and was running for his life. Lloyd willed himself to stand upright. His legs wobbled, but his mind was steadfast. He was right: Beller’s empty M-14 lay across the torso of the dead man, and the .45, spent and burning to the touch, lay a few feet away.

Lloyd deep breathed, reloaded and listened for sounds of flight. He caught them; off to his left he heard the scuffle of feet and strained breathing. He followed the sounds by the shortest possible route, scaling the cement alleyway wall and coming down into a weed-strewn back yard, where the breath-noise mixed with the sound of a radio playing jazz.

Lloyd blundered through the yard, mumbling prayers to engulf the music. He found a walkway leading to the street, and the light from the adjoining house let him pick out a trail of freshly spilled blood. He saw that the blood led into a huge vacant lot, pitch dark and eerily silent.

Lloyd listened, willing himself to assume the ears of a highly attuned animal. Just as his eyes became accustomed to the darkness and let him pick out objects in the lot, he heard it: a snapping of metal on metal, coming from the direction of a portable construction toilet. It was unmistakable: Beller was still armed with one of his evil customized .45s, and he knew Lloyd was near.

Lloyd hurled a rock at the outhouse. The door creaked open and three single shots rang out, followed by the sound of doors slamming all the way down the block.

Lloyd got an idea. He walked down the street, scanning front porches until he found what he was looking for, nestled among an evening's array of potato chip bags and empty beer cans–a portable radio. Steeling himself, he turned on the volume and was bombarded by rhythmic soul music. Despite his headache, he smiled, then turned the volume down. It was poetic justice for Staff Sergeant Richard A. Beller.

Lloyd carried the radio into the vacant lot and placed it on the ground ten yards in back of the construction toilet, then flipped the volume dial and ran in the opposite direction.

Beller burst out the door of the outhouse seconds later, screaming, "Nigger! Nigger! Nigger!" Blindly, he fired off a series of shots. The light from his muzzle bursts illuminated him perfectly. Lloyd raised his .45 and aimed slowly, pointing at Beller's feet to allow for recoil. He squeezed the trigger, the gun kicked and the elephant clip emptied. Beller screamed. Lloyd dug into the dirt, stifling his own screams. The radio blasted rhythm and blues, and Lloyd ran toward the sound, the butt end of his .45 extended. He stumbled in the darkness, then got down on his hands and knees and bludgeoned the music to death.

Lloyd stood up unsteadily, then walked to the remains of Richard Beller. He felt strangely calm as he carried first the entrails of the former civilian soldier to the outhouse, then the lower body, then the disembodied arms. Beller's head was nothing but splattered bone and brain debris, and Lloyd let them lie in the dirt.

Muttering, "God please, please, God, rabbit down the hole," Lloyd walked out to the street, noting with his animal antennae that there was no one about–the locals were either scared shitless by the gunfire or inured to it. He emptied his canteen into the gutter and found a length of surgical tubing in his bayonet case–good strangling cord, Beller had once told him. There was a '61 Ford Fairlane at the curb. Deftly manipulating the tubing and canteen, Lloyd managed to siphon a solid pint of gas from the tank. He walked back to the outhouse and doused what remained of Beller, than reloaded his .45 and paced off ten yards. He fired, and the outhouse exploded. Lloyd walked back to Avalon Boulevard. When he turned around, the entire lot was engulfed in flames.

Two days later, the Watts Riot was over. Order had been restored to the devastated underbelly of South Central Los Angeles. Forty-two lives were lost–forty rioters, one deputy sheriff and one National Guardsman whose body was never found, but who was presumed dead.

The riot was attributed to many causes. The N.A.A.C.P. and the Urban League attributed it to racism and poverty. The Black Muslim Party attributed it to police brutality. Los Angeles Chief of Police William H. Parker attributed it to a “breakdown in moral values.” Lloyd Hopkins considered all these theories fatuous nonsense. He attributed the Watts Riot to the death of the innocent heart, most specifically the heart of an old black wino named Famous Johnson.

When it was over, Lloyd retrieved his car from the parking lot of the Glendale Armory and drove to Janice’s apartment. They made love, and Janice provided what comfort she could, but refused the oral comfort Lloyd begged for. He left her bed at three in the morning and went looking for it.

He found a Negro prostitute at the corner of Western and Adams who was willing to do the deed for ten dollars, and they drove to a side street and parked. Lloyd screamed when he came, frightening the hooker, who bolted out of the car before she could collect her money.

Lloyd cruised aimlessly until dawn, then drove to his parents’ house in Silverlake. He could hear his father snoring as he unlocked the door, and he saw light coming from under the door to Tom’s room. His mother was in her den, sitting in her bentwood rocker. All the lights in the room were off, except for the colored light from the fish tank. Lloyd sat down on the floor and told the mute, prematurely old woman his entire life story, ending with the killing of the killer of innocence and how he could now protect innocent people as never before. Absolved and fortified, he kissed his mother’s cheek and wondered how he would kill the eight weeks before he entered the Academy.

Tom was waiting for him outside the house, stationed firmly on the pathway leading to the sidewalk. When he saw Lloyd, he laughed and opened his mouth to speak. Lloyd didn’t let him. He pulled a .45 automatic from his waistband and placed it against Tom’s forehead. Tom started to tremble, and Lloyd said very softly, “If you ever mention niggers, commies, kikes, or any of that shit to me ever again, I’ll kill you.” Tom’s florid face went pale, and Lloyd smiled and walked back to the shattered remains of his own innocence.

Part Two Torch Songs

3

He cruised west on Ventura Boulevard, savoring the newness of daylight-saving time, the clarity of the extra-long afternoons and the unseasonably warm spring weather that had the harlots dressed in tank tops and bare-midriff halters and the real women in a profusion of demure summer pastels: pink, light blue and green, pale yellow.

It had been many months since the last time, and he attributed this hiatus to the shifting weather patterns that had his head in a tizzy: warm one day, cold and rainy the next, you never knew how women were going to dress, so it was hard to get a fix on one to rescue–you couldn't feel the colors, the texture of what a woman was until you viewed her in a context of consistency. God knows that when the planning started the little fluxes of her life became all too evident; if he lost love for her then, the resultant pity reaffirmed the spiritual aspects of his purpose and gave him the detachment necessary to do the job.

But the planning was at least half of it, the part that edified, that cleansed him, that gave him abstention from minor chaos and precarious impunity from a world that gobbled up the refined and sensitive and spit them out like so much waste fluid.

Deciding to drive through Topanga Canyon on his way back to the city, he killed the air-conditioning and put a meditation tape on the cassette player, one that stressed his favorite theme: the silent mover, self-assured and accepting, armed with a compassionate purpose. He listened as the minister with the countrified voice spoke of the necessity of goals. "What sets the man of movement apart from the man dwelling in the netherworld of stasis is the road, both inward and outward bound, toward worthwhile goals. Traveling this road is both the journey and the destination, the gift both given and received. You can change your life forever if you will follow this simple thirty day program. First, think of what you want most at this moment–it can be anything from spiritual enlightenment to a new car. Write that goal down on a piece of paper, and write today's date next to it. Now, for the next thirty days, I want you to concentrate on achieving that goal, and allow no thoughts of failure to enter your mind. If these thoughts intrude, banish them! Banish all but the good pure thoughts of achieving your goal, and miracles will happen!"

He believed it; he had made it work for him. There were now twenty pieces of carefully folded paper attesting to the fact that it worked.

He had first played the tape fifteen years before, in 1967, and was impressed. But he didn't know what he wanted. Three days later he saw her, and knew. Jane Wilhelm was her name. Grosse Point born and bred, she had fled Bennington in her senior year, hitching west in search of new values and friends. She had drifted, oxford shirt and penny loafer clad, to the dope scene on the Sunset Strip. He had first seen her outside the Whisky Au Go Go, talking to a bunch of hippie low lifers, obviously trying to downplay her intelligence and good breeding. He picked her up and told her of his tape and piece of paper. She was touched, but laughed aloud for several moments. If he wanted to ball, why didn't he just ask? Romanticism was corny, and she was a liberated woman.

It was then, in his refusal, that he took his first moral stand. He now knew the exactitude of his immediate goal and all his future ones: the salvation of female innocence.

He kept Jane Wilhelm under loose surveillance until the end of the thirty-day period prescribed by the minister, watching her make the rounds of love-ins, crash pads and rock concerts. Shortly after midnight on the thirty-first day, Jane stumbled away alone from Gazzari's Disco. From his car, parked just south of Sunset, he watched her weave across the street. He turned on his high beams, catching her full in the face, committing to memory her drug-puffed features and dilated eyes. It was her final debasement. He strangled her right there on the sidewalk, then threw her body into the trunk of his car.

Three nights later he drove north to the farmland outside of Oxnard. After a roadside prayer service that featured his salvation tape, he buried Jane in the soft earth adjoining a rock quarry. So far as he knew, her body was never found.

He turned onto Topanga Canyon Road, recalling the methodology that had allowed him to save twenty women without the excitable mass media or fuzz ever seizing on him. It was simple. He became his women, spending months assimilating the details of their lives, savoring every nuance, cataloguing every perfection and imperfection before deciding on the method of elimination, which was then tailored to fit the persona, indeed the very soul, of his intended. Thus the planning was the courtship, and the killing the betrothal.

The thought of courtship brought forth a huge rush of ardent imagery, all revolving around prosaic detail, the small intimacies that only a lover could appreciate.

Elaine from 1969, who had loved baroque music; who, although pretty, had spent virtually all her free time listening to Bach and Vivaldi with the windows of her garage apartment open, even in the coldest weather–wanting to share the beauty she felt with a world deadset on ignoring her. Night after night he had listened with a boom receiver from a nearby rooftop, picking up muttered declarations of loneliness beneath the music, almost weeping as their hearts fused in the strains of the Brandenburg Concerti.

Twice he walked through the apartment, collating directions that would indicate the proper way to salvage Elaine's soul. He had decided to wait, to meditate on the end of this woman's life, when he found underneath her sweaters an application for a computer dating service. That Elaine had succumbed to that vulgarity was the final indicator.

He spent a month studying her handwriting, and a week composing a suicide note in that hand. One cold night after Thanksgiving he climbed in through a window and opened three grain and a half Seconal capsules into the bottle of orange juice that he knew Elaine drank from every night before retiring. Later, he watched through a telescope as she took death's communion, then gave her two hours of sleep before entering the apartment, leaving the note and turning on the gas. As a final act of love he put a Vivaldi flute concerto on the stereo to provide accompaniment to Elaine's departure.

Blinding memories of other lovers caused his eyes to well with tears as he pictured their moments of culmination: Karen the horse lover, whose house was a virtual testament to her equine passion; Karen who rode bareback in the hills above Malibu and who died astride her strawberry roan as he ran from cover and bludgeoned the horse over the edge of a cliff; Monica, of the exquisite taste in small things, who clad the polio-riddled body she hated in the finest of silk and wool. As he continued to steal glimpses of her diary and watched her loathing of her body grow, he knew that dismemberment would be the ultimate mercy. After strangling Monica in her Marina Del Ray apartment, he rent her with a power saw and dumped her plastic encased parts into the ocean near Manhattan Beach. Police attributed the death to the "Trashbag Killer."

He dashed tears from his eyes, feeling the memories snowball into yearning. It was time again.

He drove into Westwood Village, paid to park and went walking, deciding not to be hasty, yet also not unduly cautious. Late dusk was falling, bringing with it a corresponding drop in temperature, and the Village streets were bursting with female vitality: women everywhere; snuggling into sweaters, hugging close to storefronts as they waited to enter movie theatres, browsing through bookstores, walking around him, past him, almost through him, it seemed.

Late dusk became night, and with darkness the streets had thinned to the point where individual women stood out in all their uniqueness. It was then that he saw her, standing in front of Hunter's Book Store, peering into the window as if in search of a vision. She was tall and slender, wearing a minimum of make-up on a soft face that tried hard to project a no-nonsense air. Late twenties–a seeker–a good-natured artificer with a sense of humor, he decided; she would enter the book store, check out the best sellers first, then the quality paperbacks, finally settling on a gothic romance or detective novel. She was lonely. She needed him.

The woman pulled her hair into a bun and slid a barette over the loose ends. She sighed and pushed open the door of the bookstore, then strode purposefully to a display table covered with books on self-improvement. Everything from Creative Divorce to Winning Through Dynamic Yoga was represented, and the woman hesitated, then grabbed a copy of Force-Field Synergistics Can Save Your Life, and carried it back to the cashier.

He was a discreet distance behind her all the way, and when she pulled out a checkbook to pay for her purchase, he memorized the name and address printed on her checks:

Linda Deverson
3583 Mentone Avenue
Culver City, Calif. 90408

He didn't wait to hear Linda Deverson converse with the cashier. He ran out of the store and all the way to his car, seized by love and the territorial imperative: the poet wanted to see the ground of his new courtship.

Linda Deverson was many things, he thought three weeks later as he developed the latest batch of photos. Pulling them out of the solution and hanging them up, he watched her spring to life in vivid black and white. There was Linda leaving the office where she worked as a real estate salesperson; Linda scowling as she attempted to pump her own gas; Linda jogging down San Vicente Boulevard;

Linda staring out of her living room window, smoking a cigarette.

He locked the shop, took the photos and went upstairs to his apartment. As always when he walked through his darkened kingdom, he felt proud. Proud that he had had the patience to save and persevere and never relent in his determination to own this place that had given him the finest moments of his youth.

When his parents died and left him homeless at fourteen, the owner of Silverlake Camera had befriended him, giving him twenty dollars a week to sweep out the store at closing every night, and allowing him to sleep on the floor and study in the customers' bathroom. He studied hard and made the owner proud of him. The owner was a horse lover and gambler, and used the store as a bookie drop. He had always thought that his benefactor, who suffered from congestive heart disease and was familyless, would leave the store to him; but he was wrong–when he died the shop was taken over by the bookies to whom he owed money. They promptly ran it to hell–hiring nothing but incompetents, turning the quiet little shop into a low-life hangout–running football pools, booking horses, and selling dope.

When he realized what had been done to his sanctuary, he knew that he had to act to save it, whatever the price.

He had been making a good living as a free-lance photographer, shooting weddings and banquets and communions, and he had saved more than enough money to buy the store should it go on the market. But he knew that the scum who owned it would never sell–it was turning too great an illicit profit. This vexed him so much that he completely forgot about his fourth courtship and threw all his energy toward permanent ownership of his despoiled safe harbor.

Batteries of anonymous phone calls to the police and district attorney did no good; they would not act on the malfeasance at Silverlake Camera. Desperate now, he searched out other means.

Through surveillance, he knew that the new owner got drunk every night at a bar on Sunset. He knew that the man had to be poured into a cab at closing time, and that the cabbie who met him at the door of the bar each night at two a.m. was a compulsive horse player who was heavily in his debt. With the same diligence that marked his courtships, he went to work, first acquiring an ounce of uncut heroin, then approaching the cab driver and making him an offer. The cabbie accepted the offer, and left Los Angeles the following day.

Two nights later, he was the one behind the wheel of the cab in front of the Short Stop Bar at closing time. At precisely two a.m., the owner of Silverlake Camera staggered outside and flopped into the back seat, promptly passing out. He drove the man to Sunset and Alvarado, and stuffed a plastic bag bursting with heroin into his coat pocket. He then hauled the unconscious drunk over to Silverlake Camera and placed him in a sitting position, half in and half out the front door, the key in his right hand.

He drove to a pay phone, called the Los Angeles Police Department and told them of a burglary in progress. They took care of the rest. Three patrol cars were dispatched to Sunset and Alvarado. As the first car screeched to a halt outside Silverlake Camera, the man in the doorway came awake, got to his feet and reached inside his coat pocket. Misinterpreting his gesture, the two patrolmen shot and killed him. Silverlake Camera went into receivership the following week and he picked it up for a song.

The camera shop and the three-room apartment above it became his song, and he renovated it into a symphony; a complete aesthetic statement of purpose, one steeped in his own past and the clandestine histories of the three people who had given him the terrible catharsis that set him free to salvage female innocence.

One whole wall was devoted to his attackers–a photographic collage that updated their warped progress in life: the musclebound one a Los Angeles County Deputy Sheriff, his sniveling lackey a male prostitute. Their brief, violent transit with him had shaped their lives for the negative–the acquisition of money and cheap one-on-one power the only balm for their spiritual emptiness. The candid snapshots on the wall spelled it out plainly: The Birdman, stationed at curbside on a "Boy's Town" street, hip outthrust, hungry eyes trawling for wretched lonely men to bring him a few dollars and ten minutes of selfhood; and Muscles, overweight and florid-faced, staring out the window of his patrol car at his West Hollywood constituency–the hip gays that he was sworn to protect, but who disdained his "protection" and ridiculed him as "Officer Pig."

The opposite wall held blown-up yearbook photographs of his original beloved; her innocence preserved forever by the extraordinary clarity of his art. He had clipped the photographs on graduation day 1964, and it wasn't until over a decade later, when he was a master photographer, that he felt confident enough to embark on a complex blow-up and reproduction process in an attempt to make them larger than life. Taped next to the blow-ups were gnarled, shriveled and twisted rose branches–twenty of them–the detritus of the floral tributes that he sent to his beloved after claiming a woman in her name.

He had set out to turn his sanctuary into a total sensory testament to the three, but for years the methodology had eluded him. He had claimed his visual access, but he wanted to hear these people breathe.

The solution came to him in a dream. Young women were tied to the spindle of a giant recording turntable. He sat at the control board of an elaborate electrical system, pushing buttons and flipping levers in a futile effort to make the women scream. Himself near the point of screaming, he had somehow willed the ability to quash his frustration by waving his arms in the simulation of flight. As his limbs treaded air, he ran out of breath and was close to suffocating when his hands touched free floating streams of magnetic tape. He grabbed the tape and used it as ballast to return to the control board. All the lights on the panel had gone off during his flight, and when he began pushing buttons the lights switched on, then short-circuited and burst with blood. He began to stuff the bloody holes with tape. The tape slithered through the apertures, onto the turntable and around the spindle, crushing the young women who were held captive there. Their screams awoke him from his dream, dissolving into his own scream when he discovered that his groin had exploded into his clenched hands.

That morning he purchased two state-of-the-art transistorized tape recorders, two condensor microphones, three hundred feet of wire, and a transistor power pack. Within a week the apartments of both Officer Pig and his original beloved had been outfitted with brilliantly concealed listening devices; and his access to their lives was complete. He would make weekly runs to change the tapes, almost exploding as he returned home and looked at the pictures on the wall and listened to their breathing compliment, learning intimacies that not even the dearest of lovers would know.

Those intimacies validated his judgment straight down the line: His first beloved took her flesh lovers with caution–they were sensitive-sounding men who loved her and capitulated to her subtle will absolutely. He could tell that she was lonely beneath her sometimes strident Feminist facade, but that was natural: she was a poet, one of growing local renown, and loneliness was the bane of all creative people. Officer Pig was, of course, corruption incarnate–an up-for-grabs cop who took bribes from the male prostitutes of Boy's Town, allowing them to ply their wicked craft while he and his sleazy cop buddies looked the other way. The Birdman was his liaison, and hours of listening to the two old high school buddies gloat over their picayune crime scams had convinced him that the wretchedness of their lives was his revenge.

His years of listening passed, long evenings where he would touch himself in total darkness as the tapes unfurled into his headphones. He grew even bolder in his desire to be in total sync with those who had brought about his rebirth, and on the anniversary of the beginning that he rarely thought of anymore, he staged betrothals artificed as suicides to celebrate his own act of submission in a sawdust covered high school corridor. Four times; twice in Officer Pig's veritable backyard, once in his own apartment building. The love he had felt in those moments of symbiotic reverie had made his clenched hand explosions magnify tenfold, and he knew that every gauntlet of camera art and breath and blood that he ran would only serve to make his song more inviolate.

Back in the present, he thought again of the many things Linda Deverson was, then felt his mind go blank as he tried to find a narrative line to impose on the welter of images that constituted his new love.

He sighed and locked the door of his apartment behind him, then took the photographs of Linda and taped them to the Tiffany glass window that fronted his writing desk. Sighing again, he wrote:

> Three weeks into the courtship and as yet no access to her apartment, much less her heart–triple locks on the one door, it will take a bold gambit to get inside–I will have to risk it soon–Linda remains so elusive. Or maybe not; what has caught me so far is her sense of humor–the rueful smile that lights up her face as she pulls a cigarette out of her sweatsuit after jogging three miles down San Vicente; her firm but humorous refusals to go out with the obdurate young salesman who shares a cubicle with her at the real estate office; the way she talks to herself when she thinks no one is looking and the broad way she covers her mouth when a passerby catches her in the act. Two nights ago I followed her to the Force Field Synergistics seminar. That same rueful smile when she wrote the check for registration and again at the first "grouping" when they told her she couldn't smoke. I think that Linda possess the same detachment I have noticed in writers–the desire to commune with humanity, to have a common ground or dream–yet the concurrent need to remain aloof, to hold her intrinsic truths (however universal) above those of the collective. Linda is a subtle woman. While the first grouping (ambiguous jive talk about unity and energy) was going on, I snuck back to the registration office and stole her application. I now know this about my beloved:

7. Why did you come to the F.F.S. Institute?–I can't honestly say. Some of the things in your book struck me as truthful things that could help me to better myself.
8. Do you think F.F.S. can change your life?–I don't know.

A subtle woman. I can change your life, Linda; I am the only one who can.

Three nights later he broke into her apartment.

It was carefully thought out and bold. He knew that she would be attending the second Synergistics Seminar, which was scheduled to last from eight o'clock until midnight. At seven forty-five he was stationed across the street from the F.F.S. Institute on 14th and Montana in Santa Monica, armed with a matchbook sized circuit breaker and wearing skin-tight rubber gloves.

He smiled as Linda pulled into the parking lot, exchanged guarded greetings with other arriving F.F.S.ers and wolfed down a last cigarette before running into the large red brick building. He waited ten minutes, then sprinted over to her '69 Camaro, opened the hood and attached the circuit breaker to the underside of the car's distributor housing. Should anyone attempt to start the Camaro, it would turn over once and die. Laughing at the small perfection of it, he slammed the hood and ran back to his own car, then drove to the home of his beloved.

It was a pitch-dark spring night, and warm winds gave added audial cover. Parking a block away, he padded over to 3583 Mentone Avenue, carrying a flat-handled lug wrench and a transistor radio in a brown paper bag. Just as a huge gust of wind came up, he placed the radio on the ground outside Linda's living room window and turned the volume up full blast. Punk Rock bombarded the night, and he slammed the lug wrench full force into the window, grabbed the radio and ran back to his car.

He waited for twenty minutes, until he was certain that no one had heard the noise and no silent alarm had been sounded. Then he walked back and vaulted into the dark apartment.

Drawing curtains over the broken window, he deep-breathed and let his eyes become accustomed to the darkness, then followed his most urgent curiosity straight back toward where the bathroom had to be. He turned on a light and then rummaged through the medicine cabinet; checked out the make-up kit on top of the toilet; even went through the dirty clothes hamper. His soul sighed in relief. No contraceptive devices of any kind; his beloved was chaste.

He left the door ajar and walked into the bedroom. Quickly noting that there was no overhead light, he turned on the lamp next to the bed. Its diffused glow gave him light to work by, and he flung open the walk-in closet door, hungry to touch the fabric of his beloved's life.

The closet was packed with garments on hangers, and he swept them up in a giant armful and carried them into the bathroom. There were mostly dresses, in a variety of fabrics and styles. Trembling, he fondled polyester suits and cotton shifts, pseudo-silk culottes and businesslike tweed; stripes, plaids, tattersall checks–all feminine and all pointing to the subtle, searching nature of Linda Deverson. She doesn't know who she is, he said to himself; so she buys clothes to reflect all the different things she could be.

He carried the bundle of clothing back to the closet and arranged it as it had been, then went looking for further evidence of Linda's chastity. He found it on her telephone stand–all the phone numbers in her address book belonged to women. Heart leaping with joy, he went into the kitchen and rummaged beneath the sink until he found a can of black paint and a stiff paint brush. He pried the can open and drew out a big glob of paint and smeared "Clanton 14 St.–Culver City–Viva La Raza" on the kitchen wall. To make it look even better, he grabbed a toaster and portable cassette player and took them with him.

Fondling the toaster on the seat beside him, he drove back to the F.F.S. Institute and removed the circuit breaker from Linda Deverson's car, then went home to meditate on the subtlety of his woman.

The following Wednesday night was the first F.F.S. "Question and Answer" grouping. He had purchased his ticket two days before at the Ticketron outlet near his shop and was curious as to how Linda would query the F.F.S. programmers, who had thus far brooked no feedback from their trainees. He was certain his beloved would interpose intelligent, skeptical questions.

There was a cordon of religious zealots outside the institute, brandishing signs that read "*Syn*ergistics is sin! Jesus is the only way!" He laughed as he walked into them; he thought Jesus was vulgar. One of the zealots noticed the ironic smile on his face and asked him if he had been saved.

"Twenty times," he replied.

The zealot's jaw dropped; he had been on the butt end of many sacrilegious one-liners, but this was a new one. He stood aside and let the nondescript heretic enter the building.

Once inside, he gave his ticket to the security guard, who handed him a large cushion and pointed in the direction of the assembly room. He walked through a hallway adorned with photographs of celebrity F.F.S.ers and into a huge room where knots of people milled around anxiously, chattering and sizing up the new arrivals. At the back of the room he wadded his cushion up and sat down with his eyes glued to the door.

She came in a moment later, setting her cushion down just a few feet away from him. His heart shuddered and pounded so hard that he thought it would drown out all the excited psychobabble that was floating through the room. Staring into his lap, he assumed a meditation pose that he hoped would forestall any conversation she might attempt. He shut his eyes so hard and wrenched his hands so tightly that he felt like a shrapnel bomb about to explode.

Then the lights in the room were dimmed twice, indicating the session was about to begin. A hush came over the assembly as the lights went out completely and candles were lit and placed in strategic positions throughout the room. The sudden darkness gripped him and held him like a lover. He turned his head and caught a glance of Linda silhouetted in candlelight. Mine, he said to himself, mine.

Sitar chords came over the P.A. system, winding down into a soft male voice. “Feel the fields that separate you from your greater self start to dissipate. Feel your inner self mix with the synergy of other tuned-in force fields to produce true energy and union. Feel the synthesis of yourself and everything good in the cosmos.”

The voice lowered itself to a whisper. “Today I am here to relate to you personally, to help you apply the principles of Force Field Synergistics to your personal lives. This is your third workshop; you have the ammunition necessary to change your lives forever, but I am sure you have many questions. That is why I am here. Lights, please!”

The lights went on, jarring him. Carefully modulating his breathing to keep his control at optimum, he watched a silver-haired young man in a blue blazer walk to a flower draped lectern at the front of the room. He was greeted with wild applause and bliss-filled gazes.

“Thank you,” the man said. “Questions?”

An elderly man at the front of the room raised his hand and said, “Yeah, I got a question. What are you gonna do about the niggers?”

The man at the lectern went beet red beneath his silver coiffure and said, “Well, I don’t think that’s germane to the issues at hand. I think—”

“Well, I do!” the old man bellowed. “You people took this building over from the Moose, and you got a civic responsibility to address yourself to the nigger problem!” The old man looked around for support and got nothing but embarrassed shrugs and hostile looks. The man at the lectern snapped his fingers and two burly, blazer-clad teenagers entered the room.

The old man ranted on. “I was a member of the Moose Lodge for thirty-eight years, and I rue the day we sold out to you bimbos! I’m gonna call for a meeting of the zoning board, and get an ordinance passed to keep all niggers and religious crackpots south of Wilshire. I’m a member in good…” The teenagers grabbed the old man by his arms and legs and carried him, kicking, biting, and screaming, out of the room.

The man at the lectern called for quiet, raising his hands in a supplicating gesture to quell the relieved hubbub that followed in the old man's wake. Running a hand through his silver hair, he said, "Now there's someone with a low karma synergy! Racism is low chakra! Now …"

Linda Deverson raised her hand forcefully and said, "I have a question. It relates to that old man. What if his inner self is bad and all his native force fields are so twisted with fear and anger that meanness is all he can relate to? What if he has just one germ of kindness, of curiosity, and that's what brought him here tonight? He paid to attend this meeting tonight, he—"

"His money will be refunded," the man at the lectern interjected.

"That's not what I'm talking about!" Linda shouted. "That's not what I mean! Don't you understand that that man can't be dismissed with a cheap crack about low chakra? Don't you …" Linda slammed her hands into her cushion, then got to her feet and rushed to the front door.

"Let her go!" the group leader said. "Her misery will be refunded if she leaves our program. Let her pay for her chakra!"

Barely containing his excitement, he got up to follow her and was almost knocked over by a tall buxom woman in a corduroy pantsuit. When he got outside to the parking lot, he found her conferring with Linda, who was smoking a cigarette and brushing angry tears out of her eyes. Shielded by a tall hedgerow, he could hear their conversation plainly.

"Shit, shit, shit," Linda was muttering.

"Just forget about it," the woman answered. "You win a few, you lose a few. I've been searching for a few years longer than you; listen to the voice of experience."

Linda laughed. "You're probably right. God, could I use a drink!"

"I wouldn't mind one myself," the woman said. "Do you mind scotch?"

"No, I love it!"

"Good. I've got a bottle of Chivas at home. I live in the Palisades. Did you bring your car?"

"Yes."

"Want to follow me?"

Linda nodded and ground out her cigarette. "Sure."

He was right behind them as they drove the twisting roads of Santa Monica Canyon up to a quiet block of large houses fronted by broad lawns. He watched as the first car hit its right-hand directional and pulled into a long circular driveway. Linda followed suit, parking directly behind. He drove on and parked at the corner, then walked casually over to the house the woman had entered.

The lawn extended around both sides of the house, with towering hibiscus plants forming its perimeters. He threaded his way along them, staying in the shadows, making a complete circuit of the house before catching sight of the two women sitting in adjoining easy chairs in a warmly appointed den. Crouching low, he watched Linda sip scotch and laugh in pantomime, imagining that she was being regaled by him, by his wit and the humorous verse that he wrote only for her. The other woman was laughing too, slapping her knee and freshening Linda's glass every few minutes from the bottle on the coffee table.

He was staring into the window, lost in Linda's laughter, when he suddenly became aware that something was drastically wrong. His instinct never failed him, and just as he was about to hit on the cause of his uneasiness, he saw the two women move toward each other very slowly and in perfect synchronization kiss on the lips, first tentatively, then hungrily, knocking over the bottle of scotch as they moved into a fierce embrace. He started to scream, then stifled the sound by jamming his hand into his mouth. He raised his other fist to smash the window, but reason took tenuous hold and he smashed the ground instead.

He looked in the window again. The women were nowhere to be seen. Frantically, he pressed his face to the glass and craned his neck almost off its axis, until he saw two pair of nude legs wrapped together, twisting and straining on the floor. Then he did scream, and the otherworldly sound of his own terrified voice propelled him out to the street. He ran until his lungs burned and his legs started to wobble. Then he fell to his knees and was perfectly still as comforting images of the twenty others washed over him. He thought of them at their moments of salvation, and of how much they looked like the ones who had betrayed his original true love so many years before.

Restored by the righteousness of his purpose, he got up and walked back to his car.

Performing the rituals of life allowed him to operate over the next week, keeping images of the betrayal from bludgeoning him into desperate action.

He minded the store from morning until late afternoon, then fielded calls that came in from his answering service. Wedding assignments were picking up, as they did each spring, and this year he could afford to be choosy, spending his early evenings interviewing the doting parents of engaged young couples who thought they were interviewing him. No uglies, he decided; no porkers. Only slender, good-looking young people would stand before his camera. He owed himself that.

After conducting business he would drive to the Palisades and watch Linda Deverson and Carol March make love. Dressed in black, he would scale a shadow-shrouded telephone pole and peer down through the upstairs bedroom window as the woman coupled on a quilt-covered waterbed. At about midnight, when his arms were weary from hours of hugging the rough wood of the phone pole, he would watch the sated Linda get up from the bed and dress as Carol importuned her to spend the night. It was always the same; his brain, willfully shut off as he viewed the lovemaking, would snap to life with speculation as Linda took her leave. Why was Linda leaving? Was buried guilt coming to the surface? Regret at the way she had debased herself?

He would then jump down from the pole and run for his car, pulling up without lights behind Linda's Camaro just as she walked out the door. Then he would follow the glow of her taillights as she drove home via the most scenic route possible, almost as if she needed an injection of beauty after her night of debauchery. Keeping a safe distance behind, he would let her part at the intersection of Sunset and the Pacific Coast Highway, wondering how and when he could bring her salvation.

After two more weeks of extensive surveillance, he wrote in his diary:

6-7-82

> Linda Deverson is a tragic victim of these times. Her sensuality is self-destructive, but indicative of stong parental need. The March woman capitalizes on this; she is a viper. Linda remains unsatisfied in both her sensuality and search for a mother (the March woman is at least fifteen years her senior!). Her midnight excursions through the most soulful parts of Pacific Palisades and Santa Monica speak volumes on her guilt and subtle searching nature. Her need for beauty is so strong in the aftermath of her self destruction. I must take her at this moment–that must be the precise time of her salvation.

Emboldened by knowledge of the place, he put the time out of his mind, losing himself in his courtship. But the late nights were taking their toll in little portents of slippage in his work life–rolls of film clumsily shot, then stupidly exposed to sunlight; appointments forgotten, photo orders misplaced. The slippage had to stop, and he knew how to do it. He had to consummate his courtship of Linda Deverson.

He set the date: Tuesday, June 14th, three days hence. His tremors of expectation began to grow.

On Monday, June 13th, he went to an auto supply store in the Valley and bought a case of motor oil, then drove to a junkyard and told the owner he was looking for chrome hood ornaments. While the owner scurried about looking for them, he scraped up several huge handfuls of iron filings from the ground and loaded them into a paper bag. The junkman came running back a few minutes later, waving a chrome bulldog. Feeling generous, he offered the man ten dollars for it. The man accepted. Driving back over the Cahuenga Pass to his shop, he threw the bulldog out the window and laughed as it clattered over to the edge of the roadway.

His consummation day was carefully planned and honed down to the second. Upon rising he placed the “Closed Due To Illness” sign in the window, then returned to his apartment, where he played his meditation tape and stared at the photos of Linda Deverson. Next he destroyed the pages in his diary that pertained to her and took a long walk through the neighborhood, all the way over to Echo Park, where he spent hours rowing around the lake and feeding the ducks. At nightfall he packed his consummation tools into the trunk of his car and drove to his first and last rendezvous with his beloved.

At 8:45 he was parked four doors down from Carol March’s house, alternately shifting his gaze from the darkened street to his dashboard clock. At 9:03 Linda Deverson pulled into the driveway. He swooned at the perfection of it; she was right on time.

He drove to Santa Monica Canyon, to the intersection of West Channel Road and Biscayne, where West Channel bisected and the right fork led into a small campground filled with picnic tables and swings. If his calculations were correct, Linda would be driving through at precisely ten minutes of midnight. He pulled his car off to the side of the road on the edge of the park proper, where it was shielded from street view by a row of sycamore trees. Then he went for a long walk.

He returned at 11:40 and got his equipment out of the trunk, first donning his park ranger’s outfit of Smoky The Bear hat, green wool shirt and field belt, then assembling his sawhorse detour signs and carrying them over to the intersection.

Next he hauled his five gallon can of motor oil and iron filings to the middle of the street and poured them smoothly over the pavement, until the blacktop just before the detour signs was a slippery purple ooze glinting with sharp steel. Then all he could do was wait.

At 11:52 he heard her car approaching. As her headlights appeared, his body shuddered and he had to will himself to contain his bowels and bladder.

The car slowed as it neared the detour signs, braking and going into a right turn, then fishtailing and sliding into the saw horses as it hit the pool of oil. There was a crash of wood on metal, then two loud ka-plops! as the rear tires blew out. The car came to a stop and Linda got out, slamming the door and muttering, “Oh shit, oh fuck,” then going around to the back of the car to examine the damage.

Steeling himself with all the courtliness he could muster, he walked from the trees and called out, “Are you okay, miss? That was a nasty slide you took.”

Linda called back, “Yes, I’m okay. But my car!”

He pulled a flashlight from his field belt and shined it into the darkness, arcing it over the campground several times before letting the beam rest on his beloved. Linda blinked against the glare, raising a hand to shield her face. He walked toward her, pointing his light at the ground.

She smiled as she noticed his hat–Smoky The Bear to the rescue; it was good that she had smoked her last cigarette at Carol’s. “Oh God, I’m glad you’re here,” she said. “I saw that detour sign and then skidded on something. I think two of my tires blew out.”

“That’s no problem,” he said, “my service shack is right over here; we’ll call an all-night gas station.”

“Oh God, what a pain in the ass,” Linda said, fumbling in gratitude for the arm of her savior. “You don’t know how glad I am to see you.”

He faltered at her touch; joy consumed him and he said, “I’ve loved you for so long. Since we were kids. Since all tho…”

Linda gasped. “What the he…” she said. “Who the he…”

She started to back away, then tripped and fell to the ground. He reached out a hand to help her up. She hesitated. “No, please,” she whimpered, moving backwards. He fumbled at his field belt and unclipped a two edged fire axe. He bent down again, grabbing Linda at the wrist and yanking her up just as he brought the axe down in a high, rail-splitting swing. Linda’s skull crashed inward as his love went into slow motion and blood and brain fragments burst into the air, suspending the moment into a thousand eternities. He brought the axe down again and again until he was drenched in blood and blood had splattered onto his face and into his mouth and through his brain and his entire soul was a bright lover’s red; the bright red of flowers he would send his true love tomorrow. For you, for you, all for you, the poet muttered as he left the remains of Linda Deverson and walked to his car; my soul, my life for you.

Detective Sergeant Lloyd Hopkins celebrated the seventeenth anniversary of his appointment to the Los Angeles Police Department in his usual manner, grabbing a computer print-out of recent crimes and field interrogation reports filed by Rampart Division, then driving to the old neighborhood to breathe past and present from the vantage point of seventeen years of protecting innocence.

The October day was smoggy and just short of hot. Lloyd got his unmarked Matador from the lot at Parker Center and drove westbound on Sunset, reminiscing: over a decade and a half and the fulfillment of his major dreams–the job, the wife, and the three wonderful daughters. The job thrilling and sad in excess of fulfillment; the marriage strong in the sense of the strong people he and Janice had become; the daughters pure joy and reason for living in themselves. The exultant feelings were the only thing lacking, and in the magnanimity of nostalgia Lloyd chalked up their absence to maturity–he was forty now, not twenty-three; if his seventeen years as a policeman had taught him anything, it was that your expectations diminished as you realized how thoroughly fucked-up the bulk of humanity was, and that you had to go on a hundred seemingly contradictory discourses to keep the major dreams alive.

That the discourses were always women and in direct violation of his Presbyterian marriage vows was the ultimate irony, he thought, stopping for the light at Sunset and Echo Park and rolling up the windows to keep the street noise out. An irony that staunch, strong Janice would never understand. Feeling that his reverie was recklessly overstepping its bounds, Lloyd plunged ahead, anxious to voice it flat out, to himself and the vacant air around him: “It wouldn’t work between us, Janice, if I couldn’t cut loose like that. Little things would accumulate and I’d explode. And you’d hate me. The girls would hate me. That’s why I do it. That’s why I….” Lloyd couldn’t bring himself to say the word “cheat.”

He stopped his musings and pulled into the parking lot of a liquor store, then dug the computer sheets out of his pocket and settled in to think.

The sheets were pale pink with black typescript, edged with seemingly random perforations. Lloyd fingered through them, arranging them in chronological order, starting with the ones dated 9-15-82. Beginning with the crime reports, he let his perfectly controlled blank mind drift through brief accounts of rapes, robberies, purse snatchings, shopliftings, and vandalism. Suspect descriptions and weaponry from shotguns to baseball bats were recounted in crisp, heavily abbreviated sentences. Lloyd read through the crime reports three times, feeling the disparate facts and figures sink in deeper with each reading, blessing Evelyn Wood and her method that allowed him to gobble up the printed word at the rate of three thousand per minute.

Next he turned to the field interrogation reports. These were accounts of people stopped on the street, briefly detained and questioned, then released. Lloyd read through the F.I.s four times, knowing with each reading that there was a connection to be made. He was about to give each stack of print-outs another go round when he snapped to the buried ellipsis that was crying out to him. Furiously shuffling through the pink rolls of paper, he found his match-up: Crime Report #10691, 10-6-82. Armed robbery.

At approximately 11:30 p.m., Thursday, October 6, the Black Cat Bar on Sunset and Vendome was held up by two male Mexicans. They were of undetermined age, but presumed young. They wore silk stockings to disguise their appearances, carried "large" revolvers, and ransacked the cash register before making the proprietor lock up the bar. They then forced the patrons to lie on the floor. While prone, the robbers relieved them of wallets, billfolds and jewelry. They fled a moment later, warning their victims that the "back-up" would be outside with a shotgun for twenty minutes. They slashed the two phone lines before they left. The bartender ran outside five minutes later. There was no back-up.

Stupid fools, Lloyd thought, risking half a dime minimum for a thousand dollars tops. He read over the F.I. report, filed by a Rampart patrolman: 10-7-82, 1:05 a.m.–"Questioned two w.m. outside res. at 2269 Tracy. They were drinking vodka and sitting on top of late model Firebird, Lic. #HBS 027. Explained that car was not theirs, but that they lived in house. Partner and I searched them–clean. Got hot call before we could run warrant check." The officer's name was printed below.

Lloyd kicked the last bits of information around in his head, thinking it sad that he should have greater intimate knowledge of a neighborhood than the cops who patrolled it. 2269 Tracy Street was a low-life holdover from his high school days over twenty years before, when it had been a halfway house for ex-cons. The charismatic ex-gangster who had run the operation on State funds had embezzled a bundle from local Welfare agencies before selling the house to an old buddy from Folsom, then hightailing it to the border, never to be seen again. The buddy promptly hired a good lawyer to help him keep the house. He won his court battle and dealt quality dope out of the old wood-framed dwelling. Lloyd recalled how his high school pals had bought reefers there back in the late 50s. He knew that the house had been sold to a succession of local hoods and had acquired the neighborhood nickname of "Gangster Manor."

Lloyd drove to the Black Cat Bar. The bartender immediately made him for a cop. "Yes, officer?" he said. "No complaints, I hope."

"None," Lloyd said. "I'm here about the robbery of October 6th. Were you tending bar that night?"

"Yeah, I was here. You got any leads? Two detectives came in the next day, but that was it."

"No real leads yet. Do…"

Lloyd was distracted by the sound of the jukebox snapping on, beginning to spill out a disco tune. "Turn that off, will you?" he said. "I can't compete with an orchestra."

The barman laughed. "That's no orchestra, that's 'The Disco Doggies.' Don't you like them?"

Lloyd couldn't tell if the man was being pleasant or trying to vamp him; homosexuals were hard to read. "Maybe I'm behind the times. Just turn it off, okay? Do it now."

The bartender caught the edge in Lloyd's voice and complied, creating a small commotion as he yanked the cord on the jukebox. Returning to the bar he said warily, "Just what was it you wanted to know?"

Relieved by the music's termination, Lloyd said, "Only one thing. Are you certain the two robbers were Mexican?"

"No, I'm not certain."

"Didn't you…"

"They wore masks, officer. What I told the cops is that they talked English with Mexican accents. That's what I said."

"Thank you," Lloyd said, and ran out to his car.

He drove straight to 2269 Tracy Street–Gangster Manor. As he expected, the old house was deserted. Cobwebs, dust, and used condoms covered the warped wood floor, and sets of footprints that Lloyd knew had to be recent were clearly outlined. He followed them into the kitchen. All the fixtures were ripped out and the floor was covered with rodent droppings. Lloyd opened cabinets and drawers, finding only dust, spider webs, and mildewed, maggot-infested groceries. Then he opened a floral patterned bread basket and jumped into the air, dunking imaginary baskets and whooping when he saw what he found: a brand new box of Remington hollow point .38 shells and two pair of Sheer Energy pantyhose. Lloyd whooped again. "Thank you, o' nesting grounds of my youth!" he shouted.

Phone calls to the California Department of Motor Vehicles and L.A.P.D. Records and Information confirmed his thesis. A 1979 Pontiac Firebird, license number HBS 027 was registered to Richard Douglas Wilson of 11879 Saticoy Street, Van Nuys. R. & I. supplied the rest: Richard Douglas Wilson, white male, age thirty-four was a two-time convicted armed robber who had recently been paroled from San Quentin after serving three and a half years of a five year sentence.

Heart bursting, and snug in his soundless phone booth, Lloyd dialed a third number, the home of his one-time mentor and current follower, Captain Arthur Peltz.

"Dutch? Lloyd. What are you doing?"

Peltz yawned into the mouthpiece, "I'm taking a nap, Lloyd. I'm off today. I'm an old man and I need a siesta in the afternoon. What's up? You sound jazzed."

Lloyd laughed. "I am jazzed. You want to take a couple of armed robbers?"

"All by ourselves?"

"Yeah. What's the matter? We've done it a million times."

"At least a million–more like a million and a half. Stake out?"

"Yeah, at the guy's pad in Van Nuys. Van Nuys Station in an hour?"

"I'll be there. You realize that if this thing is a washout, you're buying me dinner?"

"Anywhere you want," Lloyd said, and hung up the phone.

Arthur Peltz was the first Los Angeles policeman to recognize and herald Lloyd Hopkins's genius. It happened when Lloyd was a twenty-seven year old patrolman working Central Division. The year was 1969, and the hippie era of love and good vibes had dwindled out, leaving a backwash of indigent, drug-addicted youngsters floating through the poorer sections of Los Angeles, begging for spare change, shoplifting, sleeping in parks, back yards and doorways and generally contributing to a drastic rise in misdemeanor arrests and felony arrests for possession of narcotics.

Fear of hippie nomads was rife among solid citizen Angelenos, particularly after the Tate-LaBianca slayings were attributed to Charles Manson and his hirsute band. The L.A.P.D. was importuned to come down hard on the destitute minstrels of love; which it did–raiding hippie campgrounds, frequently stopping vehicles containing furtive-looking longhairs and generally letting them know that they were personae non gratas in Los Angeles. The results were satisfying–there was a general hippie move toward eschewing outdoor living and "cooling it." Then five longhaired young men were shot to death on the streets in Hollywood over a period of three weeks.

Sergeant Arthur "Dutch" Peltz, then a forty-one year old Homicide detective, was assigned to the case. He had very little to work on, except a strong instinct that the murders of the unacquainted young men were drug related and that the so-called "ritual markings" on their bodies–an xed out letter H–were put there as subterfuge.

Investigation into the recent pasts of the victims proved fruitless; they were transients existing in a subculture of transients. Dutch Peltz was baffled. He was also an intellectual given to contemplative pursuits, so he decided to take his two-week vacation smack in the middle of his case. He came back from fishing in Oregon clearheaded, spiritually renewed, and pleased to find that there were no new victims of the "Hippie Hunter," as the press had dubbed him. But dire things were happening in Los Angeles. The basin had been flooded with a particularly high-quality Mexican brown heroin, its source unknown. Instinct told Dutch Peltz that the heroin onslaught and the murders were connected. But he didn't have the slightest idea how.

On a cold night around this time, Officer Lloyd Hopkins told his partner he was hungry for sweets, and suggested they stop at a market or liquor store for cookies or cupcakes. His partner shook his head; nothing open this late except Donut Despair, he said. Lloyd weighed the pros and cons of a raging sweet-tooth versus the world's worst donuts served up by either sullen or obsequious wetbacks.

His sweet-tooth won, but there were no wetbacks. Lloyd's jaw dropped as he took a seat at the counter. Donut Despair (or Donut Deelite, open all nite!), as it was known to the world at large, hired nothing but illegal aliens at all its locations. It was the policy of the chain's owner, Morris Dreyfus, a former gangland czar, to employ illegals and pay them below the minimum wage, but make up the difference by providing them with flop-out space at his many Southside tenements. Now this!

Lloyd watched as a sullen hippie youth placed a cup of coffee and three glazed donuts in front of him, then retreated to a back room, leaving the counter untended. He then heard furtive whispers, followed by the slamming of a back door and the starting of a car engine. The hippie counterman reappeared a moment later and couldn't meet Lloyd's eyes; and Lloyd knew it was more than his blue uniform. He knew something was wrong.

The following day, armed with a copy of the Los Angeles Yellow Pages, Lloyd, in civilian clothes, made a circuit of over twenty Donut Despairs, to find the counters manned by longhaired white men at all locations. Twice he sat down and ordered coffee, letting the counterman see–as if by accident–his off-duty .38. In both instances the reaction was cold, stark terror.

Dope, Lloyd said to himself as he drove home that night. Dope. Dope. But. But any streetwise fool would know that anyone as big as I am, with my short haircut and square look is a cop. Those two kids made me for one the second I walked in the door. But it was my gun that scared them.

It was then that Lloyd thought of the Hippie Hunter and the seemingly unrelated heroin influx. When he got home he called Hollywood Station, gave his name and badge number and asked to talk to a Homicide dick.

Dutch Peltz was more impressed with the huge young cop himself than he was with the fact that they had been thinking along almost identical lines. Now he had a hypothesis–that Big Mo Dreyfus was pushing smack out of his donut stands, and that somehow people were getting killed because of it. But it was young Hopkins himself, so undeniably infused with a brilliance of instinct for the darkness in life, that had him awestruck.

Peltz listened for hours as Lloyd told of his desire to protect innocence and how he had trained his mind to pick out conversations in crowded restaurants and how he could read lips and memorize with time and place any face that he glimpsed for only a second. When he went home, Dutch Peltz said to his wife, "I met a genius tonight. I don't think I'll ever be the same."

It was a prophetic remark.

The following day Peltz began an investigation into the financial dealings of Morris Dreyfus. He learned that Dreyfus had been converting his stocks and bonds into cash and that he was contacting former gangland associates with offers to sell the Donut Deelite chain dirt cheap. Further investigation showed that Dreyfus had recently applied for a passport and had sold his homes in Palm Springs and Lake Arrowhead.

Peltz began a surveillance of Dreyfus, watching him make steady rounds of his donut stands, where he would motion the longhaired counterman into the back room and depart a moment later. That night Peltz and a veteran narcotics detective tailed Dreyfus to the Benedict Canyon home of Reyes Medina, a Mexican reputed to be the liaison between poppy-growing combines in southern Mexico and scores of heavyweight stateside heroin dealers. Dreyfus was inside for two hours, and left looking distraught.

The following morning, Peltz drove to the Donut Deelite on 43rd and Normandie. He parked across the street and waited until the stand was empty of customers, then walked in and flashed his badge at the youth behind the counter, telling him he wanted information, and not on donut recipes. The youth tried running out the back way, but Peltz wrestled him to the floor, whispering, "Where's the smack? Where's the shit, you hippie fuck?" until the youth began to blubber out the story that he expected.

Mo Dreyfus was pushing Mexican brown heroin to medium-level local dealers, who were turning it over for a huge profit. What Peltz didn't expect was the news that Dreyfus was dying of cancer and was accruing capital to take exorbitantly expensive treatments by a Brazillian doctor-medicine man. The word had come down that all drug sales out of all Donut Deelite locations were to stop the following week, when the new owner took over. Big Mo would be on his way to Brazil by then, and all the countermen-pushers would be contacted by a "rich Mexican" who would give them their "going away" bonuses.

After uncovering three ounces of heroin underneath a meat locker, Peltz handcuffed the youth and took him downtown to the central jail, where he was booked as a material witness. Peltz then took the elevator to the eighth floor offices of the L.A.P.D.'s Narcotics Division.

Two hours later, after obtaining search and arrest warrants, four shotgun-wielding detectives burst into the home of Morris Dreyfus and arrested him for possession of heroin, possession with intent to sell, sales of dangerous drugs and criminal conspiracy. In his jail cell, against his attorney's advice, Morris Dreyfus made the connection that convinced Dutch Peltz beyond any doubt of Lloyd Hopkins's genius: In hushed tones, Dreyfus told how a "death squad" of militant illegal aliens was behind the killing of the five hippies and how they were now demanding $250,000 from him for firing his immigrant work force en masse. The hippies were killed as a terror tactic; their random selection a ruse to keep attention from being focused on the Donut Deelite chain.

The following morning a dozen black and whites cordoned off both sides of the 1100 block of Wabash Street in East Los Angeles. Flak-jacketed officers surrounded the building that housed the death squad. Armed with fully automatic AK-47s, they broke through the front door, firing warning bursts above the heads of four men and three women quietly eating breakfast. The seven stoically submitted to handcuffing and a search team was deployed to check the rest of the house. A total of eleven illegal aliens was arrested. After a gruelling series of interrogations, three men admitted to the Hollywood killings. They were indicted on five counts of first-degree murder and ultimately received life sentences.

The day after the confessions were secured, Dutch Peltz went looking for Lloyd Hopkins. He found him going off duty in the parking lot at Central Division. Unlocking his car, Lloyd felt a tap on his shoulder. He turned around and found Peltz shuffling his feet nervously, gazing up at him with a look that he could only think of as pure love.

"Thanks, kid," the older cop said. "You've made me. I was going to tell—"

"No one would believe you," Lloyd interrupted. "Let it go down the way it is."

"Don't you want—"

"You did the work, Sergeant. I just supplied the theory."

Peltz laughed until Lloyd thought he would keel over of a heart attack. As his laughter subsided, Peltz regained his breath and said, "Who are you?"

Lloyd flicked the antenna of his car and said softly, "I don't know. I Jesus fucking Christ don't know."

"I can teach you things," Dutch Peltz said. "I've been a Homicide dick for eleven years. I can give you a lot of solid, practical information, the benefit of a lot of experience."

"What do you want from me?" Lloyd asked.

Peltz took a moment to consider the question. "I think I just want to know you," he said.

The two men stared at each other in silence. Then Lloyd slowly extended his hand, sealing their fates.

It was Lloyd who was the teacher; almost from the start. Dutch would provide knowledge and experience in the form of anecdotes and Lloyd would find the hidden human truth and hold it up for magnification. Hundreds of hours were spent talking, rehashing old crimes and discussing topics as diverse as women's clothing and how it reflected character to dog-walking burglars who used their pets as subterfuge. The men discovered safe harbors in each other–Lloyd knew that he had found the one cop who would never look at him strangely when he retreated at the sound of a radio or begrudge him when he insisted on doing it his way; Dutch knew that he had found the supreme police intellect. When Lloyd passed the Sergeant's exam, it was Dutch who pulled strings to get him assigned to the Detective Division, calling in a career's worth of unreturned favors.

It was then that Lloyd Hopkins was able to manifest his intellect and produce astounding results–the greatest number of felony arrests and convictions of any Los Angeles police officer in the history of the department, all within a period of five years. Lloyd's reputation grew to the point where he asked for and was granted almost complete autonomy, deferred to by even the most sternminded, traditionalist cops. And Dutch Peltz proudly watched it happen, content to play in the august light of genius provided by a man he loved more than his own life.

Lloyd found Dutch Peltz in the muster room at Van Nuys Station, pacing the walls and reading the crime reports tacked to the bulletin boards. He cleared his throat and the older cop wheeled and threw up his hands in mock surrender.

"Jesus, Lloyd," he said, "when in God's name will you learn not to tread so softly among friends? A kodiak bear with the tread of a cat. Jesus!"

Lloyd laughed at the expression of love; it made him happy. "You look good, Dutch. Working a desk and losing weight! A fucking miracle."

Dutch gave Lloyd a warm, two-handed handshake. "It's no miracle, kid. I quit smoking and lost weight too. What have we got?"

"A gunsel. Works with a partner. He's got a pad on Saticoy. I figured we'd drive over and check if his car is around. If he's at home, we'll call for a couple of back-ups units, if he's gone, we'll wait him out and take him ourselves. You like it?"

"I like it. I brought my Ithaca pump. What's the joker's name?"

"Richard Douglas Wilson, white male, age thirty-four. Two-time loser with a Quentin jacket."

"Sounds like a charming fellow."

"Yeah, a Renaissance low lifer."

"You'll tell me about it in the car?"

"Yeah, let's go."

Richard Douglas Wilson was not at home. Having checked every street space, driveway and parking lot on the 11800 block of Saticoy Street for a '79 Firebird, Lloyd made a circuit of number 11879; a rundown, two-story apartment house. The mailbox designated Wilson as living in Number 14. Lloyd found the apartment at the rear of the building. A screen-covered, sliding glass window was wide open. He looked inside, then walked back to Dutch, who was parked across the street in the shadow of a freeway off-ramp.

"No car, no Wilson, Dutch," Lloyd said. "I looked in his window–brand new stereo, new TV, new clothes, new money."

Dutch laughed. "You happy, Lloyd?"

"Yeah, I am. Are you?"

"If you are, kid."

The two policemen settled in to wait. Dutch had brought a thermos of coffee, and when twilight stifled the heat and smog, he poured two cups. Handing one to Lloyd, he broke the long, comfortable silence. "I ran into Janice the other day. I had to testify for an old snitch of mine in Santa Monica. He took a fall for a burglary one, so I went down to rap sadness to the D.A. about how the poor bastard was strung out and would he talk to the judge about diverting him to a drug program. Anyway, I stop at a coffee shop, and there's Janice. She's got this fag with her, he's showing her fabrics out of this binder, really giving her the hard sell. Anyway, the fag sashays off and Janice invites me to sit down. We talk. She says the shop is doing well, it's acquiring a reputation, the girls are fine. She says that you spend too much time working, but that it's an old complaint and she can't change you. She looks sort of disgusted, so I come to your aid. I say, 'Genius writes its own rules, sweetie. Lloyd loves you. Lloyd will change in time.' Janice screams at me, 'Lloyd is incapable of it, and his fucking love isn't enough!' That was it, Lloyd. She wouldn't talk about it any more. I tried to change the subject, but Janice keeps taking these cryptic little digs at you. Finally, she jumps up and kisses me on the cheek and says, 'I'm sorry, Dutch. I'm just being a bitch,' and runs out the door."

Dutch's voice trailed off as he searched for words to end his story. "I just thought I'd tell you," he said. "I don't believe partners should keep secrets from each other."

Lloyd sipped his coffee, his mind quietly turbulent, as it always was when he felt cracks appearing in his major dreams. "So what's the upshot, partner?" he asked.

"The upshot?"

"The riddle, you dumb fucking krauthead! The undercurrents! Haven't I taught you better than that? What was Janice really trying to tell you?"

Dutch swallowed his crushed pride and spat it out angrily. "I think she's wise to your womanizing, brainboy. I think she knows that the finest of L.A.'s finest is chasing cunt and shacking up with a bunch of sleazy bimbos who can't hold the remotest candle to the woman he married. That's what I think."

Lloyd went calm beneath his anger, and the cracks in his major dreams became fissures. He shook his head slowly, searching for mortar to fill them up. "You're wrong," he said, giving Dutch's shoulder a gentle squeeze. "I think Janice would let me know. And Dutch? The other women in my life aren't bimbos."

"Then what are they?"

"Just women. And I love them."

"You love them?"

Lloyd knew as he said the words that it was one of the proudest moments of his life. "Yes. I love all the women I sleep with, and I love my daughters and I love my wife."

After four hours of silent surveillance, Dutch had dozed off in the driver's seat, his head cradled into the half-opened front window. Lloyd remained alert, sipping coffee and keeping his eyes glued to the driveway of 11879 Saticoy Street. It was shortly after ten o'clock when he saw a late-model Firebird pull up in front of the building.

He nudged Dutch awake, placing a hand over his mouth. "Our friend is here, Dutch. He just pulled up, and he's still in the car. I think we should get out on my side and walk around and take him from the rear."

Dutch nodded and handed Lloyd his shotgun. Lloyd squeezed through the passenger door onto the sidewalk, keeping the shotgun pressed into his right leg.

Dutch followed suit, slamming the door and throwing an arm around Lloyd, exclaiming, “God, am I smashed!” He went into an adept imitation of a weaving drunk, leaning against Lloyd and talking gibberish.

Lloyd kept his eyes on the black Firebird, waiting for the doors to open, wondering why Wilson was still inside. When they got to the end of the block, he handed Dutch the Ithaca pump and said, “You take the driver, I’ll take the passenger.” Dutch nodded and jacked a shell into the chamber. Lloyd whispered, “Now,” and the men hunkered down and ran up behind the car, swooping down on it from opposite sides, Dutch jamming his shotgun into the driver’s side window, whispering, “Police, don’t move or you’re dead”; Lloyd resting his .38 on the door jamb and saying to the woman passenger, “Freeze, sweetheart. Put your hands on the dashboard. We want your boyfriend, not you.”

The woman stifled a scream and slowly complied with Lloyd’s orders. The driver started to jabber, “Look man, you got this wrong, I ain’t done nothin!”

Dutch tightened his finger on the trigger and rested the barrel on the man’s nose and said, “Put your hands behind your head. I’m gonna open this car door real slow. You get out real slow or you’re gonna be real dead.”

The man nodded and wrapped shaky hands around his neck. Dutch pulled the shotgun back and started to open the car door. As his hand hit the latch, the man kicked out with both legs. The door swung into Dutch’s midsection, knocking him backwards, the shotgun exploding into the air as his finger reflexively yanked the trigger. The man jumped out of the car and stumbled into the street, then got up and started to run.

Lloyd relinquished his bead on the woman and fired a warning shot into the air, yelling, “Halt, halt!”

Dutch got to his feet and fired blindly. Lloyd saw the running figure starting to weave in anticipation of further volleys. He watched the rhythm of the man’s swaying, then fired three times at shoulder level. The man buckled and fell to the pavement. Before Lloyd could approach cautiously, Dutch had run up and was slamming the man in the ribs with the butt of his shotgun. Lloyd ran over and pulled Dutch off, then cuffed the suspect’s hands behind his back.

The man had been hit twice just below the collarbone. Clean, Lloyd noticed; two crisp exit wounds. He pulled the man roughly to his feet and said to Dutch, “Ambulance, back-up units.” Looking around at the crowd that was starting to form on both sides of the street, he added: “And tell those people to back off onto the sidewalk.”

Lloyd turned his attention to the suspect. “Richard Douglas Wilson, right?”

“I don’t gotta tell you nothin’,” the man answered.

“That’s right, you don’t. Okay, let’s take care of the legalities. You have the right to remain silent. You have the right to have legal counsel present during questioning. If you cannot afford counsel, an attorney will be provided. You got anything to say, Wilson?”

“Yeah,” the man said, twisting his wounded shoulder, “I say fuck your mother.”

“A predictable response. Can’t you guys come up with something original like ‘Fuck your father’?”

“Fuck you, flatfoot.”

“That’s better; you’re learning.”

Dutch ran back over. “Ambulance and back-up are on their way.”

“Good. Where’s the girl?”

“She’s still in the car.”

“Good. Look after Mr. Wilson, will you? I want to talk to her.”

Lloyd walked to the black Firebird. The young woman sat rigid in the passenger seat, her hands still clamped to the dashboard. She was crying, and her mascara had run all the way down to her chin. Lloyd knelt by the open door and placed a gentle hand on her shoulder. “Miss?”

The woman turned to face him, starting to weep openly. “I don’t want to have a record!” she bawled. “I just met the guy. I’m not a bad person, I just wanted to get stoned and listen to some music!”

Lloyd smoothed an errant lock of her blonde hair. “What’s your name?” he asked.

“Sarah.”

“Sarah Bernhardt?”

“No.”

“Sarah Vaughan?”

“No.”

“Sarah Coventry?”

The woman laughed and wiped her sleeve across her face. “Sarah Smith,” she said.

Lloyd took her hand. “Good. My name’s Lloyd. Where do you live, Sarah?”

“In West L.A.”

“I’ll tell you what. You go over and wait in that crowd of people. I’ve got a few things to do here, then I’ll drive you home. Okay?”

“Okay… and I won’t have a record?”

“No one will ever even know that you were here. Okay?”

“Okay.”

Lloyd watched Sarah Smith compose herself and move into the crowd of rubberneckers on the sidewalk. He walked over to Dutch and Richard Douglas Wilson, who were leaning against the unmarked Matador. Lloyd motioned Dutch to leave, and as he departed, fixed Wilson with a hard look and disgusted shake of the head.

“No honor among thieves, Richard,” he said. “None at all. Especially the punks over at Gangster Manor.” Wilson’s jaw trembled at the last words, and Lloyd continued. “I found a box of shells and a pantyhose wrapper there with your prints on them. But that wasn’t how we nailed you. Somebody snitched you off. Somebody sent the Rampart dicks an anonymous letter making you for the Black Cat stick-up. The letter said you only knocked off fruit bars because you got turned out by some bad-ass jockers at Quentin, and you liked it. You love queers and you hate them too, because of what they made you.”

“That’s a fucking lie!” Wilson screamed. “I took down liquor stores, markets, even a fucking disco! I done—”

Lloyd cut him off with a chopped hand gesture and went in for the kill. “The letter said that you were drinking outside Gangster Manor after the heist, and you were bragging about all the cunt you scored. Your buddy said he was cracking up because he knew you liked to take it up the ass.”

Richard Douglas Wilson’s pale, sweat-streaked face went purple. He shrieked, "That scumbag motherfucker! I saved his ass from getting porked by every nigger on the yard! I carried that punk through Quentin, now he—"

Lloyd put a hand on Wilson's shoulder and said quietly, "Richard, you're looking at a dime minimum this time. Ten bullets. You think you can handle that? You're tough, you're a stand-up guy; I know that. I'm tough too. But you know what? I couldn't do a dime up there. They got niggers up there who'd eat me for breakfast. Turn your partner over, Richard. He snitched you off. I'll go…" Wilson was shaking his head frantically in denial. Lloyd started to shake his head in pure loathing. "You dumb asshole," he said. "Go by the old code, let some piece of shit rat on you, facing five to life and you look a gift horse in the mouth. You dumb motherfucker." He turned and started to walk away.

He had gotten only a few feet when Wilson called out, "Wait. Wait. Look—"

Lloyd stifled the huge grin that was lighting up his face and said, "I'll go to the D.A., I'll talk to the judge, I'll see to it that you go to the protective custody tank while you're waiting for your trial."

Richard Douglas Wilson weighed the pros and cons a last time, then capitulated. "His name is John Gustodas. 'Johnny The Greek.' He lives in Hollywood. Franklin and Argylle. The red brick building on the corner."

Lloyd squeezed Wilson's undamaged shoulder. "Good fellow. My partner will take down your statement at the hospital, and I'll be in touch." He craned his head to look for Dutch, and spotted him on the sidewalk talking to two uniformed officers. He whistled twice, and Dutch walked over, warily. "You tired, Dutchman?" Lloyd asked.

"A little. Why?"

"Wilson confessed. He snitched off his partner. The guy lives in Hollywood. I want to go home. You want to take down Wilson's statement, then call Hollywood dicks and give them the info on the guy?"

Dutch hesitated. "Sure, Lloyd," he said.

"Great. John 'Johnny The Greek' Gustodas. Franklin and Argylle. Red brick apartment house on the corner. I'll write up all the reports, don't worry about that."

Lloyd heard the wail of an ambulance siren, and shook his head to combat the noise. "Fucking sirens ought to be outlawed," he said as the ambulance rounded the corner and ground to a halt. "There's your chariot. I gotta get out of here. I promised to take Janice out to dinner at eight. It's almost eleven now." The two policemen shook hands. "We did it again, partner," Lloyd said.

"Yeah. I'm sorry I barked at you, kid."

"You're on Janice's side. I don't blame you; she's better looking than I am."

Dutch laughed. "Talk to you tomorrow about Wilson's statement?"

"Right. I'll call you."

Lloyd found Sarah Smith with the remnants of the spectators, smoking a cigarette and shuffling her feet nervously on the pavement. "Hi, Sarah. How are you feeling?"

Sarah ground out the cigarette. "All right, I guess. What's going to happen to what's-his-name?"

Lloyd smiled at the sadness of the question. "He's going to prison for a long time. Don't you even remember his name?"

"I'm bad at names."

"Do you remember mine?"

"Floyd?"

"Close. Lloyd. Come on, I'll take you home."

They walked over to the unmarked Matador and got in. Lloyd scrutinized Sarah openly as she gave her address and fiddled with the contents of her purse. A good girl from a good family gone slightly loose, he decided. Twenty-eight or nine, the light blonde hair legit, the body beneath the black cotton pantsuit both slender and soft. A kind face trying to look tough. Probably a hard worker at her job.

Lloyd headed straight for the nearest westbound on-ramp, alternately savoring his anniversary triumph and picturing confrontations with Janice, who would doubtless give him one of her incredible slow burns–if not an outright battle for being so late. Feeling kindness well up in him for sparing Sarah Smith the harshness of the law, he tapped her shoulder and said, "It's going to be all right, you know."

Sarah dug into her purse looking for cigarettes and found only an empty pack. She muttered, "Shit" and threw it out the window, then sighed. "Yeah, maybe you're right. You really get off on being a cop, don't you?"

"It's my life. Where did you meet Wilson?"

"Is that his name? I met him at a country-western bar. Shit-kicker's paradise, but at least they treat women with respect. What did he do?"

"Held up a bar at gunpoint."

"Jesus! I figured he was just some kind of dope dealer."

Out of the mouths of babes, Lloyd thought. "I'm not lecturing you or anything like that," he said, "but you shouldn't hang out in dives. You could get hurt."

Sarah snorted. "Then where should I go to meet people?"

"You mean men?"

"Well… yeah."

"Try the continental approach. Drink coffee and read a book at some picturesque sidewalk café. Sooner or later some nice fellow will start a conversation with you about the book you're reading. You'll meet higher class people that way."

Sarah laughed wildly and clapped her hands, then poked Lloyd in the arm. When he took his eyes from the road and gave her a deadpan, her laughter became hysterical. "That's funny, that's so funny!" she squealed.

"It's not that funny."

"Yes, it is! You should be on TV!" Sarah's laughter subsided. She looked at Lloyd quizzically. "Is that how you met your wife?"

"I didn't tell you I was married."

"I saw your ring."

"Very observant. But I met my wife in high school." Sarah Smith laughed until she ached. Lloyd laughed along in a more sedate cadence, then dug in his pocket for a handkerchief and reached over and dabbed at Sarah's tear-mottled face. She leaned into his hand, rubbing her nose along his knuckles.

"You ever wonder why you keep on doing things even when you know they don't work?" she asked.

Lloyd ran a finger under her chin and tilted her head upwards to face him. "It's because outside of the major dreams everything is always changing, and even though you keep doing the same things, you're looking for new answers."

"I believe that," Sarah said. "Get off at the next exit and turn right."

Five minutes later he pulled to the curb in front of an apartment building on Barrington. Sarah poked him in the arm and said, "Thanks."

"Good luck, Sarah. Try the book trick."

"Maybe I will. Thanks."

"Thank you."

"For what?"

"I don't know."

Sarah poked Lloyd's arm a last time and darted out of the car.

Janice Hopkins looked at the antique clock in her living room and felt her fearful slow burn leap ahead as the hour hand struck ten and she realized that this was her husband's "second major anniversary" and that she could not rationally fight with him over their missed dinner date, could not use that minor grievance to force confrontations on any of the disturbances that undercut their marriage, could do nothing but say, "Oh shit, Lloyd, where were you this time?", smile at his brilliant answer, and know how much he loved her. Tomorrow she would call her friend George, and he would come to the shop and they would commiserate at length about men.

"Oh God, George," she would say, "the life of a muse!"

And George would reply, "But you love him?"

"More than I know."

"Realizing that he's slightly off the deep end?"

"More than slightly, kiddo, what with his little phobias and all. But they just make him more human, more my baby."

And George would smile and talk of his lover, and they would laugh until the Waterford crystal rang and the bone china plates spun on their shelves.

Then George would take her hand and casually mention the brief affair they had had when George decided he needed to experience women to be more of one himself. It had lasted a week, when George accompanied her to San Francisco for a seminar on appraising antiques. In bed all he talked about was Lloyd. It disgusted her, but thrilled her too, and she went on to divulge the most intimate facts of her marriage.

When she realized that Lloyd would always be the unseen third party in bed with them, she broke it off. It was the only time she had cheated on her husband, and it was not for the standard reasons of neglect, abuse, or sexual boredom. It was to gain some kind of parity with him for the adventurous life he led. When Lloyd was frightened or angry and came to her with that look of his and she unhooked her bra and gave him her breasts, he was hers utterly. But when he read reports, or talked with Dutch Peltz and his other cop friends in the living room and she saw the wheels turning behind the pale grey eyes, she knew he was going to places that she never could. Her other parities–the success of the boutique, the book on Tiffany mirrors she had co-authored, her business acumen–all these satisfied only at the level of logic. Because Lloyd could fly and she couldn't; even after seventeen years of marriage, Janice Rice Hopkins did not possess a syllabus to explain why this was so. And inexplicably, her husband's capacity for flight began to frighten her.

Against the sum total of over twenty years of intimacy, Janice collated the recent evidences of Lloyd's strange behavior: his hour-long sojourns in front of the mirror, casting his eyes in circles as though trawling for flying insects; the increasingly long stints spent at his parents' house, talking to his mother, who had not uttered or comprehended a sound in nineteen years; the insanely sardonic set to his face when he talked to his brother on the telephone about their parents' care.

But the stories that he told the girls were the most disturbing: cop tales that Janice suspected to be half parable and half confession, lurid travelogues on the darkest Los Angeles streets, populated by hookers, junkies, and other sundry low-lifes and cops who were often as raunchy and brutal as the people they threw in jail. A year ago Janice had told Lloyd not to tell her the stories. He had agreed with a silent nod of his head and a cold look in his eyes, and took his parable/confessions to the girls, bringing them into adolescence with detailed accounts of sleaze and horror. Anne would shrug the stories off–she was fourteen and boy crazy; Caroline, thirteen and with a real talent for ballet, would brood over them and bring home true detective magazines and ask her father to discourse on the various articles inside. And Penny would listen and listen and listen, with pale grey eyes shining right through her father and her father's story to some distant termination point. When Lloyd concluded his parable, Penny would kiss him sternly on the cheek and go upstairs and knit the cashmere and madras plaid quilts that had already earned her feature coverage in five Sunday supplements.

Janice shivered. Was Penny's innocence blasted beyond redemption already? A master artisan and fledgling entrepreneur at twelve? She shivered again and looked at the clock. An hour of fearful speculation had passed, and Lloyd was still not home. Suddenly she realized that she missed him and wanted him beyond the limits of normal desire in a twenty-year-old love affair. She walked upstairs and undressed in the dark bedroom, lighting the scented candle that was Lloyd's signal to wake her up and love her. Crawling into bed, a last dark thought crossed her mind, like predator birds blackening a calm sky: As the girls grew older they looked more and more like Lloyd, especially in their eyes.

She heard Lloyd enter the house an hour later, his ritualistic sounds in the entrance hall: Lloyd sighing and yawning, unhooking his gunbelt and placing it on the telephone stand, the familiar shuffling noises he made as he slowly walked upstairs. Tensing herself for the moment when he would open the door and see her in amber light, Janice ran a teasing hand between her legs.

But the bedroom door didn't open; she heard Lloyd tiptoe past it and walk down the hall to Penny's room, then rap his knuckles lightly on her door and whisper, "Penguin? You want to hear a story?" The door creaked open a second later, and Janice heard father and child giggle in gleeful conspiracy.

She gave her husband half an hour, angrily chainsmoking. When her last remnants of ardor had fled and she started to cough from the half-dozen cigarettes, Janice threw on a robe and walked down the hall to listen.

Penny's bedroom door was ajar, and through it Janice could see her husband and youngest daughter sitting on the edge of the bed, holding hands. Lloyd was speaking very softly, in an awe-tinged storyteller's voice: "…after clearing the Haverhill/Jenkins homicide, I got assigned to a robbery deployment, a loan-out to the West L.A. squadroom. There had been a series of nighttime burglaries of doctor's offices, all in large buildings in the Westwood area. Cash and saleable drugs were the burglar's meat; in shortly over a month he'd ripped off over five grand in cash and a shitload of pharmaceutical speed and heavyweight downers. The West L.A. dicks had his M.O. figured out this way: The bastard used to hide out in the building until nightfall, then hit his mark, then break into a second floor office and jump out the window into the parking lot. There was evidence to point to this–chipped cement on the window ledges. The dicks figured him for a gymnast, a bullshit cat burglar type who could jump two stories without getting hurt. The commander of the squad was setting up parking lot surveillances to catch him. When the burglar hit an office building on Wilshire that two teams of detectives were staking out, it blew their thesis to hell and I was called in."

Lloyd paused. Penny nuzzled her head into his shoulder and said, "Tell me how you got the scumbag, Daddy."

Lloyd brought his storyteller's voice down to its lowest register: "Sweetheart, nobody jumps two stories repeatedly without getting hurt. I formed my own thesis: The burglar brazenly walked out of the buildings, waving to the security guards in the foyer as if everything were hunky-dory. Only one thing troubled me. Where was he carrying the dope he ripped off? I went back and checked with the guards on duty the nights of the robberies. Yes, both known and unknown men in business suits had walked out of the building in the early evening hours, but none were carrying bags or packages. The guards assumed them to be businessmen with offices in the building and didn't check them out. I heard that same statement six times before it all came together in my mind: The burglar dressed in drag, probably in the protective coloring of a nurse's uniform, carrying a large purse or shoulderbag. I checked with the guards again and, bingo! An unknown woman seen wearing a nurse's uniform and carrying a large shoulderbag was seen leaving the burglarized buildings at almost the exact time on all six burglary nights. The guards couldn't describe her, but said she was 'ugly,' 'a dog,' and so forth."

Penny fidgeted when Lloyd took in a deep breath and sighed. She took her head from his shoulder and poked him sharply in the arm. "Don't be a tease, Daddy!"

Lloyd laughed and said, "Alright. I ran a computer cross-check on vice offenders and registered sex offenders with burglary convictions. Double bingo! Arthur Christiansen, a.k.a. "Misty Christie", a.k.a. "Arlene the Queen" Christiansen. Specialties: giving cut-rate blow jobs to drunks who thought he was a woman and full-drag B & Es. I staked out his pad for thirty-six hours straight, determining that he was dealing uppers and Percodan–I heard his customers comment on the righteous quality of his stuff. This was solid corroboration, but I wanted to catch him-her in the act. The following afternoon old Arthur-Arlene left the pad with a giant quilted shoulderbag and drove to Westwood and walked into a big office building two blocks from the U.C.L.A. campus. Four hours later, an hour after dark, a very ugly creature in a nurse's uniform walks out, carrying the same shoulderbag. I whip out my badge, yell 'Police Officer!' and rush Arthur-Arlene, who screams, 'Chauvinist!' and swings on me. The blows are ineffectual and I'm reaching for my handcuffs when Arthur-Arlene's falsies pop out of his blouse. I get him handcuffed and flag down a black-and-white. Arthur-Arlene is screaming 'sisterhood is powerful' and 'police brutality,' and a crowd of U.C.L.A. students start shouting obscenities at me. I barely managed to get into the black-and-white. The scene was almost L.A.'s first transvestite police riot."

Penny laughed hysterically, collapsing on the bed and pounding the covers with her fists. She burrowed her head into the pillow to wipe away her tears, then giggled, "More, Daddy, more. One more before you go to bed:"

Lloyd reached over and ruffled Penny's hair. "Funny or serious?"

"Serious," Penny said. "Give me some dark stuff to sate my ghoulish curiosity. If you don't make it good, I'll stay up all night thinking of Arthur-Arlene's falsies."

Lloyd traced circles on the bedspread. "How about a knight story?"

Penny's face grew somber. She took her father's hand and scooted down the bed so that Lloyd could rest his head in her lap. When father and daughter were comfortable, Lloyd stared up at the tartan quilt suspended from the ceiling and said, "The knight was caught in a dilemma. He had two anniversaries in one day–one personal, one professional. The professional one took precedence and in the course of it he shot a man, wounding him. About an hour later, after the man was in custody, the knight started to shake like he always did after he fired his gun. All those delayed reaction questions hit him: What if his shots rendered the asshole for good? What if next time he gloms the wrong info and takes out the wrong guy? What if he starts seeing red all the time and his discretion goes haywire? It's a shitstorm out there. You know that, don't you, Penguin?"

"Yes," Penny whispered.

"You know that you've got to develop claws to fight it?"

"Sharp ones, Daddy."

"You know the weird thing about the knight? The more complicated his doubts and questions become, the stronger his resolve gets. It just gets weird sometimes. What would you do if things got really weird?"

Penny played with her father's hair. "Sharpen my claws," she said, digging her fingers into Lloyd's scalp.

Lloyd grimaced in mock pain. "Sometimes the knight wishes he weren't such a fucking Protestant. If he were a Catholic he'd be able to get formal absolution."

"I'll always absolve you, Daddy," Penny said as Lloyd got to his feet. "Like the song said, 'I'm easy.'"

Lloyd looked down at his daughter. "I love you," he said.

"I love you too. One question before you go: You think I'd be a good Robbery/Homicide dick?"

Lloyd laughed. "No, but you'd be a great Robbery/Homicide dickless."

Janice watched Penny squeal in delight, and suddenly she was violated at the womb. She walked back to the bedroom she shared with her husband and flung off her robe, preparing to do her battle in the nude. Lloyd walked through the door moments later, smelling the scented candle and whispering, "Jan? You ardent this late, sweetheart? It's after midnight."

As he reached for the light switch, Janice threw her overflowing ashtray at the opposite wall and hissed, "You sick, selfish, son-of-a-bitch, can't you see what you're doing to that little girl? You call spilling out that violence being a father?" Frozen in the ugliness of the moment, Lloyd pushed the light switch, illuminating Janice, shivering in the nude. "Do you, Lloyd, goddamn you?"

Lloyd moved toward his wife, arms extended in a supplicating gesture, hoping that physical contact would quell the storm.

“No!” Janice said as she backed away, “Not this time! This time I want a promise from you, an oath that you will not tell our children those ugly stories!”

Lloyd reached a long arm out and caught Janice’s wrist. She twisted it free and knocked down the nightstand between them.

“Don’t, Lloyd. Don’t want me and don’t placate me and don’t touch me until you promise.”

He ran a hand through his hair and started to tremble. Fighting an impulse to punch the wall, he bent over and picked up the nightstand. “Penny is a subtle child, Jan, possibly a genius,” he said. “What should I do? Tell her about the three…”

Janice hurled her favorite porcelain lamp at the closet and shrieked, “She’s just a little girl! A twelve-year-old little girl! Can’t you understand that?”

Lloyd tripped across the bed and grabbed her around the waist, burying his head in her stomach, whispering, “She has to know, she had to know it, or she’ll die. She has to know.”

Janice raised her arms and molded her hands into fists. She started to bring them down, clublike, onto Lloyd’s back but hesitated as a thousand instances of his erratic passion washed over her, combining to form an epigram whose words she was too terrified to speak.

She lowered her hands to her husband’s face and gently pushed him away. “I want to see if the girls are all right,” she said. “I’ll have to tell them we were fighting. Then I think I want to sleep alone.”

Lloyd got to his feet. “I’m sorry I was so late tonight.”

Janice nodded dumbly and felt her sense of things confirmed. Then she put on a robe and went down the hall to check on her daughters.

Lloyd knew that he wouldn’t be able to sleep. After saying good night to the girls, he prowled around downstairs looking for something to do. There was nothing to do but think of Janice and how he could not have her without giving up something dear to him and essential to his daughters. There was no place to go but backward in time.

Lloyd put on his gunbelt and drove to the old neighborhood.

He found it waiting for him in the pre-dawn stillness, as familiar as the sigh of an old lover. Lloyd drove down Sunset, feeling overwhelmed by the Tightness of his usurping of innocence via parable. Let them learn it slowly, he thought, not the way I did. Let them learn the beast by story–not repeated example. Let that be the new hallmark of my Irish Protestant irregulars.

With this surge of affirmation, Lloyd floored the gas pedal, watching night-bound Sunset Boulevard explode in peripheral flashes of neon, sucking him into the middle of a swirling Jetstream. He looked at the speedometer: one hundred thirty-five miles per hour. It wasn’t enough. He bore down on the wheel with his whole being, and the neon turned to burning white. Then he closed his eyes and decelerated until the car hit an upgrade and the laws of nature forced it to a gliding stop.

Lloyd opened his eyes to discover them flooded with tears, wondering for an awkwardly long moment where on earth he was. Finally, a thousand memories clicked in and he realized that chance had left him at the corner of Sunset and Silverlake–the heart of the old neighborhood. Propelled by a subservient fate, he went walking.

Terraced hillsides drew Lloyd into a fusion of past, present, and future.

He sprinted up the Vendome steps, noting with satisfaction that the earth on both sides of the cement stanchions was as soft as ever. The Silverlake hills were formed by God to nurture–let the poor Mexicans live hearty here and thrive; let the old people complain about the steepness yet never move away. Let the earthquake the scientific creeps predicted come…Silverlake, the defiant traditionalist anomaly, would sustain its havoc and stand proud while L.A. proper burst like an eggshell.

At the top of the hill, Lloyd let his imagination telescope in on the few houses still burning lights. He imagined great loneliness and sensed that the light burners were importuning him for love. He breathed in their love and exhaled it with every ounce of his own, then turned west to stare through the hillside that separated him from the very old house where his crazy brother tended their parents. Lloyd shuddered as discord entered his reverie. The one person he hated guarding his two beloved creators. His one conscious compromise. Unavoidable, but…

Lloyd recalled how it happened. It was the spring of 1971. He was working Hollywood Patrol and driving over to Silverlake twice a week to visit his parents while Tom was away at work. His father had settled into a quiet, oblivious state in his old age, spending whole days in his back yard shack, tinkering with the dozens of television sets and radios that eclipsed almost every square inch of its floor space; and his mother, then eight years mute, stared and dreamed in her silence, having to be steered to the kitchen thrice daily lest she forget to eat.

Tom lived with them, as he had all his life, waiting for them to die and leave him the house that had already been placed in his name. He cooked for his parents and cashed their Social Security checks and read to them from the lurid picture histories of Nazi Germany that lined the bookshelves of his bedroom. It was Morgan Hopkins's express wish to Lloyd that he and his wife live out their days in the old house on Griffith Park Boulevard. Lloyd reassured his father many times, “You'll always have the house, Dad. Let Tom pay the taxes, don't even worry about it. He's a sorry excuse for a man, but he makes money, and he's good at looking after you and Mother. Leave the house to him; I don't care. Just be happy and don't worry.”

There was a silent agreement between Lloyd and his brother, then thirty-six and a phone sales entrepreneur operating at the edge of the law. Tom was to live at home and feed and care for their parents, and Lloyd was to look the other way at the cache of automatic weapons buried in the back yard of the Hopkins homestead. Lloyd laughed at the inequity of the bargain–Tom, craven beyond words, would never have the guts to use the weaponry, which would be rusted past redemption within a matter of months anyway.

But one day in April of '71, Lloyd got a phone call informing him that there was now a gaping hole at the periphery of his major dreams. An old buddy from the Academy who worked Rampart Patrol had cruised by the Hopkins home, noticing a “For Sale” sign on the front lawn. Puzzled, since he had heard Lloyd often mention that his parents would rather die than give up the house, he called Lloyd at Hollywood Station to voice his puzzlement. Lloyd took the words in with a silent rage that had the locker room wobbling surreally before his eyes. Still wearing his uniform, he got his car from the parking lot and drove out to Tom's office in Glendale.

The "office" was a converted basement with four dozen small desks jammed together along the walls, and Lloyd walked into it oblivious to the salesmen shouting the panacea of aluminum siding and home bible-study classes into telephones.

Tom's desk was off by itself near the front of the room, next to a large urn filled with Benzedrine-laced coffee. Lloyd swung his lead-filled billy club into the urn, puncturing it and sending geysers of hot brown liquid into the air. Tom walked out of the men's room, saw the rage in his brother's eyes and the club, and backed into the wall. Lloyd advanced, and was arcing the club in a perfect roundhouse aimed at Tom's head when the terror in the pale grey eyes that so resembled his own halted him. He threw the billy down and ran to the first row of desks, startled phone salesman darting out of his way, running for cover at the back of the basement.

Lloyd began jerking the telephone cords out of their wall mountings and hurling the phones across the room. One row; two rows; three rows. When the salesmen had all deserted the office, and the floor was littered with broken glass, scattered order forms, and inoperative telephones, he walked up to his quaking older brother and said, "You will take the house off the market today and never leave Mother and Dad alone."

Tom nodded mutely and fainted into a puddle of his dope-saturated coffee.

Lloyd deepened his gaze into the dark hillside. That was over ten years ago. His mother and father were still alive in their separate solitudes; Tom was still their custodian. It was his one unsatisfying holding action, but there was nothing he could do about it. He recalled his last conversation with Tom. He was visiting his parents and found Tom in the back yard, burying shotguns under cover of night.

"Talk to me," Lloyd said.

"About what, Lloydy?" Tom asked.

"Say something real. Insult me. Ask me a question. I won't hurt you."

Tom backed a few steps away. "Are you going to kill me when Mom and Dad are gone?"

Lloyd was thunderstruck. "Why on earth would I want to kill you?"

Tom retreated again. "Because of what happened on Christmas when you were eight."

Lloyd felt himself embraced by monsters, over thirty years dead in the wake of the strong man he had become. His eyes strayed to his father's radio shack, and he had to will himself to return to the present, the force of the horrific memory was so compelling. "You're crazy, Tom. You've always been crazy. I don't like you, but I would never kill you."

Lloyd watched dawn creep up on the eastern horizon, outlining the L.A. skyline with strands of gold. Suddenly he was lonely and wanted to be with a woman. He sat down on the steps and considered his options. There was Sybil, but she had probably gone back to her husband–she was considering it the last time they talked. There was Colleen, but she was probably on her mid-week sales run to

Santa Barbara. Leah? Meg? It was over with them, to resurrect it in the fierceness of early morning need would only cause pain later. There was only the uncertainty of Sarah Smith.

Lloyd knocked on her door forty-five minutes later. She opened it bleary-eyed, dressed in a denim bathrobe. When her eyes focused in on him she started to laugh.

"I'm not that funny looking, am I?" Lloyd asked.

Sarah shook her head. "What's the matter, your wife kick you out?"

"Sort of. She found out that I'm really a vampire in disguise. I prowl the lonely dawn streets of Los Angeles looking for beautiful young women to give me transfusions. Take me to your wisest muse."

Sarah giggled. "I'm not beautiful."

"Yes you are. Do you have to go to work today?"

Sarah said, "Yeah, but I can call in sick. I've never been with a vampire."

Lloyd took her hand as she motioned him inside. "Then allow me to introduce myself," he said.

Part Three Convergence

5

Lloyd was seated in his office at Parker Center, his hands playing over papers on his desk, alternately forming steeples and hanging men. It was January 3, 1983, and from his sixth story cubicle he could see dark storm clouds barrelling northward. He hoped for a pulverizing rain storm. He felt warm and protective when foul weather raged.

The relative solitude of the office, situated between typewriter storage and Xeroxing rooms, was pleasing, but Lloyd's primary reason for acquiring it was its proximity to the dispatcher's office three doors down. Sooner or later, all homicides within the L.A.P.D.'s jurisdiction were reported over their phone lines, either by investigating officers requesting assistance or concerned parties screaming for help. Lloyd had rigged a special line to his own phone, and whenever an incoming call hit the switchboard a red light on his answering machine went on and he could pick up the receiver and listen in, often making him the first L.A.P.D. detective to gain crucial information on a murder. It was a sure-fire antidote to burdensome caseloads, dreary report writing, and court appearances; so when Lloyd saw the light on his machine blink, his heart gave a little lurch and he picked up the receiver to listen.

"Los Angeles Police Department, Robbery-Homicide Division," the woman at the switchboard said.

"Is this where you report a murder?" a man stammered in return.

"Yes, sir," the woman answered. "Are you in Los Angeles?"

"I'm in Hollyweird. Man, you wouldn't believe what I just seen…" Lloyd came alive with curiousity–the man sounded like he had witnessed a stoned visitation.

"Do you wish to report a homicide, sir?" The woman was brusque, even a little bullying.

"Man, I don't know if it was the real thing or a fuckin' hallucination. I've been doin' dust and reds for three days now."

"Where are you, sir?"

"I ain't nowhere. But you send the cops to the Aloha Apartments on Leland and Las Palmas. Room 406. There's something inside out of a fuckin' Peckinpah movie. I don't know, man, but either I gotta quit usin' dust or you got some heavy shit on your hands." The caller went into a coughing attack, then whispered, "Fuckin' Holly-weird, man; fuckin' weird," and slammed down his receiver.

Lloyd could almost feel the switchboard operator's befuddlement–she didn't know if the caller was for real or not. Muttering "Goddamned creep," she let her end of the line go dead. Lloyd jumped to his feet and threw on his sports jacket. He knew. He ran to his car and tore out for Hollywood.

The Aloha Regency was a four story, moss-hung, Spanish-style apartment house painted a bright electric blue. Lloyd walked through the unkempt entrance foyer to the elevator, quickly grasping the building as a once grand Hollywood address gone to despair. He knew that the inhabitants of the Aloha Regency would be an uneasy melange of illegal aliens, boozehounds, and welfare families. The sadness in the threadbare carpeted hallways was almost palpable.

He got into the elevator and pressed 4, then unholstered his .38, feeling his skin start to tingle as he sensed the nearness of death. The elevator jerked to a halt and Lloyd got out. He scanned the hallway, noting that the doors on the even-numbered side leading up to 406 bore jimmy marks. After 406 the jimmy marks stopped. The wood on the door jambs was freshly splintered with no evidence of warping, which meant that the doors had probably been tried as recently as this morning. Feeling a thesis forming already, Lloyd pointed his .38 straight at the door of 406 and kicked it in.

Holding his gun in front of him as a directional finder, he walked into a small rectangular living room lined with bookshelves and tall potted plants. There was a desk wedged diagonally into one corner and three beanbag chairs on the floor, arranged in a semi-circle opened toward the front picture window. Lloyd walked through the room, savoring its feel. Slowly he swiveled to face the kitchenette off to the left. Freshly scrubbed tile and linoleum; dishes piled neatly by the sink. Which left the bedroom–separated from the rest of the apartment by a bright green door bearing a Rod Stewart poster.

Lloyd looked down at the floor and felt his stomach start to churn. In front of the crack below the door was a pile of dead cockroaches, melded together in a pool of congealed blood. He kicked in the door, murmuring, “Rabbit down the hole,” closing his eyes until he assimilated the overwhelming stench of decomposing flesh. When he felt his tremors go internal and knew he wouldn’t retch, he opened his eyes and said very softly, “Oh God, please no.”

There was a nude woman hanging by one leg from a ceiling beam directly over a quilt-covered bed. Her stomach had been ripped open from pelvis to ribcage and her intestines were spilled out onto her upended torso, splaying out to cover her blood-matted face. Lloyd memorized the scene: the woman’s free hanging leg swollen and purple and twisted out at a right angle, caked blood on her breasts, a bluish-white tint on what he could see of her unbloodied flesh, the bed coverlet drenched with so much blood that it crusted and peeled in layers, blood on the floor and walls and dresser and mirror, all framing the dead woman in a perfect symmetry of devastation.

Lloyd went into the living room and found the telephone. He called Dutch Peltz at the Hollywood Station, saying only, “6819 Leland, Apartment 406. Homicide, ambulance, Medical Examiner. I’ll call you later and tell you about it.”

Dutch said, “Okay, Lloyd,” and hung up.

Lloyd walked through the apartment a second time, willing his mind blank so that things could come to him, moving his eyes over the living room until he noticed a leather purse lying next to a cactus plant. He reached down and grabbed it, then dumped its contents onto the floor. Make-up kit, Excedrin, loose change. He opened a hand-tooled wallet. The woman had been Julia Lynn Niemeyer. The photo and statistics on her driver’s license made him ache: pretty, 5’5”, 120 pounds. D.O.B. 2-2-54, making her a month short of twenty-nine.

Lloyd dropped the wallet and examined the bookshelves. Romances and popular novels predominated. He noticed that the books on the top shelves were covered with dust, while the books on the bottom shelf were clean.

He squatted down to examine them more closely. The bottom shelf contained volumes of poetry, from Shakespeare to Byron to feminist poets in soft cover. Lloyd pulled out three books at random and leafed through them, feeling his respect for Julia Lynn Niemeyer grow–she had been reading good stuff in the days before her death. He finished flipping through the classics and picked up an outsized paperback entitled Rage In The Womb–An Anthology of Feminist Prose. Opening to the "Contents," he went numb when he saw dark brown stains on the inside cover. Flipping forward, he found pages stuck together with congealed blood and bloody smatterings growing fainter as he worked toward the end of the book. When he reached the glossy finished back cover, he gasped. Perfectly outlined in white were two bloody partial fingerprints–an index and pinky; enough to run a make on.

Lloyd whooped and wrapped the book in his handkerchief and carefully placed it on one of the beanbag chairs. On impulse, he walked back over to the bookshelf and ran a hand in the narrow space between the bottom shelf and the floor. He came away with a handful of vending machine dispensed sex tabloids–The L.A. Nite-Line, L.A. Grope, and L.A Swinger.

He carried them over to the chair and sat down and read, saddened by the lurid fantasy letters and desperate liaison ads. "Attractive divorcee, 40, seeks well-hung white men for afternoon love. Send erect photo and letter to P.O. Box 5816, Gardena, 90808, Calif."; "Good looking gay guy, 24, into giving head, seeks hunky young high school guys with no mustache. Call anytime—709–6404"; "Mr. Big Dick's my name, and fucking's my game! I give good lovin' to much acclaim! Let's get together for a swingin' nite, my dick is hard if your pussy's tight!—Send spread photo to P.O. Box 6969, L.A. 90069, Calif."

Lloyd was about to put the tabloids down and send up a mercy plea for the entire human race when his eyes caught an advertisement circled in red. "Your fantasy or mine? Let's get together and rap. Any and all sexually liberated people are invited to write to me at P.O. Box 7512, Hollywood, 90036, Calif. (I'm an attractive woman in her late 20s.)" He put the paper down and dug through the other two. The identical ad was featured in both.

He stuck the papers into his jacket pocket, walked back into the bedroom, and opened the windows. Julia Lynn Niemeyer swayed from the draft, turning on her one-legged axis, the ceiling beam creaking against her weight. Lloyd held her arms gently. "Oh, sweetheart," he whispered, "oh, baby, what were you looking for? Did you fight? Did you scream?"

Almost as if in answer, the woman's cold left arm was caught by a gust of wind and flopped out of Lloyd's grasp. He grabbed it and held the hand tightly, his eyes moving to the large blue veins at the crook of the elbow. He gasped. A pair of needle marks were outlined clearly against the middle of the largest vein. He checked the other arm–nothing–then scraped away patches of dried blood from the ankles and backs of the knees. No other tracks; the woman had been professionally sedated at the time of her desecration.

Lloyd heard footsteps in the hallway, and seconds later a plainclothes cop and two patrolmen in uniform burst into the apartment. He walked into the living room to greet them, pointing a thumb over his shoulder and saying, "In there, guys." He was staring out the window at the black sky when he heard their first exclamations of horror, followed by the sound of retching.

The plainclothes cop was the first to recover, walking up to Lloyd and blurting out bluff-hearty, “Wow! That’s some stiff! You’re Lloyd Hopkins, aren’t you? I’m Lundquist, Hollywood Dicks.”

Lloyd turned to face the tall, prematurely grey young man, ignoring his outstretched hand. He scrutinized him openly and decided he was stupid and inexperienced.

Lundquist fidgeted under Lloyd’s stare. “I think we got a botched-up burglary, Sergeant,” he said. “I saw B. & E. marks on the door here. I think we should start our investigation by hauling in burglars know to use viol—”

Lloyd shook his head, silencing the younger detective. “Wrong. Those jimmy marks are fresh. The edges would have rounded off from moisture if the attempted burglaries coincided with the murder. That woman has been dead for at least two days. No, the burglar was the guy who called in to report the body. Now listen, the woman’s purse is on that chair over there. Positive I.D. There’s also a paperback book with two bloodstained partial prints. Get them to the lab and have the technicians call me at home when they have something conclusive one way or the other. I want you to search the premises, then seal it–no reporters, no TV assholes. You got that?”

Lundquist nodded.

“Good. Now, I want you to call the M.E. and S.I.D., and have them bring in a fingerprint team and dust this place from top to bottom. I want a complete forensic work-up. Tell the M.E. to call me at home with the autopsy report. Who’s the top dog at Hollywood Dicks?”

“Lieutenant Perkins.”

“Good. I’ll call him. Tell him I’m handling this case for Robbery-Homicide.”

“Right, Sergeant.”

Lloyd walked back into the bedroom. The two patrolmen were staring at the corpse and cracking jokes. “I had a girlfriend once who looked like that,” the older cop said. “Bloody Mary. I could only get together with her for two weeks outta the month, her period lasted so long.”

“That’s nothing,” the younger cop said, “I knew an attendant at the morgue who fell in love with a corpse. He wouldn’t let the Coroner slice her–said it took the R out of romance.”

The other cop laughed and lit a cigarette with shaking hands. “My wife takes the R out of romance every night, also the O and the M.”

Lloyd cleared his throat; he knew that the men were joking to keep their horror at bay, but he was offended anyway, and didn’t want Julia Lynn Niemeyer to hear such things. He rummaged through the bedroom closet until he found a terrycloth robe, then walked into the kitchen and found a serrated-edged steak knife. When he re-entered the bedroom and stood up on the blood-spattered bed, the younger cop said, “You’d better leave her like that for the Coroner, Sergeant.”

Lloyd said, “Shut the fuck up,” and cut through the nylon cord that bound Julia Lynn Niemeyer at the ankle. He gathered her dangling limbs and violated torso into his arms and stepped off the bed, cradling her head into his shoulder. Tears filled his eyes. “Sleep, darling,” he said. “Know that I’ll find your killer.” Lloyd lowered her to the floor and covered her with the robe. The three cops stared at him in disbelief.

“Seal the premises.” Lloyd said.

Three days later, Lloyd was stationed at the main Hollywood Post Office with his eyes glued to the wall containing P.O. boxes 7500 through 7550, armed with the knowledge that Julia Lynn Niemeyer had placed her tabloid advertisements in the company of a tall, blonde woman of about forty. Office personnel at both the L.A. Night-Line and L.A. Swinger had positively identified the dead woman from her driver’s license photograph, and distinctly remembered her female companion.

Lloyd fidgeted, keeping his anger and impatience at bay by recapitulating all the known physical evidence on the killing. Fact: Julia Lynn Neimeyer was killed by a massive dose of heroin, and was mutilated after her death. Fact: The Coroner had placed the time of her murder as seventy-two hours before the discovery of her body. Fact: No one at the Aloha Regency had heard signs of a struggle or knew much about the victim, who lived on money from a trust fund set up by her parents, who had died in a car accident in 1978. This information had been supplied by the woman’s uncle, who had read of the killing in the San Francisco newspapers and who went on to describe Julia Niemeyer as a “very deep, very quiet, very intelligent girl who didn’t let people get close to her.”

The killing had made the newspapers in a big way, and similarities to the Tate-LaBianca slayings of 1969 had been graphically pointed out. This caused a torrent of unsolicited information to flood the switchboards of the Los Angeles Police Department, and Lloyd had assigned three officers to interview all callers who didn’t sound like outright cranks. The bloodstained fingerprints on the paperback book–the one hard piece of physical evidence–had been scrutinized by fingerprint experts, then computer fed and teletyped to every police agency in the continental United States, with astoundingly negative results: The partial index and pinky prints could not be attributed to anyone, anywhere, meaning that the killer had never been arrested, never been a member of the armed services or civil service, never been bonded, and had never applied for a driver’s license in thirty-seven of the fifty United States.

Lloyd felt his thesis take on the form of what he called the “Black Dahlia Syndrome,” a reference to the famous unsolved 1947 mutilation murder. He was certain that Julia Lynn Niemeyer had been killed by an intelligent middle-aged man who had never killed before, a man with a low sex drive who had somehow come in contact with Julia Niemeyer, whose persona somehow triggered his long dormant psychoses, and eventually led him to plan her murder carefully. He knew also that the man was physically strong and capable of maneuvering on a broad-based societal level: a solid citizen type who could also score heroin.

Lloyd was impressed with both killer and the challenge his capture presented. He surveyed the post office crowd at random, then shifted his gaze back to Box 7512. He felt his impatience grow. If the “tall blonde woman” didn’t show by lunchtime, he would smash the box open and rip it off by the hinges.

She showed an hour later. Lloyd sensed that it was she as soon as she walked through the broad glass doors and nervously made for the aisles of boxes. A tall, strong-featured woman whose manner was like a barely controlled scream, he could almost feel her body tension as she looked fearfully in all directions, inserted her key and withdrew a handful of mail, then ran back outside.

Lloyd came up behind her as she was opening the door of a double-parked Pinto Hatchback. She turned around as she heard his footsteps, her hand flying to her mouth when she saw the badge he was holding up at eye level. Transfixed by the badge, the woman flopped against the car and let the handful of mail drop to the street.

Lloyd bent down and picked it up. "Police officer," he said quietly.

"Oh, Jesus," she said. "Vice?"

Lloyd said, "No, Homicide. It's about Julia Niemeyer."

An angry flush came over the woman's face. "Jesus," she said, "that's a relief. I was going to call you. I suppose you want to talk?"

Lloyd smiled; the woman had a certain panache. "We can't talk here," he said, "and I don't want to subject you to a police station. Do you mind driving somewhere?"

"No," the woman said, adding "Officer" with the thinnest edge of contempt.

Lloyd told her to drive south to Hancock Park. En route he learned that she was Joanie Pratt, age 42, former dancer, singer, actress, waitress, Playboy Club Bunny, model, and kept woman.

"What are you doing now?" he asked as she pulled into the Hancock Park parking lot.

"It's illegal," Joanie Pratt said, smiling.

"I don't care," Lloyd said, smiling back.

"Okay, I deal Quaaludes and fuck for selected older guys who don't want to get involved."

Lloyd laughed and pointed to a collection of plaster dinosaurs standing on a grassy knoll a few yards from the Tar Pits. "Let's go talk," he said.

When they were seated on the grass, Lloyd bored in, describing Julia Niemeyer's corpse in hideously graphic detail. Joanie Pratt turned white, then red and started to sob. Lloyd made no move to comfort her. When her tears subsided, he said softly, "I want this animal. I know about the ads you and Julia placed in the sex papers. I don't care if the two of you have fucked half of L.A. or the kangaroos in the San Diego Zoo or each other. I don't give a fuck if you deal dope, snort dope, shoot dope, or turn little kids on to dope. I want to know everything that you know about Julia Niemeyer: her love life, her sex life, and why she put those ads in those papers. Have you got that?"

Joanie nodded mutely. Lloyd dug a handkerchief out of his coat pocket and handed it to her. She wiped her face and said, "All right, it's like this. I was in the Hollywood Library about three months ago, returning some books. I notice this good-looking chick standing in line next to me, checking out all these scholarly books on sex–Kraft-Ebbing, Kinsey, The Hite Report. I crack a joke to the girl, who turns out to be Julia. Anyway, we go outside and smoke a cigarette and talk–about sex. Julia tells me she's researching sexuality–that she wants to write a book about it. I share my racy past with her, and tell her I've got this gig going–floating swingers' parties. It's kind of a scam–I know some heavyweight real estate people, and I score dope for them in exchange for letting me sublet these really primo houses when the owners are out of town. Then I place ads in the sex papers–high, high line sex parties. Two hundred dollars a couple–to keep the riffraff out. I provide good food and dope, music and a light show. Anyway, Julia–she's obsessed with sex, but she doesn't fuck–she's just a sex scholar…"

Joanie paused, and lit a cigarette. When Lloyd nervously blurted out, “Go on,” she said, “Anyway, Julia wants to interview the people at my parties. I tell her ‘fuck no! These people are paying goood money to come, and they don’t want to be hassled by some sex-obsessed interviewer.’ So Julia says, ‘Look. I’ve got lots of money. I’ll pay for people to come to the parties, and I’ll interview them there, as their price for admission. That way, I can watch them have sex.’ Anyway, that’s why Julia placed those ads. People contacted her, and she offered to pay their way to the parties if they consented to interviews.”

Lloyd was riveted, staring into Joanie Pratt’s pale blue eyes until she started to wave a hand in front of his face. “Come back to earth there, Sergeant. You look like you just took a trip to Mars.”

Lloyd felt vague instincts clicking into place. He brushed Joanie’s hand away. “Go on.”

“Okay, Mars Man. Anyway, Julia conducted her interviews and watched people fuck until she was blue in the face. She wrote out tons of notes and had the first draft of her book completed when her pad was burglarized and her manuscript and all her notes and files were stolen. She tol—”

“What!” Lloyd screamed.

Joanie leaped back, startled. “Whoa there, Sarge. Let me finish. This was about a month ago. The pad was ransacked. Her stereo and TV and a thousand dollars in cash were stolen. She…”

Lloyd interrupted. “Did she report it to the police?”

Joanie shook her head. “No, I told her not to. I told her she could always rewrite her book from memory and do some more interviews. I didn’t want any cops nosing around us. Cops are notorious moralists, and they might have gotten wind of my scam. But listen. About a week before she died, Julia told me she had the feeling she was being followed. There was this man that she used to see in all these odd places–on the street, in restaurants, in the market. He never stared at her or anything like that, but she had this feeling he was stalking her.”

Lloyd went cold all over. “Did she recognize the man from the parties?”

“She said she couldn’t be sure.”

Lloyd was silent for a long moment. “Do you have any of the letters Julia received?”

Joanie shook her head. “No, just the ones I picked up today.”

Lloyd stuck out his hand, and Joanie withdrew the letters from her purse. He stared at her, tapping the collection of envelopes against his leg. “When are you having your next party?”

Joanie lowered her eyes. “Tonight.”

Lloyd said, “Good. I’m going to attend. You’re going to be my date.”

The party was in a three story A-frame nestled at the end of a cul-de-sac on the Valley side of the Hollywood Hills. Lloyd wore cuffed chino pants, penny loafers, a striped polo shirt, and a crew-neck sweater over his .38 snubnose, prompting Joanie Pratt to exclaim, “Jesus, Sarge! This is a swing party, not a high school sock hop! Where’s my corsage?”

“It’s in my pants,” he said.

Joanie laughed, then ran hooded eyes over his body. “Nice. You gonna fuck tonight? You’ll get offers.”

"No, I'm saving it for the senior prom. You want to show me around?"

They walked through the house. All the furniture in the living room and dining room had been moved up against the walls, and the carpets had been rolled up and wadded ceiling high next to a row of low tables where cold cuts, hors d'oeuvres, and canned cocktails in bowls of ice were arrayed. Joanie said, "Buffet and dance floor. There's a primo stereo system with a hook-up to speakers all over the house." She pointed to lighting fixtures hung from the ceiling. "The stereo is hooked up to the lights, so the music and the lights work together. It's wild." She took his hand and led him upstairs. The two upper floors contained bedrooms and dens on either side of a winding hallway. Red lights blinked on and off above the open doors, and Lloyd could see that inside the entire floor space of each room was covered by mattresses with pink silk sheets.

Joanie poked him in the ribs. "I hire these wetbacks from the slave market on Skid Row. They do all the heavy lifting. I give them ten bucks before the party, then twenty bucks and a bottle of tequila when they move all the furniture back. What's the matter, Sarge? You're scowling."

"I don't know," Lloyd said, "but it's funny. I'm here looking for a killer, this whole 'party' is probably against the law, and I think I'm happier than I've been in a long time."

The celebrants started to arrive half an hour later. Lloyd briefed Joanie on what he wanted–she was to circulate, and point out any people she recognized as having been interviewed by or having seemed interested in Julia Niemeyer. She was to report to him all men who even mentioned Julia or her recent demise. She was also to report anything that seemed darkly incongruous, anything that violated her self-described party ethos of "Good music, good dope, good fucking"; no one was to know that he was a police officer.

Lloyd stationed himself behind the two burly bouncers scrutinizing incoming guests and collecting their invitations. The partygoers, coupled off to insure an even ratio of partners, seemed to him to be the very microcosm of jaded money–the finest clothes in the latest styles over unfit, tension-ridden bodies, the men middle-aged and afraid of it, the women looking hard, competitive, and brassy in the worst camped-out faggot manner. As the bouncers locked and bolted the door behind the last arrivals, Lloyd felt that he had just viewed a perfect impressionist representation of hell. His left knee was twitching in reaction to it, and when he walked back to the buffet he knew that he would need every ounce of the love in his Irish Protestant ethos to keep from hating them.

He decided to play the jocular stud. As Joanie Pratt brushed by him, he whispered to her, "Make it look like we're together."

Joanie closed her eyes. Lloyd bent in slow motion to kiss her, his hands reaching out and grasping her waist and lifting her so that her feet dangled inches above the floor. Their lips and tongues met and played in perfect unison. Whistling and good natured jibes drowned out Lloyd's furious heartbeat, and when he broke the kiss and lowered Joanie to the floor he felt he had conquered the jaded assembly with love.

"That's all, folks," he said with a mock humble twang, patting Joanie on the shoulder. "You folks all have a good time. I have to go upstairs and rest." Wild applause greeted this irony, and he ran for the staircase.

Lloyd found a bedroom at the far end of the third story hallway. He locked himself in, feeling proud of his performance, yet ashamed of its ease and dumbfounded by the fact that he was starting to like the revelers downstairs. He sat down on the pink sheeted mattress and dug out the letters that Joanie had given him–the last correspondence delivered to P.O. Box 7512. He had planned to go over them later, aided by Joanie, but now he needed work to keep his almost heart-stricken ambivalence at bay.

The first two envelopes contained underground junk mail, form letters advertising king-size electric dildos and bondage attire. The third envelope was hand-printed. Lloyd looked more closely and noticed that the letters in the address were perfectly squared off, obviously formed by pen and ruler. His mind clicked, and he held the envelope gently by the edges and slit it open with a deft thrust of his fingernail. It contained a poem, block ruler printed in maroon ink. Lloyd tilted the page sideways. Something about the ink bothered him. Letting the paper wobble in front of his eyes, he realized that the maroon ink was starting to flake, revealing a brighter shade underneath. He deliberately smudged a stanza, then smelled his finger and felt his mind click a second time: The poem was written in blood.
